Preface:
To the New and Enlarged Edition of
"Phrase and Table" 1844

It is now about a quarter of a century since the first edition of "Phrase and Table" was published; and the continuous sale of the book is a proof that it supplies a want very largely felt.

In the interval much new information has been unearthed in the subjects treated of in the Dictionary; many errors of philology have been exposed, and an accumulation has been reached which was almost impossible when the book was first undertaken more than 30 years ago. During this length of period time the book or its manuscript has been always at the author's disposal; that new matter might be laid on store, errors corrected, and suggestions utilized to render the work more generally useful, and more thoroughly to be depended on.

It has been thought by those concerned that, as the author is now in the 85th year of his age, it would be desirable for him finally to overhaul the entire book, from beginning to end, and to substitute new articles for less useful ones as addition and corrections, and to substitute new articles for less useful ones and omission; so that this "New and Enlarged Edition" is practically a new work on the old lines.

The last ten years of the Nineteenth Century have been preeminently distinguished for researches in English philology. More dictionaries on our gigantic and magnificent language have been published in this decade than in any preceding one, and thousands of able scholars in Great Britain and America have contributed to improve their character, so that now our dictionary... of any other language can touch even the fringe of our best English epistles of a single spoken by more than a hundred millions of the earth's inhabitants. The research, the accuracy, the precision now demanded are quite unprecedented, and the great public interest taken on the matter might justify our calling the period "The Era of English Philostry."

In this present "New and Enlarged Edition" of this "Dictionary of Pعلو and Table" advantage has been taken of this great literary movement from every available source. More than one-third of the book consists of new material. Some 350 extra pages have been added, and all that has been retained of previous editions has been subjected to the severest scrutiny.

Thanks are most deservedly due, and are due most gratefully, tendered to the many hundreds of correspondents who have written to the author on the subjects contained in the book. Some have been specialists; some have suggested new articles; some have sent apt quotations; and others have gone diligently through the elbows in their procession from beginning to end, and have sent their observations to the author, with permission to use them according to his judgment.

Of these last, special mention should be made of the Rev. Arthur
M. Bendall, M.A., of Eton College, Nelson Mabury, Archdeacon of Bath, Mr. Edward Stearn, Bishop's palace; a most judicious and hand-taking critic; of George Morton Craig, Principal of Moral Academy Birkenhead; of Richard Jackson, a well-known author, and of a Parliamentary Clerk whose name I have not obtained permission to publish.

To set down the names of those whose correspondence fills a box of no inconceivable size, would serve no useful purpose, and would not interest the general reader; but I may, without vanity, be hoped, with all their help, and all the pains of the author, in more than half a century, that this "Treasury of Literature" or a "Guide" will become a standard book of reference, and a guide to be relied on.

G. S. Crook. Brewer.

Edinburgh, Nov. 15.
Autumn 1874.
A. This letter is modified from the Hebrew aleph (א) (אֵלֶּף = an ox), which was meant to indicate the outline of an ox's head.

ṣ in Egyptian is denoted by the hieroglyph which represents the ibis. Among the Greeks it was the symbol of a bad augury in the sacrifices. ṣ in logia is the symbol of a universal affirmative. ṣ asserts, ṣ denies. Thus, syllogisms in हस हस contain three universal affirmative propositions.

A1 means first-rate—the very best. In Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, the character of the ship's hull is designated by letters, and that of the anchors, cables, and stores by figures. A1 means hull first-rate, and also anchors, cables, and stores: A2, hull first-rate, but furniture second-rate. Vessels of an inferior character are classified under the letters 2, 3, and 4.

"She is a prize girl, she is, and is A1"—Sam Slick.

A.B. (See Able.)

A.B.C. = Aerated Bread Company.

A B C Book. A primer, a book in which articles are set in alphabetical order, as the A B C Railway Guide. The old Primer contained the Catechism, as is evident from the lines:—

"That is question now
And then comes answer like an A B C book."

Shakespeare: King John, 1. 1

A.B.C. Process (Thf) of making artificial manure. An acrostic of Alum, Blood, Clay, the three chief ingredients.

A.B.C.O.U. The device adopted by Frederick V., Archduke of Austria (the Emperor Frederick III. — 1440–1493).

Austria Est Imperare Orbis Ventorum. All's Unity is the Austrian Unifier. Austria's Empire Is Overall Universal.

To which was added after the war of 1836,

Austria's Emperor Is Ousted Utterly.

Frederick II. of Prussia is said to have translated the motto thus:—

"Austria salt in orbis ultima" (Austria will one day be lonely in the world)."
Aback. I was taken aback—I was greatly astonished—taken by surprise—startled. It is a sea term. A ship is "taken aback" when the sails are suddenly carried by the wind back against the mast, instantly staying the ship's progress—very dangerous in a strong gale.

Abacus. A small frame with wires stretched across it. Each wire contains ten movable balls, which can be shifted backwards or forwards, so as to vary the number in two or more blocks. It is used to teach children addition and subtraction.

The ancient Greeks and Romans employed it for calculations, and so do the Chinese. The word is derived from the Phoen. abak (dust); the Orientals used tables covered with dust for ciphering and diagrams. In Turkish schools this method is still used for teaching writing. The multiplication table invented by Pythagoras is called Abacus Pythagoricus. (Latin, abacus; Greek, ébaik.)

Abaddon. The angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix. 11). The Hebrew abadd means "he perished!"

"The angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon."—Junius.

Abambo. The evil spirit of the Gamma tribes in Africa. A fire is always burning in his house. He is supposed to have the power of causing sickness and death.

Abandon means put at anyone's orders; hence, to give up. (Latin, ad to; hann-un, late Latin for "a decree.")

Abandon fait larron. As opportunity makes the thief, the person who neglects to take proper care of his goods, leads into temptation, hence the proverb, "Neglect leads to theft."

Abaris. The dart of Abaris. Abaris, the Scythian, was a priest of Apollo; and the god gave him a golden arrow on which to ride through the air. This dart rendered him invisible; it also cured diseases, and gave oracles. Abaris gave it to Pythagoras.

"The dart of Abaris carried the philosopher wheresoe'er he desired it."—Wiltshire.

Abate (2 syl.) means properly to knock down. (French, abatter, whence a battue, i.e., wholesale destruction of game; O.E. a-bedan.)

Abate, in horsemanship, is to perform well the downward motion. A horse is said to abate when, working upon curves, he lifts or beats down both his hind legs to the ground at once, and keeps exact time.

Abatement, in heraldry, is a mark of dishonour annexed to coat armour, whereby the honour of it is abated.

Abaton. (Greek a, not; baino, I go.) An inaccessible as Abaddon. Artemisia, to commemorate her conquest of Rhodes, erected two statues in the island, one representing herself, and the other emblematical of Rhodes. When the Rhodians recovered their liberty they looked upon this monument as a kind of palladium, and to prevent its destruction surrounded it with a fortified enclosure which they called Abaton, or the inaccessible place. (Lucan speaks of an island difficult of access in the fens of Memphis, called Abaton.)

Abdassides (3 syl.). A dynasty of caliphs who reigned from 750-1258. The name is derived from Abbas, uncle of Mahomet. The most celebrated of them was Haroun-al-Raschid (born 763, reigned 786-808).

Abbaye Laird (Au). An insolvent debtor sheltered by the precincts of Holyrood Abbey.

"As diligence cannot be proceeded with on Sunday, the Abbey Laids (as they were properly called) were enabled to come forth on that day to mince in our society. "—R. Chambers.

Abbaye-lubber (Au). An idle, well-fed dependent or loafer.

"It came into a common proverb to call him an Abbey-loofer, that was idle, well-fed, a low, illiterate, bitter-hunter, that might work or would not."—The Diary of Daniel, 1623.

It is used also of religions in contempt; see Dryden's Spanish Frier.

Abbot of Mursule, or Lord of Mursule. A person who used to superintend the Christmas diversions. In France the "Abbot of Mursule" was called L'abbé de Liesse (jollity). In Scotland the master of revels was called the "Master of Unreason."

Abbotsford. A name given by Sir Walter Scott to Clarty Gill, on the south bank of the Tweed, after it became his residence. Sir Walter devised the name from a fancy he loved to indulge in, that the abbeys of Melrose Abbey, in ancient times, passed over the foords of the Tweed.

Abd in Arabic = slave or servant, as Abd-Allah (servant of God), Abd-el-Kader (servant of the Mighty One), Abd-Abdæl (2 syl.). George Monk, third Duke of Albemarle.

"A brave Abdæl of the prophet's school was placed:
Abdæl, with all his father's virtues grace,
Without one Hebrew's blood, restored the crown.
— Byron and Tatt: Abdon and Ach TOUCH, Part II.

Abdallah, the father of Mahomet, was so beautiful, that when he married Aminah, 200 virgins broke their hearts from disappointed love.—Washington Irving: Life of Mahomet.

Abdallah. Brother and predecessor of Giasir, pacha of Abydus. He was murdered by Giasir (2 syl.).—Byron: Bride of Abydus.

Abdala. Persian fanatics, who think it a merit to kill anyone of a different religion; and if slain in the attempt, are accounted martyrs.

Abdera. A maritime town of Thrace, said in fable to have been founded by Abdëra, sister of Diomede. It was so overrun with rats that it was abandoned, and the Abderitans migrated to Macedonia.

Abderitan. A native of Abdéra, a maritime city of Thrace. The Abderitans were proverbial for stupidity, hence the phrase, "You have no more mind than an Abderite." Yet the city gave birth to some of the wisest men of Greece: as Democritus (the laughing philosopher), Protagoras (the great sophist), Anaxarchus (the philosopher and friend of Alexander), Heracleas (the historian), etc.

Abderitan Laughter. Scolding laughter, incessant laughter. So called from Abdéra, the birthplace of Democritos, the laughing philosopher.

Abderite (3 syl.). A scoffer, so called from Democritos.

Abderus. One of Herakles's friends, devoured by the horses of Diomede. Diomede gave him his horses to hold, and they devoured him.

Abdiel. The faithful seraph who withstood Satan when he urged the angels to revolt. (See Paradise Lost, Bk. v., lines 896, etc.)

"He adhered with the faith of Abdiel, to the ancient form of adoration." —Sir W. Scott.

Abeddanger. One who teaches or is learning his A B C.

Abecedarian hymns. Hymns which began with the letter A, and each verse or clause following took up the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. (See Acrostic PoetrY.)

Abel and Cain. The Mahometan tradition of the death of Abel is this: Cain was born with a twin sister who was named Aclima, and Abel with a twin sister named Junella. Adam wished Cain to marry Abel's twin sister, and Abel to marry Cain's. Cain would not consent to this arrangement, and Adam proposed to refer the question to God by means of a sacrifice. God rejected Cain's sacrifice to signify his disapproval of his marriage with Aclima, his twin sister, and Cain slew his brother in a fit of jealousy.

Abel Keena. A village schoolmaster, afterwards a merchant's clerk. He was led astray, lost his place, and hanged himself.—Cabby: Borough, Letter xxi.

Abelites (3 syl.). Abelites, or Abeldonians. A Christian sect of the fourth century, chiefly found in Hippo (N. Africa). They married, but lived in continence, as they affirm Abel did. The sect was maintained by adopting the children of others. No children of Abel being mentioned in Scripture, the Abelites assume that he had none.

Abesca. The impersonation of Abbeys and Convents, represented by Spenser as a damsel. When Una asked if she had seen the Red Cross Knight, Abessa, frightened at the lion, ran to the cottage of blind Superstition, and shut the door. Una arrived, and the lion burst the door open. The meaning is, that at the Reformation, when Truth came, the abbeys and convents got alarmed, and would not let Truth enter, but England (the lion) broke down the door.—Fairy Queen, i. 3.

Abesta. A book said to have been written by Abraham as a commentary on the Zend and the Puzend. It is furthermore said that Abraham read these three books in the midst of the furnace into which he was cast by Nimrod. Persian Mythology.

Abeyance really means something gaped after (French, breyer, to gape). The allusion is to men standing with their mouths open, in expectation of some sight about to appear.

Abhig. The propitiatory sacrifice made by an Indian rajah who has slain a priest without premeditation.

Abhor' (Latin, ab, away from, and horre, to shrink; originally, to shudder,

Abiola. Wife of Makumbi; African deity. She holds a pistol in her hand, and is greatly feared. Her aid is implored in sickness.

Abida. A god of the Kalmucks, who receives the souls of the dead at the moment of decease, and gives them permission to enter a new body, either human or not, and have another spell of life on earth. If the spirit is spotless it may, if it likes, rise and live in the air.

Abidharma. The book of metaphysics in the Tripitaka (a.r.).

Abigail. A lady's maid, or lady-maid. Abigail, wife of Nabal, who introduced herself to David and afterwards married him, is a well-known Scripture heroine (1 Sam. xxv. 3). Abigail was a popular middle class Christian name in the seventeenth century. Beaumont and Fletcher, in The Nausicaa (or Wrinew Moum Lady, call the "waiting gentlewoman" Abigail, a name employed by Swift, Fielding, and others, in their novels. Probably "Abigail Hill," the original name of Mrs. Mashum, waiting-woman to Queen Anne, popularised the name.

Abimelech is no proper name, but a regal title of the Philistines, meaning Father-king.

Able. An able seaman is a skilled seaman. Such a man is termed an A.B. (Able-bodied); unskilled seamen are called "boys" without regard to age.

Able-bodied Seaman. A sailor of the first class. A crew is divided into three classes: (1) able seamen, or skilled sailors, termed A.B.; (2) ordinary seamen; and (3) boys, which include green hands, or inexperienced men, without regard to age or size.

Aboard. He fell aboard of me—met me; abused me. A ship is said to fall aboard another when, being in motion, it runs against the other.

To go aboard is to embark, to go on the board or dock.

Aboard main tack is to draw one of the lower corners of the main-sail down to the chess-tree. Figuratively, it means "to keep to the point."

Abollia. An ancient military garment worn by the Greeks and Romans, opposed to the tunic or robe of peace. The abollia being worn by the lower orders, was affected by philosophers in the vanity of humility.

Abominate (abominor, I pray that the omen may be avoided; used on mentioning anything unlucky). As ill-omened things are disliked, so, by a simple figure of speech, what we dislike we consider ill-omened.

Abomination of Desolation (The). The Roman standard is so called (Matt. xxiv. 15). As it was set up in the holy temple, it was an abomination; and, as it brought destruction, it was the "abomination of desolation."

Abon Hassan. A rich merchant, transferred during sleep to the bed and palace of the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid. Next morning he was treated as the caliph, and every effort was made to make him forget his identity. Arabian Nights ("The Sleeper Awakened"). The same trick was played on Christopher Sly, in the Induction of Shakespeare's comedy of Taming of the Shrew; and, according to Burton (Anatomy of Melancholy, 2, 4), by Philippe the Good, Duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanor.

"Went I caliph for a day, as honest Abon Hassan, I would scourge me these quarters out of the Commonwealth."—Sir Walter Scott.

Abondo (Dame). The French Santa Claus, the good fairy who comes at night to bring toys to children while they sleep, especially on New Year's Day.

Abortive Flowers are those which have stamens but no pistils.

Abou Abn Sina, commonly called Avicenna. A great Persian physician, born at Shiraz, whose canons of medicine were those adopted by Hippocrates and Aristotle. Died 1037.

Abou-Bekr, called Father of the Virgin, i.e., Mahomet's favourite wife. He was the first caliph, and was founder of the sect called the Sunnites. (571-634.)

Abou Jahia. The angel of death in Mohammedan mythology. Called Azrael by the Arabs, and Mordad by the Persians.

Abouleumr (in Mohammedan mythology). A fabulous bird of the vulture sort which lives 1,000 years. Called by the Persians Kerkés, and by the Turks Ak-Baba.—Herbert.

Above properly applies only to matter on the same page, but has been extended

In a straightforward manner. Conjurers place their hands under the table when they are preparing their tricks, but above when they show them. "Let all be above-board" means "let there be no under-hand work, but let us see everything."

Above par. A commercial term meaning that the article referred to is more than its nominal value. Thus, if you must give more than £100 for a £100 share in a bank company, a railway share, or other stock, we say the stock is "above par."

If, on the other hand, a nominal £100 worth can be bought for less than £100, we say the stock is "below par."

Figuratively, a person in low spirits or ill health says he is "below par."

Above your hook—i.e., beyond your comprehension; beyond your mark. The allusion is to hat-peg placed in rows; the higher rows are above the reach of small statures.

Abracadabra. A charm. It is said that Abracadabra was the supreme deity of the Assyrians. Q. Severus Sarmonicus recommended the use of the word as a powerful antidote against ague, flux, and toothache. The word was to be written on parchment, and suspended round the neck by a linen thread, in the form given below:

Abracax, also written Abraxas or Abrahex, in Persian mythology denotes the Supreme Being. In Greek notation it stands for 365. In Persian mythology Abracax presides over 365 impersonated virtues, one of which is supposed to prevail on each day of the year. In the second century the word was employed by the Basilidians for the deity; it was also the principle of the Gnostic hierarchy, and that from which sprang their numerous "Eons." (See Abraxas Stones.)

Abraham.

His parents. According to Mohammedan mythology, the parents of Abraham were Prince Azar and his wife, Adna.

His infancy. As King Nimrod had been told that one shortly to be born would dethrone him, he commanded the death of all such; so Adna retired to a cave where Abraham was born. He was nourished by sucking two of her fingers, one of which supplied milk and the other honey.

His boyhood. At the age of fifteen months he was equal in size to a lad of fifteen, and very wise; so his father introduced him to the court of King Nimrod.—Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale.

His offering. According to Mohammedan tradition, the mountain on which Abraham offered up his son was Arfaday; but is more generally thought to have been Moriah.

His death. The Ghebers say that Abraham was thrown into the fire by Nimrod's order, but the flame turned into a bed of roses, on which the child Abraham went to sleep.—Tarcurier.

"Sweet and wholesome as the bed
For their own infant prophet spread,
When pitying Heaven to roses turned
The deadly-flames that beneath him burned."—T. Moore: "The Worshippers."

To Sham Abraham. To pretend illness or distress, in order to get off work. (See Abraham-man.)

"I have heard people say, 'Sham Abraham you may,
But must not sham Abraham Newland.'—T. Delia or Upton.

Abraham Newland was cusheir of the Bank of England, and signed the notes.

Abraham's Bosom. The repose of the happy in death (Luke xvi. 22). The figure is taken from the ancient custom of allowing a dear friend to recline at dinner on your bosom. Thus the beloved John reclined on the bosom of Jesus. There is no leaping from Britiah's lap into Abraham's bosom—i.e., those who live and die in notorious sin must not expect to go to heaven at death.—Boston: "Crock in the Cot."

Abraham Newland (As). A bank-note. So called because, in the early part of the nineteenth century, none were genuine but those signed by this name.

Abrahamic Covenant. The covenant made by God with Abraham, that Messiah should spring from his seed. This promise was given to Abraham, because he left his country and father's house to live in a strange land, as God told him.

Abrahaimites (4 syl.). Certain Bohemian deists, so called because they Professed to believe what Abraham believed before he was circumcised. The sect was forbidden by the Emperor Joseph II. in 1788.

Abraham-colour. Probably a corruption of Abram, meaning auburn. Halliwell quotes the following from Coriolanus, ii. 3: "Our heads are some brown, some black, some Abram, some laid." And again, "Where is the eldest son of Priam, the Abraham-coloured Trojan?" "A goodly, long, thick Abram-coloured beard."—Leslie, Master Constable.

Hall, in his Satires, iii. 5, uses Abram for auburn.

"A lusty chamber... with Abram locks was fairly furnished."

Abram-Man. or Abraham Cove. A Tom o' Bedlam; a naked vagabond; a beggar imposter.

The Abraham Ward, in Bedlam, had for its inmates beggars lunatics, who used to array themselves in party-coloured ribbons, tape in their hats, a fox-tail hanging down, a long stick with streamers, and beg alms; but "for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along."

—Canning Academy.

See King Lear, ii. 3.

In Beaumont and Fletcher we have several synonyms:

"And these, whose name of little c's, they bear,\nJackman or Polite, culpa or Cape-puddling,\nFraser or Abram-man, I speak to all."—Dryden's Book, ii. 1

Abraxas Stones. Stones with the word Abraxas engraved on them, and used as talismans. They were cut into symbolic figures combining a fowl's head, a serpent's body, and human limbs. (See Abracax.)

Abraçadabra. Side by side, the breasts being all in a line.

The ships were all abreast: i.e., their heads were all equally advanced, as soldiers marching abreast.

Abridge. is not formed from the word bridge, but comes from the Latin abbreviare, to shorten, from brevis (short), through the French abréger (to shorten).

Abrochar. To set much of abrochar is to set it afoot. The figure is from a cask of liquor, which is breached so that the liquor may be drawn from it. (Fr., broucher, to prick, abrochar.)

Abroad. You are all abroad. Wide of the mark; not at home with the subject. "Abroad; in all directions."

"An elm displays her dandy arms abroad."—Dryden.

Abrogate. When the Roman senate wanted a law to be passed, they asked the people to give their votes in its favour. The Latin for this is revigare legem (to solicit or propose a law). If they wanted a law repealed, they asked the people to vote against it; this was abrogare legem (to solicit against the law).

Abraham. James, Duke of Monmouth, the handsome but rebellious son of Charles II. in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1689-1693).

Absalom and Achitophel. A political satire by Dryden (1649-1693). David is meant for Charles II.; Absalom for his natural son James, Duke of Monmouth, handsome like Absalom, and, like him, rebellious. Achitophel is meant for Lord Shaftesbury, Zimri for the Duke of Buckingham, and Abdael for Monk. The selections are so skilfully made that the history of David seems repeated. Of Absalom, Dryden says (Part i.):—

"While 'er he did was done with so much ease,\nIn him alone I was natural to please;\nHis motions all accompanied with grace,\nAnd paradise was opened in his face."

Abscond. means properly to hide; but we generally use the word in the sense of stealing off secretly from an employer. (Latin, abscond.)

Absent. "Out of mind as soon as out of sight." Generally misquoted "Out of sight, out of mind."—Lord Brooke.

The absent are always wrong. The translation of the French proverb, Les absents ont toujours tort.

Absent Man (The). The character of Brouyer's Absent Man, translated in the Spectator and exhibited on the stage, is a caricature of Comte de Brancas.

Absolute. A Captain Absolute, a bold, despotic man, determined to have his own way. The character is in Sheridan's play called The Rivals.

Sir Anthony Absolute, a warm-hearted, testy, overbearing country squire, in the same play. William Dowton (1764-1851) was nick-named "Sir Anthony Absolute."

Absquatulate. To run away or abscond. A comic American word, from ab and squat (to go away from your squattering). A squatting is a tenement taken in some unclaimed part, without purchase or permission. The persons who take up their squatting are termed squatters.
Aoadia. According to Fabius and Aulus Gellius, the compound of ab and temetum. "Temetum" was a strong intoxicating drink, allied to the Greek methe (strong drink).

"Vitam praeceps linguam temetum appellabant."—Aulus Gellius, N. 23.

Abstract Numbers are numbers considered abstractly—1, 2, 3; but if we say 1 year, 2 feet, 3 men, etc., the numbers are no longer abstract, but concrete.

Taken in the abstract. Things are said to be taken in the abstract when they are considered absolutely, that is, without reference to other matters or persons. Thus, in the abstract, one man is as good as another, but not so socially and politically.

Abstraction. An empty Abstraction, a mere ideal, of no practical use. Every noun is an abstraction, but the narrower genera may be raised to higher ones, till the common thread is so fine that hardly anything is left. These high abstractions, from which everything but one common idea is taken, are called empty abstractions.

For example, man is a genus, but may be raised to the genus animal, thence to organised being, thence to created being, thence to matter in the abstract, and so on, till everything but one is emptied out.

Absurd means strictly, quite deaf. (Latin, ab, intensive, and surus, deaf.)

Reduction ad absurdum. Proving a proposition to be right by showing that every supposable deviation from it would involve an absurdity.

Abu'dah. A merchant of Baghdad, haunted every night by an old hag; he finds at last that the way to rid himself of this torment is to "fear God, and keep his commandments."—Tales of the Calif.

"Like Abu'dah, he is always looking out for the Fun, and knows that the night will come with the inevitable hag with it."—Thom Kier.

Abundant Number (Ab). A number such that the sum of all its divisors (except itself) is greater than the number itself. Thus 12 is an abundant number, because its divisors, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 = 16, which is greater than 12.

A Deficient number is one of which the sum of all its divisors is less than itself, as 10, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 5 = 8, which is less than 10.

A Perfect number is one of which the sum of all its divisors exactly measures itself, as 6, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 3 = 6.

Abus, the river Humber.

"For by the river that why long was bright
The saintly Abus..."—(was from)

Their chaste, Humber, named bright."

And Drayton, in his Polyolbion, 25, says:

"For my princely name,
From Humber, king of Hues, as ancienly it came."

Sec Geoffrey's Chronicles, Bk. ii. 2.

Ab'yia. A mountain in Africa, opposite Gibraltar. This, with Calpe in Spain, 16 m. distant, forms the pillars of Hercules.

"Heaves up like Abysso Afric's sand, Crown'd with much Calpe Europe's silent strand."—Darwin: Economy of Vegetation.

Abyssinians. A sect of Christians in Abyssinia, who admit only one nature in Jesus Christ, and reject the Council of Chalcedon.

Acac'eus. One who does nothing badly. It was a name given to Mercury or Hermes for his eloquence. (Greek, w, not; kakos, bad.)

Academical. The followers of Plato were so called, because they attended his lectures in the Academy, a garden planted by Academus.

"See there the olive grove of Academus, Plato's retreat."—Milton: Paradise Lost, Book IV.

Academy. Divided into—Old, the philosophic teaching of Plato and his immediate followers; Middle, a modification of the Platonic system, taught by Arcesilaus; New, the half-sceptical school of Carneades.

Plato taught that matter is eternal and infinite, but without form or order; and that there is an intelligent cause, the author of everything. He maintained that we could grasp truth only so far as we had elevated our mind by thought to its divine essence.

Arcesilaus was the great antagonist of the Stoics, and wholly denied man's capacity for grasping truth.

Carneades maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding could supply us with a sure criterion of truth.

The talent of the Academy, so Plato called Aristotle (B.C. 384-322).

Academy Figures. Drawings in black and white chalk, on tinted paper, from living models, used by artists. So called from the Royal Academy of Artists.

Acad'ia—i.e., Nova Scotia, so called by the French from the river Skaben- acadie. The name was changed in 1621.
Acadine. A fountain of Sicily which revealed if writings were authentic and genuine or not. The writings to be tested were thrown into the fountain, and if spurious they sank to the bottom. Oaths and promises were tried in the same way, after being written down.—Diodorus Siculus.

Acanthus. The leafy ornament used in the capitals of Corinthian and Composite columns. It is said that Callimaches lost his daughter, and set a basket of flowers on her grave, with a tile to keep the wind from blowing it away. The next time he went to visit the grave an acanthus had sprung up around the basket, which so struck the fancy of the architect that he introduced the design in his buildings.

Acceptance. A bill or note accepted. Thus is done by the drawer writing on it "accepted," and signing his name. The person who accepts it is called the "acceptor."

Accessory. Accessory before the fact is one who is aware that another intends to commit an offence, but is himself absent when the offence is perpetrated.

Accessory after the fact is one who screens a felon, aids him in eluding justice, or helps him in any way to profit by his crime. Thus, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing or even suspecting them to be stolen, is an accessory ex post facto.

Accident. A legal accident is some property or quality which a thing possesses, but which does not essentially belong to it, as the tint of our skin, the height of our body, the redness of a brick, or the whiteness of paper. If any of these were changed, the substance would remain intact.

Accidental or Subjective Colours. Those which depend on the state of our eye, and not those which the object really possesses. Thus, after looking at the bright sun, all objects appear dark; that dark colour is the accidental colour of the bright sun. When, again, we come from a dark room, all objects at first have a yellow tinge. This is especially the case if we wear blue glasses, for a minute or two after we have taken them off. •

The accidental colour of red is bluish green, of orange dark blue, of violet yellow, of black white; and the converse.

Accidentals in music are those sharps and flats, etc., which do not properly belong to the key in which the music is set, but which the composer arbitrarily introduces.

Accidents (4 syl.) An Italian curse or oath: "Ce qui veut dire en bon français, 'Puisse-tu mourir d'accident, sans confession,' damné."—E. About: Tolla.

Accidents, in theology. After consecration, say the Catholics, the substance of the bread and wine is changed into that of the body and blood of Christ, but their accidents (flavour, appearance, and so on) remain the same as before.

Accius Na'vius. A Roman augur in the reign of Tarquin the Elder. When he forbade the king to increase the number of the tribes without consulting the augurs, Tarquin asked him if the thought then in his mind was feasible. "Undoubtedly," said Accius, "Then cut through this whetstone with the razor in your hand." The priest gave a bold cut, and the block fell in two. This story (from Livy, Bk. i., chap. 36) is humorously retold in Bon Gaultier's Ballads.

Accolade (3 syl.). The touch of a sword on the shoulder in the ceremony of conferring knighthood; originally an embrace or touch by the hand on the neck. (Latin, ad collam, on the neck.)

Accommodation. A loan of money, which accommodates us, or fits a want.

Accommodation Note or Bill. An acceptance given on a Bill of Exchange for which value has not been received by the acceptor from the drawer, and which, not representing a commercial transaction, is so far fictitious.

Accommodation Ladder. The light ladder hung over the side of a ship at the gangway.

Accord means "heart to heart." (Latin, ad coram.) If two persons like and dislike the same things, they are heart to heart with each other.

Similarly, "concord" means heart with heart: "discord," heart divided from heart: "re-cord" properly means to recollect—i.e., re-cordare, to bring again to the mind or heart: then to set down in writing for the purpose of recollecting.

Accost means "come to the side" of a person for the purpose of speaking to him. (Latin, ad contum, to the side.)
Account. To open an account, to enter a customer's name on your ledger for the first time. (Latin, acccipitare, to reckon with.)

To keep open account is when merchants agree to honour each other's bills of exchange.

A current account or "account current, aec. A commercial term, meaning that the customer is entered by name in the creditor's ledger for goods purchased but not paid for at the time. The account runs on for a month or more, according to agreement.

To cast accounts. To give the result of the debts and credits entered, balancing the two, and carrying over the surplus.

A sale for the account in the Stock Exchange means: the sale of stock not for immediate payment, but for the fortnightly settlement. Generally this is speculative, and the broker or customer pays the difference of price between the time of purchase and time of settlement.

We will give a good account of them.—i.e. we will give them a thorough good drubbing.

Accurate means well and carefully done. (Latin, ad-accurère, accuratein,)

Accusative (The). Calvin was so called by his college companions. We speak of an "accusative age," meaning searching, one eliminating error by accusing it.

"This hath been a very accusative age."—Sir E. Burrow.

Ace (1 syl.) The unit of cards or dice, from an, the Latin unit of weight. (Italian, asso; French and Spanish, as.)

Within an ace. Within a shave. An ace is the lowest numeral, and he who wins within an ace, wins within a single mark. (See Amots-As.)

To bat an ace is to make an abatement, or to give a competitor some start or other advantage, in order to render the combatants more equal. It is said that the expression originated in the reign of Henry VIII., when one of the courtiers named Bolton, in order to flatter the king, used to say at cards, "Your Majesty must bat me an ace, or I shall have no chance at all."

Taylor, the water poeta (1580-1651), speaking of certain women, says:

"Though bat they be, they will not take an ace,
To be said Prudence, Temperance, Faith, and Grace."

Accidames. A battle-field, a place where much blood has been shed. To the south of Jerusalem there was a field so called; it was purchased by the priests with the blood-money thrown down by Judas, and appropriated as a cemetery for strangers (Matt. xxvii. 7; Acts ii. 19). (Aramaic, ôkêl-damâ.)

Acephalites (4 syl.) properly means men without a head. (1) A faction among the Eutychians in the fifth century after the submission of Mongus their chief, by which they were "deprived of their head." (2) Certain bishops exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch. (3) A sect of levelers in the reign of Henry I., who acknowledged no leader. (4) The fabulous Blenmyes of Africa, who are described as having no head, their eyes and mouth being placed elsewhere. (Greek, a-kèphalês, without a head.)

Acestes (3 syl.). The Arrow of Acestes. In a trial of skill Acestes, the Sicilian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire. (E. y. 5, line 525.)

"Like an arrow."
The swift thunder kindles as it flies, Long fellow.

Achæan League. A confederacy of the twelve towns of Achaea. It was broken up by Alexander the Great, but was again reorganized b.c. 290, and dissolved by the Romans in 147 B.C.

Achar in Indian philosophy means the All-in-All. The world is spun out of Achar as a web from a spider, and will ultimately return to him, as a spider sometimes takes back into itself its own thread. Phenomena are not independent realities, but merely partial and individual manifestations of the All-in-All.

Achates (3 syl.). A fidus Achates. A faithful companion, a bosom friend. Achates in Virgul's Iliad is the chosen companion of the hero in adventures of all kinds.

"He has chosen this fellow for his fidus Achates."—Sir Walter Scott.

Achamion, or Achmon, and his brother Basalas were two Cercopes for ever quarrelling. One day they saw Hercules asleep under a tree and insulted him, but Hercules tied them by their feet to his club and walked off with them, heads downwards, like a brace of hares. Everyone laughed at the sight, and it became a proverbial cry among the Greeks, when two men were seen quarrelling—"Look out for Melamphygos!" (i.e. Hercules).

"Ne insidias in Melamphygos!

† According to Greek fable, monkeys are degraded men. The Cercopes were changed into monkeys for attempting to deceive Zeus.

Acheron. The "River of Sorrows" (Greek, achos reis) one of the five rivers of the infernal regions.

"Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep." Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 578.

Pabulum Acheronitis. Food for the churchyard; said of a dead body.

Acherontian Books. The most celebrated books of augury in the world. They are the books which the Etruscans received from Tages, grandson of Jupiter.

Acherusia. A cavern on the borders of Pontus, said to lead down to the infernal regions. It was through this cavern that Hercules dragged Cerberus to earth.

Achilles. The Yarrow, called by the French the herbe aux charpentiers—i.e., carpenter’s wart, because it was supposed to heal wounds made by carpenters’ tools. Called Achillia from Achilles, who was taught the uses and virtues of plants by Chiron the centaur. The tale is that when the Greeks invaded Troy, Telphus, a son-in-law of King Priam, attempted to stop their landing, but Bucebus caused him to stumble over a vine, and, when he had fallen, Achilles wounded him with his spear. The young Trojan was told by an oracle that "Achilles (meaning milfoil or yarrow) would cure the wound;" but, instead of seeking the plant, he applied to the Grecian chief, and promised to conduct the host to Troy if he would cure the wound. Achilles consented to do so, scraped some rust from his spear, and from the filings rose the plant milfoil, which, being applied to the wound, had the desired effect.

Achilles (3 syll). King of the Myrmidons (in Thessaly), the hero of Homer’s epic poem called the Iliad. He is represented as brave and ruthless. The poem begins with a quarrel between him and Agamemnon, the commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks; in consequence of which Achilles refused to go to battle. The Trojans prevail, and Achilles sends forth his friend Patroclus to oppose them. Patroclus fell; and Achilles, in anger, rushing into the battle, killed Hector, the commander of the Trojans. He himself, according to later poems, fell in battle a few days afterwards, before Troy was taken.

Achilles.

Achilles of England, the Duke of Wellington (1769-1852). Of Germany, Albert, Elector of Brandenburg (1414-1486). Of Lombardy, brother of Sforza and Palamides. All the three brothers were in the allied army of Godfrey (Jerusalem Delivered). Achilles of Lombardy was slain by Corinna. This was not a complimentary title, but a proper name. Of Rome, Lucius Scipio Dentatus, the Roman tribune; also called the Second Achilles. Put to death b.c. 450.

Achilles of the West. Roland the Paladin; also called "The Christian Theseus" (2 syl).

Achilles’ Spear. (See Achilles.)

Achilles’ Tendon. A strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg. The tale is that Thetis took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river Styx to make him invulnerable. The water washed every part, except the heel covered with his mother’s hand. It was on this vulnerable point the hero was slain; and the sinew of the heel is called, in consequence, tendo Achilles. A post-Homeric story.

The Heel of Achilles. The vulnerable or weak point in a man’s character or of a nation. (See above.)

Aching Void. (An). That desolation of heart which arises from the recollection of some cherished endearment no longer possessed.

"What peaceful hours I once enjoyed! How sweet then memory still! But they have left an aching void The world can never fill." Thou er: Walking with God Achitophel. (See Absalom and Achitophel.) Achitophel was David’s traitor counsellor, who deserted to Achor

Abelom; but his advice being disregarded, he hanged himself (2 Sam. xv.).

The Achitophel of Dryden’s satire was the Earl of Shaftesbury:

“Of these (the rebels) the false Achitophel was first.”

A name to all succeeding ages curst;
For close designs and crooked counsels fit;
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, un fixed in principles and place;
In power displeased, impatient in disgrace.”

Part i. 130-3.

Achor. God of flies, worshipped by the Cyrenians, that they might not be annoyed with these tiny tormentors.

(Acres, God of)

Achias. The son of Faunus, in love with Galatea. Polyphemos, his rival, crushed him under a huge rock.

Achene. The crisis of a disease. Old medical writers used to divide the progress of a disease into four periods: the acute, or beginning; the unabated, or increase; the acute, or term of its utmost violence; and the pacific, or decline. Figuratively, the highest point of anything.

Achimian Wood (The). The trystplace of unlawful love. It was here that Mars had his assignation with Harmonia, who became the mother of the Amazons.

Achimed. An order of monks in the fifth century who watched day and night. (Greek, watchers.)

Acholyte (3 syl.). A subordinate officer in the Catholic Church, whose duty is to light the lumps, prepare the sacred elements, attend the officiating priests, etc. (Greek, a follower.)

Achopitoe. The herb Monkshood or Wolfsbane. Classic fabulists ascribe its poisonous qualities to the foam which dropped from the mouths of the three-headed Cerberus, when Hercules, at the command of Eurystheus, dragged the monster from the infernal regions.

“Amanda terribilis mensent Achol a noviciis.”

Acrasia (Self-indulgence). An enchantress who lived in the “Bower of Bliss,” situate in “Wandering Island.” She transformed her lovers into monstrous shapes, and kept them captives. Sir Guyon having crept up softly, threw a net over her, and bound her in chains of adamantine; then broke down her bower and burnt it to ashes.—Spenser: Fairy Queen, ii. 12.

Acrates (3 syl.), i.e., insinuence; called by Spenser the father of Cymochcles and Pyrcholes.—Fairy Queen, ii. 4.

Acre. “God’s acre,” a cemetery or churchyard. The word “acre,” Old English, aer, is akin to the Latin aper and German aker (a field).

Acreight. A duel in the open field. The combats of the Scotch and English Borderers were so called.

Acre-shot. A land tax. “Acre” is Old English, aer (land), and “shot” is scot or scotia (a tax).

Acres. A Bob Acres—i.e., a coward. From Sheridan’s comedy called The Rivals. His courage always “oozed out at his fingers’ ends.”

Acronomatia. Esotetical lectures; the lectures of Aristotle, which none but his chosen disciples were allowed to attend. Those given to the public generally were called exoteriké. (Acronomatia is a Greek word, meaning delivered to an auditor; ακρονωτικης, to attend lectures.)

Acroatic. Same as esoteriké. (See ACRONOMATIA.)

Acrobat means one who goes on his extremities, or uses only the tips of his fingers and toes in moving about. (It is from the two Greek words, akros baun, to go on the extremities of one’s limbs.)

Acropolis. The citadel of ancient Athens.

Of course it is compounded of akros and pole to the right, i.e., the high.

Acrostic (Greek, akrois stechon). The term was first applied to the verses of the Erythrean sibyl, written on leaves. These prophecies were excessively obscure; but were so contrived that when the leaves were sorted and laid in order, their initial letters always made a word.

—Dryas, iv. 62.

Acrostic poetry among the Hebrews consisted of twenty-two lines or stanzas beginning with the letters of the alphabet in succession, as Psalm cix., etc.

Acrostics. Puzzles, generally in verse, consisting of two words of equal length. The initial letters of the several lines constitute one of the secret words, and the final letters constitute the other word. Also words re-arranged so as to make other words of similar significance, as “Horatio Nelson” re-arranged into Act and Opponency. An "Act," in our University language, consists of a thesis and "disputation" thereon, covering continuous parts of three hours. The person "disputing" with the "keeper of the Act" is called the "opponent," and his function is called an "opponency." In some degrees the student is required to keep his Act, and then to be the opponent of another disputant. Much alteration in these matters has been introduced of late, with other college reforms.

Act of Faith (acto da fe), in Spain, is a day set apart by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of those who renounce their heretical doctrines. The sentence of the Inquisition is also so called; and so is the ceremony of burning, or otherwise torturing the condemned.

Act of God. (In). "Dumnumum fatale," such as loss by lightning, shipwreck, fire, etc.; loss arising from fatality, and not from one's own fault, theft, and so on. A Devonshire jury once found a verdict—"That deceased died by the act of God, brought about by the flooded condition of the river."

Acteon. A hunter, In Grecian mythology Acteon was a huntsman, who surprised Diana bathing, was changed by her into a stag, and torn to pieces by his own hounds. Hence, a man whose wife is unfaithful. (See Hores.)

Actian Years. Years in which the Action games were celebrated. Augustus instituted games at Actium to celebrate his naval victory over Antony. They were held every five years.

Active. Active verbs, verbs which act on the noun governed.

Active. Active rvorbs. Property in actual employment in a given concern.

Active commerce. Exports and imports carried to and fro in our own ships.

Passive commerce is when they are carried in foreign vessels. The commerce of England is active, of China passive.

Activity. The sphere of activity, the whole field through which the influence of an object or person extends.

Actor. A taffeta, or leather-quilted dress, worn under the habergeon to keep the body from being chafed or bruised. (French, hocqueton.)

Actresses. Female characters used to be played by boys. Coryat, in his Crudities (1611), says, "When I went to a theatre (in Venice) I observed certain things that I never saw before; for I saw women act. . . . I have heard that it hath sometimes been used in London." (Vol. ii.).

There are women's parts in plays and operas to be acted as men in the habit of women . . . we do permit and give leave for the time to come that all women's parts be acted by women, 1652. —Charles II.

The first female actress on the English stage was Mrs. Colman (1650), who played hamlet in the Siege of Rhodes.

The last male actor that took the part of a woman on the English stage, in serious drama, was Edward Kynaston, noted for his beauty (1670-1687).

Aec tetigisti. You have hit the nail on the head. (Lit., you have touched it with a needle.) Phaestus (Iudens, v. 2, 19) says, "Rem aec tetigisti;" and Cicero (Pro Milone, 24) has "Vulnus aec punctum," evidently referring to a surgeon's probe.

Acutiator. A person in the Middle Ages who attended armies and knights to sharpen their instruments of war. (Latin, acutus, to sharpen.)

Ad Gracias Calendas. (Deferred) to the Greek Calendars — i.e., for ever. (It shall be done) on the Greek Calendars — i.e., never. There were no Calends in the Greek notation of the months. (See Never.)

Ad inquirendum. A judicial writ commanding an inquiry to be made into some complaint.

Ad libitum. Without restraint.

Ad rem (Latin). To the point in hand, to the purpose. (Aec rem tetigisti). (See above, Acutus.)

Ad unum omnes. All to a man (Latin).

Ad valorem. According to the price charged. Some customs duties vary according to the different values of the goods imported. Thus, at one time teas
Ad vitam
Ad vitam aet cULPAM. A Latin phrase, used in Scotch law, to indicate the legal permanency of an appointment, unless forfeited by misconduct.

Adam. The Talmudists say that Adam lived in Paradise only twelve hours, and account for the time thus:—

The first hour, God collected the dust and animated it.
The second hour, Adam stood on his feet.
The fourth hour, he named the animals.
The sixth hour, he slept and Eve was created.
The seventh hour, he married the woman.
The tenth hour, he fell.
The twelfth hour, he was thrust out of Paradise.

The Mohammedans tell us he fell on Mount Serendib, in Ceylon, where there is a curious impression in the granite resembling a human foot, above 5 feet long and 23 feet broad. They tell us it was made by Adam, who stood there on one foot for 200 years to expiate his crime; when Gabriel took him to Mount Arafath, where he found Eve. (See Adam's Peak.)

Adam was buried, according to Arabian tradition, on Abouaials, a mountain of Arabia.

Adam. The old Adam: he beat the offending Adam out of thee; the first Adam, Adam, as the head of unrighteousness, stands for "original sin," or "man without regenerating grace."
The second Adam, the new Adam, etc.: I will give you the new Adam, Jesus Christ, as the covenant head, is so called; also the "new birth unto righteousness."

When Adam delved and Eve span, "Au temps pass', Berthe fluit." This Bertha was the wife of King Pepin.

When Adam delved and Eve span, Who was then the gentleman? Adam.

A faithful Adam. A faithful old servant. The character is taken from Shakespeare's comedy of As You Like It, where a retainer of that name, who had served the family sixty-three years, offers to accompany Orlando in his flight, and to share with him his thrifty savings of 500 crowns.

Adam Bell. A northern outlaw, whose name has become a synonym for a good archer. (See Clym of the Clough.)

Adam Cupid: i.e., Archer Cupid, perhaps with allusion to Adam Bell, the celebrated archer. (See Percy's Reliques, vol. 1., p. 7.)

Adam's Ale. Water as a beverage; from the supposition that Adam had nothing but water to drink. In Scotland water for a beverage is called Adam's Wine.

Adam's Apple. The protuberance in the forepart of a man's throat; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit which Adam ate stuck in his throat, and occasioned the swelling.

Adam's Needle. The yucca, so called because it is sharp-pointed like a needle.

Adam's Peak. in Ceylon, is where the Arabs say Adam bewailed his expulsion from Paradise, and stood on one foot till God forgave him. It was the Portuguese who first called it "Pico de Adam." (See Kaada.) In the granite is the mark of a human foot, above 5 feet long by 23 feet broad, said to have been made by Adam, who, we are told, stood there on one foot for 200 years, to expiate his crime. After his penance he was restored to Eve. The Hindus assert that the footprint is that made by Buddha, when he ascended to heaven.

Adam's Profession. Gardening, agriculture. Adam was appointed by God to dress the garden of Eden, and to keep it (Gen. ii., 15); and after the fall he was sent out of the garden "to till the ground" (Gen. iii., 23).

Adam's. Payson Adams, the ideal of a benevolent, simple-minded, eccentric country clergyman: ignorant of the world, bold as a lion for the truth, and modest as a girl. The character is in Fielding's novel of Joseph Andrews.

Adamant. is really the mineral corundum; but the word is indifferently used for rock crystal, diamond, or any hard substance, and also for the magnet or lodestone. It is often used by poets for no specific substance, but as hardness or firmness in the abstract. Thus, Virgil, in his Æneid vi., 502, speaks of "adamantine pillars" merely to express solid and strong ones; and Milton frequently uses the word in the same way.
Thus, in Paradise Lost, ii. 436, he says the gates of hell were made of burning adamant:

"This huge convex of fire
Outragious to devour, immures us round
Ninefold, and gates of burning adamant Barred over us prohibit all passage."

Satan, he tells us, wore adamantine armour (Book vi. 110):

"Satan, with vast and haughty strides advanced, Came towering, armed in adamant and gold."

And a little further on he tells us his shield was made of adamant (vi. 235):

"He [Satan] hasted, and opposed the rocky orb
Of ten-fold adamant, his ample shield
A vast circumference."

Tasso (canto vili. 82) speaks of seundo di lucidissimo damante (a shield of clearest diamond).

Other poets make adamant to mean the magnet. Thus, in Trovitis and Cris-side, ii. 2:

"As true as steel, as plangent to the moon,
As say to dasy, as taffy to her hare,
As iron to adamant."

(Pliny tells us there are six unbreakable stones (xxxvii. 15), but the classical adamus (gen. adamant-is) is generally supposed to mean the diamond. Diamond and adamant are originally the same word.

Adamastor. The spirit of the stormy Cape (Good Hope), described by Canoans in the Lividu as a hideous phantom. According to Barretto, he was one of the giants who invades heaven.

Adamic Covenant. The covenant made with God to Adam, that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head" (Gen. iii. 15).

Adamites (3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who spread themselves over Bohemia and Moravia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. One Picard, of Bohemia, was the founder in 1100, and styled himself "Adam, son of God." He professed to recall his followers to the state of primitive innocence. No clothes were worn, wives were in common, and there was no such thing as good and evil, but all actions were indifferent.

Ad'aran, according to the Parsee superstition, is a sacred fire less holy than that called Behram (q.r.).

Adays. Nowadays at the present time (or day). So in Latin, Nunc dierum and Nunc temporis. The prefix "nunc" = at, of, or on. Similarly, unghis of late, on Sundays. All used adverbially.

Addison of the North—i.e., Henry Mackenzie, the author of the Man of Feeling (1743-1831).

Addix it, or Adder's rant (Lat.). All right. The word uttered by the augurs when the "birds" were favourable.

Adile is the Old English adela (6th), hence rotten, putrid, worthless. Addled egg better "addle-egg," a worthless egg. An egg which has not the vital principle.

Addle Parliament (The)—5th April to 7th June, 1614. So called because it did not pass one single measure. (See PARLIAMENT.)

Adelantado. A big-wig, the great boss of the place. It is a Spanish word for "his excellency" (adelantor, to excel), and is given to the governor of a province.

"Open no door, if the adelantado of Spain were here he should not enter."—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humour, v. 4.

Ad'eman, or Adama n (in Jerusalem Believed). Archbishop of Poggio, an ecclesiastical warrior, who with William, Archbishop of Orange, besought Pope Urban on his knees that he might be sent on the crusade. He took 400 armed men from Poggio, but they sneaked off during a drought, and left the crusade (Book xii.). Ademar was not alive at the time, he had been slain at the attack on Antioch by Clorinda (Book xi.); but in the final attack on Jerusalem, his spirit came with three squadrons of angels to aid the besiegers (Book xvii.);

Adopt properly means one who has attained (from the Latin, addeptus, participle of addeper). The alchemists applied the term vre adedptus to those persons who professed to have "attained to the knowledge of" the elixir of life or of the philosopher's stone.

Alchemists tell us there are always 11 adepts, neither more nor less. Like the sacred chickens
Adessarianis. A term applied to those who hold the real presence of Christ’s body in the eucharist, but do not maintain that the bread and wine lose any of their original properties. (The word is from the Latin ad esse, to be present.)

Adhena Fidelis. Composed by John Reading, who wrote “Dulci Domum.” It is called the “Portuguese Hymn,” from being heard at the Portuguese Chapel by the Duke of Leeds, who supposed it to be a part of the usual Portuguese service.

Adalida, ad (the slit-cured). The swiftest of Mahomet’s camels.

Adhabal-Cabr. The first purgatory of the Mahometans.

Adidphorists. Followers of John Calvin; moderate Lutherans, who hold that some of the dogmas of Luther are matters of indifference. (Greek, adaphoros, indifferent.)

Adieu, good-b’ye. A due, an elliptical form for I commend you to God. Good-b’ye is God be with ye.

Adissechen. The serpent with a thousand heads which sustains the universe. (Indian mythology.)

Adjective Colours are those which require a mordant before they can be used as dyes.

Adjourne. Once written ajourn, French, a-journer, to put off to another day.

“Le ajourned them to relive in the North of France.”—Longfellow: Chronicke, p. 59

Adjournment of the House. (See MOVING THE ADJOURNMENT.)

Admirable (The). Aben-Ezra, a Spanish rabbi, born at Tolosdo (1119-1174).

Admirable Crichton (The). James Crichton (kry-ton). (1551-1573.)

Admirable Doctor (Doctor admirabilis). Roger Bacon (1214-1292).

Admiral. corruption of Amir-al. Milton, speaking of Satan, says:—

“His spear (to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some tall animal, was but a wand)
He walked with.”—Paradise Lost, 1. 292.

The word was introduced by the Turks or Genoese in the twelfth century, and is the Arabic Amir with the article el (lord or commander); as Amir-al-Ma (commander of the water), Amir-al-Omra (commander of the forces), Amir-al-Mamun (commander of the faithful).

English admirals used to be of three classes, according to the colour of their flag—

Admiral of the Red, used to hold the centre in an engagement.

Admiral of the White, used to hold the van.

Admiral of the Blue, used to hold the rear.

The distinction was abolished in 1864; now all admirals carry the white flag.

Admirals are called Pay Officers.

Admiral of the Blue. A butcher who dresses in blue to conceal blood-stains. A tapster also is so called, from his blue apron. A play on the now-admiral of the British navy, called “Admiral of the Blue (Flag).”

“Ah, soon as custom a begins to stir
The Admiral of the Blue
Poor John, 1781.

Admiral of the Red. A punning term applied to a wine-bibber whose face and nose are very red.

Admittance. Licence. Shakespeare says, “Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance”—i.e., to whom great freedom is allowed (Mercy Wives, ii. 2). The allusion is to an obsolete custom called admission, by which a prince avowed another prince to be under his protection, Maximilian, Emperor of Mexico, was the “admittant” of the Emperor Napoleon III.

Admonitioners, or Admonitioners. Certain Puritans who in 1571 sent an admonition to the Parliament condemning everything in the Church of England which was not in accordance with the doctrines and practices of Geneva.

Adobe [Ende.]

Adolphi. Daughter of General Kleiner, governor of Prague and wife of Idstein. Her only fault was “excess of too sweet nature, which ever made another’s grief her own.”—Knovles: Maid of Marnider (1689).

Adonai. Son of the star-beam, and god of light among the Rosicrucians.
Adonis. Those Jews who maintain that the proper vowels of the word Jehovah are unknown, and that the word is never to be pronounced Adonai. (Hebrew, adon, lord.)

Adoption. Adoption by arms. An ancient custom of giving arms to a person of merit, which laid him under the obligation of being your champion and defender.

Adoption by baptism. Being godfather or godmother to a child. The child by baptism is your god-child.

Adoption by hair. Cutting off your hair, and giving it to a person in proof that you receive him as your adopted father. Thus Boason, King of Arles, cut off his hair and gave it to Pope John VIII., who adopted him.

Adoption Controversy. Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel, maintained that Jesus Christ in his human nature was the son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii. 29), though in his pre-existing state he was the “begotten Son of God” in the ordinary Catholic consecration. Duus Scotus, Durandus, Calixtus, and others supported this view.

Adoptionist. A disciple of Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel (in Spain), is so called.

Adoro (2 syl.) means to 'carry to one's mouth.' To kiss... (ad-oro, ad-isci). The Romans performed adoration by placing their right hand on their mouth and bowing. The Greeks paid adoration to kings by putting the royal robe to their lips. The Jews kissed in homage; thus God said to Elijah he had 7,000 in Israel who had not bowed unto Baal, “every mouth which hath not kissed him” (1 Kings xix. 18; see also Hos. xiii. 2). “Kiss the Son lest He be angry” (Psalm ii. 12), means worship, reverence the Son. Even in England we do homage by kissing the hand of the sovereign.

Adrammelech. God of the people of Sepharvaim, to whom infants were burnt in sacrifice (Kings xvii. 31). Probably the sun.

Adrastus. An Indian prince, from the banks of the Ganges, who aided the King of Egypt against the crusades. He wore a serpent's skin, and rode on an elephant. Adrastus was slain by Rinaldo.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, Book xx.
Adrian (St.), represented, in Christian art, with an anvil, and a sword or axe close by it. He had his limbs cut off on a smith’s anvil, and was afterwards beheaded. St. Adrian is the patron saint of the Flemish brewers.

Adriel, in Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for the Earl of Malburne.

“Sharp-judging Adriel, the nurse’s friend,
- Himself a nurse; in Sichardin’s debate
True to his prince, but not a slave of state;
Whose David’s love with honour did adorn,
That from his disobedient son were torn.”

Adrift. I am all adrift. He is quite adrift. To turn one adrift. Sea phrases. A ship is said to be adrift when it has broken from its moorings, and is driven at random by the wind. To be adrift is to be out of the mark, or not in the right course. To turn one adrift is to turn him from house and home to go his own way.

Adrift: properly means “to the right” (French, à droite). The French call a person who is not adroit gauche (left-handed), meaning awkward, boorish.

Adudelata. The table at which the fancies sat during sacrifices.

Adulamites (4 syl.). The adherents of Lowe and Horseman, seceders in 1666 from the Reform Party. John Bright said of these members that they retired to the cave of Adullam, and tried to gather round them all the discontented. The allusion is to David in his flight from Saul, who “escaped to the cave Adullam; and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him” (1 Sam. xxi. 1, 2).

Advancement. The second branches of a stag’s horn.

“Thus the main horns itself they call the bænum. The lower antler is called the hamant: the next, range, the next that, antefrunt; and then the top.

Manor, patins, and spesiris.” - Natural Forest.

Advent. Four weeks to commemorate the first and second coming of Christ; the first to redeem, and the second to judge the world. The season begins on St. Andrew’s Day, on the Sunday nearest to it. (Latin, adventus, the coming to.)

Adversary (Tha). Satan. (1 Pet. v. 8.)

Advocate (Ad) means one called to assist clients in a court of law. (Latin, advocatus.)

The Devil’s Advocate. One who brings forward malicious accusations. When any name is proposed for canonisation in the Roman Catholic Church, two advocates are appointed, one to oppose the motion and one to defend it. The former, called Advocatus Diaboli (the Devil’s Advocate), advances all he can against the person in question; the latter, called Advocatus Div (God’s Advocate), says all he can in support of the proposal.

Advowson means the right of appointing the incumbent of a church or ecclesiastical benefice. In medieval times the “advocacy” or patronage of bishoprics and abbeys was frequently in the hands of powerful nobles, who often claimed the right to appoint in the event of a vacancy; hence the word (from Latin, advocatus, the office of a patron).

A presentative advowson is when the patron presents to the bishop a person to whom he is willing to give the place of prebendary.

A collective advowson is when the bishop himself is patron, and collates his client without any intermediate person.

A donative advowson is where the Crown gives a living to a clergyman without presentation, institution, or induction. This is done when a church or chapel has been founded by the Crown, and is not subject to the ordinary.

Advowson in gross is an advowson separated from the manor, and belonging wholly to the owner. While attached to the manor it is an advowson appurtenant. “Gross” (French) means absolute, entire; thus gross weight is the entire weight without deductions. A villan in gross was a villain the entire property of his master, and not attached to the land. A common gross is one which is entirely your own, and which belongs to the manor.

Sale of Advowsons. When lords of manors built churches upon their own demesnes, and endowed them, they became private property, which the lord might give away or even sell under certain limitations. These churches are called Advowsons appurtenant, being appurte ned to the manor. After a time they became regular “commercial property.”
and we still see the sale of some of them in the public journals.

Adyrum. The Holy of Holies in the Greek and Roman temples, into which the general public were not admitted. (Greek, ἅδυτον = not to be entered; duo, to go.)

Hecules (2 syl.). Those who, in ancient Rome, had charge of the public buildings (ediles), such as the temples, theatres, baths, aqueducts, sewers, including roads and streets also.

Egyptus (2 syl.). A fabulous king of Athens who gave name to the Egyptian Sea. His son, Theseus, went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute exacted by Minos. Theseeus said, if he succeeded he would hoist a white sail on his home-voyage, as a signal of his safety. This he neglected to do; and Egyptus, who watched the ship from a rock, thinking his son had perished, threw himself into the sea.

This incident has been copied in the tale of Sir Tristram and Ysidore. Sir Tristram being severely wounded in Brittany, sent for Ysidore to come and see him before he died. He told his messenger, if Ysidore consented to come to hoist a white flag. Sir Tristram's wife told him the ship was in sight with a black flag at the helm, whereupon Sir Tristram bode his head and died. [TRISTRAM.]

EGIPTIAN SCRIPTURES. Sculptures excavated by a company of Germans, Danes, and English (1811), in the little island of Egypt. They were purchased by Ludwig, Crown Prince of Bavaria, and are now the most remarkable ornaments of the Glyptothek, at Munich.

Agir. God of the ocean, whose wife is Rama. They had nine daughters, who wore white robes and veils (Scandinavian mythology). These daughters are the billows, etc. The word means "to flow."

Aegis. The shield of Jupiter made by Vulcan was so called, and symbolised "Divine protection." The shield of Minerva was called an aegis also. The shield of Jupiter was covered with the skin of the goat Amalthea, and the Greek for goat is, in the genitive case, aigest. The aegis made by Vulcan was of bronze.

I give my aegis over you, I give you my protection.

Aegrotat. To sport an aegrotat. In university parlance, an aegrotat is a medical certificate of indisposition to exempt the bearer from attending chapel and college lectures.

AHI (A-1), a common motto on jewellery, means "for ever and for aye." (Greek.)

AETNA. The cat. An Egyptian deity held in the greatest veneration. Herodotos (ii. 66) tells us that Diana, to avoid being molested by the giants, changed herself into a cat. The deity used to be represented with a cat's head on a human body. (Greek, aileuros, a cat.)

EMILIAN LAW. Made by Emilius Luscermus the praetor. It enjoined that the oldest priest should drive a nail every year into the capitol on the Ides of September (September 1).

EMONIA EMONIA (HEMONIA HEMONIAN).

ENEA. The hero of Virgil's epic. He carried his father Anchises on his shoulders from the flames of Troy. After roaming about for many years, he came to Italy, where he founded a colony which the Romans claim as their original. The epithet applied to him is plus = pious, dutiful.

ENED. The epic poem of Virgil, (in twelve books). So called from Eurus and the suffix -is, plur. ides (belonging to).

"The story of Simon," says Marchant, "and the burning of Troy is borrowed from Homer."

The story of Dido and Aeneas is taken from those of Meliboeus and Jason, in Apollonius of Rhodes. "The story of the Wooden Horse and burning of Troy is from Archias of Miletus."

EOLIC DIGAMMA. An ancient Greek letter (F), sounded like our V. Thus monos with the digamma sounded vinos; whence the Latin vinos, our wine. Gamma, or g, was shaped thus ∞, hence digamma = double g.

EOLIC MODER. In music, noted for its simplicity, fit for ballads and songs. The Phrygian Mode was for religious music, as hymns and anthems.

EOLUS, in Roman mythology, was "god of the winds."

EOLUS. The wind-harp. A box on which strings are stretched. Being placed where a draught gets to the strings, they utter musical sounds.

EON (Greek, aioun), eternity, an immeasurable length of time; any being that is eternal. Basilides reckons there have been 365 such mons, or gods; but Valentinianus restricts the number to 30. Sometimes written "Eon."

In mythology each series of rocks covers an age, or an indefinite and immeasurable period of time.

Æra. [Æra.]

Aërated Bread. Bread made light by means of carbonic acid gas instead of leaven.

Aërated Water. Water impregnated with carbonic acid gas, called fixed air.

Æriani. Followers of Ærius, who maintained that there is no difference between bishops and priests.

Æschylus (Greek, Αἰσχύλος), the most sublime of the Greek tragic poets. He wrote 90 plays, only 7 of which are now extant. Æschylus was killed by a tortoise thrown by an eagle (to break the shell) against his bald head, which it mistook for a stone (n.c. 533-436). See Horace, Ars Poetica, 278.

Æschylus of France. Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon. (1671-1762.)

Æsopus. The Latin form of the Greek word Ἀσκληπιος, the god of medicine and of healing. Now used for “a medical practitioner.”

Æsir, plural of As or Ao, the celestial gods of Scandinavia, who lived in Asgard (god’s ward), situate on the heavenly hills between earth and the rainbow. The chief was Odin. We are told that there were twelve, but it would be hard to determine who the twelve are, for, like Arthur’s knights, the number seems variable. The following may be mentioned:—(1) Odin; (2) Thor (his eldest son, the god of thunder); (3) Tyr (another son, the god of wisdom); (1) Baldur (another son, the Scandinavian Apollo); (5) Bragi (the god of eloquence); (6) Vider (god of silence); (7) Hódur (the blind (Baldur’s twin brother)); (8) Hermod (Odin’s son and messenger); (9) Heimir (divine intelligence); (10) Odur (husband of Freyja, the Scandinavian Venus); (11) Loki (the god of mischief, though not an Asa, lived in Asgard); (12) Vali (Odin’s youngest son); another of Odin’s sons was Kvasir the keen-seen. Then there were the Vanir, or gods of air, ocean, and water: the gods of fire; the gods of the Lower World: and the Mysterious Three, who sat on three thrones above the rainbow. Their names were Har (the perfect), the Like-perfect, and the Third person.

Wives of the Æsir: Odin’s wife was Frigga; Thor’s wife was Sif (beauty);

Baldur’s wife was Nanna (daring); Bragi’s wife was Iduna; Odur’s wife was Freyja (the Scandinavian Venus); Loki’s wife was Sifhna.

The Æsir built Asgard themselves, but each god had his own private mansion. That of Odin was Gladsheim; but his wife Frigga had also her private abode, named Fenalisir; the mansion of Thor was Bilskirnir; that of Baldur was Broadblink; that of Odur’s wife was Folkhang; of Vidar was Landvidi (wide land): the private abode of the goddesses generally was Vinogol.

The refectory or banquet hall of the Æsir was called Valhalla.

Njord, the water-god, was not one of the Æsir, but chief of the Vanir; his son was Frey; his daughter, Freyja (the Scandinavian Venus); his wife was Skadi; and his home, Noatun.

Æsop’s Bath. Sir Thomas Brown’s (Religious Matter, p. 67) rationalises this into “hair-dye.” The reference is to Modea renovating Æson, father of Jason, with the juices of a concoction made of sundry articles. After Æson had imbibed these juices, Ovid says:—

"Barba connumque,

Castile postis, nimium remansit, colorum,

Metamorphoses, vii. 298.

Æsonian Hero (The). Jason, who was the son of Æson.

Æsop’s Fables were compiled by Babrius, a Greek, who lived in the Alexandrian age.

Æsop, a Phrygian slave, very deformed, and the writer of fables. He was contemporaneous with Pythagoras, about B.C. 570.

Almost all Greek and Latin fables are ascribed to Æsop, as all our Poems are ascribed to David. The Latin fables of Plautus are supposed to be translations of Æsopian fables.

Æsop of Arabia. Lokman (?) Nasser, who lived in the fifth century, is generally called the “Arabian Æsop.”

Æsop of England. John Gay. (1688-1732.)

Æsop of France. Jean de la Fontaine. (1621-1695.)

Æsop of Germany, Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. (1729-1781.)

Æsop of India. Bidpay or Pilpay. (About three centuries before the Christian era.)

Ætites (3 syl.). Eagle - stones. (Greek, αἴτως, an eagle.) Hollow stones composed of several crusts, one within another. Supposed at one time to form part of an eagle’s nest. Pliny mentions them. Kirwan applies the name to clay-ironstones having a globular crust of oxide investing an ochreous kernel. Mythically, they are supposed to have the property of detecting theft.

Aetolian Hero (The). Diomedes, who was king of Aetolia. Ovid.

Affable means "one easy to be spoken to." (Latin, ad pari, to speak to.)

Affect. To love, to desire. (Latin, affecto.)

"Some affect the light, and some the shade." Blair: Graces.

L'Affection aveugle raison (French). Cassius says to Brutus, "A friendly eye could never see such faults." "L'esprit est presque toujours la dupe du cœur." (La Rochefoucauld: Maximes.)

Again, "a mother thinks all her geese are swans."

Italian: A ogni grolla paion belli i suoni grollatiini. Ad ogni moscolo, suo nido è bello.

French: A chaque oiseau son nid paraît beau.

Latin: Asinus asino, sus sui, pulcher. Sus cuique res est carissima.

Affront properly means to stand front to front. In savage nations opposing armies draw up front to front before they begin hostilities, and by graces, sounds, words, and all conceivable means, try to provoke and terrify their vis-a-vis. When this "affronting" is over, the adversaries rush against each other, and the fight begins in earnest.

Affront. A salute; a coming in front of another to salute.

"Only, sir, thus I must caution you of, in your affront, or salute, never to move your hat."—Tennyson: In Quaque, vi. 65.

Afraid. He who trembles to hear a leaf fall should keep out of the wood. This is a French proverb: "Qui a peur de feuilles, ne doit aller au bois." Our corresponding English proverb is, "He who fears scars shouldn't go to war." The timid should not voluntarily expose themselves to danger.

"Little boats should keep our shore, Larger ones may venture more."

Africa. Terra te Africa (I take possession of thee, O Africa). When Caesar landed at Arundelum, in Africa, he tripped and fell—a bad omen; but, with wonderful presence of mind, he pretended that he had done so intentionally, and kissing the soil, exclaimed, "Thus do I take possession of thee, O Africa." Told also of Scipio. (See Don Quixote, Pt. II. Bk. vi. ch. 6.)

Affair: commerce, war, and affair.

"Africa is always producing some novelty." A Greek proverb quoted (in Latin) by Pliny, in allusion to the ancient belief that Africa abounded in strange monsters.

African Sisters (The). The Hesperides (4 syl.) who lived in Africa. They were the daughters of Atlas.

Afric., or "Afric." The beau ideal of what is terrible and monstrous in Arabian superstition. A sort of ghoul or demon. Solomon, we are told, once turned an Afric, and made it submissive to his will.

Aft. The hinder part of a ship.

Fire and Aft. The entire length (of a ship), from stem to stern.

After-cast. A throw of dice after the game is ended; anything done too late.

"Ever he playeth an after-cast."

After-clap. Bacare of after-claps. An after-clap is a catastrophe or threat after an affair is supposed to be over. It is very common in thunderstorms to hear a "clap" after the rain subsides, and the clouds break.

"What phlegm unsheathed and misclaps Do dot him in with after-claps."—Shak.

Butler: Hudibras, Pt. 1. 5.

After Mont, Mustard. In Latin, "Post bellum, auxilium." We have also, "After death, the doctor," which is the German, "Wann der kranke is tot, so kommt der arztrei!" (when the patient's dead, comes the physio). To the same effect is, "When the steed is stoned, lock the stable door." Meaning, doing a thing, or offering service when it is too late, or when there is no longer need thereof.

After us, the Deluge. "I care not what happens when I am dead and gone," So said Mme. de Pompadour, the mistress of Louis XV. (1722-1764). Metternich, the Austrian statesman (1773-1859), is credited with the same; but probably he simply quoted the words of the French marchioness.

Aft-meal. An extra meal: a meal taken after and in addition to the ordinary meals.

"Aft-meal who shall pray for thence."—Thyman: De Buve.

A'gag, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Titus Gates made his declaration, and was afterwards found barbarously murdered in a ditch near Agnistes

Primrose Hill. Agas was hewed to pieces by Samuel (1 Sam. xiv.).

"And Corah (Titus Oates) sought for Agas's head as a token of murder."

In terms as coarse Samuel used to Saul." 1. 63-6.

Agnistes [Agenistes]. A passage of the Veda, the repetition of which will purify the soul like ascension after confession.

Agamemnon. King of Argos, in Greece, and commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks who went to the siege of Troy. The fleet being delayed by adverse winds at Aulis, Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia to Diana, and the winds became at once favourable.

— Homer's Iliad.

"Till Agamemnon's daughter's blood
Appeased the gods that them with blood —
Earl of Surrey.

His brother was Menelaus.
His daughters were Iphigenia, Electra, Iphimass, and Chrysothemis (Sphodres),
He was general of Priam's forces.
He was killed in a battle by his wife (Chrysea), after his return from Troy.
His son was Orestes, who slew his mother for murdering his father, and was called Agenamemnon.
His wife was Chryseis, who lived in adultery with Egistheus. At Troy he fell in love with Cassandra, a daughter of King Priam.

Viz: Erotes and Agamemnon ("there are hills beyond Pentland, and fields beyond Forth"), i.e., we are not to suppose that our own age or locality monopolises all that is good. — Hor. Od. iv. 9, 25. We might add, et post Agamenmonum rirent.

"Great men there lived ere Agamemnon came,
And after him all others rise to fame." — R. C. H.

Aganippe (4 syl.), or Aganippe, the Thessalian, being able to calculate eclipses, she pretended to have the moon under her command, and to be able when she chose to draw it from heaven. Her secret being found out, her vaunting became a laughing-stock, and gave birth to the Greek proverb cast at braggarts.

"Yes, as the Moon obeys Aganipe." — R. C. H.

Aganippe (4 syl.). A fountain of Bosotia at the foot of Mount Helicon, dedicated to the Muses, because it had the virtue of imparting poetical inspiration. From this fountain the Muses are called Aganippedes (3 syl.) or Aganipplides (5 syl.).

Agape (3 syl.). A love-feast. The early Christians held a love-feast before or after communion, when contributions were made for the poor. These feasts became a scandal, and were condemned at the Council of Carthage, 397. (Greek, agape, love.)

Agapemone (5 syl.). A somewhat disreputable association of men and women living promiscuously on a common fund, which existed for a time at Charlynch, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire. (Greek, agapé, love.)

Agape. Women under vows of virginity, who undertook to attend the monks. (The word is Greek, and means beloved.)

Agate (2 syl.). So called, says Pliny (xxvii. 10), from Achaites or Gagaites, a river in Sicily, near which it is found in abundance.

"These, these are they, if we consider well,
That sphæres and the diamonds are the event.
The pearl, the emerald, and the turclus.

The sunnate corall, amber's golden hue,
The chrysolite, garnet, arcaht, ruby red" — Taylor: The Waterpene (1693).

Agate is supposed to render a person invisible, and to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

Agate. A very diminutive person. Shakespeare speaks of Queen Mab as no bigger than an agate-stone on the forefinger of an alderman.

"I was never married with an agate till now."—Shakespeare 3 Hen. iv. 1. 2.

Agatha. Daughter of Cuno, the Anger, in love with Max, to whom she is to be married, provided he carries off the prize in the annual trial-shot. She is in danger of being shot by Max unwittingly, but is rescued by a hermit, and becomes the bride of the young huntsman. Wiel's Opera of Her Springs.

Agatha (St.). Represented in Christian art with a pair of shears, and holding in her hand a salver, on which her breasts are placed. The reference is to her martyrdom, when her breasts were cut off by a pair of shears.

Agave (3 syl.) or "American aloe," from the Greek, agave, admirable. The Mexican plant fences of Agave round their wigwams, as a defence against wild beasts. The Mahometsans of Egypt regard it as a charm and religious symbol; and pilgrims to Mecca indicate their exploit by hanging over the door of their dwelling a leaf of Agave, which has the further charm of warding off evil spirits. The Jews in Cairo attribute a similar virtue to the plant, every part of which is utilised.

Agdistes (self-indulger). The god who kept the porch of the "Bower of Bliss." He united in his own person the two sexes, and sprang from the stone Agdus, parts of which were taken by Deucalion and Pyrrha to cast over their Age as accords (To). To do what is fit and right (Scotch law term). Here "Age" is from the Latin aetate, to do.

"To set about the matter in a regular manner, or, as he termed it, to "age an accord."

Sir W. Scott: Bedlam and event.

Age of Animals. An old Celtic rhyme, put into modern English, says:—

"The age of a dog is that of a horse; Thrice the age of a man is that of a man; Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer; Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle."

Age of Women (The). Though many women are mentioned in the Bible, the age of only one (Sarah, Abraham's wife) is recorded, and that to show at her advanced age she would become the mother of Isaac.

"Elizabeth, the mother of the Baptist," we are told by St. Luke, "was well stricken in age."

Age of the Bishops (The). The sixteenth century. (Italain: Middle Ages.

Age of the Popes (The). The twelfth century. (Italain: Middle Ages.

Age hee. "Attend to this." In sacrifice the Roman crier perpetually repeated these words to arouse attention. In the "Common Prayer Book" the attention of the congregation is frequently aroused by the exhortation, "Let us pray," though nearly the whole service is that of prayer.

Ages. Varro [Footnotes omitted] recognizes three ages:—

1. From the beginning of mankind to the Deluge, a time wholly unknown.
2. From the Deluge to the First Olympiad, called the mythical period.
3. From the First Olympiad to the present time, called the historic period.

Titian symbolised the three ages of man thus:—

1. An infant in a cradle.
2. A shepherd playing a flute.
3. An old man meditating on two skulls.

According to Lucretius also, there are three ages, distinguished by the materials employed in implements (v. 1282), viz.:—

1. Age of stone, when celts or implements of stone were employed.
2. Age of bronze, when implements were made of copper or brass.
3. Age of iron, when implements were made of iron, as at present.

Hesiod names five ages, viz.:—

The Golden or patriarchal, under the care of Saturn.
The Silver or voluptuous, under the care of Jupiter.
The Bronze or warlike, under the care of Neptune.
The Heroic or renaissance, under the care of Mars.
The Iron or present, under the care of Pluto.

† The present is sometimes called the wire age, from its telegraphs, by means of which well-nigh the whole earth is in intercommunication.

Fichte names five ages also: the ante-diluvian, post-diluvian, Christian, autaric, and millennium.

Agelasta. The stone on which Ceres rested when worn down by fatigue in searching for her daughter. (Greek, joyless.

Agenorides (5 syl.). Cadmus, who was the son of Agenor.

Agent. Is man a free agent? This is a question of theology, which has long been mooted. The point is this: If God fore-ordains all our actions, they must take place as he fore-ordains them, and man acts as a watch or clock; but if, on the other hand, man is responsible for his actions, he must be free to act as his inclination leads him. Those who hold the former view are called naturalists, those who hold the latter, libertarians.

Agglutinate Languages. The Turanian family of languages are so called because every syllable is a word, and these are glued together to form other words, and may be unglued so as to leave the roots distinct, as "instand."

Aghast. Frightened, as by a ghost; from Anglo-Saxon gief (Scotch geit), a ghost.

Age. The percentage of charge made for the exchange of paper money into cash. (Italian).

"The profit is called by the Italians aggio."—Nuova.

Agis. King of Sparta, who tried to deliver Greece from the Macedonian yoke, and was slain in the attempt.

To save a rotten state, Agis who saw Even Spartans self to servile yoke sink."

Thomson: Winter, 408.

Agist. To take the cattle of another to graze at a certain sum. The feeding of these beasts is called apistment, the words are from the Norman agisier (to be levant and couchant, rise up and lie down), because, says Coke, beasts are levant and couchant whilst they are on the land.
Agla. A cabalistic name of God, formed from the initial letters of Atah, Gibbor, Leholah, Adonai (Thou art strong for ever, O Lord!). (See Nor-Arica.)

Agloes. The poorest man in Arcadia, pronounced by Apollo to be far happier than Gyges, because he was “contented with his lot.”

“Poor and content is rich and rich enough;
But riches endless are as poor as winter.
To him who ever fears he shall be poor.”

Shakespeare: Othello, iii. 3.

Agnes. She is an Agnes (elle fait l’Agnès)—i.e., she is a sort of female “Verdant Green,” who is so unsophisticated that she does not even know what love means. It is a character in Mollière’s L’École des Femmes.

Agnes (St.) is represented by Domencchino as kneeling on a pile of fagots, the fire extinguished, and the executioner about to slay her with the sword. The introduction of a lamb (agnus) is a modern innovation, and play on the name. St. Agnes is the patron of young virgins.

“St. Agnes was first tied to a stake, but the fire of the stakes went out; whereupon Aspasius, set to watch the martyrdom, drew his sword, and cut off her head.”

Agnoe’s Day (St.), 21st January. Upon St. Agnes’ night, you take a row of pins, and pull out every one, one after another. Saying a paten-nooster, stick a pin in your sleeve, and you will dream of him or her you shall marry.—Lalvey: Miscelany, p. 136.

Agnotes (3 syl.). Ag-nu-ites, or Ag-no-i-tae (4 syl.).

(1) Certain heretics in the fourth century who said “God did not know everything.”

(2) Another sect, in the sixth century, who maintained that Christ “did not know the time of the day of judgment.”

(Agree., α,not; γνωσθαι, to know.)

Agnostic (An). A term invented by Prof. Huxley in 1865 to indicate the mental attitude of those who withhold their assent to whatever is incapable of proof, such as the absolute. In regard to miracles and revelation, agnostics neither dogmatically accept nor reject such matters, but simply say Agnosco—I do not know—they are not capable of proof.

Agnoe-castus. A shrub of the Vitex tribe, called agnos (chaste) by the Greeks, because the Athenian ladies, at the feast of Ceres, used to strew their couches with viole leaves, as a palladium of chastity. The monks, mistaking agnos (chaste) for agnos (a lamb), but knowing the use made of the plant, added castus to explain its character, making it chaste-lamb. (For another similar blunder, see I.H.S.)

Agnoe-castus. A cake of wax or dough stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the Cross, and distributed by the Pope on the Sunday after Easter as an amulet. Our Lord is called Agnos Dei (the Lamb of God). There is also a prayer so called, because it begins with the words, Agnos Dei, qui tollis pecus tuum (O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world).

Agog. He is all agog, in nervous anxiety; on the qui vive, like a horse in clover. (French, à gogo, or vivre à gogo, to live in clover.)

Agonistes (4 syl.). Samson Agonistes (the title of Milton’s drama) means Samson wrestling with adversity—Samson combating with trouble. (Greek, agonizomai, to comb, to struggle.)

Agonistics. A branch of the Donatists of Africa who roamed from town to town affirming they were ministers of justice. The Greek agon (an assembly) = the Latin munus, days when the law-courts were open, that country people might go and get their law-suits settled.

Agony properly means contention in the athletic games; and to agonise is the act of contending. (Greek, agon, a game of contest, as well as a “place of assembly”)

Agony, meaning “great pain,” is the wrestle with pain or struggle with suffering.

Agony Column of a newspaper. A column containing advertisements of missing relatives and friends; indicating great distress of mind in the advertiser.

Agrarian Law, from the Latin ager (land), is a law for making land the common property of a nation, and not the particular property of individuals. In a modified form, it means a redistribution of land, giving to each citizen a portion.

Agrimony. The older spelling was Argemomy, and Pliny calls it argemonia, from the Greek argemon, a white speck on the eye, which this plant was supposed to cure.
Ague (A cure for). (See Homer.)

Ague-cheek. Sir Andrew Ague-cheek, a straight-haired country squire, stupid even to silliness, self-conceited, living to eat, and wholly unacquainted with the world of fashion. The character is in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

A'gur's Wish (Prov. xxx. 8). "Give me neither riches nor poverty."

Ahaseurus, or Ahashverosh. A title common to several Persian kings. The three mentioned in the Bible are supposed to be Cyaxares (Dan. xi. 1); Xerxes (Esther); and Cambyses (Ezra iv. 0).

An abbreviation one finds at Hatheremasons give four renderings of the name Xerces, viz. Persim, Khshayargus; Xerxan, Khshatsoha; Zayjimnu, Khshseraha; and the tucket, Xeres: the Sanskrit root Ksh means "to rule," Khshat(a) (Ezod Kesh), a kins.

Ahead. The wind's ahead—i.e., blows in the direction towards which the ship's head points; in front. If the wind blows in the opposite direction (i.e.; towards the stern) it is said to be astern.

When one ship is ahead of another, it is before it, or further advanced. "Ahead of his class," means at the head. Ahead in a race, means before the rest of the runners.

To go ahead is to go on without hesitation, as a ship runs ahead of another.

Ahithophel, or Achitophel. A treacherous friend and adviser. Ahithophel was David's counsellor, but joined Absalom in revolt, and advised him "like the oracle of God" (2 Sam. xvi. 20-23). In Dryden's political satire, Achitophel stands for the Earl of Shaftesbury. (See ACHITOPHEL.)

Ahmed (Prince). Noted for the tent given him by the fairy Pari-ban'ou, which would cover a whole army, but might be carried in one's pocket; and for the apple of Sauarcunet, which would cure all diseases. — Arabian Nights, Prince Ahmed, etc.

This text coincides in a marvellous manner with the Norse ship called Skidbladnir (q.v.). (See SOLOMON'S CARPET.)

Ahobilah (Ezek. xxiii. 4, 11, etc.). The personification of prostitution. Used by the prophet to signify religious adultery or harlotry. (See Harlot.)

"The great difficulty in exposing the immorality of this Ahobilah is that her facts are so rare citing."—Papers on the Social Evil, 1853.

Ahobilahmah. A granddaughter of Cain, loved by the seraph Samima. She is a proud, ambitious, queen-like beauty, a female type of Cain. When the flood came, her angel-lover carried her under his wings to some other planet. — Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Ahriman, or Ahriemanes. The principle or angel of darkness and evil in the Magian system. (See ORMUS.)"I recommend the evil spirit, air, and do honour to Ahirimanes in this young man."— Tacitus.

Aide toi et le Ciel t'aidera (God will help those who help themselves). The party-motto of a political society of France, established in 1824. The object of the society was, by agitation and the press, to induce the middle classes to resist the Government. Guizot was at one time its president, and Le Globe and Le National its organs. This society, which doubtless aided in bringing about the Revolution of 1830, was dissolved in 1832.

Aigrette (2 syl.). A lady's head-dress, consisting of feathers or flowers. The French call the down of lusties and dandelions, as well as the tuft of birds, aigrette.

Aim. To give aim, to stand aloof. A term in archery, meaning to stand within a convenient distance from the butts, to give the archers information how near their arrows fall to the mark aimed at.

"But, gentle people, give me aim awhile,
For naught puts me to a heavy task;"—
Stand a little off. Shakspeare: Titus Andronicus, v. 3.

To cry aim. To applaud, encourage. In archery it was customary to appoint certain persons to cry aim, for the sake of encouraging those who were about to shoot.

"All my neighbours shall cry aim."
Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 2.

Aim-erier. An abettor, one who encourages. In archery, the person employed to "cry aim." (See above.)

"Then smiling aim-erier at princes' fall."—
English Aesopina.

Air, an element. Anuxagor's held air to be the primary form of matter. Aristotle gives Fire, Air, Earth, and Water as the four elements.

Air, a manner, as "the air of the court," the "air of gentility;" "a good air" (manner, deportment) means the pervading habit.

Air, in music, is that melody which predominates and gives its character to the piece.

Air one's opinions (To). To state opinions without having firmly based Air-brained. Giddy, heedless. This word is now generally spelt “hur-brained,” but by ancient authors, hair-brained. In C. Thomson’s Autobiography it is spelt “Air-brained,” which seems plausible.

Air-line signifies (in the United States) the most direct and shortest possible route between two given places, as the Eastern and Western Air-line Railway.

"Presently a north-easterly current of wind struck the air-ship, and it began to move with great velocity upon a horizontal line."—Max Adler: The Captain’s DK.

Air-throne. Odin’s throne in Gladsheim. His palace was in Asgard.

Air. To give oneself mighty airs: to assume, in manner, appearance, and tone, a superiority to which you have no claim. The same as Air, manner (q.v.).

The plural is essential in this case to take it out of the category of mere convention, or to distinguish it from “air” in the sense of atmosphere, as “he had a fine, manly air,” “his air was that of a gentleman.” Air, in the singular, being generally complimentary, but “airs” in the plural always conveying contempt. In Italian, we call the phrase, so da d’erte.

Airap adam. The white elephant, one of the eight which, according to Indian mythology, sustain the earth.

Aisle (pronounce il). The north and south wings of a church. Latin, ala (axilla, ascella), through the French, aile, a wing. In German the nave of a church is schiff; and the aisle fligel (a wing). In some church documents the aisles are called alleys (walks), and hence the nave is still sometimes called the “middle aisle” or alley. The choir of Lincoln Cathedral used to be called the “Chanters’ alley;” and Olden tells us that when he came to be churchwarden, in 1638, he made the Puritans “come up the middle aisle on their knees to the rote.”

Aitch-bone of beef. Corruption of “Naitch-bone,” i.e. the haunch-bone (Latin, notes, a haunch or butch). Similarly, “an aitch” is a corruption of a sword or a scabbard (Latin, scutum, scabbard). In other forms, we have reversed the order: thus “a newt” is an eft; a new (of a Danish), Latin, eft; an eft, a new (of a Danish), Latin, eft.

Ajax, the Greater. King of Salamis, a man of giant stature, daring, and self-confident. Generally called Telamon.

Ajax, because he was the son of Telamon. When the armour of Hector was awarded to Ulysses instead of to himself, he turned mad from vexation and stabbed himself.—Homemaker, and later poets.

Akbar. An Arabic word, meaning “Very Great.” Akbar-Khan, the “very great Khan,” is applied especially to the Khan of Hindustan who reigned 1556-1605.

Akbaran. The most medevolent of all the Persian gods.

Alabama, U.S. America. The name of an Indian tribe of the Mississippi Valley, meaning “here we rest.”

Alabaster. A stone of great purity and whiteness, used for ornaments. So called from “Alabaster,” in upper Egypt, where it abounds.

Aladdin. In the Arabian Nights’ Tales, obtains a magic lamp, and has a splendid palace built by the genie of the lamp. He marries the daughter of the sultan of China, loves his lamp, and his palace is transported to Africa. Sir Walter Scott says, somewhat incorrectly:

"Vanished Tutor like the palace of Aladdin?"

"The palace did not vanish into air, but was transported to another place.

Aladdin’s Lamp. The source of wealth and good fortune. After Aladdin came to his wealth and was married, he suffered his lamp to hang up and get rusty.

"It was impregnable which the most overlod noblemen in Scythia could have offered to rent a moonlit Aladdin’s lamp.—Scythia.

Aladdin’s Ring, given him by the African magician, was a “preservative against every evil.”—Arabian Nights: Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp.

Aladdin’s Window. To finish Aladdin’s Window—i.e. to attempt to complete something begun by a great genius, but left imperfect. The genius of the lamp built a palace with twenty-four windows, all but one being set in frames of precious stones; the last was left for the sultan to finish; but after exhausting his treasures, the sultan was obliged to abandon the task as hopeless.

Tait's second part of Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel is an Abaddin's Windor.

Aladine (3 syl.). The sagacious but cruel old king of Jerusalem in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, book xx. This is a fictitious character, inasmuch as the Holy Land was at the time under the dominion of the caliph of Egypt. Aladine was slain by Raymond.

Alako. Son of Baro-Devel, the great god of the gipsies. The gipsies say that he will ultimately restore them to Assan in Assyria, their native country. The image of Alako has a pen in his left hand and a sword in his right.

Alans. Large dogs, of various species, used for hunting deer.

Alarcon. King of Barca, who joined the armament of Egypt against the Crusaders. His men were only half armed.—Jerusalem Delivered.

Alarm. An outcry made to give notice of danger. (Italian, allarme, “to arms;” French, alarme.)

Alarum Bell. In feudal times a larum bell was rung in the castle in times of danger to summon the refrainers to arms. A variant of alarm (g.r.).

"Awake! awake!"

River the alarum bell! Murder and desolation!"—Shakespeare, *Richard III.

Alasnam. Alasnam's lady. In the Arabian Nights Tales Alasnam has eight diamond statues, but had to go in quest of a ninth more precious still, to fill the vacant pedestal. The prize was found in the lady who became his wife, at once the most beautiful and the most perfect of her race.

"There is wantone one rare and perfect model, and that one, where'er it is to be found, is like Alasnam's lady, worth them all."—Sir Walter Scott.

Alasnam's Mirror. The "touchstone of virtue," given to Alasnam by one of the Genii. If he looked in this mirror it informed him whether a damsel would remain to him faithful or not. If the mirror remained unsullied so would the maiden; if it clouded, the maiden would prove faithless.—Arabian Nights: Prince Zeys Alasnam.

Alastor. The evil genius of a house; a Nemesis. Cicero says: "Who modi-ticated killing himself that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated." Shelley has a poem entitled "Alastor, or The Spirit of Solitude." The word is Greek (alastor, the avenging god, a title applied to Zeus); the Romans had their Jupiter Vindex; and we read in the Bible, "Vengeance is mine. I will repay, saith the Lord." (Rom. xii. 19).

Alanda. A Roman legion raised by Julius Cesar in Gaul, and so called because they carried a lark's tuft on the top of their helmets.

Alawy. The Nile is so called by the Abyssinians. The word means "the giant."

Alb. The long white tunic (Latin, albus, white) bound round the waist with a girdle. The dress is emblematical of purity and continence, and worn by priests when saying Mass.

Albadara. A bone which the Arabs say defies destruction, and which, at the resurrection, will be the germ of the new body. The Jews called it Luz (g.r.); and the "Ossacrum" (g.r.) refers probably to the same superstition.

Alban (St.), like St. Denis, is represented as carrying his head between his hands. His attributes are a sword and a crown.

St. Aphrosodius, St. Arquiete, St. Bessilinian, St. Christophe, St. Hilarian, St. Leu, St. L wieans, St. Lucian, St. Prota, St. Solange, and several other martyrs, are represented as carrying their heads in their hands. An artistic handling way of identifying a headless trunk.

Albania. Turkey, or rather the region about the Caucasus. The word means the "mountainous region."

Albanian Hat. (L.) "Un chapeau à l'Albanaise." A sugar-loaf hat, such as was worn by the Albanians in the sixteenth century.

Albano Stone or Peperino, used by the Romans in building; a volcanic tufa quarried at Albano.

Albany. Scotland. (See ALBAX.)

Albati. The white brethren. Certain Christian fanatics of the fourteenth century, so called because they dressed in white. Also the recently baptised. (Lain.)

Albatross. The largest of web-footed birds, called by sailors the Cape Sheep, from its frequenting the Cape of Good Hope. It gorges itself, and then sits motionless upon the waves. It is said to sleep in the air, because its flight is a gliding without any apparent motion of its long wings. Sailors say it is fatal to shoot an albatross. Coleridge's Ancient Mariner is founded on this superstition.

Albert (An). A chain from the waistcoat pocket to a button in front of the waistcoat. So called from Prince Albert, the consort of Queen Victoria. When he went to Birmingham, in 1849, he was presented by the jewellers of the town with such a chain, and the fashion took the public fancy.

Albertas (in Orlando Furioso) married Alda, daughter of Otho, Duke of Saxony. His sons were Hugh or Ugo, and Fulke or Fulco. From this family springs the Royal Family of England.

Albinazar (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the leaders of the Arab host which joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. "A chief in rapine, not in knighthood bred." (Book xvii.)

Albigenses (+ syl.). A common name for heretics prior to the Reformation; so called from the Albigenses, inhabitants of the district which now is the department of the Tarn, the capital of which was Albi. It was here the persecution of the Reformers began, under the direction of Pope Innocent III., in 1209. The Waldenses rose after them, but are not unfrequently confounded with them.

Albin. A name at one time applied to the northern part of Scotland, called by the Romans "Caledonia." This was the part inhabited by the Picts. The Scots migrated from Scotia in the North of Ireland, and acquired mastery under Kenneth M'Alpin in 813. In poetry Scotland is called Albin.

Albins. A term originally applied by the Portuguese to those negroes who were mottled with white spots; but now applied to those who are born with red eyes and white hair. Albions are found among white people as well as among negroes. The term is also applied to beasts and plants. (Latin, albus, white.)

Albino-poets. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (chap. viii.), speaks of Kirke White as one of the "sweet Albion poets," whose "plaintive song" he admires. It implies some deficiency of virility, as albinism suggests weakness, and possibly is meant as a play upon the name in this particular instance.

Albion. England, so named from the ancient inhabitants called Albionês. The usual etymology of albus (white), said to have been given by Julius Caesar in allusion to the "white cliffs," is quite untenable, as an old Greek treatise, the De Mundo, formerly ascribed to Aristotle, mentions the islands of Albion and Terræ three hundred years before the invasion of Caesar. Probably "Albion" or Albay was the Celtic name of all Great Britain, subsequently restricted to Scotland, and then to the Highlands of Scotland. Certainly the inhabitants of the whole island are implied in the word Albiones in Festus Avienus's account of the voyage of Hamilcar in the fifth century B.C. (See ALBIN.)

"Beyond the Pillars of Hercules is the ocean in which flows the world, and in it are 2 large, fertile islands called Britannia, 1, viz., Albion and the north of De Mundo, Sec. iv."

Albion. Son of the king of this island when Oberon held his court in what we call Kensington Gardens. He was stolen by the elfin Milkah, and brought up in fairyland. When nineteen years of age, he fell in love with Kenna, daughter of King Oberon, but was driven from the empire by the indignant monarch. Albion invaded the territory, but was slain in the battle. When Kenna knew this, she showered the juice of moly over the dead body, and it changed into a snow-drop.— T. Tickell.

Albion the Giant. Fourth son of Neptune, sixth son of Osiris, and brother of Heracles, his mother being Amphitrite. Albion the Giant was put by his father in possession of the isle of Britain, where he speedily subjugated the Samothracians, the first inhabitants. His brother Bergion ruled over Ireland and the Orkneys. Another of his brothers was Lostrigo, who subjected Italy. (See W. Harrison's Introduction to Holinshed's Chronicle.

Albracca's Damsel (in Orlando Furioso) is Angelica. Albracca is the capital of Cathay (q.c.).

Album. A blank book for scraps. The Romans applied the word to certain tables overlaid with gypsum, on which were inscribed the annals of the chief priests, the edicts of the pretors, and rules relating to civil matters. In the Middle Ages, "album" was the general name of a register or list; so called from being kept either on a white (albus) board with black letters, or on a black board with white letters. For the same reason the boards in churches for notices, and the boards in universities containing the names of the college men, are called albums.

Alderman (3 syl.). A magistrate is so called in Spain and Portugal. The word is the Arabic al-cadi (the Judge).

Alcaic Verse or Alcaic. A Greek and Latin metre, so called from Alcaeus, a lyric poet, who invented it. Each line is divided into two parts, thus:

The first two lines of each stanza of the ninth ode of Horace are in Alcaics. The first two lines of the ode run thus, and in the same metre:

See how Saturn's crown, with its wintry snow,
And weary woodlands bend with the toilsome load.

Alcantara (Order of). A military and religious order instituted in 1214 by Alfonso IX., King of Castile, to commemorate the taking of Alcantara from the Moors. The sovereign of Spain is, ex-officio, head of the Order. A renunciation of the order of St. Julian of the Pear-tree, instituted by Fernando Gomez in 1776, better known by the French title St. Julien du Parcier. The badge of the order was a pear-tree.

Alessandus (in Jerusalem Delivered). The Captains of the Crusaders, leader of 6,000 foot soldiers from Helvetia.

Aloe (2 syl.). One of the dogs of Actaeon. The word means "strength."

Alchemilla or Lady's Mantle. The alchemist's plant; so called because alchemists collected the dew of its leaves for their operations. Lady means the Virgin Mary, to whom the plant was dedicated.

Alchemists (Al-ki-m8) is the Arabic al kiuma (the secret art); so called not only because it was carried on in secret, but because its main objects were the three great secrets of science - the transmutation of baser metals into gold, the universal solvent, and the elixir of life. . . .

Alcaldé. A generic name for a first-rate carver in wood.

Alicnna. The personification of carnal pleasure in Orlando Furioso; the Erci of classic fable, and Lai of the Arabian. She enjoyed her lovers for a time, and then changed them into trees, stones, fountains, or beasts, as her fancy dictated.

Alcinoo poma dare (to give apples to Alcinaus). To carry coals to Newcastle; sending cider to Herefordshire. The orchards of Alcinous, King of Coreya (Corfu), were famous for their fruits.

Alcofridas. The pseudonym of Rabelais in his Gargantua and Pantagruel. Alcofridas Nasier is an anagram of "Francois Rabelais." The introduction runs thus: "The inestimable life of the great Gargantua, father of Pantagruel, herefore composed by M. Alcofridas, abstrator of the quintessence, a book full of pantagruelism."

Alcuth, mentioned by the Venerable Bede, is Dumbarton.

Aldabella or Aldabelle (in Orlando Furioso). Sister of Oliviero and Brandimarte, daughter of Monaldeschi, and wife of Orlando.

Aldabella. A marchioness of Florence, who gave entertainment to the magnates of the city. She was very handsome, heartless, and arrogant. When Fazio became rich with Bartoldo's money, Aldabella inveigled him from his wife, and his wife, out of jealousy, accused her husband of being privy to Bartoldo's death. Fazio being condemned for murder and robbery, his wife Bianca accused Aldabella of inveigling him, and the marchioness was condemned by the Duke of Florence to spend the rest of her life in a nunnery.

Dean Milman: Fazio.

Aldofarman. The sun in Arabian mythology. In astronomy, the star called the Bull's eye in the constellation Taurus. (Arabic al the, debarman.)

Alderman. One of the seniors or elders. Now applied to a class of magistrates in corporate towns. In London an alderman is the chief magistrate in a ward appointed by election. There are also aldermen of the County Council.

A turkey is called an alderman, both from its presence in aldermanic feasts, and also because of its red and purple colours about the head and neck, which make it a sort of poultry alderman.

An alderman is chairman, by a similar effort of wit, a turkey hung with sausages.

Alderman (An). A burglar’s tool; a crowbar for forcing safes. So called from the high rank it holds with burglars.

Alderman (An). A cant term for half-a-crown. An alderman as chief magistrate is half a king in his own ward; and half a crown is half a king.

Algdge Pump. A draught on Aldgate Pump. A cheque with no effects. A worthless bill. The pun is on the word draught, which means either an order on a bank for money or a sup of liquor.

Aldiger (in Orlando Furioso). Bu’vo’s son, of the house of Clarnmont, who lived in Agrigmont Castle. He was brother of Maligagi and Vivian; all Christians.

Aldine (2 syl.). Leader of the second squadron of Arabs who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. — Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered. (See SYPHAX)

Aldine Editions. Editions of the Greek and Latin classics, published and printed under the superintendence of Aldo Manuzio, his father-in-law Andrea of Asolo, and his son Paolo (1490-1597); most of them in small octavo, and all noted for their accuracy. The father invented the type called titules, once called Aldine, and first used in printing Virgil, 1501.

Al’dingar (Sir). Steward of Queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. He impeached her fidelity, and submitted to a combat to substantiate his charge; but an angel, in the shape of a child, established the queen’s innocence. — Percy’s Reliques.

Ales is the Scandinavian of, called alde in our island. Beer, written disconnectedly, is a kind of porter. A beverage made from barley is mentioned by Tacitus and even Herodotus. Hops were introduced from Holland and used for brewing in 1524, but their use was prohibited by Act of Parliament in 1528—a prohibition which soon fell into disuse. Ale is made from pale malt, whence its light colour; porter and stout from malt more highly dried. Beer is the general word, and in many parts of England includes ale, porter, and stout. The word ale was introduced by the Danes, and the word beer by the Teutons. Among London brewers beer means the dark form, called also stout or porter.

"Called ale among men; but by the gods called beer."—The Alcestis.

Aleberry, a corruption of ale-bree. A drink made of hot ale, spice, sugar, and toast. Burns speaks of the barley-bree (Anglo-Saxon barr, broth).

"Cause an aleberry to be made for her, and put into a powder of camphor." —The Pathway to Health.

"He that drinkers with cutlers must not be without his ale-dagger." (Shak). (See N. E. D.)

Pierce Penniless says: — "All that will not were ale-house daggers at your backes [should abstain from taverns]." — See Shakespeare Society, p. 55.

Ale-draper, a tapster. Ale-draperly, the selling of ale, etc.

No other affection have I but to be an ale-draper."—H. C. H.: Kind hearts’ Dreame, 1592.

Ale Knight (An). A knight of the ale-tub, a tippler, a sot.

Ale-silver. A yearly tribute paid to the corporation of London, as a licence for selling ale.

Ale-stake. The pole set up before ale-houses by way of sign. A bush was very often fixed to its top. A tavern.

"A gardin full he set upon his head
As great as it wereon for an ale-stake." —Chaucer.

"I knew many an ale-stake." —Hart’s. English Drama, 1. 100.

Ale-wife. The landlady of an ale-house or ale-stand.

Alecto. One of the Furies, whose head was covered with snakes.

"Then like Alecto, terrible to ye.
On the Medusa, the Thracian queen.” —Hone, English Delightful, i. vi.

Alcetarian Stone (An). A stone, said to be of talismanic power, found in the stomach of cocks. Those who possess it are strong, brave, and wealthy. Milo of Crotone owed his strength to this talisman. As a philëte it has the power of preventing thirst or of assuaging it. (Greek, aletor, a cock.)

Alectromancy. Divination by a cock. Draw a circle, and write in succession round it the letters of the alphabet, on each of which lay a grain of corn. Then put a cock in the centre of the circle, and watch what grains he eats. The letters will prognosticate the answer. Libanius and Jamblicus thus discovered, who was to succeed the emperor Valens. The cock ate the grains over the letters θ, ρ, ο, d = Theod [Θοδ], Greek alector, cock; mantia, divination.

Aleria (in Orlando Furioso). One of the Amazons, and the best beloved of the ten wives of Guido the Savage.

Alert. To be on the watch. From the Latin cretus, part. of cregere, to set upright; Italian, ereto; French, eret, a watch-tower. Hence the Italian starre all ereto, the Spanish estar alerta, and the French être à l'oreille, to be on the watch.

Alessio. The lover of Liza, in Bellini’s opera of La Sonambula (Scribe’s libretto).

Alethes (3 syl.). An ambassador from Egypt to King Aladine. He is represented as a man of low birth raised to the highest rank, subtle, false, deceitful, and wily.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.

Alexander and the Robber. The robber’s name was Diomedes.—Geeta Romana, cxlv.

You are thinking of Parmenio, and I of Alexander—i.e., you are thinking what you ought to receive, and I what I ought to give; you are thinking of those catedated, rewarded, or gifted; but I of my own position, and what punishment, reward, or gift is consistent with my rank. The allusion is to the tale about Parmenio and Alexander, when the king said, “I consider not what Parmenio should receive, but what Alexander should give.”

Only two Alexanders, Alexander said, “There are not but two Alexanders—the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable painting of the hero by Apelles.”

The/constants of Alexander. Having gained the battle of Issus (B.C. 333) the family of King Darius fell into his hand; but he treated the ladies as queens, and observed the greatest decorum towards them. A cuuuch, having escaped, told Darius of this noble con- tinence, and Darius could not but admire such nobility in a rival.—Arrian Anna-Basis of Alexander, iv. 20. (See Con-

Alexandrian School. An academy of literature by Ptolemy, son of La’gos, was called by the shepherds who brought him up.

Alexander of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden, so called from his military achievements. He was conquered at Pultowa, in Russia (1709), by Czar Peter the Great (1682-1718).

“Representing here

The frantic Alexander of the North.”—Thomson: Winter.

The Persian Alexander. Sandjar (1117-1153).

Alexander the Corrector. Alexander Cruden, author of the “Concordance to the Bible,” who petitioned Parliament to constitute him “Corrector of the People,” and went about constantly with a sponge to wipe out the licentious, coarse, and profane chalk scrawls which met his eye. (1706-1770.)

Alexander’s Beard. A smooth chin, no beard at all. An Amazonian chin.

“Disguised yet with Alexander’s beard.”—Guizot: Pte Stere time.

Alexandra (in Orlando Furioso). Orontia’s daughter; the Amazon queen.

Alexandra, so Cassandra, daughter of Priam, is called. The two names are mere variants of each other.

Alexandrian. Anything from the East was so called by the old chroniclers and romancers, because Alexandria was the depot from which Eastern stores reached Europe.

“Repaired from Alexandria to London.”—Pery: Furioso, x. 31.

Alexanderian Codex. A manuscript of the Scriptures in Greek, which belonged to the library of the patriarchs of Alexandria, in Africa, a.d. 1998. In 1628 it was sent as a present to Charles I., and in 1753 was placed in the British Museum. It is on parchment, in uncial letters, and contains the Septuagint version (except the Psalms), a part of the New Testament, and the Epistles of Clemens Romanus.

Alexanderian Library. Founded by Ptolemy Soter, in Alexandria, in Egypt. The tale is that it was burnt and partly consumed in 391; but when the city fell into the hands of the calif Omar, in 642, the Arabs found books sufficient to “heat the baths of the city for six months.” It is said that it contained 700,000 volumes.

Alexandrian School. An academy of literature by Ptolemy, son of La’gos, especially famous for its grammarians and mathematicians. Of its grammarians the most noted are Aristarchos, Harpocrate, and Eratosthenes; and of its mathematicians, Ptolemy and Euclid, the former an astronomer, and the latter the geometer whose Elements are still very generally used.

Alexandrine Age. From A.D. 323 to 640, when Alexandria, in Egypt, was the centre of science and literature.

Alexandrine Philosophy. The system of the Gnostics, or Platonised form of Christianity.

Alexandrines (4 syl.). Iambic verses of 12 or 13 syllables, divided into two parts between the sixth and seventh syllable; so called because they were first employed in a metrical romance of Alexander the Great, commenced by Lambert-li-Cors, and continued by Alexandre de Bornay, also called Alexandre de Paris. The final line of the Spenserian stanza is an Alexandrine.

"A needless Alexandrine ends the song, Which, like a wounded snake, i drew its slow length along."

Alexandrite (4 syl.). A variety of chrysobery found in the micro-slate of the Uralis. So named from Czar Alexander II. (1818, 1855-1881), because it shows the Russian colours, green and red.

Alexis (St.). Patron saint of hermits and beggars. The story goes that he lived on his father's estate as a hermit till death, but was never recognised. He is represented in Christian art, with a pilgrim's habit and staff. Sometimes he is drawn as if extended on a mat, with a letter in his hand, dying.

Ald'ber (father of all). The most ancient and chief of the Scandinavian gods. Odin, father of the Æsir, or gods.

Alfma. (See Horse.)

Alfar. The good and bad genii of the Scandinavian.

Alfoheim (home of the good genii). A celestial city inhabited by the elves and fairies. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Alfonso. An instrument for extracting balls. So called from Alfonso Ferri, a surgeon of Naples, who invented it. (1592.)

Alfonsoine Tables. Astronomical tables constructed in 1292, by Isaac Hazan, a Jewish rabbi, who named them in honour of his patron, Alfonso X., King of Castile, surnamed "The Wise."

Alfonso, to whom Tasso dedicated hisbottom line of. A.D. 323

"Alhambra. The palace of the ancient Moors in Granada. The word
All. Cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, the beauty of whose eyes is with the Persians proverbial; insomuch that the highest term they employ to express beauty is Ayn Hal (eyes of Ali) — Chardin.

"You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot," one of Macbeth's gang: he was Robin of Bagshot, alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Carbuncle, alias Bob Booty. — Gay: The Beggar's Opera.

Alibi (elsewhere). A plea of having been at another place at the time that an offence is alleged to have been committed.

"Never mind the character, and stick to the alley! Nothing like an alley! Sammy, nothing!" — Dickens: Pickwick Papers.

Alibi Clock (An), 1887. A clock which strikes one hour, while the hands point to a different time, the real time being neither one nor the other.

Aliboron. Maitre Aliboron. Mr. Jackass. Aliboron is the name of a jackass in La Fontaine's Fables. (See Gomcm.)

Alice. The foster-sister of Robert le Diable, and bride of Rambaldo, the Norman troubadour. She came to Palermo to place in the duke's hand her mother's will, which he was enjoined not to read till he was a virtuous man. When Bertram, his head-father, tempted his son to evil, Alice proved his good genius, and when at last Bertram claimed his soul as the price of his ill deeds, Alice read the "will," and won him from the evil one. — Meyerbeer's Opera, Roberto d'Invalo.

Alice Brand. Wife of Lord Richard, cursed with the "sleepless eye." Alice signed Turgan the dwarf three with the sign of the cross, and he became "the fairest knight in all Scotland," when Alice recognized in him her own brother. — Sir Walter Scott: The Lady of the Lake, iv. 12.

Alichino (wing dropped). A devil, in The Inferno of Dante.

Alick and Sandie. Contractions of Alexander; the one being Alex, and the other Sandie.

Alison. The seventh heaven, to which Azrael conveys the spirits of the just. (Mohammedan mythology.)

Alien Priory. (An). A priory which owes allegiance to another priory. A sub-priory, like Rufford Abbey, Notts, which was under the prior of Easivaulx in Yorkshire.

Allanfarou, the giant. Don Quixote attacked a flock of sheep, which he declared to be the army of the giant Allanfarou. Similarly Ajax, in a fit of madness, fell upon a flock of sheep, which he mistook for Grecian princes.

Allat. The name by which the Arabs adore nature, which they represent by a crescent moon.

Allprando (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the Christian knights. Having discovered the armour of Rinaldo cast on one side, he took it to Godfrey, who very naturally inferred that Rinaldo had been slain. (See Gen. xxxvii. 31-35.)

Aliris. Sultan of Lower Bucharia. Under the disguised name of Fer'amor, he accompanied Lulla Rookh, his betrothed, from Delhi, and won her heart by his ways, and the tales he told on the journey. The lady fell in love with the poet, and was delighted to find, on the morning of the wedding, that Feramor was, in fact, the sultan, her intended husband. — T. Moore: Lulla Rookh.

Al Kader (the Divine decree). A particular night in the month Ramadhan, when the Arabs say that angels descend to earth, and Gabriel reveals to man the decrees of God. — Al Koran, ch. xcixii.

Alkahast. The hypothetical universal solvent. The word was invented by Paracelsus.

Al Rakim (pronounce Rah-keem). The dog in the legend of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus.

Al Sirat (Arabian, the path). The bridge over hell, no wider than the edge of a sword, across which every one who enters heaven must pass. (Mohammedan mythology.)

All. Everything. "Our all," everything we possess.

"Our all is at stake." Ralst. a; State of War.

All and Some. "One and all." (Old English, ealle et samma, all at once, altogether.)

' Now stop your nose and render all and some." Ralst. a. "Allons et succombons!"

All and Sunday. All without exception.

He played all and sundry to a house full, of the worst he could. Hall estore.

All cannot do all. Horace says, "Non omnia possimus omnes." German proverb, "Eum jeder kann nicht
All Fools' Day (April 1st). (See April Fool.)

All Fours. A game of cards; so called from the four points that are at stake, viz. High, Low, Jack, and Game.

To go on all fours is to crawl about on knees and hands like a little child.

It does not go on all fours means it does not suit in every minute particular; it does not fully satisfy the demand. It limps as a quadruped which does not go on all its four legs. Omnis comparitur claudicat (all similes limp).

"No skme can go on all-fours." Monday.

All-hallow Summer. The second summer, or the summerly time which sets in about All-Hallows-tide. Called by the French, L’été de St. Martin (from October 9th to November 11th). Also called St. Luke’s Summer (St. Luke’s Day is October 18th). The Indian summer. Shakespeare uses the term—

"Farewell, thou fitter spring: farewell, All-hallow Summer." Hamlet IV. 2.

All Hallow's Day (November 1st). The French call it Translant, which we have transliterated All Saints’ Day. Hallowmass is All-Saints’ festival. (Anglo-Saxon, hâlig, but Halig-monde was September, and Halig-deg was simply a Holy-day.)

All Hallow's Eve. The Scotch tradition is, that those born on All Hallow's Eve have the gift of double sight, and commanding powers over spirits. Mary Avenel, on this supposition, is made to see the White Lady, invisible to less gifted visions.

"Being born on All-hallow's Eve, she Mary Avenel was supposed to be invested with power over the invisible world." (See Sir Walter Scott. The Monastery, chap XV.)

All in all. He is all in all to me, that is, the dearest object of my affection. God shall be all in all means all creation shall be absorbed or gathered into God. The phrase is also used adverbially, meaning altogether, as:

"Take him for all in all.
I shall not look upon his like again." Shakespeare. Hamlet v. 2.

All in the Wrong. A drama, by Murphy, borrowed from De-Touches, the French dramatist.

All is lost that is put in a riven dish.
In Latin, "Partus sum quidquid infunditur in dolium, pertit." (It is no use helping the insolvent.)

All is not gold that glitters or glisters. Trust not to appearances. In Latin, "Nulius fides frontis."

"Not all that glisters is gold."

All my Eye (and) Betty Martin. All nonsense. Joe Miller says that a Jack Tar went into a foreign church, where he heard some one uttering these words—Ah! mihi, beate Martini (Ah! [grant] me, Blessed Martin). On giving an account of his adventure, Jack said he could not make much out of it, but it seemed to him very like "All my eye and Betty Martin." Grose has "Mihi beate Martinia" [sic]. The shortened phrase, "All my eye," is very common.

All one. The same in effect. Answers the same purpose.

All-overish. A familiar expression meaning all over at once. "I feel all-overish," not exactly ill, but uncomfortable all over. The precursor of a fever, influenza, ague, etc.

All Saints or All Hallow. In 610 the Pope of Rome ordered that the heathen Pantheon should be converted into a Christian church, and dedicated to the honour of all martyrs. The festival of All Saints was first held on May 1st, and in the year 834 it was changed to November 1st. "Hallow" is from the Anglo-Saxon hâlig (holy).

All Serene, derived from the Spanish word sereno. In Cuba the word is used as a countersign by sentinels, and is about equivalent to our "All right," or "All's well."

All Souls' Day. The 2nd of November, so called because the Roman Catholics on that day seek by prayer and almsgiving to alleviate the sufferings of souls in purgatory. It was first instituted in the monastery of Cluny, in 993.

According to tradition, a pilgrim, returning from the Holy Land, was compelled by a storm to land on a rocky island, where he found a hermit, who told him that among the cliffs of the island was an opening into the infernal regions through which huge flames ascended, and where the groans of the tormented were distinctly audible. The pilgrim told Odilo, abbot of Cluny, of this: and the abbot appointed the day following, which was November 2nd, to
All the go 34

All Akbar. Allah is most mighty. The cry of the Arabs.—Ockley.

Allan-a-Dale. The minstrel of Robin Hood's yeomen. He was assisted by Robin Hood in carrying off his bride, when on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

Allemand. "Une querelle d'Allemand," a quarrel about nothing. We call put volair "Dutch courage."

Allen. (See Allworthy.)

Allestre. Richard Allestre, of Derby, was a noted almanac maker in Ben Jonson's time.

Alley (The). The Stock Exchange Alley.

"John Hove, after many active years in the Alley, retired to the Continent, and died at the age of 70."—Old and New London, p. 47b.

Allénsia (Dutch) (June 16th, n. c. 390), when the Romans were cut to pieces by the Gauls near the banks of the river Allia; and ever after held to be a dies nefastus, or unlucky day.

Alligator. When the Spaniards first saw this reptile in the New World, they called it el lagarto (the lizard). Sir Walter Raleigh called these creatures lagartos, and Ben Jonson allegartos.

"To the present day the Europeans in Ceylon apply the term alligator to a bird are in reality crocodiles."—J. E. Tennant, Ceylon (vol. i. part 2, chap. ii. p. 14).

Alligator Pears (the fruit of Persea gratissima) is a curious corruption. The aboriginal Carib word for the tree is annacuti, from which the Spanish discoverers pronounced "avocado," and English sailors called "alligator," as the nearest approach which occurred to them.

Alliteration.

Dr. Bethel of Eton.

"Indicta de, declaratory, droll. By, lazy Bethel fellowship alike a bull."—Eton College.

CARDINAL WOLSEY.

"Bred to butchers, but to bishops bred. How much his roman breaks his honest head."—Eton College.

% Huchard composed an alliterative poem on Charles the Bold, every word of which begins with c.

Henry Harder composed a poem of 100 lines, in Latin hexameters, on cats, every word of which begins with c. The title is Causum comin Catus certamen caunun compositum currante calamo C Catulli Cannunti. The first line is—

"Cantorum canum canunt in chao canunique.*
Hammonics wrote the Certamen catholicum cum Calvinista, every word of which begins with c.

It is a curious coincidence that the names of these three men all begin with H.

In the Materia more Magistralis every word begins with m.

Placventius, the Dominican, who died 1518, wrote a poem of 258 Latin hexameters, called Pugna Pororum, every word of which begins with p. It begins thus:

"Pauete, Porcelli, pororum pugna proponat."
Which may be translated—

"Praise, Paul, raise pg's public progeny."

Tussor, who died 1580, has a rhyming poem of twelve lines, every word of which begins with l.

The Rev. B. Poulter, prebendary of Winchester, composed in 1828 the famous alliterative alphabetic poem in rhyme.

It begins thus:

"An Austrian army awfully arrived.
Boldly by battery besieged Belgium.
Consecrated commandants, commanding came,
Dealing destruction's devastating doom."

Some ascribe this alliterative poem to Alaric A. Watts (1820). (See H. Southgate, Many Thoughts on Many Things.)

Another attempt of the same kind begins thus:

"About an age ago, as all agree,
Beautifying in arms, winning best Bohem.
Clearest characte', contriving clean,
Dublin's derivate, disputations adorn.

Allo'dials. Lands which are held by an absolute right, without even the burden of homage or fidelity; opposed to feudal. The word is Teutonic: all-id (all property).

Allop'athy, in opposition to Ha-mo'pathy. The latter word is from the Greek, homo pathos, similar disease; and the former is allo pathos, a different disease. In one case, "like is to cure like"; and in the latter, the disease is cured by its "antidote."

Allo.' The fire Allo.' A public-house 50. It has five human figures, with a motto to each:

1. A king in his reign... motto I prevail all
2. A bishop, in his pontificate... I prove for all
3. A lawyer, in his gown... I plead for all
4. A soldier in his uniform... I fight for all
5. A laborer, with his tools... I pay for all.
Several of these signs still exist.

Allo.' Tap-droppings. The refuse of all sorts of spirits drained from the glasses, or spilt in drawing. The mixture is sold in gin-houses at a cheap rate.

Allworth. In A New Way to Pay Old Debts, by Massinger.

Allworthy, in Fielding's Tom Jones, is designed for the author's friend, Ralph Allen, of Bristol.

"Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth and blush to find it fame."

Pope: Epilogue to Sat. 1. 135, 136.

Alma (the human soul), quae of "Body Castle," beset by enemies for seven years (the Seven Ages of Man). The besiegers are a rabble rout of evil desires, foul imaginations, and silly conceits. Alma conducted Arthur and Sir Guyon over her castle. "The divine part of a man," says Spenser, "is circular, a circle being the emblem of eternity; but the mortal part triangular, as it consists of three things—blood, flesh, and bones."—Prior's Farm.

Alma Mater. A collegian so calls the university of which he is a member. The words are Latin for "fostering mother."

"Expulsum from his Alma Mater."—The Colossi and the Porter.

Almack's. A suite of assembly rooms in King Street, St. James's (London), built in 1763 by a Scotman named Macall, who inverted his name to obviate all prejudice and hide his origin. Balls, preceded over by a committee of ladies of the highest rank, used to be given at these rooms; and to be admitted to them was as great a distinction as to be presented at Court. The rooms were afterwards known as Will's, from the name of the next proprietor, and used chiefly for large dinners. They were closed in 1800.

Almagest. The Synopsis-magistri of Ptolemy, translated by the Ambrians in 800, by order of the caliph Al-Ma'mun, and then called Al-maghest, i.e., "the magistri." It contains numerous observations and problems of geometry and astronomy. It is very rare, and more precious than gold.

Almam, a German. The French Alman, a German, which, of course, is the classic Alman or Alman. Similarly, Almany Germany, French, Almagnie.

"A hom{:dom:umissaund vestibulum, Alman knick...
1. Sat in the two we're unto Argentoratum."

Holland: Amsterdam Marschall.

"Now Fulke comes not, and walks in Amary."—Harrington: Orlando Furioso, iii. 30.
Aloe

Aloe is the Arabic al manoos (the diary). Versteegen says it is the Saxon al-moon-ght (all moon heed), and that it refers to the tallies of the full and new moons kept by our Saxon ancestors. One of these tallies may still be seen at St. John's College, Cambridge.

Before printing, or before it was common:

- By Solomon Jarchi...
- Walter de Brivendame...
- John Side, Oxford...
- Nicholas de Lyra...
- Purbach...

First printed by Gutenberg at Mainz 1452 by Reimannmann, at Konovend... 1472.
- Zinnaer, at Lin... 1575.
- Richard Purchas (Shakespear's)...
- Stofler, in Venice...
- Poor Robins Almanack...
- Princess Mowten's Almanack between 1609 and 1718.

Stamp duty imposed 1716, repealed 1854.

The Almanack is often marked with points referring to signs of the zodiac, and intended to incite the favourable and unfavourable times of letting blood.

I shall not consult your almanack (French), I shall not come to you to know what weather to expect. The reference is to the prognostications of weather in almanacs.

Aldersbury. It was in a sanctuary at Aldersbury that Queen Guenevere took refuge, after her adulterous passion for Lancelot was revealed to the king (Arthur). Here she died; but her body was buried at Glastonbury.

"The almonite dollar, that great object of universal devotion triumphant on land..."

Ben Jonson speaks of "almighty gold."

Almond Tree. Grey hairs. The Preacher thus describes old age:-

"... when the keepers of the house (the bed of the house) were weary, and the grinders (the heritage) were pressed because they were dry, and those that looked out of the windows of the house were dandruffed, and the almond tree shall flourish upon us..." - Eccles. xlix., 24.

Almory. The place where the almoner resides, or where alms are distributed. An almoner is a person whose duty it is to distribute alms, which, in ancient times, consisted of one-tenth of the entire income of a monastery. (See Ambly.)

Alms. Gifts to the poor.

Dr. Johnson says the word has no singular; whereas Todd says it has no plural. Like other words, it is wholly singular in construction, but is used both as a noun singular and noun plural. Of course it is Almene, Almene, Almouse, Almone, Almes, the is not the plural suffix. Riches in the French speech. Both words are singular, but of nouns of multitude, for the plural construction. (Latin almonium, Greek diworagh, from the same root, &c.)

Alms Basket. To live on the alms basket. To live on charity.

Alms-Drink. Another's leavings; for alms consists of broken bread and the residue of drink. It is also applied to the liquor which a drinker finds too much, and therefore hands to another.

Alms-foos. Peter's pence, or Rome sod. Abolished in England by Henry VIII.

Alms-house. A house where paupers are supported at the public expense; a poor-house. Also a house set apart for the aged poor free of rent.

Almsman. One who lives on alms.

Almanach Drem. (Ar.) Counting your chickens before they are hatched. Almanah, the hermit's fifth brother, invested all his money in a basket of glassware, on which he was to make a certain profit. The profit, being invested, was to make more, and this was to go on till he grew rich enough to marry the visor's daughter. Being angry with his imaginary wife he gave a kick, overturned his basket, and broke all his wares.

"To indulge in Almanach-like du... of commendations..."

Almanach of Modern Literature. Coloridge has been so called because he "dreamt" his Kulla Khan, and wrote it out next morning. (1772-1834.)

"... probably he had been reading Pursue's "Phylasmus," for none can doubt the resemblance of the two pieces.

Aloe. A Hebrew word, Greek alde. A very bitter plant; hence the proverb, "Mis aloe quam mollis habet." (Life) has more biters than sweets." The French say, "La côte d'Adam content plus"
ALPHONSO.

Alphonso came originally from the island called Secotra, in the Indian Ocean.

Along-shore Men or Longshoremen, that be stevedores (2 syl.), or men employed to load and unload vessels.

Alonge of Aguilar. When Fernando, King of Aragon, was laying siege to Granada, after chasing Zagal from the gates, he asked who would undertake to plant his banner on the heights. Alonso, "the lowmost of the dons," undertook the task, but was cut down by the Moors. His body was exposed in the wood of Oxijer, and the Moorish damsels, struck with its beauty, buried it near the brook of Alpuxarra.

Aloof. Stand aloof, away. A sea term, meaning originally to bear to windward, or left. (Norwegian, German, etc., left, wind, breeze.)

Alorus, so the Chaldeans called their first king, who, they say, came from Babylon.

A l'entrance. To the uttermost. (Anglo-French for d'entrance.)

"A champion has started up to maintain a controversy her innocence of the great offence."

—Standard.

Alp. The Adrian renegade, a Venetian by extraction, who forsook the Christian faith to become a commander in the Turkish army. He led the host to the siege of Corinth, while that country was under the dominion of the Doge. He loved Francesca, daughter of Minotti, governor of Corinth, but she died of a broken heart because he deserted his country and was an apostate. The renegade was shot in the street.

Byron: Siege of Corinth.

Alph. A mythical "sacred river in Xanadu," which ran "through caverns measureless to man." —Colridge: Kubla Khan.

Alph. "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last" (Rev. 1:8).

"Alpha" is the first, and "O-mega" the last letter of the Greek alphabet.

Alphabet. This is the only word compounded of letters only. The Greek alphabet (a) beta (b); our A B C (book), etc.

The number of letters in an alphabet varies in different languages. Thus there are:

- 21 letters in the Italian alphabet.
- Hebrew & Syrian alphabet
- Latin
- Greek
- French
- English, German, Dutch
- Spanish
- Arabic
- Coptic
- Russian
- Armenian
- Georcan
- Slavonic
- Persian (Zendi)
- Sanskrit

The Chinese have no alphabet, but about 20,000 syllabic characters.

Kena vii, 21 contains all the letters of the English language, presumably in the order, following an excerpt:

...and so forth...

...and then... a Greek ch to distinguish between Church and Christ, two a's (one soft and one hard), two e's, two o's, half a dozen a's, and so on.

Two a's, we have dif., dif., Thomas (t), nar (n), salt (salt), etc. So with r, we have pry (p), met (e), England (i), serv (s), herb (h), etc. The other vowels are equally indefinite.

Alphes and Arcthussa. The Greek fabler says that Alphes, the river god, fell in love with the nymph Arcthussa, who fled from him in despair. The god pursued under the sea, but the nymph was changed into a spring, which came up in the harbour of Syracuse.

"We have seen a monstrous Alphes of Fanesque, or the attributed Arcthussa."

Alphoos (in Orlando Furioso). A magician and prophet in the army of Clamagro, slain in sleep by Florida's."

Alphesibea or "Arsinoe," wife of Alcmenon. She gave her spouse the fatal collar, the source of numberless evils.

So was the necklace of Hamony; and so wore the collar and veil of Euphro, wife of Amphaias.

Alphonso, etc. (See Alfonso, etc.)
Alpleich or "Elfenreigen" (the weird spirit-song), that music which some hear before death. Faber refers to it in his _Pilgrims of the Night._

"Hark, hark, my soul! Angelic songs are swelling."

Pope also says, in the _Dying Christian—_

"Hark! they whisper: angels say, _breath sport, come away._"

_Alpue, Alpue (Alp),_ in the game of Basset, doubling the stake on a winning card.

"What ply 'tis those conquering eyes
Which all the world admire,
Should, while the love gaining dies,
Be only on Alpue." _Etherge: Basset._

_Alquife (al-kf-fy)._ A famous enchanter, introduced into the romances of ancient times, especially those related to Amadis of Gaul.

_Alrinaeh._ The demon who presides over floods and earthquakes, rain and hail. It is this demon who causes shipwrecks. When visible, it is in a female form. (_Eastern mythology._)

_Alruma-wife (Alw)._ The Alrums were the laries or penates of the ancient Germans. An Alruna-wife was the household goddess of a German family.
An Alruna-maiden is a household maiden goddess.

"She (Alpata) looked as fair as the sun, and talked like an Alruma-wife." _Kingden: Alpata_, chap. vii.

_Altasia._ The Whitefriars sanctuary for debtors and law-breakers. Cunningham thinks the name is borrowed from Alise, in France, which being a frontier of the Rhine, was everlastingly the seat of war and the refuge of the disaffected.
Sir Walter Scott, in his _Fortunes of Nigel_, has described the life and state of this monastery. He has borrowed largely from Shadwell's comedy, _The Square of Altasia._ (See PETANIA.)

_Alsvidur._ (See House.)

_Altamoros (in Jerusalem Delivered)._
King of Samarcand, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusdaders. "He was supreme in courage as in might." (Book xvii.) He surrendered himself to Godfrey. (Book xx.)

_Altan Kol_ or _Gold River (Thibet)._
So-called from the gold which abounds in its sands.

_Altar (Au),_ in Christian art. St.
Stephen (the Pope), and Thomas Becket are represented as immolated before an alter. St. Canute is represented as lying before an altar. St. Charles Borromée is represented as kneeling before an altar. St. Gregory (the Pope) is represented as offering sacrifice befor e an altar. And the attribute of Victor is an altar overturned, in allusion to his throwing down a Roman altar in the presence of the Emperor Maximian.

_Let to the altar, i.e. married._ Said of a lady. The altar is the communion-table railed off from the body of the church, where marriages are solemnised.
The bride is led up the aisle to the rail.

_Alter ego._ My double or counterpart. In _The Corsican Brothers_, the same actor performs the two brothers, the one being the alter ego of the other.
(Latin, "a second I"). One who has full powers to act for another.

_Althea's Brand_, a fatal contingency. Althea's son was to live so long as a log of wood, then on the fire, remained unconsumed. She contrived to keep the log unconsumed for many years, but being angry one day with Meleager, she pushed it into the midst of the fire, and it was consumed in a few minutes. Meleager died at the same time._Ordu: Metamorphoses, viii. 4.

"The fatal brand Althea burned" _Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., Act 1. 1._

_Althea (Divine)._ The divine Althea of Richard Lovelace was Lucy Sachey-evall, called by the poet, "Lucretia._"

"When love with unconfin'd wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my gates _

The "grates" referred to were the prison grates. Lovelace was thrown into prison by the Long Parliament for his petition from Kent in favour of the knight.

_Altissidora_ (in the "Curious Impertinent"), an episode in _Don Quixote._

_Altis._ The plot of ground on which the Greeks held their public games.

_Alto relievo._ Italian for "high relief." A term used in sculpture for figures in wood, stone, marble, etc., so cut as to project at least one-half from the tablet. It should be _relief_ (3 syl.)

_Alumbrado_ (in English, "enlightened"). _Alvina Weeps_, or "Hark! Alvina weeps," i.e. the wind howls loudly, a Flemish saying. Alvina was the dughter of a king, who was cursed by herself in Babel because she married unsuitably. From that day she roamed about the air invisible to the eye of man, but her means are audible.

Amasis (Ancient Egypt). The servant of Dame Christian Custance, the guy widow, in Udall's comedy Ralph Roister Doister.

Alaiido (in Orlando Furioso). King of Tremizien in Africa. He was overthrown by Orlando on his way to join the allied army of Agraulant.

A.M. or M.A. When the Latin form is intended the A comes first, as Artium Magister; but where the English form is meant the M precedes, as Master of Arts.

Amadis of Gaul. The hero of a romance in prose of the same title, originally written in Portuguese in four books. These four were translated into Spanish by Montalvo, who added a fifth. Subsequent romancers added the exploits and adventures of other knights, so as to swell the romance to fourteen books. The French version is much larger still, one containing twenty-four books, and another running through seven volumes. The original author was Vasco de Lobeira, of Oporto, who died 1403.

The hero, called the "Lion-knight" from the device on his shield, and "Bel-tenebros" (darkly beautiful), from his personal appearance, was a love-child of Perion, King of Gaul, and Elizena, Princess of Brittany. He is represented as a poet and musician, a linguist and a gallant, a knight-errant and a king, the very model of chivalry.

Other names by which Amadis was called were the lovely Désirée, the Knight of the Burning Sword, the Knight of the Uncertainty, etc. Bernardo, in 1566, wrote "Amadigi di Gaula."

Amadis of Greece. A supplemental part of the romance called Amadis of Gaul, added by Felippone de Silva.

Amasmon (3 syl.). One of the chief devils whose dominion is on the north side of the infernal gulf. He might be bound or restrained from doing hurt from the third hour till noon, and from the ninth hour till evening.

"Amasmon soundeth well: but better well."

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Amalsttan Code. A compilation of maritime laws, compiled in the eleventh century at Amalfi, then an important trading town.

Amalivaeco. An American spirit, who had seven daughters. He broke their legs to prevent their running away, and left them to people the forests.

Amalphies. (See Sithylline Books.)

Amalthea's Horn. The cornucopia or horn of plenty. The infant Zeus was fed with goats' milk by Amalthea, one of the daughters of Melisseus, King of Crete. Zeus, in gratitude, broke off one of the goat's horns, and gave it to Amalthea, promising that the possessor should always have in abundance everything desired. (See Zeus.)

Amandas, the impersonation of love in Thomson's Spring, is Miss Young, afterwards married to Admiral Campbell.

Amarant. A cruel giant slain by Guy of Warwick.—Guy and Amaranth, Perry's Reliques.

Amaranth. Clement of Alexandria says—Amaranthus flores, symbolum est immortalitatis. The word is from the Greek amaranthus (everlasting). So called because its flowers never fade like other flowers, but retain to the last much of their deep blood-red colour.

"Im mortal amaran— a flower which once in paradise, last in the tree of life, began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence, to heaven removed, where first it grew, there grows And flowers oft shading the fruit of life With these that never fadeth, the green elect And then a splendid view."

Milton: Paradise Lost, III, 334-41.

* In 1553 Christina, Queen of Sweden, instituted the Order of the "Knights of the Amaranth" but it ceased to exist at the death of the Queen. Among the emblems it was the symbol of immortality.

The best known species are "Love lies bleeding" (amaranthus caudatus), and "Prince's feather" (amaranthus hypochamnus). "Cock's comb" is now ranked under the genus Celosia.

Amaryllis. A pastoral sweetheart. The name is borrowed from the pasturals of Theocritus and Virgil.

"To sport with Amaryllis in the shade."

Milton: Lycidas, 96.

Amasis (King of), same as Polycrates' Ring. Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in everything that Amasis, King of Egypt, advised him to part with something which he highly prized. Polycrates accordingly threw into the sea an engraved ring of extraordinary value. A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which the ring was found. Amasis now renounced all friendship with Polycrates, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long afterwards, a satrap, having entrapped the too fortunate despot, put him to death by crucifixion. — Herodotus, iii. 40.

Amatì. A first-rate violin; properly, one made by Amati of Cremona (c. 1600). (See Cremona.)

Amaurot (Greek, the shadowy or unknown place), the chief city in Utopia (no-place), a political novel by Sir Thomas More, Rabelais, in his Pantagruel, had previously introduced the word, and tells us that the Amaurots conquered the Diposodes (or Duplicans).

Amaurote, a bridge in Utopia. Sir Thomas More says he could not recollect whether Raphael Hyghholdy told him it was 500 paces or 1000 paces long; and he requested his friend Peter Giles, of Antwerp, to put the question to the adventurer.

"I cannot recollect whether the reception room of the Spaniard's Castle in the Air is 200 or 300 feet long. I will see the next accountant who journeys to the moon to take the exact dimensions for me, and will memorialise the learned society of Laputa." — Dean Swift: Gilpin's Travels.

Amasement. Not afraid with any amazement (1 Peter iii. 6), introduced at the close of the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer. The meaning is, you will be God's children so long as you do his bidding, and are not drawn aside by any distraction (παράφθασιν). No doubt St. Peter meant "by any terror of persecution." Cranmer, being so afraid, was drawn aside from the path of duty.

Amasia, meant for Charles II., in Pordage's poem of Azara and Hushat. We are told by the poet, "his father's murderers he destroyed;" and then he preposterously adds—

"Beloved of all, for merciful was he, Like God, in the superlative degree."

To say that such a selfish, promise-breaking, impious libertine was "like God, in the superlative degree," is an outrage against even poetical licence and court flattery.

Amason. A horsewoman, a fighting or masculine woman. The word means without breast, or rather, "deprived of a pap." According to Grecian story, there was a nation of women in Africa of a very warlike character. There were no men in the nation; and if a boy was born, it was either killed or sent to his father, who lived in some neighbouring state. The girls had their right breasts burnt off, that they might the better draw the bow.

"These dreadful Amazons, gallant viragoes who... carried victorious arms... into Syria and Asia Minor." — J. E. Chambers: David Livingstone (Introduction, p. 24).

Amazonia. In South America, originally called Maracán. The Spaniards first called it Orella; but after the women joined their husbands in attacking the invaders, the Spaniards called the people Amazons and the country Amazonia.

Amazonian Chin (.11). A beardless chin, like that of a woman warrior.

"When with his Amazonian chin he drove The tawdry brow before him." — Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 2.

Ambassador, a practical joke played on greenhorns abroad ship. A tub full of water is placed between two stools, and the whole being covered with a green cloth, a sailor sits on each stool, to keep the cloth tight. The two sailors represent Neptune and Amphitrite, and the greenhorn, as ambassador, is introduced to their majesties. He is given the seat of honour between them; but no sooner does he take his seat than the two sailors rise, and the greenhorn falls into the tub, amidst the laughter of the whole crew.

Amber. This fossilised vegetable resin is, according to legend, a concretion of birds' tears. The birds were the sisters of Meléagor, who never ceased weeping for the death of their brother.— Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii. line 270, etc.

"Among them she escheweth the lowest amber, That even the sorrow was from earth hath wrought." — T. Moore: The Wreathen.

Amber, a repository. So called because insects and small leaves are preserved in amber.

"You may be disposed to preserve it in your amber..." — Nash and You Cares...— W. Dower.

"Pretty in amber, to observe the forms Of bugs, or stings, or dirt, or grubs, or worms, The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare, But wonder how the devil they get there." — * Pope: Ep. to Arbuthnot*, v. 72.

Amberabad. Amber-city, one of the towns of Jinnistan, or Fairy Land.

Ambes-as or Ambes-ace. Two aces, the lowest throw in dice; figuratively, bad luck. (Latin, ambus-anos, both or two aces.)

"I had rather be in this choice than throw ambes-ace for my life..." — Alf's Will, etc., i. 2.

Ambi-dexter properly means both hands right hands; a double dealer; a juror who takes money from both parties for his verdict; one who can use his left hand as deftly as his right.
Ambition, strictly speaking, means "the going from house to house" (Latin, ambire, going about canvassing). In Rome it was customary, some time before an election came on, for the candidates to go round to the different dwellings to solicit votes, and those who did so were ambitious of office.

Ambrose (Mary). An English heroine, who immortalized her name by her valour at the siege of Ghent, in 1381. Her name is a proverbial one for a woman of heroic spirit.

"My daughter will be valiant,
And prove a very Mary Ambry 'tis the business."
Ben Jonson: Tale of a Tub, i. 4.

Ambrose (St.), represented in Christian art in the costume of a bishop. His attributes are (1) a bertha, in allusion to the legend that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth when lying in his cradle; (2) a scapular, by which he expelled the Arians from Italy.

The penance he inflicted on the Emperor Theodosius has been represented by Rubens, a copy of which, by Van Dyleck, is in the National Gallery.

Ambrosia. The food of the gods (Greek, a privative, brotos, mortal); so called because it made them not mortal, i.e. it made them immortal. Anything delicious to the taste or fragrant in perfume is so called from the notion that whatever is used by the deities must be excellent.

"A table where the heaped ambrosia lay."
Homer, by Bryant; Odyssey, v. line 141.

"Husbands and wives must drink from the cup of conjugal life; but they must both taste the same ambrosia, or the same gall." —R. C. Houghton, Women of the Orient, part ii.

Ambrosian Chant. The choral music introduced from the Eastern to the Western Church by St. Ambrose, the Bishop of Milan, in the fourth century. It was used till Gregory the Great changed it for the Gregorian.

Ambrosian Library. A library in Milan, so called in compliment of St. Ambrose, the patron saint.

Ambrosio, the hero of Lewis's romance, called The Monk. Abbot of the Capuchins at Madrid. The temptations of Matilda overcome his virtue, and he proceeds from crime to crime, till at last he sells his soul to the devil. Ambrosio, being condemned to death by the Inquisition, is released by Lucifer; but no sooner is he out of prison than he is dashed to pieces on a rock.

Ambry, a cupboard, locker, or recess. In church, for keeping vestments, books, or other articles. Used by a confusion for almory, or niche in the wall where alms, etc., were deposited. Now used for holding the sacramental plate, consecrated oil, and so on. The secret drawers of an escritoire are called ambries. (Archaic English almory, Latin armarium, French armoire.)

"They arose bath almaries,
And y ren-bounded coffers."
Pier the Siouier, p. 286.

Ambrosia (3 syl.) is the Italian imboscata (concealed in a wood).

Amare-isco (French), a scap-egoat.

"He is the one damnoe of everyone about the court—the scapegosat, who is to carry away all then inequities." —Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. 48.

Amedien (3 syl.). "Friends of God;": a religious body in the Church of Rome, founded in 1100. They wore no breeches, but a grey cloak girded with a cord, and were shod with wooden shoes.

Amedil. A model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel so called. It is said that the character is intended for his own wife.

Amemon is another hero of Chaldea, who reigned 20 years. Amphius reigned 6 years.

Amen Corner, London, the end of Paternoster Row, where the monks finished their Pater Noster, on Corpus Christi Day, as they went in procession to St. Paul's Cathedral. They began in Paternoster Row with the Lord's prayer in Latin, which was continued to the end of the street; then said Amen, at the corner or bottom of the Row; then turning down Ave Maria Lane, commenced chanting the "Hail, Mary!" then crossing Ludgate, they chanted the Credo. Amen Lane no longer exists.

Amede honorable, in France, was a degrading punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides, and sacrilegious persons, who were brought into court with a rope round their neck, and made to beg pardon of God, the king, and the court.

Now the public acknowledgment of the offence is all that is required.

Amenethes (3 syl.). The Egyptian Hadès. The word means hiding-place.
American Flag. The American Congress resolved (June 14, 1777), that the flag of the United States should have thirteen stripes, alternately red and white, to represent the thirteen States of the Union, together with the thirteen white stars, on a blue ground. General Washington’s escutcheon contained two stripes, each alternated with red and white, and, like the American stars, those of the General had only five points instead of six. A new star is now added for each new State, but the stripes remain the same.

However, before the separation the flag contained thirteen stripes of alternate red and white to indicate the thirteen colonies, and the East India Company flag, as far back as 1704, had thirteen stripes. The Company flag was sanctioned with St. George’s Cross, the British American flag with the Union Jack.

American Peculiarities:—

| Native of New England | say Guess, | New York & Middle States | Expect, | Southern States | Herkimer, | Western States | Calculate. |

American States. The Americans are rich in nicknames. Every state has, or has had, its sobriquet. The people of American States. The eight states which retain the Indian names of the chief rivers, as: Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin.

Amevns. (See Horse.)

Amethyst. A species of rock-crystal supposed to prevent intoxication (Greek, a-methustos, the antidote of intoxication). Drinking-cups made of amethyst were supposed to be a charm against inebriety.

It was the most cherished of all precious stones by Roman matrons, from the superstition that it would preserve inviolate the affection of their husbands.

Amiable Numbers. (See Amicable, etc.)

Amicable Numbers. Numbers which are mutually equal to the sum of all their aliquot parts: as 220, 284. The aliquot parts of 220 are 1, 2, 4, 5, 10, 11, 20, 22, 44, 55, 110, the sum of which is 284. Again, the aliquot parts of 284 are 1, 2, 4, 71, 142, the sum of which is 220.

Amies (3 syl.). A form of the name Elium (friend of God). In Dryden’s satire of Absalom and Achitophel it is meant for Sir Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons. (2 Sam. xxi. 31.)

"Who can Amiel’s name refuse?
Of ancient race by birth, but nobler yet
In his own worth, and without the great
The soul in him, long time as close concealed.
Thy reason guided and their passion cooled."
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, 1, 490-503.

Amiens (3 syl.). The Peace of Amiens, March 27, 1802, a treaty signed by Joseph Bonaparte, the Marquis of Cornwalls, Azara, and Schimmelpfennig, to settle the disputed points between France, England, Spain, and Holland. It was dissolved in 1803.

Amina. An orphan adopted by a miller, and beloved by Elvino, a rich farmer. The night before her espousals she is found in the bed of Count Rodolpho, and is renounced by her betrothed husband. The count explains to the young farmer and his friends that Amina is innocent, and has wandered in her sleep. While he is still talking, the orphan is seen getting out of the window of the mill, and walking in her sleep along the edge of the roof under which the mill-wheel is rapidly revolving. She crosses a crazy bridge and comes among the spectators. In a few minutes she awakes, flies to Elvio, and is claimed by him as his beloved and innocent bride.—Bellinì's best opera, La Sonnambula.

Amin'adab. A Quaker. The Scripture name has a double use, but in old comedies, where the character represents a Quaker, the name has generally only one. Obadiah is used, also, to signify a Quaker, and Rachel a Quakeress.

Am'mone (3 syl.). Wife of Sidi Nouman, who ate her rice with a bodkin, and was in fact a ghoul. "She was so hard-hearted that she led about her three sisters like a leash of greyhounds."—Arabian Nights.

Am'mone (2 syl.). The name assumed by Cathos as more aristocratic than her own. She is courted by a gentleman, but discards him because his manners are too simple and easy for "bon ton;" he then sends his valet, who pretends to be a marquis, and Aminte is charmed with his "distinguished style of manner and talk." When the game has gone far enough, the trick is exposed, and Aminte is saved from a misalliance.—Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules.

It was a prevailing fashion in the Middle Ages to change names: Valence's proper name was Amoret (1064-1737), Maximilian's was Schen-Mats, and the title names of Desdemona Ursula were Schen-Mats (1667-1680), Amoret's name was Amoret de Chooz, and Amoret's was Jean Baptiste de Chooz.

Amiral or Am'miral. An early form of the word "admiral." (French, amiral; Italian, ammiraglio.) (See Am'miral.)

Amlet (Richard). The gamester in Vanbrugh's drama called The Confederacy.

Am'mon. The Libyan Jupiter; so called from the Greek ammos (sand), because his temple was in the desert. Herodotus calls it an Egyptian word (ii. 42). Son of Jupiter Ammon. Alexander the Great. His father, Philip, claimed to be a descendant of Hercules, and therefore of Jupiter; and the son was saluted by the priests of the Libyan temple as son of Ammon. Hence was he called the son or descendant both of Jupiter and of Ammon.

Am'monian Horn (Th.). The cornucopia. It was in reality a tract of very fertile land, in the shape of a ram's horn, given by Ammon, King of Libya, to his mistress, Amalthéa (q.v.) (the mother of Bacchus).

Am'monites (3 syl.). Fossil molluscs allied to the nautilus and cuttlefish. So called because they resemble the horn upon the ancient statues of Jupiter Ammon. (See above.)

Amon's Son (in Orlando Furioso) is Rinaldo. He was the eldest son of Amon or Aymon, Marquis d'Este, and nephew of Charlemagne.

Amoret, brought up by Venus in the courts of love. She is the type of female loveliness—young, handsome, gay, witty, and good; soft as a rose, sweet as a violet, chaste as a lily, gentle as a dove, loving everybody and all beloved. She is no Diana to make "gods and men fear her stern frown"; no Minerva to "freeze her foes into concealed stone with rigid looks of chaste austerity"; but a living, breathing virgin, with a warm heart, and beaming eye, and passions strong, and all that man can wish and woman want. She becomes the loving, tender wife of Sir Scudamore. Titus finds her in the arms of Corinna (sensual passion); combats the monster unsuccessfully, but wounds the lady.—Spenser: Fairy Queene, book iii.

Amoret, a love-song, love-knot, love-affair, love personal.—A pretty word, which might be reintroduced.

He will be in _his_ amoret, and _his_ cannone pastoral, and _his_ melancholy.—Benjamin

"For not to know in whose he be, But all in love you must believe, 1-gaunted with amorettes."

Amorous (Th). Philippe I. of France; so called because he divorced his wife Berthe to espouse Bertrade, who was already married to Foulques, count of Anjou. (1061-1108.)

Amour propre. One's self-love, vanity, or opinion of what is due to self. To make an appeal to one's amour propre, is to put a person on his metal. To wound one's amour propre, is to gull his good opinion of himself to wound his vanity. (French.)

Am'paro de Pobres. A book exposing the begging impostors of Madrid, written by Herrera, physician to Felipe III.

Ampersand, the character made thus, "&"—and. In the old Horn-books, after giving the twenty-six letters, the character & was added, and was called "Ampersand," a corruption of Amphiousian Prophetess. (Amphiusian Vates). The Cumean sibyl; so called from Amphius, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus; consequently Amphiousian means Apollo-nian.

Ampouille (Satire). The jug or bottle containing oil used in anointing the kings of France, and said to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the coronation service of St. Louis. It was preserved at Rheims till the first Revolution, when it was destroyed.

Amram's Son. Moses. (Exodus vi. 20.)

"As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son, in Kyphi's evil day,
Waved round the coast.

Amri, in the satire of Abanand and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor.

Amsanctus. A lake in Italy, in the territory of Hirpinum, said to lead down to the infernal regions. The word means sacred water.

Amuock. To run amuck. To talk or write on a subject of which you are wholly ignorant; to run foul of. The Malays, under the influence of opium, become so excited that they sometimes rush forth with daggers, yelling "Amen! amen!" (Kill! kill!); and fall foul of any one they chance to meet.

Amulet. Something worn, generally round the neck, as a charm. (Arabic, hamutel, that which is suspended.)

The early Christians used to wear amulets called Ichthus, fish; the word is composed of the initial letters of Iesous Christos Theou Uios Soter (Jesus Christ, Son of God, our Saviour). (See Noteaica.)

Amundeville. Lady Adeline Amundeville, a lady who "had a twilight tinge of blue," could make epigrams, give delightful soirees, and was fond of making matches.—Byron: Don Juan, xv., xvi.

Anabolic Brothers (The). Castor and Pollux, who were born at Amycle.

Amyean Silence. More silent than Anyale. The inhabitants of Amyacle were so often alarmed by false reports of the approach of the Spartans, that they made a decree no one should ever again mention the subject. When the Spartans actually came against the town, no one dared mention it, and the town was taken.

Amyris plays the fool, i.e. a person assumes a false character with an ulterior object, like Junius Brutus. Amyris was a Sybarite (3 syll.) sent to Delphi to consult the Oracle, who informed him of the approaching destruction of his nation. Amyris fled to Peloponnese and his countrymen called him a fool; but, like the madness of David, his “folly” was true wisdom, for thereby he saved his life.

Amys and Amylion. The Pylades and Orestes of medieval story. — Ellis’s Specimens.

Anabaptists. A nickname of the Baptist Dissenters; so called because, in the first instances, they had been baptised in infancy, and were again baptised on a confession of faith in adult age. The word means the twice-baptised.

Anabaptists. A sect which arose in Germany in 1521.

Anacharsis. Anacharsis among the Scythians. A wise man amongst fools; “Good out of Nazareth.” “A Sir Sidney Smith on Salisbury Plain.” The opposite proverb is “Saul amongst the Prophets,” i.e. a fool amongst wise men. Anacharsis was a Scythian by birth, and the Scythians were proverbial for their uncultivated state and great ignorance.

Anacharsis Cloots. Baron Jean Baptist Cloots, a Prussian by birth, but brought up in Paris, where he adopted the revolutionary principles, and called himself The Orator of the Human Race. (1755-1793.)

Anacreon. The stone on which Ceres rested after searching in vain for her daughter. It was kept as a sacred deposit in the Prytaneum of Athens.

Anacreon. A Greek poet, who wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine. (B.C. 533-478.)

Anacreon Moore. Thomas Moore, who not only translated Anacreon into English, but also wrote original poems in the same style. (1779-1832.)

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuzac, president of the National Convention; so called from the flowery language and convivial jests used by him towards his miserable victims. (1735-1811.)

Anacreon of the Temple. Guillaume Amfrye, abbe de Chalieu; the “Tom Moore” of France. (1639-1729.)

The French Anacreon. Pontus de Tyard, one of the Pleiad poets (1621-1695). P. Lasnon. (1727-1811.)

The Persian Anacreon. Mohammed Hâkit. (Fourteenth century.)

The Scotch Anacreon. Alexander Sen, who flourished about 1530.

The Sicilian Anacreon. Giovanni Meli. (1710-1813.)

Anacreon of Painters. Francesco Algaro, a famous painter of lovely females. (1578-1660.)

Anacreontic. In imitation of Anacreon (q.v.).

Anachronism. An event placed at a wrong date; as when Shakespeare, in Troilus and Cressida, makes Nestor quote Aristotle. (Greek, an chronos, out of time.)

Anagnostos (Greek). A domestic servant employed by the wealthy Romans to read to them at meals. Charlemagne had his reader; and monks and nuns were read to at meals. (Greek, anagnoukao, to read.)

Anagrams. Dame Eleanor Davies (prophetess in the reign of Charles I.)—Never so mad a lady.

Bartholomew — Boarows.

Branchio — Romanos et est a Vita made by Dr. Br.

Queen Victoria — Jubilate Ye (run o'm the school.

Queest Ye — (runners of Rome: IX in last made by Henry IV.

These are interchangeable words: —

Amor and Cupid — Amor and Roma, Bros and Rose; Rainald Live and many more.

Anah, a tender-hearted, pious, meek, and loving creature, granddaughter of Cain, and sister of Alolibimah. Japhet loved her, but she had set her heart on the seraph Azaziel, who carried her off.
to some other planet when the flood came.—Byron: _Heaven and Earth_.

Ana'na. The pine-apple (the Brazilian _ananas_).

"Witness thou, best Ana'na; thou the pride Of vegetable life." _Thomson: Summer_, 993, 505.

Anastasia (St.). Her attributes are a stake and faggots, with a palm branch in her hand. The allusion is, of course, to her martyrdom at the stake.

Anathema. A denunciation or curse. The word is Greek, and means to place, or set up, in allusion to the mythical custom of hanging in the temple of a patron god something devoted to him. Thus Gordius hung up his yoke and beam; the shipwrecked hung up their wet clothes; workmen retired from business hung up their tools, etc. Hence anything set apart for destruction; and so, set apart from the Church as under a curse.

"Me hauta sacer Votiva partes indicat ut dea Suspensio potest qui Vestimenta mora deus."
_Homer: Ithaca_ (v. 15-16).

* Horace, having escaped the lovesanes of Pyrrha, hangs up his votive tablet, as one who has escaped the dangers of the sea.

Anatomy. He was like an anatomy—i.e. a mere skeleton, very thin, like one whose flesh had been anatomised or cut off. Shakespeare uses atomys as a synonym. Thus the hostess quickly says to the Bridle: "Thou atomy, thou!" and _Bell T'ashheet_ caps the phrase with, "Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal."—2 _Henry IV_., v. 1.

Anaxarctes (5 syl.) of Satamis was changed into stone for despising the love of Iphis, who hung himself.—_Ovid: Metamorphoses_, xiv. 750.

Anaxarcte (4 syl.). A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance called _Atadde_ of Gaul. This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Ancan's. Helmsman of the ship _Argo_, after the death of Tiphys. He was told by a slave that he would never live to taste the wine of his vineyards. When a bottle made from his own grapes was set before him, he sent for the slave to laugh at his progestinations; but the slave made answer, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." At this instant a messenger came in, and told Ancan's that a wild boar was laying his vineyard waste, whereupon he set down his cup, went out against the boar, and was killed in the encounter.

Ancalites (4 syl.) Inhabitants of parts of Berkshire and Wiltshire, referred to by Caesar in his _Commentaries_.

Anchors. That was my sheet anchor—i.e. my best hope, my last refuge. The sheet anchor is the largest anchor of a ship, which, in stress of weather, is the sailor's chief dependence. The word _sheet_ is a corruption of the word _shute_ (thrown out), meaning the anchor "thrown out" in foul weather. The Greeks and Romans said, "my sacred anchor," because the sheet anchor was always dedicated to some god.

Anchor (The), in Christian art, is given to Clement of Rome and Nicolas of Bari. Pope Clement, in A.D. 80, was bound to an anchor and cast into the sea. Nicolas of Bari is the patron saint of sailors.

_The anchor is a peal—that is, the cable of the anchor is so tight that the ship is drawn completely over it._ (See _Bower Anchor, Sheet Anchor_.)

_The anchor comes home,_ the anchor has been dragged from its hold. Figuratively, the enterprise has failed, notwithstanding the precautions employed.

_To weigh anchor,_ to haul in the anchor, that the ship may sail away from its mooring. Figuratively, to begin an enterprise which has hung on hand.

Anchor Watch (1 m.). A watch of one or two men, while the vessel rides at anchor, in port.

Ancien Régime. An antiquated system of government. This phrase, in the French Revolution, meant the monarchical form of government, or the system of government, with all its evils, which existed prior to that great change.

Ancient. A corruption of _ensign_—a flag and the officer who bore it. Pistol was Falstaff's "ancient."

"Ten times more dishonourably ragged than an old-led anchor."—_Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV_., v. 2.

""—_Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV_., v. 2.

Ancient Mariner. Having shut an albatross, he and his companions were subjected to fearful penalties. On repentance he was forgiven, and on reaching land told his story to a hermit.
Ancient of Days

At times, however, distress of mind drove him from land to land, and wherever he abode he told his tale of woe, to warn from cruelty and persuade men to love God's creatures.—Coleridge.

Ancient of Days (Daniel iii. 9). Jehovah.

Ammol (3 syll.). The Palladium of Rome. It was the sacred buckler which Numa said fell from heaven. To prevent its being stolen, he caused eleven others to be made precisely like it, and confided them to twelve priests called Salii, who bore them in procession through the city every year at the beginning of March.

"Ite me ancile vocat, quod ab ouni parte rectum est, Quemque notis occlus, angularis omnis abest." Used: Fonti, iii. 377.

And. The character ἀ & is a monogram of et (and), made in Italian type, &.

Andirons or Hand-irons, a corruption of andervia, anderv, andèia, or andèna. Ducange says, "Andera est ferrum, quo appodiantur ligna in foco, ut melius incandes, et melius comburantur." Further on he gives audoria, auderius, andellus, etc., as variants. Called "dogs" because they were often made in the resemblance of dogs. The derivation of andervia is not clear; Ducange says, "dictur andena, quasi ante en, orem, i.e. calorem," but this probably will satisfy no one. The modern French word is languer, old French audur, Low Latin audur.

Andrea Ferrara. A sword. So called from a famous sword-maker of the name. (Sixteenth century.)

"We'll put in ball, my boy; old Andrea Ferrara shall lodge his security."—Scott: Waverley, ch. 5.

Andrew, a name commonly used in old plays for a valet or man-servant. Probably a Merry Andrew or domestic jester. (See MERRY ANDREW.)

Andrew (An). A merchant vessel, probably so called from Andrew Doria, the famous Genoese admiral.

"I should think of shallows and of sky, And see my worthy Andrew drenched in sand."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice 1.1.

Andrew (St.), depicted in Christian art as an old man with long white hair and beard, holding the Gospel in his right hand, and leaning on a cross like the letter X, termed St. Andrew's cross. The great pictures of St. Andrew are his Flagellation by Domenichino, and the Adoration of the Cross by Guido, which has also been depicted by Andrea Sacchi, in the Vatican at Rome. Both the Flagellation and the Adoration form the subjects of frescoes in the chapel of St. Andrew, in the church of San Gregorino, at Rome. His day is November 30th. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in Patre (A.D. 70). (See St. RULE.)

The "adoration of the cross" means his fervent address to the cross on which he was about to suffer. "Hail, precious cross, consecrated by the body of Christ! I come to thee exulting and full of joy. Receive me into thy dear arms." The "flagellation" means the scourging which always preceded capital punishments, according to Roman custom.

St. Andrew's Cross is represented in the form of an X (white on a blue field). The cross, however, on which the apostle suffered was of the ordinary shape, if we may believe the rite in the convent of St. Victor, near Marseilles. The error rose from the way in which that cross is exhibited, resting on the end of the cross-beam and point of the foot.

According to J. Leslie (History of Scotland), this sort of cross appeared in the heavens to Achilus, King of the Scots, and Hungus, King of the Picts, the night before their engagement with Athelstan. As they were the victors, they went barefoot to the kirk of St. Andrew, and vowed to adopt his cross as their national emblem. (See CONSTANTINE'S CROSS.)

Andrew Maca (The). The crew of H.M.S. Andreae. Similarly, the Bellerophon was called by English sailors "Billy ruffian," and the Achilles the "Ash hock." (See BEEFSTEAK, etc.)

Androcles and the Lion. Androcles was a runaway slave who took refuge in a cavern. A lion entered, and instead of taming him to pieces, lifted up his fore paw that Androcles might extract from it a thorn. The slave being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena. It so happened that the same lion was let out against him, and, recognising his benefactor, showed towards him every demonstration of love and gratitude.

In the Gesta Romanorum ( Tale riv.) the same story is told, and there is a similar one in Pisop's Fables. The original tale, however, is from Aulus Gellius, on the authority of Plutarch, who asserts that he was himself an eyewitness of the encounter.

Android. An automat on figure of a human being (Greek, andros-oides, a man's likeness). One of the most famous of these machines is that by M. Vaucanson, called the flute-player. The chess-player by Kempelen is also celebrated. (See AUTOMATON.)

Andromeda. Daughter of Cepheus (2 syl.) and Cassiopeia. Her mother boasted that the beauty of Andromeda surpassed that of the Nereids; so the Nereids induced Neptune to send a seaman- monster on the country, and an oracle declared that Andromeda must be given up to it. She was accordingly chained to a rock, but was delivered by Perseus (2 syl.). After death she was placed among the stars. (See ANGELICA.)

Andromica (in Orlando Furioso). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her beauty. She was sent with Sophrustyna to conduct Astolpho from India to Arabia.

Anon. Over against; concerning. (Old English, on-egen; later forms, an-ef, an-em, an-en.)

Anjo do Grêve (French), a hangman or executioner. The "Place de Grêve" was at one time the Tyburn of Paris.

Angel. Half a sovereign in gold; so called because, at one time, it bore the figure of the archangel Michael slaying the dragon.

When the Rev. Mr. Patten, vicar of Whistable, was dying, the Archbishop of Canterbury sent him £10. The wit said, "Tell his Grace that now I am sure he is a man of God, for I have seen his angels."

Angel (a public-house sign), in compliment to Richard II., who placed an angel above his shield, holding it up in his hands.

To write like an angel (French). The angel referred to was Angelo Vergezio [Vergezio], a Cretan of the sixteenth century. He was employed both by Henry II. and by Francois I., and was noted for his calligraphy. (Dudot: Nouvelle Biographie Universelle [1852-60].)

Angel of the Schools. St. Thomas Aquinas. (See ANGELIC DOCTOR.)

Angels, say the Arabs, were created from pure, bright gems; the genii, of fire; and man, of clay.

Angels, according to Dionysius the Areopagite, were divided into nine orders:—
(i) Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones, in the first circle.
(ii) Dominations, Virtues, and Powers, in the second circle.
(iii) Principalities, Archangels, and Angels, in the third circle.

St. Gregory the Great: Homily 34.
"In heaven above.
The pellucida hands in triple circles move."
Trans: Jerusalem Delivered, x. 13.

Angels. The seven holy angels are—Abdiel, Gabriel, Michael, Raguel, Raphael, Simiel, and Uriel. Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the Bible; Raphael in the Apocalypse.

5: Milton (Paradise Lost, book i., from 392) gives a list of the fallen angels.

Angel-beast. A favourite round game of cards, which enabled gentlemen to let the ladies win small stakes. Five cards are dealt to each player, and three heaps formed—one for the king, one for play, and the third for Troïot. The name of the game was in bête (beast). Angel was the stake. Thus we say, Shilling-whist.

"This gentleman offers to play at Angel-beast, though he scarce knows the cards."—Mulberry Garden.

Angel Visits. Delightful intercourse of short duration and rare occurrence.
"(Visits) Like those of angels, short and far between."
Bunyan: Grace, p. 11. 586.
"Like angel- visits, few and far between."
Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, line 375.

Angel-water, a Spanish cosmetic, made of roses, trefoil, and lavender. Short for Angelica-water, because originally it was chiefly made of the plant Angelica.

"Angel-water was the worst scent about her."—Selly: Batham.

Angelic Doctor. Thomas Aquinas was so called, because he discussed the knotty points in connection with the being and nature of angels. An example is, "Iteum Angelicae morte de homin emans transcendo per medium?"
"The Doctor says that it depends upon circumstances."
"It is said ... of a quiz that one of his questions was: how many angels can dance on the point of a pin."

Angelic Hymn. The hymn beginning with Glory be to God so high, etc. (Luke ii. 14); so called because the former part of it was sung by the angel host that appeared to the shepherds of Bethlehem.

Angelica. Daughter of Galaphiron, king of Cathay, the capital of which was Albrachea. She was sent to sow discord among the Christians, Charlemagne Angelica's Draught, something which completely changes affection. The tale is that Angelica was passionately in love with Rinaldo, who hated her, whereas Orlando, whom she hated, actually shared her shadow. Angelica and Rinaldo drink from a certain fountain, when a complete change takes place; Rinaldo is drunk with love, and Angelica's passion changes to abhorrence. Angelica ultimately married Medoro, and Orlando went mad. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Angelical Stone. The speculum of Dr. Dec. He asserted that it was given him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. It passed into the possession of the Earl of Peterborough, thence to Lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to the Duke of York, whose son presented it to Horace Walpole. It was sold in 1842, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill.

Angelici. Certain heretics of the second century, who advocated the worship of angels.

Angelites (3 syl.). A branch of the Sabellian heretics; so called from Angelius, in Alesia, where they used to meet. (Dr. Hook: Church Dictionary.)

Angelo. (See Michael Angelo.)

Angelo and Raffello. Michael Angelo criticised Raffaule very severely.

"Such was the language of this false Ivan (Angel). One time he christened Raphael a Pythagorean. He swore that his medallions were composed of stone; he swore his expressions were like owls, so tame, his drawings, like the honest cripple, lame. And as for composition, he had none." Peter Parnell: Lyric Odes, v. 111.

(See Michael Angelo.)

Angelus (The). A Roman Catholic devotion in honour of the Incarnation, instituted by Urban II. It consists of three texts, each said as versicle and response, and followed by the salutation of Gabriel. The name is derived from the first words, Angelus Domini (The angel of the Lord, etc.).

The prayer is recited three times a day, generally about 6 a.m., at noon, and about 6 p.m., at the sound of a bell called the Angelo.

The Angelus bell (often wrongly called the Curfew) is still rung at 8 p.m. in some country churches.

"Sweely over the village the bell of the Angelus sounded" Longfellow: Evangeline Anger. Athenodorus, the Stoic, told Augustus the best way to restrain unruly anger was to repeat the alphabet before giving way to it. (See Dander.)

"The sacred line he did but once repeat, and laid the storm, and cooled the raging heat." Tacitus: The Horn Book.

Angelina, adjective of Anjou.
John was not the last of the Anges in names of England, though he was the last king of England who reigned over Anjou.

Angelina (1 syl.). The young wife of Marino Faliero, the doge. She was the daughter of Loredoano. (Byron: Marino Faliero.)

Anglais's Lord. Orlando, who was lord of Anglais and knight of Brava.

Angle. A dead angle. A term in fortification applied to the plot of earth before an angle in a wall which can neither be seen nor defended from the parapet.

Angle with a Silver Hook (12). To buy fish at market.

Angling. The father of angling, Izaak Walton (1593-1683). Angling is called "the gentle craft"; shoe-making was also so called. Probably there is a pun concealed in the first of these; a common bait of anglers being a "gentle." In the second case, St. Cristin was a Roman gentleman of high birth, and his craftsmen took from him their title of "gentle" (gentilis).
one day leaned against it to rest himself. He was slain by Roland, the paladin, in single combat at the Fronsac. (Cro-quentaine.)

Angry (The). Christian II., of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, was so called on account of his un governable temper. (1513-1559.)

Angular. Cross-grained; of a patchy temper; one full of angles, whose temper is not smooth.

Angurva'del. Frithiof's sword, inscribed with Runic letters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed with a dim light in time of peace. (See Sword.)

nancy; fly, feebleness, insignificance; fox, cunning, artifice; frog and toad, inspiration; goat, lazziness; goose, conceit; folly; gull, gullibility; grasshopper, old age; hare, timidity; hawk, rapacity, penetration; hen, maternal care; horse, speed, grace; jackdaw, vain assumption, empty conceit; jay, senseless chatter; kitchen, playfulness; lamb, innocence, sacrifice; lark, cheerfulness; lion, noble courage; lynx, suspicions vigilance; magpie, gavvulity; mole, blindness, obluneness; monkey, tricks; mule, obstinacy; nightingale, fortulness; ostrich, stupidity; ox, patience, strength; owl, wisdom; parrot, mocking verbosity; peacock, pride; pigeon, cowardice (pigeon-livered); pig, obstinacy, destines; puppy, empty-headed conceit; rabbit, frivolity; raven, sin; robin red-breast, confiding trust; serpent, wisdom; sheep, silliness, timidity; sparrow, lasciviousness; spider, silliness; stag, cuckoldom; swallow, a sunshine friend; swan, grace; swine, filthiness, greed; tiger, ferocity; tortoise, chastity; turkey-cock, official insolence; turtledove, conjugal fidelity; vulture, rapine; wolf, cruelty, savage ferocity, and rapine; worm, crossing; etc.

Animals. (The cries of). Apes gibber: asses bray; bees hum; beetles drone; bears growl; bitterns boom; blackbirds whistle; blackcaps — we speak of the “chick-chick” of the blackcap; bulls bellow; canaries sing or quaver; cats meow, purr, swear, and caterwaul; calves bleat and bawl; chaffinches chirp or pump; chickens pip; cicadas sing; cocks crow; cows moo or low; crows caw; cuckoos cry cuckoo; deer bell; dogs bark, bay, howl, and yelp; doves coo; ducks quack; eagles scream; falcons chant; flies buzz; foxes bark and yelp; frogs croak; geese cackle and hiss; goldfinch—we speak of the “merry twinkle” of the female; grasshoppers chirp and pitter—grouse—we speak of the “drumming” of the grouse; guineafowl’s cry “come back”; guineapigs squeak; hares squeak; hawks scream; hens cackle and cluck; horses neigh and whinny; hyenas laugh; jays chatter; kittens meow; lambs baa and bleat; larks sing; llanets chuckle in their call; lions roar; magpies chatter; mice squeak and squawk; monkeys chatter and gibber; nightingales pipe and warble—we also speak of its “jug-jug”; owls hoot and screech; oxen low and bellow; parrots talk; peacocks scream; peewits cry peewit; pigeons coo; pigs grunt, squeak, and squeal; ravens croak; redstarts whistle; rocks creak; serrech-owls screech or shriek; sheep baa or bleat; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp or yelp; stags bellow and call; swallows twitter; swans cry—we also speak of the “bombilation” of the swan; thrushes whistle; tigers growl; tits—we speak of the “twit-twit” of the bottle-tit; turkey-cocks gobble; vultures scream; whisthroats chir; wolves howl.

Animosity means animation, spirit, as the fire of a horse, called in Latin equis animositas. Its present exclusive use in a bad sense is an instance of the tendency which words originally neutral have to assume a bad meaning. (Compare churl, villain.)

Animula.

“Animula, vagula, blandula, Hostes, comenque, corporis; Quae anima abhis in loca, Pallidula, rigida, gaudula.”

The Emperor Hadrian to his Son.

Sorely-lived, bathe-little, flattering spirit, Comrade and guest in this body of clay, Whither, ah! whither, departing in flight, Right, half-naked, tale motion, away. & c. & n.

Anna (Dowia). A lady beloved by Don Ottavio, but seduced by Don Giovanni, who also killed her father, the “Commandant of the City,” in a duel. (Mozart’s opera of Don Giovanni.)

Annabel, in Dryden’s satire of "Absalom and Achitophel" is designed for the Duchess of Monmouth. Her maiden name and title were Anne Scott, Countess of Buccleuch, the richest heiress in Europe. The duke was faithless to her, and after his death, the widow, still handsome, married again.

“To all us [Monmouth’s] wishes, nothing he [David] denied; And made the charming Annabel his bride.”

Part I. lines 28, 31.

Anna Matilda (Am), an ultra-sentimental girl. Mrs. Hannah Cowley used this pen-name in her responses in the World to Della Cruses (R. Merril). (See the Bacchid by Gifford.)

Annates (2 syl). One entire year’s income claimed by the Pope on the appointment of a bishop or other ecclesiastic in the Catholic Church. This is called the first fruits (Latin, anima, a year). By the Statute of Recusants (25 Hen. VIII. c. 20, and the Confirming Act), the right to English Annates and Tenth was transferred to the Crown: but, in the reign of Queen Anne, annates were given up to form a fund for the augmentation of poor livings. (See BOUNTY, QUEEN ANNE’s.)

Anne. Sister Anne, Sister of Fatima, the seventh and last of Blueboard’s wives.

Anne’s Fan (Queen). Your thumb to your nose and your fingers spread.

Anne’s Great Captain. The Duke of Marlborough (1650-1722).

Annie Laurie was eldest of the three daughters of Sir Robert Laurie, of Maxwellton, born December 16, 1682. William Douglas, of Fingland (Kirkcudbright), wrote the popular song, but Annie married, in 1708, James Ferguson, of Craigdarroch, and was the mother of Alexander Ferguson, the hero of Burns’s song called The Whistle.

William Douglas was the hero of the song “Willie was a wanton wae.”

Annule Dei figuram ne gestato (Jn). Wear not God’s image in a ring (or enscribe . . . ), the 24th symbol of the Proteptics. Jamblicus tells us that Pythagoras wished to teach by this prohibition that God had an “incorporeal subsistence.” In fact, that it meant “thou shalt not liken God to any of His works.”

Probably the ring, symbolizing eternity, here upon the special prohibition.

Annunciation. Day of the Annunciation. The 25th of March, also called Lady Day, on which the angel announced
Anthony

Ante, in Greek mythology, was a gigantic wrestler, whose strength was invincible so long as he touched the earth; and every time he was lifted from it, was renewed by touching it again. (See MALEGAL)

Antea, the Libyan strand.

It was Hercules who succeeded in killing this charmed giant. He then said:—

Antecedents. I know nothing of his ancestors—his previous life, character, or conduct. (Latin, antecedens, foregoing.)

Antediluvian. Before the Deluge, meaning the Scripture Deluge.

Antitha. The lady-love of Abrocomas in Xenophon's romance, called Ephes'inae. Shakespeare has borrowed from this Greek novel the leading incidents of his Romeo and Juliet, especially that of the potion and mock entombment. N.B. This is not the historian, but a Xenophon who lived in the fourth Christian century.

Anthony.

Anthony (St.). Patron saint of swineherds, because he always lived in woods and forests.

Anthus Luctus. The period during which a widow is morally supposed to remain chaste. If she marries within about nine months from the death of her late husband and a child is born, a doubt might arise as to the paternity of the child. Such a marriage is not illegal, but it is inexpedient.

Anthus Mirab'ilia. The year of wonders, 1666, memorable for the great fire of London and the successes of our arms over the Dutch. Dryden has written a poem with this title, in which he describes both these events.

Anodyne Necklace (Au), a halter.
An anodyne is a medicine to relieve pain. Probably a pun on nodus, a knot.
that is intended also. George Primrose says:
"May I die by an anodyne necklace, but I had rather be an under-turnkey than an usher in a boarding-school."

Anomoe'ans or Ulkists. A sect in the fourth century which maintained that the essence of the Son is wholly unlike that of the Father. (Greek, un'tomoios, unlike.)

Anon, immediately, at once. The Old English au-on or au-an = at once.
Variants, on one, anon.

"They knew ye lion in shearing of breke, and one he vanysite aways fro hem."—MS. Lincoln, A 1, 17.

"Skep the lion.
To the fox among his warf"— Wright's Poetical Songs.

"For the nonce" is a corrupt form of "For the once," where the is the accusative case, meaning "For the once" or "For this once."

Anon-rights. Right quickly.

"He had in town five hundred coehoires.
He them (them) of [off] sent anon-righ'ters."—
Arthur and Merlin, p. 88.

Anusari. The Moelms of Medina were called Ansarians (an'thiiriens) by Mahomet, because they received him and took his part when he was driven from house and home by the Koresheites (Kore-ish-its).

Answer is the Old English an-svar,n verb and saw-ra-an or swar-an, where
And is the preposition—The Latin re in re-spond-re. (See Sware.)

To answer like a Norman, that is, evansively.

"We saw in France, 'Answering like a Norman' which means to give an evasive answer.
which is more no."—Max O Bell: Friend M'Donald, ct. 2.

To answer its purpose, to carry out what was expected or what was intended. Celsus says, "Medicina sequitur respondet, interdum tamen failit."

To answer the bell is to go and see what it was rang for.

To answer the door is to go and open it when a knock or ring has been given.

In both the last two instances the word is "answering to a summons." To swear means literally "to affirm something," and to an-swear is to "say something" by way of rejoinder; but figuratively both the "swer" and the "answer" may be made without words.

... My story being done,
She [Fideles] swore [affirmed] 'was strange,'...

"Twas patrful, 'was wondrous patrful"—
Shakespeare: Othello, i. 2.

Answer more Scotice (To). To divert the direct question by starting another question or subject.

"Hark ye, sirrah, said the doctor, 'I trust you remember you are owing to the land 4 stone of barleymead and a bow of oats. '

"I was thinking," replied the man more Scotice, that is returning no direct answer on the subject on which he was addressed, I was thinking my best way would be to come down to your humour, and take your advice, in case my trouble should come back."—Sir Walter Scott: The Abbot, ch.
xxvii.

Anthroposophus

St. Anthony's Cross. The taurcross, T, called a lave.

St. Anthony's Fire. Erysipelas is so called from the tradition that those who sought the intercession of St. Anthony recovered from the pestilential erysipelas called the sacred fire, which proved extremely fatal in 1689.

St. Anthony's Pig. A pet pig, the smallest of the whole litter. St. Anthony was originally a swineherd, and, therefore, the patron saint of pigs.

Anthroposophus. The nickname of Dr. Vaughan, rector of St. Bride's, in Bedfordshire. So called from his Anthroposophia Tecomagica, to show the condition of man after death.

Anti-Christ, or the Man of Sin, expected by some to precede the second coming of Christ. St. John so calls every one who denies the incarnation of the eternal Sou of God.

Antigone. The Modern Antigone. Marie Thérèse Charlotte, Duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI.; so called for her attachment to Louis XVIII., whose companion she was. (1778-1851.)

Antimony. Said to be derived from the Greek antimonwchos (bad for monks). The tale is that Valentine once gave some of this mineral to his conveant pigs, who thrived upon it, and became very fat. He next tried it on the monks, who died from its effects; so Valentine said, "they good for pigs, it was bad for monks." Thus fable is given by Furtiè Cost. Another derivation is anti-monos (averse to being alone), because it is found in combination with sulphur, silver, or some other substance.

Littré suggests stibium and connects it with stibium.

Antinoman. [Greek, anti-monos, exempt from the law.] One who believes that Christians are not bound to observe the "law of God," but "may continue in sin that grace may abound." The term was first applied to John Agricola by Martin Luther.

Antinous (1 syl.). A model of manly beauty. He was the page of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor.

Antipathy (of human beings)

To Animals: Henri III. and the Duke of Schoenberg felt faint at the sight of a cat; Vanghein felt the same at the sight of a pig, and abhorred pork; Marshal Brézé sickened at the sight of a rabbit; the Duc d'Epernon always swooned at the sight of a leveret, though he was not affected at the sight of a hare.

To Fish: Erasmus felt grievous nausea at the smell of fresh fish.

To Flowers and Fruits: Queen Anne, Grétry the composer, Favorino the Italian poet, and Vincent the painter, all abhorred the smell of roses; Scaliger had the same aversion to watercresses; and King Vladislas sickened at the smell of apples.

To Music: Le Mothe de Nayer felt faint at the sound of any musical instrument: Nicuno had a strong aversion to the sound of a flute.

Witches have an antipathy to running water.

"Some men there are love not a sapping pig. Some that are mad if they behold a rat." — Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Antipathy (of animals). According to to wolves have a mutual antipathy to bellflowers; geese to the soil of Whithby; snakes to soil of Ireland; cats to dogs; all animals dislike the castor-oil plant; campbell keeps off insects; Russian leather is disliked by bookworms; paraffin by flies; cedar-wood is used for wardrobes, because its odour is disliked by moths. Ants dislike green sage.

Antipope is a pope elected by a king in opposition to the pope elected by the cardinals; or one who usurps the papedom in opposition to the rightful pope. Geddes gives a list of twenty-four antipopes, three of whom were deposed by the council of Constance.

Antisthenes. Founder of the Cynic School in Athens. He wore a ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff like a beggar. Socrates wittily said he could "see rank pride peering through the holes of Antisthenes's rags."

Antoninus. The Wall of Antonine. A turf entrenchment raised by the Romans from Dunlisp Castle, on the Clyde, to Caw Ridden Kirk, near the Firth of Forth, under the direction of Lollius Urbicus, legate of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140.

Antony (See Anthony.)

Antrusions. The chief followers of the Frankish kings, who were specially Ants

trust of them. (Old German, tríst, trust, fidelity.)

"None but the king could have antrusions."
—Burles: Constitutional History.

Ants. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard,... which provideth her meat in the summer" (Proverbs vi. 6-8; and xxx. 25). The notion that ants in general gather food in harvest for a winter's store is quite an error; in the first place, they do not live on grain, but chiefly on animal food; and in the next place they are torpid in winter, and do not require food. Colonel Sykes, however, says there is in Poonah a grain-feeding species, which stores up millet-seed; and according to Lubbock and Moggridge, ants in the south of Europe and in Texas make stores.

What are called "ant eggs" are not eggs, but the pupae of ants.

Antibus. In Egyptian mythology, similar to the Hermes of Greece, whose office it was to take the souls of the dead before the judge of the infernal regions. Antibus is represented with a human body and jackal's head.

Auril. It is on the auril, under deliberation; the project is in hand. Of course, the reference is to a smithy.

"She had another arrangement on the auril."—Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard.

Any-how, i.e., in an irregular manner. "He did it any-how," in a careless, slovenly manner. "He went on any-how," in a wild, reckless manner. Any-how, you must manage it for me; by hook or crook; at all events. (Old English, anig-hith.)

Aorist. Poetical, pertaining to the Muses. The Muses, according to Grecian mythology, dwelt in Aorist, that part of Boeotia which contains Mount Helion and the Muse's Fountain. Thomas calls the fraternity of poets "The Aonian lyre."

Who praised me, and staved right merrily."
—Castle of Indolent, 11. 2

A outrance. (French.) To the farthest point. The correct form of the phrase. (See A L'OUTRANCE.)

Ape. The buffet ape, in Dryden's poem called The Hind and the Panther, means the Free-thinkers.

"Next her the buffet ape, as atheists... Mimicked all sects, and had his own to choose."
—Part I. 80, 81.

He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jar; first mouthed, to be last swallowed. (Hamlet iv. 2). Most of the Old World monkeys have cheek pouches, used as receptacles for food.

To lead apes or To lead apes in hell. It is said of old maids. Hence, to die an old maid.

"I will even take sixpence in earnest of the bear-ward, and lead his apes into hell."—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 1.

Fadla

Apes. The ape, to play practical jokes; to play silly tricks; to make facial imitations, like an ape.

To put an ape into your hood (or cap)—i.e., to make a fool of you. Apes were formerly carried on the shoulders of fools and simpletons.

To say an ape's patronymic, is to chatter with fright or cold, like an ape.

Apelles. A famous Grecian painter, contemporary with Alexander the Great.

"There comedy forms embroidered rose to view Than ever Apelles' wondrous pencil drew."

Aperanto. A churlish philosopher, in Shakespeare's Timon of Athens.

"The cynicism of Aperanto contrasted with the meanthropic of Timon."—Sir Walter Scott.

A-purse. An A.; a person or thing of unusual merit, "A" all alone, with no one who can follow, nemio proximus et secundus.

Chaucer calls Cresside "the flour and A-purse of Troy and Greek."

"London, thou art of tongues A-purse."—Lamdon ne Mys.

Apox. The topmost height, really means the pointed olive-wood spike on the top of the cap of a Roman priest. The cap fitted close to the head and was fastened under the chin by a fillet. It was applied also to the crest or spike of a helmet. The word now means the summit or tip-top.

Aphrodite (4 syl.). The Greek Venus; so called because she sprang from the foam of the sea. (Greek, apheres, foam.)

"A'phrodite's girdle. Whoever wore Aphrodite's magic girdle, immediately became the object of love." (Greek mythology.)

Aporius. A gourmand. Aporius was a Roman gourmand, whose income being reduced by his luxurious living to £20,000, put an end to his life, to avoid the misery of being obliged to live on plain diet.

A-piggy-back. (See Pig-Back.)

Apis. In Egyptian mythology, is the bull symbolical of the god Apis. It was not suffered to live more than twenty-five years, when it was sacrificed and buried in great pomp. The madness of Cambyses is said to have been in retribution for his killing a sacred bull.

Aplomb means true to the plumbline, but is generally used to express that self-possession which arises from perfect self-confidence. We also talk of a dancer's aplomb, meaning that he is a perfect master of his art. (French, a plomb.)

"Here exists the best stock in the world ... men of aplomb and reserve, of great sense and many moods, of strong instinct, yet apt for culture."—Emerson: English Traits, p. 131.

Apocryphic Number. The mystical number 666. (Rev. xiii. 18.) (See NUMBERS.)

Apocrypha. Those books included in the Septuagint and Vulgate versions of the Old Testament, but not considered to be parts of the original canon. They are accepted as canonical by Catholics, but not by Protestants, and are not printed in Protestant Bibles in ordinary circulation. The word means hidden (Greek, apokryphi), "because they were wont to be read not openly ... but, as it were, in secret and apart" (Bible, 1539, Preface to the Apocrypha). As the reason why these books are not received as canonical is because their genuineness or their authenticity is doubtful, therefore the word "apocryphal" means not genuine or not authentic.

Apollinaris. An ancient sect founded in the middle of the fourth century by Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea. They denied that Christ had a human soul, and asserted that the Logos supplied its place. The Athanasian creed condemns this heresy.

Apollo. The sun, the god of music. (Roman mythology.)

Do strike at an impartial"—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iii, 7.

A perfect Apollo. A model of manly beauty, referring to the Apollo Belvidere (q.v.).

The Apollo of Portugal. Luis Camonés, author of the Lusiad: so called, not for his beauty, but for his poetry. He was god of poetry in Portugal, but was allowed to die in the streets of Lisbon like a dog, literally of starvation. Our own Otway suffered a similar fate. (1527-1579.)

Apollo Belvidere (Bel-ree-dear'). A marble statue, supposed to be from the chisel of the Greek sculptor Calasias, who flourished in the fifth ante-Christian era. It represents the god holding a bow in his left hand, and is called Belvidere from the Belvidere Gallery of the Vatican, in Rome, where it stands. It was discovered in 1503, amidst the ruins of Antium, and was purchased by Pope Julius II.

Apollodes. Plato says: "Who would not rather be a man of sorrows than Apollodes, envied by all for his enormous wealth, yet nourishing in his heart the scorpions of a guilty conscience?" (The Republic). This Apollodes was the tyrant of Cassandre (formerly Invideia). He obtained the supreme power B.C. 370, exercised it with the most cruelty, and was put to death by Antigones Gonutus.

Apolloius. Master of the Rosicrucians. He is said to have had the power of raising the dead, of making himself invisible, and of being in two places at the same time.

Apollon. King of the bottomless pit. (Rev. ix. 11.) His contest with Christian, in Bunyan's allegory, has made his name familiar. (Greek, the destroyer.)

Apostata (The). Julian, the Roman emperor. So called because he forsook the Christian faith and returned to Paganism again. (231, 361-363.)

A posteriori (Latin, from the latter). An a posteriori argument is proving the cause from the effect. Thus, if we see a watch, we conclude there was a watchmaker. Robinson Crusoe inferred there was another human being on the desert island, because he saw a human footprint in the wet sand. It is thus the existence and character of Deity is inferred from his works. (See A PRIORI.)

Apostles. The badges or symbols of the fourteen apostles.

Andrew, a cross, because he was crucified; a cross shaped like the letter X. Bartholomew, a knife, because he was pierced with a knife.

James the Great, a scalp-shell, a pheasant's head, or a guaurd battle, because he is the patron saint of pheasants. (See SCALLOP-SHELL.)

James the Less, a club: a pole, because he was killed by a blow on the head with a pole, dead him by Simon the fuller.

John, a cup with a winged serpent figure out of it: in allusion to the tradition about Apollos by, priest of Diana, who challenged John to drink a cup of poison. John made the sign of a cross on the cup, Satan like a dragon flew from it, and John then drank the cup, which was quite innocuous.

Judas Iscariot, a bag, because he had the bag and "here what was put therein" (John xii. 8). Jude, a club, because he was martyred with that club.

Matthew, a hatchet or battleaxe, because he was slain at Nadalcar with a hatchet.

Mathias, a battle-axe, because he was first stoned, and then beheaded with a battle-axe.
Paul, a sword, because his head was cut off with a sword. The servant of La Lidia, in Spain, boasted of possessing the very instrument.

Peter, a branch of keys, because Christ gave him the keys of the kingdom of heaven. A rock, because he went out and went bitterly when he heard the news. (Matt. xxvi. 75.)

Philip, a long staff surmounted with a cross, because he suffered death by being impaled by the Roman soldiers. Simon, a stone, because he was sown to death, according to tradition.

Thomas, a lance, because he was pierced through the body, at Medjugor, with a lance.

(Apothies, where buried. According to Catholic legend, seven of the Apostles are buried at Rome. These seven are distinguished by a star (*).

Andrew lies buried at Amalfi (Naples).

Bartholomew, at Rome, in the church of Bartholomew Island, on the Tiber.

James the Greater was buried at St. Jean de Compostella, in Spain.

Simon the Levis, at Rome, in the church of the Holy Apostles.

John, at Ephesus.

James, at Rome.

Matthew, at Silenno (Naples).

Matthew, at Rome, under the altar of the Basilica.

Paul, somewhere in Italy.

Peter, at Rome, in the church of St. Peter.

Philip, at Rome.

Simon of Cyrene, at Rome.

Thomas, at Cribra (Naples). (See Madura.)

Mark the Evangelist is said to have been buried at Venice.

Luke the Evangelist is said to have been buried at Padua.

N.B.—Italy claims thirteen of these apostles as evangelists: Rome seven, Naples three, Paul somewhere in Italy, Mark at Venice, Luke at Padua.

Apostles of

Apostles of Anthonius, St. Hubertus (406-83).

Ethiopia. (See Abyssinia.)

Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, 339-393.

St. Athanasius, St. Paul the First, at Rome, 3rd-5th century.

The Twelve Apostles. The last twelve names on the roll or list of ordinary degrees were so called, when the list was arranged in order of merit, and not alphabetically, as now; they were also called the Chosen Twelve. The last of the twelve was designated St. Paul from a play on the verse I Cor. xv. 9. The same term is now applied to the last twelve in the Mathematical Tripos.

Apostles of the Sword. So Mahomet was called, because he enforced his creed at the point of the sword. (570-632.)

Prince of the Apostles. St. Peter. (Matt. xvi. 18, 19.)

Apostle Spoons. Spoons formerly given at christenings; so called because one of the apostles figured at the top of the handle. Sometimes twelve spoons, representing the twelve apostles; sometimes four, representing the four evangelists; and sometimes only one, was presented. Sometimes, but very rarely, a set occurs containing in addition the "Master Spoon" and the "Lady Spoon." We still give at christenings a silver spoon, though the apostolic handle is no longer retained.

Apostles' Creed. A church creed supposed to be an epitome of Scripture doctrines, or doctrines taught by the apostles. It was received into the Latin Church, in its present form, in the eleventh century; but a formula somewhat like it existed in the second century. Items were added in the fourth and fifth centuries, and verbal alternations much later.

It is said that Faith, Bishop of Antich, introduced the Creed as part of the daily service in 673.

Apostolic Fathers. Christian authors born in the first century, when the apostles lived. John is supposed to have died about A.D. 90, and Polycarp, the last of the Apostolic Fathers, born about 56, was his disciple. These three are tolerably certain: Clement of Rome (30-100), Ignatius (died 116), and Polycarp (106-155). Three others are Barnabas, Hermas, and Papias. Barnabas was the companion of Paul, Hermas is a very doubtful name, and Papias (Bp. of Hierapolis) is mentioned by Eusebius.

Polycarp could hardly have been a disciple of John, although he might have received Christian instruction from the old "beloved one."

Apostolic Majesty. A title borne by the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary. It was conferred by Pope Sylvester II. on the King of Hungary in 1000.

Apparel. Dress. The ornamental parts of the alb, at the lower edge and at the wrists. Catechumens used to talk of putting on their apparels, or fine white surplices, for the feast of Pentecost.

Pugin says: "The alb should be made with apparels worked in silk or gold, embroidered with ornaments."

"Rock tells us... That apparels were strung on the upper part of the surplice, like a collar to it."

Appeal to the Country (An).

Asking electors by their choice of representatives to express their opinion of some moot question. In order to obtain the public opinion Parliament is dissolved, and a new election must be made.

Appian Way. The oldest and best of all the Roman roads, leading from the Porta Capena of Rome to Capua. This "queen of roads" was commenced by Appius Claudius, the censor, B.C. 313.

Apple (Newton and the). Voltaire tells us that Mrs. Conduit, Newton’s niece, told him that Newton was at Woolsthorpe, when seeing an apple fall, he was led into a train of thought which resulted in his discovery of gravitation (1666).

His mother had married a Rev. B. Smith and in 1651 had returned to Woolsthorpe. Her granddaughter was the wife of Mr. Conduit, who succeeded Newton in the Mint. Newton was on a visit to his mother.

The apple of discord. A cause of dispute; something to contend about. At the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, where all the gods and goddesses met together, Discord threw on the table a golden apple "for the most beautiful." Juno, Minerva, and Venus put in their separate claims; and not being able to settle the point, referred the question to Paris, who gave judgment in favour of Venus. This brought upon him the vengeance of Juno and Minerva, to whose spite the fall of Troy is attributed.

P . The "apple" plays a large part in Greek story. Besides the "Apple of Discord," related above, we have the three apples thrown down by Hippomenes when he raced with Atalanta. The story says that Atalanta stopped to pick up the apples, whereby Hippomenes won the race, and according to the terms obtained her for wife.

Then there are the golden apples of the Hesperides, guarded by a sleepless dragon with a hundred heads; but Hercules slew the dragon and carried some of the apples to Eurystheus. This was the twelfth and last of his "labours."

Of course, the Bible story of Eve and the Apple will be familiar to every reader of this dictionary.

Apples of Istakhas are "all sweetness on one side, and all bitterness on the other.*

Apples of Paradise, according to tradition, had a bite on one side, to commemorate the bite given by Eve.

Apples of Pyban, says Sir John Mandeville, fest the pignics with their odour only.

Apples of Sodom. Thevenot says— "There are apple-trees on the sides of the Dead Sea which bear lovely fruit, but within are full of ashes." Josephus speaks of these apples. Witman says the same is asserted of the oranges there. (See Tacitus, Hist., v. 7.)

"Like to the apples on the Dead Sea’s shore,
All ashes to the taste."

* Lygour: Cadde Harold, iii. 31.

The apple of perpetual youth. This is the apple of Itun, daughter of the dwarf Svall, and wife of Bragi. It is by tasting this apple that the gods preserve their perpetual youth. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The apple of the eye. The pupil, of which perhaps it is a corruption. If not, it is from an erroneous notion that the little hole in the spot of the eye is a little round solid ball like an apple. Anything extremely dear or extremely sensitive.

"He kept him as the apple of his eye."—Deut. xxxii. 5.

Apple-john (11n). An apple so called from its being at maturity about St. John’s Day (May 6th). We are told that apple-johns will keep for two years, and are best when shrivelled.

"I am withered like an old apple-john."

Shakespeare: Henry VIII, 1. 2. 3.

Sometimes called the Apple of King John, which, if eaten, would nullify against the notion about "St. John’s Day."

"There were some things, for instance, the Apple of King John... I should be tempted to buy"—Rowes: Life of B. Franklin.

In the United States there is a drink called "Apple-Jack," which is apple or cider brandy.

Apple-pie Bed. A bed in which the sheets are so folded that a person cannot get his legs down; from the apple turnover; or, more probably, a corruption of "a nappe-pli bed." (French, nappe pliée, a folded sheet.)

Apple-pie Order. Prim and precise order.

The origin of this phrase is still doubtful. Some suggest cap-a-pie, like a knight in complete armour. Some tell us that apples made into a pie are quartered and methodically arranged when the cores have been taken out. Perhaps the suggestion made above of nappe-pli (French, nappe pliée, folded linen, neat as folded linen, Latin, plic, to fold) is nearer the mark.

It has also been suggested that "Apple-pie order" may be a corruption of alpha, beta, meaning as orderly as the letters of the alphabet. "Every thing being in apple-pie order, . . . Dr. Johnson advised we should accompany him . . . to Mr. Wake's kraal."—Adventures in Mashonaland, p. 284 (1853).

April. The opening month, when the trees unfold, and the womb of nature opens with young life. (Latin, apricēre, to open.)

April Fool. Called in France un poisson d'April (q.v.), and in Scotland a gowk (cuckoo). In Hindustan similar tricks are played at the Holi Festival (March 31st). So that it cannot refer to the uncertainty of the weather, nor yet to the mockery trial of our Redeemer, the two most popular explanations. A better solution is this: As March 25th used to be New Year's Day, April 1st was its octave, when its festivities culminated and ended.

For the same reason that the "Mockery of Jesus" is rejected as a solution of this custom, the tradition that it arose from Noah sending out the dove on the first day of the month may be set aside.

Perhaps it may be a relic of the Roman "Vealina," held at the beginning of April. The tale is that Proserpina was spinning in the Roman meadows, and had just filled her lap with défilé. When Pluto carried her off to the lower world, her mother, Ceres, heard the echo of her screams, and went in search of "the voice," but her search was a fool's errand, it was hunting the gawk, or, looking for the "echo of a scream." Of course this tale is an allegory of springtime.

My April morn—i.e. my wedding day; the day when I was made a fool of. The allusion is to the custom of making fools of each other on the 1st of April.

April Gentleman (Au). A man newly married, who has made himself thus "an April fool."

April Squire (Au). A furus homo. A man who has accumulated money, and has retired into the country, where his money may give him the position of a squire.

A priori [Latin, from an antecedent]. An a priori argument is when we deduce a fact from something antecedent, as when we infer certain effects from given causes. All mathematical proofs are of the a priori kind, whereas judgments in the law courts are of the a posteriori evidence; we infer the animus from the act. (See A posteriori.)

Apron. This is a strange blunder. A nappron, converted into An apperon. "Nappron" is French for a napkin, from nappe (cloth in general). Halliwell, in his Archæ Dictionary, p. 571, gives Nappern (an apron) North.

Other examples of v attached to the following noun, or detached from it, are an adder for a master (Oxford as many names—see adder [French, adder, a note [Danish, ad] and muscle [Shakespeare], mind uncle; for the source this one, who transfers from the preceding pronoun him or them, or thin consecutive case after "for").

Apron-string Tenure (Au). A tenure held in virtue of one's wife. Tied to his mother's apron-string, completely under his mother's thumb. Applied to a big boy or young man who is still under mother rule.

A propos de bottes. (French.) Turning to quite another subject; a propos de rien.

Aqua Regia [royal water]. So called because it dissolves gold, the king of metals. It consists of one part of nitric acid, with from two to four of hydrochloric acid.

Aqua Tofana or Aqua Tofanica. A poisonous liquid much used in Italy in the seventeenth century by young wives who wanted to get rid of their husbands. It was invented by a woman named Tofana, who called it the Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari, from the widespread notion that an oil of miraculous efficacy flowed from the tomb of that saint. In Italian called also Aquelh di Napoli.

Aqua Vitas [water of life]. Certain ardent spirits used by the alchemists. Ben Jonson terms a seller of ardent spirits an "aqua-vite man" (Alchemist, i. i). The "elixir of life" was made from distilled spirits, which were thought to have the power of prolonging life. (See Eau-de-Vie.)

Aquarians. A sect in the early Christian Church which insisted on the use of water instead of wine in the Lord's Supper.
Aquarius

Aquarius [the water-bearer]. One of the signs of the zodiac (January 20th to February 18th). So called because it appears when the Nile begins to overflow.

Aqueous Rocks. Rocks produced by the agency of water, such as bedded limestones, sandstones, and clays; in short, all the geological rocks which are arranged in layers or strata.

Aquilant (in Orlando Furioso). A knight in Charlemagne's army, son of Olivero and Sigismunda. He was called black from his armour, and his brother Gryphon white. While Aquilant was searching for his brother he met Marta'no in Gryphon's armour, and took him bound to Damascus, where his brother was.

Aquiline (3 syl.). Raymond's matchless steed, bred on the banks of the Tagus. (Georgics, iii. 271-277; and Tasso, Jerusalem Delivered, book vii.) (See Horse.)

Aquinian Sage (The). Juvenal is so called because he was born at Aquinum, a town of the Volscians.

Arabesque [Arabesk]. The gorgeous Moorish patterns, like those in the Alhambra, especially employed in architectural decoration. During the Spanish wars, in the reign of Louis XIV., arabesque decorations were profusely introduced into France. (French, "Arab-like.") Arabian Bird (The). The phoenix; a marvellous man, quite sui generis.

"O Antony! O thou Arabian bird!"

Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 2.

Arabian Nights (The). First made known in Europe by Antoine Galland, a French Oriental scholar, who translated them and called them The Thousand and One Nights (from the number of nights occupied in their recital). They are of Indian, Persian, Egyptian, and Arabian origin.

Common English translations—

4 vol., 12mo, 1792, by H. Heron, published in Edinburgh and London.
3 vol., 12mo, 1794, by Mr. Beloe, London.
12mo, 1796, by Richard Gough, enlarged.
5 vol., 8vo, 1812, by Rev. Edward Foster.
" 1830, by Edw. Wh. Lane.
The Tales of the Genii, by Sir Charles Morell (i.e. Rev. James Ridley), are excellent imitations.

Arabians. A class of Arabian heretics of the third century, who maintained that the soul dies with the body.

Arabesques. Street Arabs. The houseless poor; street children. So called because, like the Arabs, they are nomads or wanderers with no settled home.

Arachné's Labour. Spinning and weaving. Arachné was so skilful a needlewoman that she challenged Minerva to a trial of skill, and hanged herself because the goddess beat her. Minerva then changed her into a spider.

"Arachné's labours near her hands did lie,
Her noile hands nor bome nor splendes guide,
Hoist's Jerusalem Delivered, book ii.

Araf, Al [the partition]. A region, according to the Koran, between Paradise and Jeheannah, for those who are neither morally good nor bad, such as infants, lunatics, and idiots. The inmates of Al Araf will be allowed to converse with the blessed and the cursed; to the former this region will appear a hell, to the latter a heaven. (See Limbo.)

Aras'pes (in Jerusalem Delivered). King of Alexandria, more famed for devices than courage. He joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders.

Aratos of Achara, in Greece, murdered Nicocles, the tyrant, in order to restore his country to liberty, and would not allow even a picture of a king to exist. He was poisoned by Philip of Macedon.

"Aratus, who whilest the soul
Of fondly-dangling liberty in Greece
Thomson: Winter, 64, 492.

Arbaces [3 syl.). A Mode and Assyrian satrap, who conspired against Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media on the ruins of the Assyrian kingdom. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Arbor Day. A day set apart in Canada and the United States for planting trees. (See Historic Note Book, p. 42.)

Arbor Judae. Said to be so called because Judas Iscariot hanged himself thereon. This is one of those word-resemblances so delusive to etymologists. Judas is the Spanish judia (a French bean), and Arbor Judae is a corruption of Arbor Judae (the bean-tree), so called from its bean-like pods.

Arcades Ambo [Arcades 3 syl.], both sweet innocents or simpletons, both Verdant Greens. From Virgil's Eclogue, vii. r. 4. (See below, Arcadian Youth.) Byron's translation was "blackguards both.

Arcadian. A shepherd, a fancy farmer; so called because the Arcadians were a pastoral people, and hence pastoral poetry is called Arcadia.

An Arcadian youth. A dunce or blockhead; so called because the Arcadians were the least intellectual of all the Greeks. Juvenal (vii. 160) uses the phrase Arcadiam jocosus for a stupid fool.

Arcadian Nightingales. Ansios.

"April is the month of love, and the country of Chastelennel's amours with Arcadian nightingales."—Robinson Crusoe, i. 7 (fair).

Archangels. According to the Koran, there are four archangels. Gibril, the angel of revelations, who writes down the divine decrees; Michael, the champion, who fights the battles of faith; Azriel, the angel of death; and Azrael, who is commissioned to sound the trumpet of the resurrection.

Arch-monarch of the World. Napoleon III. of France. (1808, 1852-1870, died 1873.)

Archers. The best archers in British history and story are Robin Hood and his two comrades Little John and Will Scarlet.

The famous archers of Henry II. were Tophus his Bowman of the Guards, Gilbert of the white hind, Hubert of Suffolk, and Clifton of Hampshire.

Nearly equal to these were Egbert of Kent and William of Southampton.

Artemis, the Roman emperor, we are told, could shoot four arrows between the spread fingers of a man's hand.

Tell, who shot an apple set on the head of his son, is a replica of the Scandinavian tale of Egil, who, at the command of King Nidung, performed a precisely similar feat.

Robin Hood, we are told, could shoot an arrow a mile or more.

Arches (The Court of). The most ancient consistory court of England, the dean of which anciently held his court under the arches of Bow church. Of course we refer to the old church, the steeple of which was supported on arches. The present structure was the work of Sir Christopher Wren.

Archeus (3 syl.), according to the Paracelsians, is that immaterial principle which energises all living substances. There were supposed to be numerous archai, but the chief one was said to reside in the stomach.

Archilochian Bitterness. Ill-natured satire, so named from Archilochus, the Grecian satirist (n.c. 741-678.)

Archimago (3 syl.). The name given by Thomson to the "demon Indolence," Archimagus is the title borne by the High Priest of the Persian Magi.

"I will, he cried, 'so help me God! I destroy That villain Archimago."—Thomson, Castle of Indolence, c. ii.

Archimago [Hypocrisy]. In Spenser's Faerie Queen (li. 1). He assumes the guise of the Red Cross Knight, and deceives Una; but Sansloy sets upon him, and reveals his true character. When the Red Cross Knight is about to be married to Una, he presents himself before the King of Eden, and tells him that the Knight is betrothed to Duessa. The falsehood being exposed, Archimago is cast into a vile dungeon (book i.). In book ii. the arch-hypocrite is loosed again for a season, and employs Braggadochio to attack the Red Cross Knight. These allegories are very obvious: thus the first incident means that Truth (Una), when Piety (the Red Cross Knight) is absent, is in danger of being led astray by Hypocrisy; but any Indulgent (Sansloy) can lay bare religious hypocrisy.

"Such when as Archimago then did view
He warned well to work se some untruth wyle."

Spenser: Faerie Queen, li. 1, st. 8.

Sometime Spenser employs the shortened form "Archimago."'

Archimedes Principle. The quantity of water removed by any body immersed therein will equal in bulk the bulk of the body immersed. This scientific fact was noted by the philosopher Archimedes. (See Eureka.)

Archimedes Screw. An endless screw, used for raising water, propelling Architect of his own Fortune. Appius says, "Fabrum suo esse quemque fortune." Longfellow says, "All are architects of Fate." (The Builders.)

Archontics. Heretics of the second century, who held a number of idle stories about creation, which they attributed to a number of agents called "archons." (Greek, archon, a prince or ruler.)

Arcite (2 syl.). A young Theban knight, made captive by Duke Theseus, and shut up with Palamon in a prison at Athens. Here both the captives fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister-in-law. After a time both captives gained their liberty, and Emily was promised by the duke to the victor in a tournament. Arcite was the victor, but, as he was riding to receive the prize of his prowess, he was thrown from his horse, and died. So Emily became the bride of Palamon. (Chaucer: The Knight's Tale.)

The story is perhaps better known through Dryden's version, Palamon and Arcite.

Arrepe Barba. War steeds of Areos, in Andalusia, very famous in Spanish ballads. (See Barred Steeds.)

Arctic Region means the region of Arcturus (the Bear stars). Ark in Sanskrit means "to be bright," applied to stars or anything bright. The Greek translated ark into arktos, "a bear"; hence Arcturus (the Bear star), and Arctic region, the region where the north star is found.

Arden (Enoch). Mr. G. R. Emerson, in a letter to the Athenaeum (August 18th, 1866), points out the resemblance of this tale by Tennyson to one entitled Homeward Bound, by Adelaide Anne Procter, in a volume of Legends and Lyrics, 1838. Mr. Emerson concludes his letter thus: "At this point (i.e. when the hero sees his wife seated by the fire, whispering baby words and smiling on the father of her child) Tennyson departs from the story. Enoch goes away broken-hearted to die, without revealing his secret; but Miss Procter makes the three recognise each other, and the hero having blessed his wife, leaves her, to roam 'over the restless ocean.'"

Mrs. Gaskell's Manchester Marriage is a similar tale. In this tale "Frank" is made to drown himself; and his wife (then Mrs. Openshaw) never knows of his return.

Argantes

Argante (3 syl.). A giantess of unbridled licentiousness, in Spenser's Fairie Queene, iii. 7.

"That giantesse Argante ruleth, A daughter of the Thanes... Her sire the Thanes was..."

Argantes (3 syl.). A Circassian of high rank and matchless courage, but fierce to brutality, and an ultra-deceiver of the sect of the Nazaroues. He was sent as an ambassador from Egypt to King Al'adin. He and Salymen were by far the most doughty of the Pagan knights. The former was slain by Rinaldo, and the other by Tauraud. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.)

"Bonaparte stood before the deputies like the Argantes of Italy's heroic poet, and gave thes Ariel

A ship sailing on an adventure. The galley of Jason that went in search of the Golden Fleece was so called, from the Greek aryos (swift).

Argonauts. The sailors of the ship Argo. Apollonius of Rhodes wrote an epic poem on the subject. (Greek, argo nauta.)

Argosy. A merchant ship. A corruption of "ragusea." Ships of the largest size were built at Ragusa in Dalmatia and Venice.

"He had an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indies... a third to Mexico, a fourth to England."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

Argot [Argo]. Slang or flash language (French).

"Sans le (de vant d'argot) faire venir du grec argos, c'est comme l'on a prétendu avant nous, nous y verrons logiquement subdiviser du vieux mot argus qui signifie injures, reproches, et ainsi russe, argente, subtilité."—Larcheys: Dictionnaire d'Argot.

Argus-eyed. Jealousy watchful. According to Grecian fable, Argus had 100 eyes, and Juno set him to watch Io, of whom she was jealous.

Argyle (2 syl.)—of whom Thomson says, in his Autumn (928-30)—

"On thee, Argyll,
Her hope, her stay, her darling, and her breast,
Thy tomb, impinging country, and thy west
Was John, the great Duke, who lived
Only two years after he succeeded to the dukedom. Pope (Ep. Sat. li. 86, 87) says—

"Argyll the state's whole thunder born to wield,
And shake alike the senate and the field."

Arians. The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, in the fourth century. He maintained (1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence previous to His appearance on earth, but not from eternity; and (4) that the Messiah was not real man, but a divine being in a case of flesh.

Arideus [A-ri-de-us] in Jerusalem Delivered, herald in Jerusalem. The other herald is Findo rus.

Ariel. A spirit of the air and guardian of innocence. He was enslaved to the witch Sycorax, who overtasked him; and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his power, shut him up in a pine-rift for twelve years. On the death of Sycorax, Ariel became the slave of Caliban, who tortured him most cruelly. Prospero liberated him from the pine-rift, and the grateful fairy served him for sixteen years, when he was set free. (Shakespeare: Tempest.)

Ariell. The sylph that watched over Bellinda. (Pope: Rape of the Lock, i.)
Aries. The Ram. The sign of the Zodiac in which the sun is from March 21st to April 20th.

"At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun." Thomson: Spring, 29.

Arimanes (4 syl.). "The prince of earth and air," and the fountain-head of evil. It is a personage in Persian mythology, introduced into Grecian fable under the name of Arimanu's. Byron introduces him in his drama called Manfred.

Arimaspian. A one-eyed people of Scythia, who adorned their hair with gold. They were constantly at war with the griffins who guarded the gold mines.

"As when a griffon, through the wilderness... Pursues the Arimaspians, who by stealth had from his wakeful custody parted the guarded gold." Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371.

Arioch. One of the fallen angels cast out of heaven. The word means a fierce lion. (Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371.)

Arión. A Greek musician, cast into the sea by mariners, but carried to Tenedos on the back of a dolphin.

Arión. The wonderful horse which Hercules gave to Adrastos. It sprang from Cerés and Neptune, had the power of speech, and its feet on the right side were the feet of a man. (See Horse.)

Ariosto was privately married to Alessandra Benucci, widow of Tito Strozzi; she is generally called his mistress.

Ariosto of the North. So Lord Byron calls Sir Walter Scott. (Childe Harold, iv. 40.)

Aristéas. The wandering Jew of Grecian fable. (See Jew.)

"Then Aristides lifts his hands from spotless heart; to whom the unfaltering voice Of Freedom gave the nobler name of Just." Thomson, inv. 1, i. 34.

The British Aristides. Andrew Marvell (1620-1678).

The French Aristides. Mons. Grévy, born 1813, president of the Third Republic 1879-1887, died 1891. He was a barrister by profession.

Aristippos. (See Hedonism.)

Aristocracy. The cold shade of the aristocracy — i.e. the unsympathising patronage of the great. The expression first occurs in Sir W. F. F. Napier's History of the Peninsular War.

The word "aristocracy" is the Greek aristocracia (rule of the best-born).

Aristophanes. The English or Modern Aristophanes. Samuel Foote (1722-1777).

Aristotelian Philosophy. Aristotle maintained that four separate causes are necessary before anything exists: the material cause, the formal, the final, and the moving cause. The first is the antecedent from which the thing comes into existence; the second, that which gives it its individuality; the moving or efficient cause is that which causes matter to assume its individual forms; and the final cause is that for which the thing exists. According to Aristotle, matter is eternal.

Aristotelian Unities. Aristotle, the Greek philosopher, laid it down as a rule that every tragedy, properly constructed, should contain but one catastrophe; should be limited to one denouement; and be circumscribed to the action of one single day. These are called the Aristotelian or Dramatic unities. To these the French have added a fourth, the unity of uniformity, i.e. in tragedy all the "dramatis personae" should be tragic in style, in comedy comic, and in farce farcical.

Ark. You must have come out of the ark, or you were born in the ark; because you are so old-fashioned, and ignorant of current events.

Armada. The Spanish Armada. The fleet assembled by Philip II. of Spain, in 1588, for the conquest of England. Used for any fleet.

Armenians. A religious sect so called from Armenia, where Christianity was introduced in the second century. They attribute only one nature to Christ and hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father only. They enjoin the adoration of saints, have some peculiar ways of administering baptism and the Lord's Supper, but do not maintain the doctrine of purgatory.
Armida. One of the prominent female characters in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. She was a beautiful sorceress, with whom Rinaldo fell in love, and wasted his time in voluptuous pleasure. Two messengers were sent from the Christian army with a talisman to disenchant him. After his escape, Armida followed him in distraction, but not being able to allure him back, set fire to his palace, rushed into the midst of a combat, and was slain.

In 1806, Frederick William of Prussia declared war against Napoleon, and his young queen rode about in military costume to arouse the enthusiasm of the people. When Napoleon was told of it, he wittily said of her: "She is Armida, in her distraction setting fire to her own palace."

Arminians (Anti-Calvinists), so called from James Harman, of Holland, whose name, Latinised, is Jacobus Arminius. He asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent and believe; that He wills all men to be saved; and that His predestination is founded on His foreknowledge.

Armory. Heraldry is so called, because it first found its special use in direct connection with military equipments, knightly exercises, and the mêlée of actual battle.

"Some great man's badge of war or armory." Morris: Earthly Paradise, II. 365.

Arms. In the Bayeux tapestry, the Saxons fight on foot with javelin and battle-axe, and bear shields with the British characteristic of a boss in the centre. The men were moustached.

The Normans are on horseback, with long shields and pommended lance. The men are not only shaven, but most of them have a complete tonsure on the back of the head, whence the spies said to Harold, "There are more priests in the Norman army than men in Harold's."

Arms of England (The Royal). The three lions leoparded were the cognisance of William the Conqueror; the lion rampant, in the second quarter is from the arms of Scotland; and the harp in the fourth quarter represents Ireland. The lion supporter is in honour of England, and the unicorn in honour of Scotland. These two supporters were introduced by James I.

William I. had only two lions passant gardant; the third was introduced by Henry II. The lion rampant first appeared on Scotch seals in the reign of Alexander II. (1214-1249). The harp was assigned to Ireland in the time of Haury VII.; before that time the arms of Ireland were three crowns. The unicorn was not a supporter of the royal arms of Scotland before the reign of Mary Stuart.

Which arm of the service. Military or naval?

The secular arm. Civil, in contradistinction to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

"The relapsed arm delivered to the secular arm."—Priestley: Corruptions of Christianity.

To arm a magnet. To put an armature on a lodestone.

A coat of arms. An heraldic device.

A passage of arms. A literary controversy; a battle of words.

An assault at arms (or of arms). An attack by fencers; a hand-to-hand military exercise.

At arm's length. At a distance. To keep one at arm's length is to repel familiarity.

In arms. A child in arms is an infant carried about in one's arms.

A city in arms is one in which the people are armed for war.

King of arms. A chief herald in the College of Herold. Here arms means heraldic devices.

Small arms. Those which do not, like artillery, require carriages.

To appeal to arms. To determine to decide a litigation by war.

To arms! Make ready for battle.

"To arms! cried Mortimer,
And couched his quiv'ring lance."

Come to my arms. Come, and let me embrace you.

To lay down their arms. To cease from armed hostility; to surrender.

Under arms. Prepared for battle; in battle array.

Up in arms. In open rebellion; roused to anger, as the clergy were up in arms against Colenso for publishing his Lectures on the Pentateuch. The latter is a figure of speech.

With open arms. Cordially; as persons receive a dear friend when they open their arms for an embrace.

Arms [brave men]. Albanian mountainers.

"Stained with the heat of arms's blood." Byron: The Glove.

Arm-monath. Anglo-Saxon, ern-monath, barn month. The Anglo-Saxon name for August, because it was the month for garnering the corn.

Arnold. of Melchthal, patriarch of the forest cantons of Switzerland. He was in love with Matilda, a sister of Gessler, the Austrian governor of the district. When the tyranny of Gessler drove the people into rebellion, Arnold gave up Matilda and joined the insurgents; but when Gessler was shot by William Tell, he became united to her in marriage. (Rossini's opera of Giuglielmo Tell.)

Arnel'dists. The partisans of Arnold of Brescia, who raised his voice against the abuses and vices of the papacy in the twelfth century. He was burnt alive by Pope Adrian IV.

Arold, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir William Waller.

"But in the sacred annals of our plot
Industrial Arrold never be forgot.
The labour of this midnight magistratc
May vie with Corah [Titus Gates] to preserve the state."

Part II.

Aroint thee. Get ye gone, be off. In Cheshire they say, rynge ye, witch: and milk-maids say to their cows when they have done milking them, rynge ye, (or 'roint) my beauties; but it is doubtful whether this is connected with the word in question.

Aronteous (4 syl.), in Jerusalem Delivered. An Asiatic king, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders, "not by virtue fired, but vain of his titles and ambitious of fame."

Aroundight. The sword of Sir Launcelot of the Lake. (See Sword.)

"It is the sword of a good knight,
Though homespun was his mail,
What matter if it be not lucht,
Joyeuse, Cola'a, Durindale, Excelsiar, or Aroundight?"

Longfellow.

Arras, tapestry. So called from Arras, in Artois, famed for its manufacture. When rooms were hung with tapestry it was a common thing for persons to hide behind it, especially the arras curtain before the door. Hubert concealed the two villains who were to put out Arthur's eyes behind the arras. Polonius was slain by Hamlet while concealed behind the arras. Falstaff proposed to hide behind the arras at Windsor, etc.

Arris, a Roman lady, the wife of Casina Petus. Petus being accused of conspiring against the Emperor Claudius was condemned to death and sent by sea to Rome. Arris accompanied him, and stabbed herself in the boat, then presenting the dagger to her husband, she said: "Petus, it gives no pain" (non dol). (Pliny, vii.)

Her daughter Arria, wife of Thraseas, when her husband was condemned to death by Nero, opened her veins; but Thraseas entreated her to live, for the sake of her children.

Arricre Pensée (plural arrières pensées), a hidden or reserved motive, not apparent on the surface.

Arrot. the weasel, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Arrow. The broad arrow, thus â. A mark used by the British Board of Ordnance, and placed on their stores. (See Broad Arrow.)

Arrowroot is araruta, the Indian word ara is the name of the plant. There is no evidence of its being used to absorb the poison of poisoned arrows in feathy wounds.

Arse'tous (in Jerusalem Delivered). The aged eunuch who brought up Clo-riding, and attended her steps.

Artaxerxes, called by the Persians Kai-Ardeah, and surnamed diraz-dent (long-handed), because his right hand was longer than his left. The Romans translated diraz-dent into longi-manae; the Greek Arta into Arde ("noble").

Art'egal (Sir) (in Spenser's Faerie Queene), is the hero of the fifth book, and impersonates Justice, the foster child of Astrea. In the previous books he occasionally appears, and is called Sir Arthegal. It is said that Arthur, Lord Grey of Wilton, was the prototype of this character. He was sent to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant in 1580, and the poet was his secretary. In book iv., canto 6, Sir Artogal is married to Britonart, and proceeds to succour Irina (Ireland), whose heritage had been withheld by the tyrant Grantorto. (See Arthegal.)

Artemus Ward. A showman, very cute, and very American. The hypothetical writer of the essays or papers so called, the real author being Charles F. Browne.

Being asked if his name was Artémus or Arthémus, or he wrote on his address card:—

"Don't bother me with your etas and short e's.
Nor ask me for more than you have on my card.
Oh! spare me from etymological sorrows,
And simply accept me as Artemus Ward."
Artesian Wells

7 Which, however, leaves the pronunciation of "Ward" doubtful.

Artesian Wells. So called from Artesium (the Latin for Artós), in France, where they were first bored.

Artful Dodger. A young thief, a most perfect adept in villainy, up to every sort of wicked dodge. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Arthegal. Uterine brother of Prince Arthur. Spenser, in his Faerie Queene (book iii.), makes Britomart see his person and name in the magic glass. She falls in love with the looking-glass hero, and is told by Merlin that she will marry him, and become the mother of a line of kings that would surpese both the Saxons and Normans. He referred, of course, to the Tudors, who were descendants of Cadwallader. (See Artegal.)

Arthur. King of the Siluris, a tribe of ancient Britons, was mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, raised by the revolt of his nephew, Modred. He was taken to Glastonbury, where he died. His wife was Guenever, who committed adultery with Sir Launcelot of the Lake, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

He was the natural son of Uther and Igrina (wife of Gorlois, duke of Cornwall), and was brought up by Sir Ector. He was born at Tintad'gel or Tintagel, a castle in Cornwall.

His habitual rendezvous was Caerleon, in Wales; and he was buried at Avalon.

His sword was called Excalibur or Excelsior; his spear, Rone (1 syl.), and his shield, Trident. His dog was named Cavall. (See Round Table Knights.)

Arthurian Romances. These may be divided into six parts:

(1) The romance of the San Graal. By Robert Borrwn.

(2) The Merlin, which celebrates the birth and exploits of King Arthur. By Walter Mapes.

(3) The Launeclot. Perhaps by Ulrich.

(4) The search or Quest of the San Graal. It is found by Sir Galahad, a knight of pure heart and great courage; but no sooner does he find it than he is taken up to heaven. By (?) Walter Mapes.

(6) Sundry Tales, but especially the adventures of Sir Tristan. By Luke Gast, of Salisbury.

Arthur's Seat, a hill near Edinburgh, is Ar'd Seir (hill of arrows), where people shot at a mark.

Articles of Roup (Scotch). Conditions of sale at an auction announced by a crier. (Roup is the Teutonic _re_-open, to cry out.)

Artists, The Prince of. Albert Dürer; so called by his countrymen. (1471-1528.)

Artotyrites (4 syl.). Certain heretics from among the Montanists; so called because they used bread and cheese in the Eucharist. They admitted women to the priesthood. (Greek, artos, barley-bread, and tyros, cheese.)

Arts. Degrees in Arts. In the medieval ages the full course consisted of the three subjects which constituted the Trivium, and the four subjects which constituted the Quadrivium—

The Trivium was grammar, logic, and rhetoric.

The Quadrivium was music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy.

The Master of Arts was the person qualified to teach or be the master of students in arts; as the Doctor was the person qualified to teach theology, law, or medicine.

Arundel. The heraldic device of the family is six swallows (hirondelles), a pun upon the name.

Arundel. (See Horse.)

Arundelian Marbles. A collection of ancient sculptures collected at great expense by Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, and presented to the University of Oxford in 1667 by his grandson, Henry Howard, afterwards Duke of Norfolk. They contain tables of ancient chronology, especially that of Athens, from B.C. 1582 to 264, engraved in old Greek capitals. Date of the tables, B.C. 263.

Arvakur. (See Horse.)

Aryans. The parent stock of what is called the Indo-European family of nations. They lived probably in Bactria, i.e., between the river Oxus and the Hindu-koosh mountains. The Aryan family of languages include the Persian and Hindī, with all the European except Basque, Turkish, Hungarian, and Finnic. Sometimes called the Indo-European, sometimes the Indo-Germanic, and sometimes the Japetic.

Sanskrit, Zend, Latin, Greek, and Celtic are, of course, included.
Asgard

Asgard. A river that flows into the North Sea, near Wardhus, where Sir Willoughby's three ships were frozen, and the whole crew perished of starvation.

"In these fell regions, in Asgare caught, And to the story deep his idle spin Immediate sealed, he with his hapless crew... Froze into statues." Thompson: Winter, 1884.

As you were, in military drilling, means, Return to the position in which you were before the last exercise. As you were before.

Asa was a term of address to all the gods of Gladsheim; as Asa Odin, Asa Thor, Asa Loki, Asa Tyr, etc.

"That's all very well, Asa Odin! answered Freg, 'but who, let me ask, is to undertake the feeding of the human animal?""—Keany: Heroes of Asgard, p. 73.

Asa Loki. Descended from the giants and received among the celestials. He is represented as a treacherous malignant power, fond of assuming disguises, and plotting evil. One of his progeny is Helo (q.v.). (Scandinavian mythology.) (See ÅSIR.)

Asa Thor. Eldest son of Asa Odin, and the first-born of mortals. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Asaph. A famous musician in David's time (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2). Mr. Tate, who wrote the second part of Absalom and Achitophel, lauds Dryden under this name.

"While Judah's throne and Sion's rock stand fast, The song of Asaph and the fame shall last." Absalom and Achitophel, part ii. 1168-1.

Asbolos. One of Actaeon's dogs. The word means stout-coloured. (See ÅMBYNTHOS.)

Ascalaphos. Turned by Proserpine, for mischief-making, into an owl. (Greek fable.)

Ascapt. A giant conquered by Sir Bevis of Southampton. He was thirty feet high, and the space between his eyes was twelve inches. This mighty giant, whose effigy figures on the city gates of Southampton, could carry under his arm without feeling distressed Sir Bevis with his wife and horse. (See GIANTS.)

"As Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascapt," Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., act ii. 3.

Ascendant. In casting a horoscope the easternmost star, representing the house of life, is called the ascendant, because it is in the act of ascending. This is a man's strongest star, and so long as it is above the horizon his fortune is said to be in the ascendant. When a man's circumstances begin to improve, and things look brighter, we say his star is in the ascendant. (See HOUSES, STARS.)

House of the Ascendant includes five degrees of the zodiac above the point just rising, and twenty-five below it. Usually, the point of birth is referred to. The lord of the Ascendant is any planet within the "house of the Ascendant." The house and lord of the Ascendant at birth were said by astrologers to exercise great influence on the future life of the child. Perhaps Deborah referred to the influence of the stars when she said "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." (Judges v. 20.)

Ascension Day or Holy Thursday. The day set apart by the Catholic and Anglican Church to commemorate the ascension of our Lord from earth to heaven. Formerly it was customary to beat the bounds of each respective parish on this day, and many practical jokes were played even during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, to make the boys remember the ceremonies; such as "humping them," pouring water clandestinely on them from house windows, beating them with thin rods, etc. Festing the hounds was called in Scotland "riding the marches" (hounds).

Asclepiads or Asclepiadic Meter. A Greek and Latin verse, so called from Asclepiads, the inventor. Each line is divided into two parts, thus:

`````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````````
Scandinavian mythology. It is said to be situated in the centre of the universe, and accessible only by the rainbow-bridge (Bifrost). The word As means a "god," and yard an "enclosure," our "yard." Odin was priest of Asgard before he migrated to the Lake Logur or Mocker Sea.

_Ash Tree_, or "Tree of the Universe." (See Yggdrasil.)

_Ash Wednesday_. The first Wednesday in Lent, so called from an ancient Roman Catholic custom of sprinkling ashes on the heads of those condemned to do penance on this day.

The ashes were those of the palms burnt on Palm Sunday. The palms were sprinkled with ashes, the less offending were signed on the forehead with the sign of the cross, the officiating minister saying, "Requiem, bonus, qui potest es, et in patera remorator." The custom, it is said, was introduced by Gregory the Great.

_Ashmolean Museum_. Presented to the University of Oxford in 1682 by Elias Ashmole. Sometimes called the Trades'cant, because it belonged to the Tradesman family.

_Ash'taroth_. The goddess-moon in Syrian mythology, called by Jeremiah (vii. 18, xlv. 17, 25) "the queen of heaven." Goddess of the Zidonians.

"Mourned Ash'taroth, _Haven's queen and mother both._"

Milton: _The Upas_.

_Ashur_. The highest god of the Assyrians. It had the head of an eagle and four wings, but the body of a man.

"Out of that land went forth Ashur, and said Nechevuh._"—Gen. x. 11.

_Astius_. Astius: _acium fricet_ (Latin, "one ass rules another"); that is, we fraternize with persons like ourselves; or, in other words, "Birds of a feather flock together." The allusion needs no explanation.

_A'sir_. [See _Asir_.]

_Ask_. The vulgar Ax is the more correct (Saxon, axan, to ask). In as- santing to Bills, the king used to reply, "Be it as it is axed." Chaucer says in the _Doctor of Medicine's Tale_, "For my werke nothing will I axe." Launfal, 1027, has, "Ho that wyl there asky justus." Other quotations could easily be added.

_Ask and Embia_. The Adam and Eve made by Odin, one from ash-wood and the other from elm.

(Ash Tree_. 68 Aspen

_Asmodeus_ [the destroyer]. The demon of vanity and dress, called in the Talmud "the king of devils."

The _Asmodeus of domestic peace_ (in the Book of Tobit). Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and causes the death of seven husbands in succession, each on his bridal night. After her marriage to Tobit, he was driven into Egypt by a charm, made by Tobias of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes, and being pursued was taken prisoner and bound.

"Better pleasedThan AsMODEUS with the fishes fameThat drove him, though enmoured, from the spouse

Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sentFrom Media post to Egypt, there fast bound."

_Asmodeus_. The companion of Don Cle'ofas in The Devil on Two Sticks. (Chap. iii.)

_Asmodeus' flight_. Don Cle'ofas, catching hold of his companion's cloak, is perched on the steeple of St. Salva'dor. Here the foul fiend stretches out his hand, and the roofs of all the houses open in a moment, to show the Don what is going on privately in each respective dwelling.

"(With the reader take an Asmodeus' flight, and, waiting open all roofs and privies, look down from the roof of Notre Dame, what a Paris were it!"

Carlyle: _French Revolution II_, 1. chap. vi.

_Aso'ka_ of Magad'ha. In the third century the "nursing father" of Buddhist, as Constantine was of Christianity. He is called "the king beloved of the gods."

_Aso'ors_. Evil genii of the Indians.

_Aspaa'sia_, a courtesan. She was the most celebrated of the Greek Hetaroe, to whom Pericles attached himself. On the death of Pericles she lived with Lyricles, a cattle-dealer.

"The Hetaroe of Athens were, many of them, distinguished for talents and accomplishments. Those of Corinth were connected with the worship of Aphrodite (Venus).

_Aspaa'tia_, in the _Maid's Tragedy_, of Beaumont and Fletcher, is noted for her deep sorrows, her great resignation, and the pathos of her speeches. Amyntor deserts her, women point at her with scorn, she is the jest and by-word of every one, but she bears it all with patience.

_Aspen_. The aspen leaf is said to tremble, from shame and horror, because our Lord's cross was made of this wood. The fact is this: the leaf is broad, and Aspersions properly means "sprinklings" or "scatterings." Its present meaning is base insinuations or slanders.

"No sweet aspersion [rain] shall the heavens let fall.
To make this contract grow."

Shakespeare: The Tempest, iv. 1.

Casting aspersions on one, i.e. sprinkling with calumnies, slandering or insinuating misconduct.
"I defy all the world to cast a just aspersion on my character."—Fielding: Tom Jones.

Aspaul's Lake. The Dead Sea, where asphalt abound on both the surface of the water and on the banks. Asphalt is a bitumen. (From the Greek asphallos.)

As'rael. (See Azrael.)

Ass. (See Golden Ass.)

Ass. The ass on which Mahomet went to heaven to learn the will of God was called Al Borak (the lightning).

Ass. There is a dark stripe running down the back of an ass, crossed by another at the shoulders. The tradition is that this cross was communicated to the creature when our Lord rode on the back of an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem. (See Christian Traditions.)

Ass, deaf to music. This tradition arose from the hideous noise made by "Sir Balaam" in braying. Because Midas had no power to appreciate music, Apollo gave him the ears of an ass. (See Ass-Kared.)

"Avarice is as deaf to the voice of virtue, as the ass to the voice of Apollo." Orlando Furioso, xii.

An ass in a lion's skin. A coward who hectes, a fool that apes the wise man. The allusion is to the fable of an ass that put on a lion's hide, but was betrayed when he began to bray.

An ass with two handles. A man walking the streets with a lady on each arm. This occupies the whole pavement, and is therefore bad manners well meriting the reproach. In Italy they call such a simpleton a pitcher with two handles, his two arms akimbo forming the two handles. In London we call it walking bodkin, because the man is sheathed like a bodkin and powerless. Our expression is probably a corruption of the French Faire le panier à deux anses ("put your arms akimbo") or "make yourself a basket with two handles."

The ass wagged his ears. This proverb is applied to those who lack learning, and yet talk as if they were very wise; men wise in their own conceit. The ass, proverbial for having no "taste for music," will nevertheless wag its ears at a "concert of sweet sounds," just as if it could well appreciate it.

Till the ass ascends the ladder—i.e. never. A rabbinical expression. The Romans had a similar one, Cum asinus in tegulis ascenderit (when the ass climbs to the tiles). And Buxtorf has Si ascenderit asinus per scalas.

Sell your ass. Get rid of your foolish ways.

That which thou knowest not perchance then ass can tell thee. An allusion to Balaam's ass.

To make an ass of oneself. To do something very foolish. To expose oneself to ridicule.

To mount the ass (French). To become bankrupt. The allusion is to a custom very common in the sixteenth century of mounting a bankrupt on an ass, with his face to its tail. Thus mounted, the defaulter was made to ride through the principal thoroughfares of the town.

Asses have ears as well as pitchers. Children, and even the densest minds, hear and understand many a word and hint which the speaker supposed would pass unheeded.

Asses that carry the mysteries (as'inus portai myste'ria). A classical knock at the Roman clergy. The allusion is to the custom of employing asses to carry the cista which contained the sacred symbols, when processions were made through the streets. (Warburton: Divine Legation, ii. 4.)

Well, well! honey is not for the ass's mouth. Persuasion will not persuade fools. The gentlest words will not divert the anger of the unreasonable.

Wringle for an ass's shadow. To contend about trifles. The tale told by Demosthenes is that a man hired an ass to take him to Megara; and at noon, the sun being very hot, the traveller dismounted, and sat himself down in the shadow of the ass. Just then the owner Assaye Regiment. The 74th Foot, so called because they first distinguished themselves in the battle of Assaye, where 2,000 British and 2,000 Sepoy troops under Wellington defeated 60,000 Mahrattas, commanded by French officers. In 1803 this regiment is now called "the 2nd Battalion of the Highland Light Infantry." The first battalion was the old No. 71.

Assaye (The). Prop. 5, book i. of Euclid. This is the first difficult proposition in geometry, and stupid boys rarely get over it the first time without tripping.

It is the ass's pitfall, not his bridge.

If this be rightly called the "Bridge of Assae," He's not the fool who sticks, but he that passes.

E. C. R.

Assassin (Feast of). (See FOOLS.)

Ass-eared. Midas had the ears of an ass. The tale says Apollo and Pan had a contest, and chose Midas to decide which was the better musician. Midas gave sentence in favour of Pan; and Apollo, in disgust, changed his ears into those of an ass.

Assas'tins. A band of Carmathians, collected by Hassan, subah of Nishapour, called the Old Man of the Mountains, because he made Mount Lebanon his stronghold. This band was the terror of the world for two centuries, when it was put down by Sultan Bibarís. The assassins indulged in hashisch (bang), an intoxicating drink, and from this liquor received their name. (A.D. 1090.)

"The Assassins... before they attacked the enemy, would intoxicate themselves with a powder made of hemp-leaves... called hashisch."—J. Wolf.

Assay', or Essay'. To take the assay is to taste wine to prove it is not poisoned. Hence, to try, to taste; a savour, trial, or sample. Holinshed says, "Wolsey made dukes and earls serve him of wine with a sav taken" (p. 847).

Edmund, in King Lear (v. 3), says to Edgar, "Thy tongue, some say of breeding breathes;" i.e. thy speech gives indication of good breeding—it savours of it. Hence the expression, I make my first assay (trial).

"I'll make no vow before his uncle ne'er more To save the assay of a man against your Majesty."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 2.

A cup of assay. A cup for the assay of wine.

To put it in assay. To put it to the test.
Astolat. By some identified with Gulliford, in Surrey.

Astolpho (in Orlando Furioso), An English duke (son of Otho), who joined Charlemagne against the Saracens. He was carried on the back of a whale to Alcina's isle; but when Alcina tired of him, she turned him into a myrtle. He was disenchanted by Melissa. Astolpho descended into the inferior regions, and his flight to the moon (book xviii.) is one of the best parts of the whole poem. (See Inferno.)

It came upon them like a blast from Astolpho's horn — i.e. it produced a panic. Logistilla gave Astolpho a magic horn, and whatever man or beast heard its blast was seized with panic, and became an easy captive. (Orlando Furioso, book viii.)

Like Astolpho's book, it told you everything. The same fairy gave Astolpho a book, which would not only direct him aright in his journeys, but would tell him anything he desired to know. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, book viii.)

Asteth. (See Ashtaboth.)

Astrée's. Equity, innocence. During the Golden Age this goddess dwelt on earth, but when sin began to prevail, she reluctantly left it, and was metamorphosed into the constellation Virgo.

"When hard-hearted interest first began To poison earth, Astræa left the plain." — Thomson: Castle of Indolence, can. 1.

Astral Body (The). The nounmenon of a phenomenal body. This "spirit body" survives after the death of the material body, and is the "ghost" or "double." Macbeth's dagger was an astral body; so, in theosophy, is the "kama-rupa," or mind body; and in transubstantiation the veritable "blood and flesh" of Christ is the astral body of the accidents "bread and wine."

Man is supposed to consist of body, soul, and spirit. The last is the astral body of man.

Astral Spirits. The spirits of the stars. According to the mythology of the Persians, Greeks, Jews, etc., each star has its special spirit. Parmenides maintained that every man had his attendant star, which received him at death, and took charge of him till the great resurrection.

Astræa. A poetical name of Mrs. Aphra Behn, born of good family in the reign of Charles I. Her works are very numerous and very indelent, including seventeen dramatic pieces. She died 1689, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

"The stage how loosely does Astræa tread." — Pope: Satires, i. 99.

Astrology. (See Diapason, Microcosm.)

Astronomer of Dublin (The). The head of the chief rebel of Dublin, set on a tall white-painted stake on the highest point of Dublin Castle, where it remains till it falls to decay or is replaced by the head of a greater rebel. The Irish say: "God send to Dublin many more astronomers."

"His head is poled high Upon the castle here Reholding stars as though he were A great astronomer." — Derrick.

Astronomers Royal: (1) Flamsteed, 1675; (2) Halley, 1719; (3) Bradley, 1742; (4) Bliss, 1762; (5) Maskelyne, who originated the Nautical Almanack, 1765; (6) Pond, 1811; (7) Airy, 1835; (8) Christie, 1881.

Astrophel. Sir Philip Sidney. "Phil. Sid.," being a contraction of Phileas Sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron-phatos (star-lover). The "star" that he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he called Stella (star), and to whom he was betrothed. Edmund Spenser wrote a pastoral called Astrophel, to the memory of his friend and patron, who fell at the battle of Zutphen. (1564-1586.)

Asylum means, literally, a place where pilgrimage is forbidden. (Greek, a (negative), συλλογις, right of pilgrimage. The ancients set apart certain places of refuge, where the vilest criminals were protected, both from private and public assaults.

Asynir. The goddesses of Asgard. The gods were called the Æsir, the singular of which is Æsa.

At. Strenia at a quatr (Matt. xxiii. 24). Greek, di-aulō, to strain off. Here "at" is an error, probably in the first instance typographical, for "out." "Out" is given in the Bible of 1603, and has been restored by the Revisers.

Ate (2 syl.). Goddess of vengeance and mischief. This goddess was driven out of heaven, and took refuge among the sons of men.

"With Ate by his side come hot from hell. . . . Try 'Mar o front, and let slip the dogs of war." — Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, iii. 1.
Atellanae or Atell'an Fables. Interludes in the Roman theatres, introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Macæus and Bucco are the foundations of our Punch and Clown. (See PUNCH.)

Atertgata. A deity with the upper part like a woman and the lower part like a fish. She had a temple at Ascalon. (See DAGON.)

Athana'sian Creed, so called because it embodies the opinions of Athana'sius respecting the Trinity. It was compiled in the fifth century by Hilary, Bishop of Arles.

* In the Episcopal Prayer Book of America this creed is omitted.

Athel'stane (8 syl.), surnamed "The Unready" (i.e. impolitic, unwise), thane of Coningsburgh. (Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.)

Athenæum (the review so called) was founded by James Silk Buckingham in 1829. It was named after the institution founded by Hadrian, where works of art and learning were dedicated to Athéné.

Athenean Bee. Plato, a native of Athens, was so called because his words flowed with the sweetness of honey.

Athens. The Modern Athens, i.e. Edinburgh. Willis says that its singular resemblance to Athens, approached from the Piræus, is very striking.

"An imitation Acropolis is commenced on the Calton Hill, and has the effect of the Parthenon. Hyrmata is rather more lofty than the Pentland hills, and Penteicurus is further off and grander than Arthur's Seat; but the old Castle of Edinburgh is a noble feature, superbly magnificent." — Pentimens.

Athens of Ireland. Belfast. Athens of the New World. Boston, noted for its literary merit and institutions.

Athens of the West. Correldon, in Spain, was so called in the Middle Ages.

Athole Brose (Scotch). A compound of oatmeal, honey, and whisky.

At Home. A notification sent to friends that the lady who sends it will be at home on the day and at the hour specified, and will be glad to see the persons mentioned in the card of invitation. These "At homes" are generally held in an afternoon before dinner. Light refreshments are provided, and generally some popular games are introduced, occasionally music and dancing.

Not at Home. Not disengaged, or prepared for the reception of visitors; not in the house.

Atin. Strife. The squire of Pyrrochîes, and stirrer up of contention. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii.)

Atkins. (See Tommy Atkins.)

Atlantean Shoulders. Shoulders able to bear a great weight, like those of Atlas, which, according to heathen mythology, supported the whole world.

Atlantes. Figures of men, used in architecture instead of pillars. So called from Atlas, who in Greek mythology supported the world on his shoulders. Female figures are called Caryatidæ (q.v.). (See Telemones.)

Atlantæ (3 syl.) (in Orlando Furioso). A sage and a magician who lived in an enchanted palace, and brought up Rogero to all manly virtues.

Atlantic Ocean. An ocean, so called from the Atlas mountains.

Atlantis. A mythical island which contained the Elysian Fields. The New Atlantis. An island imagined by Lord Bacon, where was established a philosophical commonwealth bent on the cultivation of the natural sciences. (See UTOPIA, CITY OF THE SUN.)

Atlas. King of Mauritania in Africa, failed to have supported the world upon his shoulders. Of course, the tale is merely a poetical way of saying that the Atlas mountains prop up the heavens, because they are so lofty. We call a book of maps an "Atlas," because it contains or holds the world. The word was first employed in this sense by Mercator, and the title-page of his collection of maps had the figure of Atlas with the world on his back.

"Hill Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign, / His subterranean wonders spread!" — Thomson: Autumn, 727-8.

Atman, in Buddhist philosophy, is the noumenon of one's own self. Not the Ego, but the ego divested of all that is objective; the "spark of heavenly flame."

"The unseen and imperceptible, which was formerly called the soul, was now called the self, Atman. Nothing could be predicated of it except that it was, that it perceived and thought, and that it must be blessed." — Max Müller: A漏水lletl Châtral, 545, 1863, p. 277.

Atomic Philosophy. The hypothesis of Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurus, that the world is composed of a congeries of atoms, or particles of matter so minute as to be incapable of further diminution.

Of course it is quite impossible even to think of a portion of matter which has not an upper and under side, with some breadth and thickness.

"According to Democritus, the expounder of the Atomic Theory of matter, images composed of the least atoms floated from the object to the mind." —McClure: Psychological Cognitions Ponder, p. 53.

Atomic Theory. That all elemental bodies consist of aggregations of atoms, not united fortuitously, but according to fixed proportions. The four laws of Dalton are—constant proportion, reciprocal proportion, multiple proportion, and compound proportion.

* Atomic Volume. The space occupied by a quantity, compared with, or in proportion to, atomic weight.

Atomic Weight. The weight of an atom of an element, compared with an atom of hydrogen, the standard of unity.

Atossa. Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, so called by Pope, because she was the friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whom he calls Sappho. Hecdotus says that Atossa, the mother of Xerxes, was a follower of Sappho.

Atrip. The anchor is atrip when it has just been drawn from the ground in a perpendicular direction. A sail is atrip when it has been hoisted from the cap, and is ready for trimming. The word is from the Norwegian and Danish trip, a short stop.

Attain. A term in chivalry, meaning to strike the helmet and shield of an antagonist so firmly with the lance, held in a direct line, as either to break the lance or overthrow the person struck. Hence to "attain of treason," etc.

Attain was a word of taunting, used to express the champion's having attained his mark, or, in other words, struck his lance straight and fair against the helmet or breast of his adversary.

Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery (note).

Attercop. An ill-tempered person, who mars all sociability. Strictly speaking, the attercop is the poison-spider. (Anglo-Saxon, alter, poison; cap, spider. Our cob-web should be cop-web, i.e. spider-web.)

Attic Bee (The). Sophocles, the tragic poet, a native of Athens; so called from the great sweetness of his compositions. (B.C. 495-405.)

Attic Bird (The). The nightingale; so called because Philomel was the daughter of the King of Athens.

"Where the Attic bird Trills her thick-wardened notes the summer long."

Milton: Paradise Regained, iv. 244-46.

Attic Boy (Thy). Cephalus, beloved by Aurora or Morn; passionately fond of hunting.

"Till civil-salted Morn appear,
Not tricked and frowned, as she was wont
With the Attic boy to hunt.
But kerchoof in a comedy cloud."

Milton: Il Penseroso.

Attic Faith. Inviolable faith, the very opposite of "Punic Faith."

Attic Muse (The). Xenophon, the historian, a native of Athens; so called because the style of his composition is a model of elegance. (B.C. 444-399.)

Attic Order, in architecture, a square column of any of the five orders. (See Orders.)

Attic Salt. Elegant and delicate wit. Salt, both in Latin and Greek, was a common term for wit, or sparkling thought well expressed: thus Cicero says, "Scipio annus sale supera'bat" (Scipio surpassed all in wit). The Athenians were noted for their wit and elegant turns of thought, and hence Attic salt means wit as pointed and delicately expressed as by the Athenians. "Attic point," wit.

Attic Science. A knowledge of Attic Greek.

Attics, Attic Storey. Attics are the rooms in the attic storey, and the attic storey generally is an extra storey made in the roof. In the Roman and Renaissance styles of architecture the floor storey above the cornice or entablature is called the "Attic. Professor Goldstucker derives the word from the Sanskrit utaka (a room on the top of a house). (See The Transactions of the Philological Society, 1854.)

Attic storey. The head; the body being compared to a house, the head is the highest, or attic storey.

"Here a gentleman present, who had in his attic
More power than brains, shrieked: 'The man's a fanatic.'" —Lowell: Fable for Critics ( stanza 50).

Ill furnished in the attic storey. Not clever, dull. Quer in the attic storey. Fuddled, partially intoxicated.

Atticus. The most elegant and finished scholar of the Romans. His admirable taste and sound judgment were so highly thought of that even Cicero submitted to him several of his treatises.
The English Atticus. Joseph Addison; so called by Pope, on account of his refined taste and philosophical mind. (1672-1719.)

The Christian Atticus. Reginald Heber, Bishop of Calcutta. (1783-1826.)

The Irish Atticus. George Faulkner; so called by Lord Chesterfield. (1700-1775.)

Attinkans. Heretics of the eighth century, who solemnised baptism with the words, "I am the living water." (Attin, a name of Neptune.)

Attok. The forbidden river, beyond which no pure Hindoo can pass.

Attorney, Solicitor. (French, avocat, to atorn, or turn over to another). One legally qualified to manage matters in law for others, and to prosecute or defend others, as the case may be. A solicitor is one who solicits or petitions in Courts of Equity on behalf of his clients. At one time solicitors belonged to Courts of Equity, and attorneys to the other courts.

From and after Act 36, 37 Vict. c. 87, "all persons admitted as solicitors, attorneys, or procureurs...empowered to practise in any court, the jurisdiction of which is hereby transferred to the High Court of Justice, or the Court of Appeal, shall be called Solicitors of the Supreme Court" (1873.)

Power of Attorney. Legal authority given to another to collect rents, pay wages, invest money, or act in matters stated in the instrument on your behalf, according to his own judgment. In such cases quod alius facit per aliquem, facit per se.

Warrant of Attorney. The legal instrument which confers on another the "Power of Attorney."

Atnys. Metamorphosed into a fir-tree by Cybele. See the poem by Catullus, translated by Leigh Hunt.

An Courant (French). "acquainted with" (lit. = in the current of events). To keep one au courant of everything that passes, is to keep one familiar with, or informed of, passing events.

An Fait (French). Skilful, thorough master of; as, He is quite au fait in those matters, i.e. quite master of them or conversant with them.

An Grand Sérieux (French). In sober earnest.

"We are not asked to take these narratives au grand sérieux. They are rather sketches of the past, indicating what could have been done, and may be done again by women..."—Notes and Queries (Notes on Books, June 10, 1853, p. 496.)

Augsburg Confession

Au Pied de la Lettre (French). Literatum et verbatum; according to the strict letter of the text.

"In reading au pied de la lettre the story of his [Buddha's] past illness supervised on a meal of dried boar's flesh, served to him by a certain Kunda."—Nineteenth Century (June, 1883, p. 1060.)

Au Revoir (French). "Good bye for the present." Literally, till seeing you again.

Anbry's Dog. (See Doo.)

An'deanism. The doctrine of Audens of Mesopotamia, who lived in the fourth century. He maintained that the Old Testament justifies the belief that God has a sensible form (Gen. i. 26).

Audhum'la [the nourishing power], in Scandinavian mythology, is the cow created by Surd to nourish Ymir. She supplied him with four rivers of milk, and was herself nourished by licking the rocks. (See Ymir.)

Bör, the first man, was made by Audhumla licking salt from the snow. Odin was the son of Bör.

The breath of Audhumla was very sweet, but her milk was bitter.

Audley. We will John Audley it, i.e. abridge it. A theatrical phrase. In the eighteenth century one Shuter had a travelling company which visited different fairs. It was his custom to lengthen out his performance till a goodly number of newcomers had collected on the open stage of his theatre, when a boy called out John Audley, and the play which was going on inside was brought to an end as soon as possible. (1759.)

Audrey. A country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Augs'ian Stables. The stables of Augus, King of Elis, in Greece. In these stables he had kept 3,000 oxen, and the stables had not been cleaned for thirty years. When Herculæs was appointed to cleanse these stables, he caused two rivers to run through them.

To cleanse the Augran stables. To clear away an accumulated mass of corruption, moral, religious, physical, or legal. To reform wrongs almost past the power of man to tackle.

Augsburg Confession. The chief standard of faith in the Lutheran church. So called because, while the Diet of the German Empire was sitting at Augsburg, in 1530, the confession of faith drawn up by Melancthon and Luther was presented to Charles V.
Aunt Sally means properly the function of an augur (perhaps from avium garritus). St. Pierre says: “The first navigators, when out of sight of land, watched the flight of birds, as indications of the shore, and with no other guidance discovered many new islands.” From this custom (he says) arose the practice of consulting birds before entering on any important enterprise. (Studies.)

August. The sixth month (beginning from March) was once called sextilis, but was changed to Augustus in compliment to Augustus Caesar of Rome, whose “lucky month” it was, in which occurred many of his most fortunate events.

The preceding month (July), originally called Quintilis, had already been changed to Julius in honour of Julius Caesar.

Augusta. London; so called by the Romans.

“Oft let me wander o’er the dewy fields, Rome’s eminence, Augusta, in thy plains, And see the country far defined around.”

Augustan Age. The best literary period of a nation; so called from Augustus, the Emperor of Rome, the most palmy time of Latin literature. Horace, Ovid, Propertius, Tibullus, Virgil, etc., flourished in this reign.

Augustan Age of English Literature. Beginning in the reign of Elizabeth and ending in that of James I. For list of authors, see Historical Note-book, p. 59.

Augustan Age of China, France, Germany, Hindustan, Portugal, etc., see ditto.

Augustan History. A series of histories of the Roman Empire from 157 to 285, ascribed to the six following authors: Delius Spartianus, Julius Capitolinus, Aelius Lampridius, Valerius Gallicanus, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus.

Augustine (The Second). Thomas Aquinas, also called the Angelic Doctor, (1224-1274.)

Augustinians. Friars or nuns of the Augustine Order, established in the eleventh century in commemoration of St. Augustine, and in imitation of the ancient order founded by him in the fourth century.

Those who believe, on the authority of St. Augustine, in absolute predestination and effectual grace. That is, that predestination is quite independent of man, and that grace has no reference to preceding piety and moral conduct, but is vouchsafed by God’s own absolute will. Whom He would He did predestinate, and “whom He did predestinate, them He also called” (Romans viii. 30).

Augustus. No proper name, but a mere title given to Octavian, because he was head of the priesthood. In the reign of Diocletian the two emperors were each styled Augustus (sacred majesty), and the two viceroys Caesar. Prior to that time Hadrian limited the title of Caesar to the heir presumptive.

Augustus. Philippe II. of France; so called because he was born in the month of August. (1165, 1180-1223.)

Sigismund II. of Poland. (1520, 1548-1572.)

Aulay, in Indian mythology, is the horse with a huge trunk, on which Baly the giant rode.

“Aulay, a horse of monstrous size, possessing of immense strength...”

Auld Brig and New Brig. Of Robert Burns, refers to the bridge over the river Ayr, in Scotland.

Auld Hornie. After the establishment of Christianity, the heathen deities were degraded by the Church into fallen angels; and Pan, with his horns, crooked nose, goat’s beard, pointed ears, and goat’s feet, was transformed to his Satanic majesty, and called Old Horny.

“Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, all knoss.”

Auld Rookie. Edinburgh old town; so called because it generally appears to be capped by a cloud of “reck” or smoke.

Aulico Council. The council of the Kaiser in the old German Empire, from which there was no appeal (1495-1806) (Latin, unico, a court). The name is now given in Austria to a council of Vienna which manages the war department of the Austrian Empire.

Aunt Sally. A game in which a wooden head is mounted on a pole. The fun of the game is to knock the nose of the figure, or break the pipe stuck in its mouth. This is to be done by throwing at it, from a stated distance, a short club. The word aunt was anciently
Aureola

A circle of light, emblematical of glory, placed by the old painters round the heads of martyrs and saints. The notion was derived from Exod. xxv. 23. "Facies corvinae aurorulae" ("Thou shalt by thine own merits make for thyself a crown, besides that of gold which God has promised to the faithful") (Donne: Sermons). Strictly speaking, the glory confined to the head alone is a nimbus, and only when it envelops the entire body is it called an aureola.

Du Cange informs us that the aureola of nun's is white, of martyr red, and of doctors green.

Aurora. Early morning. According to Grecian mythology, the goddess Aurora, called by Homer "rosy-fingered," sets out before the sun, and is the pioneer of his rising.

"You cannot shut the windows of the sky, Through which Aurora shows her brightening face."

Aurora's tears. The morning dew.

Aurora Borealis. The Northern lights, a similar phenomenon to the "Aurora Boresalis." (Latin). The electrical lights occasionally seen in the northern part of the sky; also called Northern Lights, and "Merry Dancers." (See Dekwntewater.)

Aurora Baby. A rich, noble English orphan; left to the care of guardians; a Catholic in religion; and in person "A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded." Byron: Don Juan, xx 45.

Aurora Septentrionalis. Same as Aurora Australis (q.v.).

Austria. An ancient name of Italy; so called from Auson, son of Ulysses, and father of the Ausonia.

"All the green delights Ausonia pours." Thomson: Summer, 95a.

Austro. A wind pernicious to flowers and health. In Italy, one of the South winds was so called; its modern name is the Sirocco. (Greek; austros, hot, dry). In England it is a damp wind, generally bringing wet weather.

"Nought but purrid streams and noseome fogs, For ever hung on dusty Auster's beard," Thomson: Castle of Indolence, l. 76.

Austri Friars. Friars of the Order of St. Augustine. (See Begging.)

Austrian Lip. The thick underlip, characteristic of the house of Hapsburg. Derived from Cymburgis, daughter of Zemovitz, Duke of Masovia, and niece of the then King of Poland. Cymburgis was noted for her beauty and unusual strength.

"Aut Caesar aut nullo [Latin, Either Caesar or no one], everything or nothing; all or not at all. Caesar used to say, "he would sooner be first in a village than second at Rome," Milton makes Satan say, "Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heaven." Milton: Par. Lost, l. 1531. (See Stix.)

Authentic Doctor. Gregory of Rimini. (Fourteenth century.)

Auto da Fe. [In act of faith.] A day set apart by the Inquisition for the examination of "heretics." Those not acquitted were burnt. The reason why inquisitors burnt their victims was, because they are forbidden to "shed blood"; an axiom of the Roman Catholic Church being, "Veritas non uterum mouginum" (the church is untainted with blood).

Autolycus. The craftiest of thieves. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and changed their marks. Sisyphus outwitted him by marking his sheep under their feet, a device which so tickled the rogue that he instantly "cottoned" to him. Shakespeare introduces him in The Winter's Tale as a pedlar, and says he was called the son of Mercury, because he was born under that "thieving planet."

"Automata is no lapidary, though he drives a road trade in flash jewellery."—Paul Mall Gazette.

Automaton—plural, automatons or automata. Machines which imitate the actions, etc., of living creatures. The most famous are the following:—(1) The pigeon that could fly, made, n.c. 400, by Archytas, of Tarentum; (2) the wooden eagle of Regiomontanus, the German, which flew from the city of Konigsberg to meet the emperor, saluted him, and returned, 1436-1476; (3) the duck of Vaucanson of Grenoble, which could eat and drink, and even in a way digest food; its wings, viscera, bones, etc., minutely resembled those of a living animal. Vaucanson also made an image of Pan, which, at the beck of Syrinx, rose from his seat, played on his pipe, bowed when applauded, and sat down again. He also made an asp which, on being touched by an actress, in the character of Cleopatra, flew at her breast with a malignant hiss. Louis XV. set him to make a human figure, but he died before he had completed it. (Greek, autos-maJo, I self-move) (See ANDROID.)

Pierre Droz and his son Louis were noted for their automatons; so was Frederick of Knause (Vienna). The chess-player of Wolfgang, baron of Kempelen, in 1784, created quite a furor in Paris. Napoleon on one occasion played chess with this automaton. (See BRAZEN HEADS.)

Automedon. A coachman. He was the charioteer of Achilles.

Autumn. He is come to his autumn, i.e. to be hanged, to his "fall." A pun on the phrase of "turning man off" by dropping the plank on which he stands. The drop is the "leaf," and autumn is called the "fall," or "full of the leaf."

Ava, in Burmah, has marble quarries of which idols are made, and only priests are allowed to trade there. (Sykes, vol. ii. p. 376.)

"As on Ava's shore,
Where none but priests are privileged to trade
In that best marble of which gods are made."

T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, part I.

Avalanche (3 syl.) means properly something which goes downwards (French, écras). The word is applied to a mass of snow mixed with earth, ice, and stones, which slips down a mountain side to the lower ground. Metaphorically, we speak of an "avalanche of applause," an "avalanche of bouquets" showered on the stage, etc.

Avalon. An ocean island, where King Arthur resided and was buried. The word means "Apple island" (avait, apple; yeit, island); and it is generally thought to mean Glastonbury, a name derived from the Saxon glasain (green like glass).

Avant Courier. (French, avant couvrir.) A "messenger sent before" to get things ready for a party of travellers, or to announce their approach. Anything said or done to prepare the way for something more important to follow; a feeler, a harbinger.

Avant Garde. (French.) The van or advanced guard of an army.

Avatar. The advent to earth of a deity in a visible form. The ten avatara of Vishnu, in Hindu mythology, are by far the most celebrated. 1st advent, in the form of a fish; 2nd, in that of a tortoise; 3rd, of a hog; 4th, of a monster, half man and half lion, to destroy the giant Iravan; 5th, in the form of a dwarf (this Avatar is called Varuna); 6th, in human form, under the name of Rama; 7th, under the same figure and name, to slay the thousand-armed giant Cartasuciargaman; 8th, as a child named Krishna, who performed numerous miracles (this is the most memorable of all the advents); 9th, under the form of Buddha. These are all past. The 10th advent will be in the form of a white horse (Kalki) with wings, to destroy the earth.

"In Vishnu land what a name?
Or who in Moscow, towards the other?"

Ave Maria [Hail, Mary!] (1sr, 2 syl.). The first two words of the angel’s salutation to the Virgin Mary. (Luke 1. 28.) In the Roman Catholic Church the phrase is applied to an invocation to the Virgin beginning with those words; and also to the smaller beads of a rosary, the larger ones being termed pater-nosters.

Avenel (2 syl.). White Lady of Avenel. A tutelary spirit in Scott’s Monastery.

Avenger of Blood (The). The man who, in the Jewish polity, had the right of taking vengeance on him who had slain one of his kinsmen. The Avenger in Hebrew is called goel.

"Give of these were appointed for the protection of kin-folks, and of those who had caused another’s death by accident. The Korni sanctions the Jewish avenger. Family feuds have been a common burning ground of poets and novelists."

Avernus (Greek, a-ornis, "without a bird"). A lake in Campaunia, so called from the belief that its sulphurous and mephitic vapours killed any bird that happened to inhale them. Poets call it the entrance to the infernal regions; hence the proverb, The descent to Avernus is easy, but coming back again is quite another matter, meaning that all bad habits are easily acquired, but very hard to be abandoned.

Avertin (S.) The patron saint of lunatics; so called from the French avertir (lunatics).

Avesta. The sacred Scriptures of the Magians, composed by Zarooran. Better known as the Zend-Avesta or "living word in the Zend language."

Avey'gle. Son of Erebus and Nox. (Spenser: Faerie Queene.)

Avi'enna. A writer of fables in the decline of the Roman empire. In the Middle Ages, a collection of fables used to be called Avyacen, or Esoget.

A vinculo matrimonii (Latin). Divorced from marriage ties. A total divorce. A divorce a mensa et thoro is a partial divorce. The divorce a vinculo matrimonii is because the marriage was never legal, as in the case of bigamy, or marriage within the prohibited degrees; but a divorce a mensa et thoro is because the parties cannot live together from incompatibility of temper, in which case they may, if they choose, come together again.

Aviz. An order of knighthood in Portugal, founded by Sancho I., and having for its object the subjugation of the Moors.

Avoid Etrrromes. The wise saw of Pittacos of Mitylene. (b.c. 652-569.)

Avoir. Avoir Martel en tête (French). To be distracted. Martel is a hammer, hence distraction, torment, torture.

Avoirdupois. French, avoir, pier or pier, goods in general, and punce—pounds (weight). Not the verb, but the noun avoir. Properly avoir des poids (goods having weight), goods sold by weight. We have the word aver, meaning goods in general, hence also cattle; whence such compounds as aver-corn, aver-penny, a ver-silver, aver-land, and so on. We have also the noun "having, having" = possessions.

There is a common French phrase avoir du poids (to be weight), with which our word avaricious has been juggled up.

"Fared my present havings [prospects] to bestow my bounty upon you." Shakespeare: Henry VIII., iii. 2.

"One of your having, and yet court and care." "Moses" Looking Glass, Even medicines, as wholesale goods, are bought and sold by avoirdupois weight.

A-weather. The reverse of a-lee. "A-weather" is towards the weather, or the side on which the wind strikes. "A-lee" is in the lee or shelter, and therefore opposite to the wind side; as helm a-weather.

Awkward. French, gauche, not dexterous. Awk means the left hand. Hence in Holland's Plutarch we have "The awk or left hand"; and again, "They receive her awkwardly when she presented . . . the right hand." (See Simret.)

Awkward Squad. In military language means recruits not yet fitted to take their place in the regimental line.

A squad is a troop or company of soldiers under a sergeant. It is a contraction of squadron. A squadron of cavalry is the unit of a regiment. Three or four squadrons make a regiment, and a certain number of regiments constitute an army. In naval affairs a squadron is a section of a fleet.

Awi. "I'll pack up my ax and be gone," i.e. all my goods. The play is on awl and all.

Axe. "To hang up one's axe." To retire from business, to give over a useless project. The allusion is to the ancient battle-axe, hung up to the gods when the fight was done. All classical scholars will call to mind the allusion of Horace to a similar Roman custom. Being snubbed by Pyrrha, ho says, "He will hang up his axe upon her wall,* or more literally, his "drenched garments on the temple-walls of Neptune." (1 Odes, V. 14-17.) (See Ask.)

To put the axe on the helve. To solve a difficulty. To hit the right nail on the head.

To send the axe after the helve. To spend good money after bad, or under the hope of recovering bad debts.

He has an axe to grind. Some selfish motive in the background; some personal interest to answer. Franklin tells of a man who wanted to grind his axe, but had no one to turn the grindstone. Going to the yard where he saw young Franklin, he asked the boy to show him how the machine worked, and kept praising him till his axe was ground, and then laughed at him for his pains.

Axinomancy. Divination by an axe; much practised by the ancient Greeks with a view of discovering crime. An agate was placed on a red-hot axe, and indicated the guilty person by its motion. (Greek, azýnë manṭeia.)

Ayah (Anglo-Indian). A native Hindu nurse or lady's maid.

"The ayesa, or nurses, are said to be the best in the world."—B. Fyler: Visit to India, chap. ii. p. 37.

Aye'shah (3 syl.). Muhammad's second and favourite wife. He married her when she was only nine years old, and died in her arms.

Ayrshire Poet. Robert Burns, born near the town of Ayr. (1759-1796.)

Azar's. The scape-goat: so called by the Jews, because the high priest cast lots on two goats; one lot was for the Lord, and the other lot for Azazel or Satan, and the goat on which the latter lot fell was the scape-goat.

Azazel. A seraph who fell in love with A'rah, a granddaughter of Cain. When the flood came, he carried her under his wing to some other planet. (Byron: Heaven and Earth.)

Azaril. In Milton's Paradise Lost, Azasii is the standard-bearer of the infernal host. According to the Koran, when God commanded the angels to worship Adam, Azazel replied, "Why should the son of fire fall down before a son of clay?" and God cast him out of heaven. His name was then changed to Edcis, which means "despair."

"Then straight commands that at the wall the sound
Of trumpets loud, and clarions, he upewed
His mighty standard; that proud honour Claimed
Azazel, as his right, a cherub tall."—Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 341-4.

Azim. The young convert who joined "the creed and standard" of the veiled prophet of Khorassan, in Moore's Lalla Rookh. When he was witness of the prophet's infamy, he joined the caliph's army, and was mainly instrumental in defeating that of the veiled prophet.

Azo, Marquis of Estè, married Parisina, who fell in love with Hugo, a natural son of Azo. The marquis ordered Hugo to be beheaded: but no one knows what the fate of Parisina was. Azo, at any rate, married again, and had a family. This Azo was in reality Niccolo of Ferra. (Byron: Parisina.)

Azor's Mirror. Zemira is the name of the lady, and Azor that of the bear, in Marmontel's Tale of Beauty and the Beast. Zemira entreats the kind monster to let her see her father, if only for a few moments; so drawing aside a curtain, he shows her to her in a magic mirror. This mirror was a sort of telescope, which rendered objects otherwise too far off distinctly visible.

Azoth. The panacea of Paracelsus, regarded by his followers as "the tincture of life."

Azrael (3 syl.). The angel that watches over the dying, and takes the soul from the body. The angel of death. He will be the last to die, but will do so at the second trump of the archangel.

"The Mohammedan doctors say that Azrael was commissioned to inflict the penalty of death on all mankind."—H. Christmas.

The wings of Azrael. The approach of death; the signs of death coming on the dying.

"Those who listen in the ... watches of the night for the wings of Azrael."—Descant.

Azrail. The archangel commissioned to blow the trumpet of the resurrection. (The Koran.)

Aztocs. An indigenous people of Mexico who, in 1325, founded Tenochtitlan. They were in the zenith of their power in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. When the Spaniards arrived, their king was Montezuma; their supreme god was Tatoi; and Huiztilopochtli was the divine protector of their nation, to whom they offered human victims.

Azucena. An old gipsy who stole Manrico's, infant son of Garzia, the Conte di Luna's brother. (Verdi: Il Trovatore.)

Azure. Sky blue. Represented in royal arms by the planet Jupiter, in noblemen's by the sapphire. The ground of the old shield of France was azure. Emblem of fidelity and truth. Represented in heraldic devices by horizontal lines.

Azuriel. The fairy who owned what we call Holland Park. King O'beron gave him his daughter Kenna in marriage when he drove Albion from his empire. Albion invaded Kensington, the territory of King Oberon, but was slain in battle by Azuriel. (Tickell.)

Azymites (3 syl.). The Roman Catholics are so called by the Greek Church, because the holy wafers used by them in the eucharist are made of unleavened bread. (Greek, azýmos, unleavened.)
B

B. This letter is the outline of a house. It is called in Hebrew beth (a house). In Egyptian hieroglyphics this letter is a sheep.

B stands for 300. See B. trecentum sibi coagulum retinère. And, again, Et B. trecentum per se retinere videtur. But with a line above, it denotes 3,000.

For Becca and Bonal (French for B sharp and B flat), see BCHRSE.

Marked with a B (French), i.e. a poor thing. In the French language almost all personal defects begin with the letter B; e.g. bille (squint-eyed), borgne (one-eyed), sous (humpy), boîtes (lame), etc.

Not to know B from a battle-door. To be quite illiterate, not to know even his letters. Miegel tells us that hornbooks used to be called battle-doors. The phrase might therefore originally mean not to know the B, of, from, or out of, your hornbook. But its more general meaning is "not able to distinguish one letter from another."

"He knoweth not a B from a battle-door."—Towell: English Proverbs.

"Distinguish B from a battle-bole."—Dicker: Old Hornbook.

I know B, from a Bull’s foot. Similar to the proverb, "I know a hawk from a barn-shaw." (See Hawk.) The bull’s parted hoof somewhat resembles a B.

There were members who scarcely knew B from a bull’s foot.—Drumburgh: Modern Charity.

B. C. Marked with B. C. (bad character). When a soldier disgraced himself by insubordination he was formerly marked with "B. C." before he was drummed out of the regiment.

B. and S. Brandy and soda-water.

B. K. S. The name of "residence" given by officers in mutiny, who do not wish to give up their address. The word stands for Barrack’s.

B. Plata. Bugs. The pun is "B" (the initial letter), and "flat," from the flatness of the obnoxious insect. Also called Norfolk Howards, from Mr. Bugg, who advertised in the Times that he should in future change his name into "Norfolk Howard." (See F. Sharp.)

B.’s. Four B.’s essential for social success. Blood, brains, brass, braids (money). (American.) Beware of the B.’s, i.e. the British. A Carlow caution.

B. of B. Some mysterious initials applied to himself in his diary by Arthur Orton, "the Tichborne Claimant." Supposed to denote "Baronet of British Kingdom."

Baal-Peor or Belkhebror. The Trium- pus of the Moabites and Midianites.

Baal Samim. The god of celestial places.

Baal Shemesh. The Sun-god.

Baal Zeboub [Beelzebub], god of corruption or of flies. (See Flies.)

Baba. Same as yuva (Turkish). Aliba is "father Ali."

Babau. The bogie with which nurses in Languedoc terrify unruly children.

Babes in the Wood. (1) Simple trustful folks, never suspicious, and easily gullied.

(2) Insurrectionary hordes that infested the mountains of Wicklow and the woods of Enniscorthy towards the close of the eighteenth century. (See CHILDREN.)

(3) Men in the stocks or in the pillory.

Babes (Brittis of) in Rome. VATICAN, or, more correctly, VATICAN-US (q.v.), the god who caused infants to utter their first cry. FABIULUS-US (q.v.), the god to whom Roman parents made an offering when an infant uttered its first word. CUBA (q.v.), the goddess who kept infants quiet in their cots. DOMIDUCA, the goddess who brought young children safe home, and kept guard over them when out of their parents’ sight.

Babies in the Eyes. That is, love in the expression of the eye. Love is the little brother of Cupid, and hence the conceit, originating from the reflection of the onlooker in the pupil of another’s eyes.

"In each of her two crystal eyes Smith a naked boy [Cupid]."

She clung about his neck, gave him ten kisses, Took with his beaks, looked babies in his eyes."

Heywood: Love’s Mistress.

Babel. A perfect Babel. A thorough confusion. "A Babel of sounds." A confused uproar, in which nothing can be heard but hubbub. The allusion is to the confusion of tongues at Babel. (Genesis xi.)

"God... come down to see their city,
And in divers sets
From their tongues a various spirit, to rage
Quite out their native language, and instead
To sow a jangling noise of words unknown.
For with a hideous gabble rouse loud
Among the babblers each to other calls
Not understood... Thus was the building left Ridiculous, and the work Confusion named."

Bible, Paradise Lost, xii. 62-71.
Babouc. (See Bacbac.)

Babouin. Taisz-vous, petite babouin; laissez passer votre mère, qui est plus sage que vous. The tale or fable is this: A girl one day went to make an offering to Venus, and prayed the goddess to give her for husband a young man on whom she had fixed her affections. A young fellow happened at the time to be behind the image of Cupid, and hearing the petition, replied, "So fine a gentleman is not for such as you." The voice seemed to proceed from the image, and the girl replied, "Hold your tongue, you little monkey; let your mother speak, for she is wiser than you."

Baby Charles. So James I. used to call his son Charles, afterwards Charles I.

Babylon. The modern Babylon. So London is sometimes called, on account of its wealth, luxury, and dissipation.

Babylonian Numbers. Ne Babylonios tentarum numeros. Do not pry into futurity by astrological calculations and horoscopes. Do not consult fortune-tellers. The Chaldeans were the most noted of astrologers. (Horace: Odes, book i. xi. 2.)

Babylonian Captivity. The seventy years that the Jews were captives in Babylon. They were made captives by Nebuchadnezzar, and released by Cyrus (B.C. 538).

Babylonian Garment. (A.) Babylonica vestis, a garment woven with divers colours. (Pliny, viii. 74.)

"I saw among the spoils a gaudy Babylonian garment."—Joshua vi. 21.

Baca. The Valley of Baca, also called the Valley of Tears, translated in the New Version "the Valley of Weeping," apparently a dry sterile valley, the type of this earth spoiled by sorrow and sin. "Blessed is the man . . . in whose heart are the ways of them. Who passing through the valley of Baca, make it a wall . . ." (Psalm lixiv. 6). That man is blessed whose trust in God converts adverse circumstances into proofs of divine love. "Whom He loveth He chasteneth." They: "go from strength to strength."

In the mountains of Lebanon is a valley called Baca, but it is described as fertile and very delicious. The Valley of Lebanon (Joshua xi. 17) is encompassed by mountains, one of which is very barren, and abounds in thorns, rocks, and flints but another is called a terrestrial paradise. Baca means "mulberry trees," but Bekah means a "plain." Perowne says Beca is from a Hebrew root which means "weeping."

"Our sources of common pleasure dry up as we journey on through the vale of Baca."—Walter Scott: The Antiquary.

Bacbac. The Holy Bottle, and also the priestess of the Holy Bottle, the oracle of Lantern-land consulted by Panurge on the momentous question whether or not he ought to marry. The Holy Bottle answered with a click like the noise made by a glass snapping. Bacbac told Panurge the noise meant true (drink), and that was the response, the most direct and positive ever given by the oracle. Panurge might interpret it as he liked, the obscurity would always save the oracle.

So Pic or thuck (say 1) or neither, Or both, for ought I care, on either; None understood but Bacbac, Here's heads for Pic, and tails for thuck.
E. C. B.

Bacchanalia. Festivals in honour of Bacchus, distinguished for their licentiousness and debauchery. Plato says he has seen the whole population of Athens drunk at these festivals.

Bacchanalian. Drunken, rollicksome, devoted or pertaining to Bacchus (q.v.).

Bacchant. A person given to habits of drinking; so called from the "bacchants," or men admitted to the feasts of Bacchus. Bacchants wore fillets of ivy.

Bacchante (2 syl.). A female wine-hibber; so called from the "bacchantes," or female priestesses of Bacchus. They wore fillets of ivy.

Bacchis. A sacred bull which changed its colour every hour of the day. (Egyptian mythology.)

Bacchus [be'chus]. In Roman mythology the god of wine. He is represented as a beautiful youth with black eyes, golden locks, flowing with curls about his shoulders and filleted with ivy. In peace his robe was purple, in war he was covered with a panther's skin. His chariot was drawn by panthers.

The famous statue of Bacchus in the palace of Borghese (3 syl.), is represented with a bunch of grapes in his hand and a panther at his feet. Pliny tells us that, after his conquest of India, Bacchus entered Thebes in a chariot drawn by elephants.

"The Etruscan Bacchus was called Esar or Nesar; the Umbrian Desar; the Bacchus

Asjarian Issus; the Greek Dionysus; the Galatian Nyus; the Hebrew Nissis; a Greek form was Bacchus (from Baché, a shout); the Latin Bacchus: other forms of the word are the Norse Eis; the Indian Ies; the Persian Iz; the Gaulish Hos; the German Hist; and the Chinese Jos.

"As jolly Bacchus, god of pleasure, Charmed the wide world with drink and dances, And all his thousand airy fancies, Also his quaff, the white His favourite wines in Lesbos' isle." Parnell.

Bacchus, in the Lusied, is the evil demon or antagonist of Jupiter, the lord of destiny. As Mars is the guardian power of Christianity, Bacchus is the guardian power of Mohammedanism.

Bacchus sprang from the thigh of Zeus. The tale is that Semelé asked Zeus to stand between her legs in his glory, but the foolish request proved her death. Zeus saved the child which was prematurely born by sewing it up in his thigh till it came to maturity. The Arabian tradition is that the infant Bacchus was nourished during infancy in a cave of Mount Meros. As "Meros" is Greek for a thigh, the Greek fable is readily explained.

What has that to do with Bacchus? i.e., what has that to do with the matter in hand? When Thespis introduced recitations in the vintage songs, the innovation was suffered to pass, so long as the subject of recitation bore on the exploits of Bacchus; but when, for variety sake, he wandered to other subjects, the Greeks pulled him up with the exclamation, "What has that to do with Bacchus?" (See Hecuba, Mouton.)

Bacchus a nuyj plus d'hommes que Neptune. The alcho-wrecks more men than the ocean.

A priest of Bacchus. A toper.

"The jolly old priests of Bacchus in the parlour make their licentious oaths." J. S. Le Faux: The House in the Cherrywood, p. 125.

A son of Bacchus. A toper.

Bacchus. The travelling cripple of Ireland. Generally, a talkative, facetious fellow, prompt at repartee, and not unlike the ancient jester.

Bachelors. A man who has not been married. Probably from bacelaria, a man employed on a grazing-farm; (Low Latin, baccarum, for vacca, a cow). French, bachelor, bachetelle (a damsel). A Bachelor of Arts. The student who has passed his examination, but is not yet of standing to be a master. Formerly the bachelor was the candidate for examination. The word used to be spelt bachiller; thus in the Proceedings of the Privy Council, vol. 1, p. 72, we read:—"The king ordered that the bachelors should have reasonable pay for their trouble."

Bachelor of Salamanca (The). Don Cherubim. He is placed in different situations of life, and is made to associate with all classes of society. (Le Sage: The Bachelor of Salamanca (a novel).)

Bachelor's Buttons. Several flowers are so called. Red Bachelor's Buttons, the double red campion; yellow Bachelor's Buttons, the "upright crownfoot"; white Bachelor's Buttons, the white ranunculus and white campion.

"The similitude these flowers have to the jagged cloath buttons anciently worn... gave occasion...to call them Bachelor's Buttons."—Verard: Histor.

Or else from a custom still sometimes observed by rustics of carrying the flower in their pockets to know how they stand with their sweethearts. If the flower dies, it is a bad omen; but if it does not fade, they may hope for the best.

To wear bachelor's buttons. To remain a bachelor. (See above.)

Bachelor's Fare. Bread and cheese and kisses.

Bachelor's Porch. The north door used to be so called. The maidservants and other poor men used to sit on benches down the north aisle, and the maidservants, with other poor women, on the south side. Even when married the custom was not discontinued. After service the men formed one line and the women another, down which the clergy and gentry passed amidst salutations, and the two lines filed off. In some country churches these arrangements are still observed.

Bachelor's Wife (1). A hypothetical wife. A bachelor has only an imaginary wife.

"Bachelors' wives and old maids' children be well taught."—Heywood: Proverbs.

Back (To). To support with money, influence, or encouragement: as to "back a friend." A commercial term meaning to endorse. When a merchant backs or endorses a bill, he guarantees its value.

Fulstaff says to the Prince:—

"You care not who sees your back. Call you that backing of your friends? A plague upon such backing!"—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

"Englishmen will fight now as well as ever they did and there is ample power to back them."
—W. Robertson: John Bright, chap. xxxi., p. 298.

Back and Edge. Entirely, heartily, tooth and nail, with might and main. The reference is to a wedge driven home to split wood.

"They were working back and edge for me."—Boldrewood: Robbery under Arms, ch ii.

To back and fill. A mode of tacking, when the tide is with the vessel and the wind against it. Metaphorically, to be irresolute.

To back out. To draw back from an engagement, bargain, etc., because it does not seem so plausible as you once thought it. Many horses are unwilling to go out of a stable head foremost, and are backed out.

"Octavius backs out; his caution and reserve come to her rescue."—O. Clarke: Shakespeare.

To back the field. To bet on all the horses bar one. A sporting term used in betting.

To back the sails. So to arrange them that the ship's way may be checked.

To back up. To uphold, to support. As one who stands at your back to support you.

At the back of. Behind, following close after. Figure from following a leader.

"With half the city at his back"
Byron: Don Juan.

To see his back; to see the back of anything. To get rid of a person or thing: to see it leave.

Back the ears or back water is to row backwards, that the boat may move the reverse of its ordinary direction.

On the back of. Immediately after. Figure from soldiers on the march.

To the back, that is, to the backbone, entirely.

To break the back of a thing. To surmount the hardest part.

His back is up. He is angry, he shows that he is annoyed. The allusion is to a cat, which sets its back up when attacked by a dog or other animal.

To get one's back up. To be irritated (See above).

To have his back at the wall. To act on the defensive against odds. One beset with foes tries to get his back against a wall that he may not be attacked by foes behind.

"He planted his back against a wall, in a skilful use of the defence, ready with his bright muskets to do battle with all the heavy forces unarmed men, some six or seven in number."—Mrs. Gaskell: The Poor Clare, iii.

To set one's back up. (See above.)

"That word set my back up."
Dame Huddie's Letter (1710).

To turn one's back on another. To leave, forsake, or neglect him. To leave one by going away.

"As length we... turn our backs on the outskirts of civilization."—Pound: A Song, i. 18.

Behind my back. When I was not present. When my back was turned.

Laid on one's back. Laid up with chronic ill-health; helpless. Figure from persons extremely ill.

Backbite (To). To slander behind one's back.

"The only thing in which all parties agreed was to backbite the manager."—W. Irving: Traveller, Backbom, p. 163.

Backbone (The). The mainstay.

"Sober, practical men... constitute the moral backbone of the country."—W. Jeoff: In Darkest England (Part 1, p. 17).

To the backbone. Thoroughly, as true to the backbone.

"A lion man, and a nationalist to the backbone."—T. Roosevelt: T. B. Bentin, chap. i., p. 111.

Backgammon is the Anglo-Saxon bar games (back game); so called because the pieces (in certain circumstances) are taken up and obliged to go back to enter at the table again.

Background. Placed in the background, i.e. made of no consequence. Pictures have three distances, called grounds: the foreground, where the artist is supposed to be; the middle ground, where the most salient part of the picture is placed; and the background or distance, beyond which the eye cannot penetrate.

Back-hander. A blow on the face with the back of the hand. Also one who takes back the decanter in order to hand himself another glass before the decanter is passed on.

"I'll take a back-hander as Cato don't seem to drink."—Thackeray: The Newcomes.

Back-speer (To). To cross-examine.

(Scotch.)

"He has the wit to lay the scene in such a remote... country that nobody should be able to back-speer him."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (Introduction).

Back-stair Influence. Private or unrecognized influence. It was customary to build royal palaces with a staircase for state visitors, and another for those who sought the sovereign upon private matters. If any one wanted a private interview with royalty, it was highly desirable to conciliate those Backwardation (Stockbrokers' term). The sum paid by a speculator on a "bear account" (i.e. a speculation on a fall in the price of certain stock), in order to postpone the completion of the transaction till the next settling day. (See Contango.)

Backward Blessing (Muttering a). Muttering a curse. To say the Lord's Prayer backwards was to invoke the devil.

Backwater. (1) Water at the lower end of a millrace to check the speed of the wheel. (2) A current of water from the inland, which clears off the deposit of sand and silt left by the action of the sea; as the Backwater of Weymouth.

Bacon. The Bacon of Theology. Bishop Butler, author of the Analogy. (1692-1752.)

Bacon's brazen head. (See Brazen.) To blast your bacon. To strike or scourge one. The Saxons were called "hogs" by their Norman lords. Henry VIII. spoke of the common people as the "swinish multitude"; and Falstaff says to the travellers at Gadshill, "Oh, bacons, on!" (1 Henry IV., ii. 2). Bacon is the outside portion of the sides of pork, and may be considered generally as the part which would receive a blow.

To save one's bacon. To save oneself from injury.

"But as he rose to save his bacon,
By hat and wig he was forsaken."
Comm.: Dr. Johnson, Rambler xiii, line 280.

There seems to be another sense in which the term is used — viz. to escape loss; and in this sense the allusion is to the care taken by our forefathers to save from the numerous dogs that frequented their houses the bacon which was laid up for winter store, the loss of which would have been a very serious calamity.

A chow-bacon. A rustic. Till comparatively modern times the only meat which rustics had to eat was bacon. I myself know several farm labourers who never taste any meat but bacon, except on club and feast days.

He may fetch a fitch of bacon from Dunmow, i.e. he is so amiable and good-tempered he will never quarrel with his wife. The allusion is to a custom founded by Juga, a noble lady, in 1111, and restored by Robert de Fitzwalter in 1244; which was, that "any person from any part of England going to Dunmow, in Essex, and humbly kneeling on two stones at the church door, may claim a gammon of bacon, if he can swear that for twelve months and a day he has never had a household brawl or wished himself unmarried."

Baconian Philosophy. A system of philosophy based on principles laid down by Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, in the 2nd book of his Novum Organum. It is also called inductive philosophy.

Baconian Theory. The theory that Lord Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare.

Bactrian Sage. Zoroaster, a native of Bactria (Balkh), about 500 years before the birth of Christ.

Bad. Charles le mauvais. Charles II. of Navarre (1332-1387). He is gone to the bad. Has become a ruined man, or a depraved character. He has gone amongst bad people, in bad ways, or to bad circumstances.

To the bad. On the wrong side of the account; in arrears.

Bad Blood. Vindiciveness, ill-feeling.

"If there is any bad blood in the fellow he will be sure to show it."—Brother Jonathan.

To make bad blood, to stir up bad blood. To create or renew ill-feeling and a vindictive spirit.

Bad Books. You are in my bad books. Under disgrace. Also In my black books. (See under Black Books.)

Bad Debts. Debts not likely to be paid.

Bad Form, not comme il faut. Not in good taste.

Bad Lot (A). A person of bad moral character, or one commercially unsound. Also a commercial project or stock of worthless value. The allusion is to auctioneering slang, meaning a lot which no one will bid for. So an inefficient soldier is called one of the Queen's bad bargains.

Bad Shot (A). A wrong guess. A sporting phrase: a bad shot is one which does not bring down the bird shot at, one that misses the mark.

Badaud. A booby. C'est un fum badaud. He is a regular booby. Le Bagaud de Paris, a French cockney. From the Italian, badare, to gaze in the air, to stare about one.

Badge of Poverty. In former times those who received parish relief had to wear a badge. It was the letter P, with the initial of the parish to which they belonged, in red or blue cloth, on the shoulder of the right sleeve. (See Drovua.)

Badge-men. Alma-house men; so called because they wear some special dress, or other badge, to indicate that they belong to a particular foundation.

"He quite the gay and rich, the young and free, Among the badge-men with a badge to be." Crabbe: Borough.

Badger (A). A licensed huckster, who was obliged to wear a badge. By 5 Eliz., c. 12, it was enacted that "Badgers were to be licensed annually, under a penalty of £5;"

"Under Dec. 17, 1665, we read of 'Certain persons upon Humber side which . . . by great quantities of corn, two of whom were authorised badgers.'"—State Papers (Domestic Series).

Badger (To). To cease or annoy by superior numbers. In allusion to the ancient custom of badger-baiting. A badger was kennelled in a tub, where dogs were set upon him to worry him out. When dragged from his tub the poor beast was allowed to retire to it till he recovered from the attack. This process was repeated several times.

"Badger. It is a vulgar error that the legs of a badger are shorter on one side than on the other."

"I think that Titus Gates was an uncer as a badger."—Lord Macaulay.

Drawing a badger is drawing him out of his tub by means of dogs.

Badinage. Playful raillery, banter (French), from the verb badiner, to joke or jest. The noun badine means a switch, and in France they catch wild ducks by covering a boat with switchers, in which the ducks seek protection. A person quizzed is like these wild ducks.

Badinage. A nickname given to Napoleon III. It was the name of the workman whose clothes he wore when he contrived to escape from the fort of Ham, in 1846.

"If Badinage and Bismarck have a row together let them settle it between them with their fists, instead of troubling hundreds of thousands of men who . . . have no wish to fight."—Zola: The Dreyfus ch. ii. (1905).

Badinageux. The party of the Emperor Napoleon III. The party of the Emperors were called "Montjoyeux" and "Montjocrisses," from Montijo in Spain. She was the second daughter of the Count of Montijo.

Badminton is properly a "copus cup," made of claret spiced and sweetened, a favourite with the Duke of Beaufort of Badminton. As the duke used to be a great patron of the prize ring, Badminton was used as equivalent to claret as the synonym of blood.

Also a game similar to lawn tennis, only played with shuttlecocks instead of balls.

Baffo. To ease the cogniscance of a recouer knight. To degrade a knight from his rank. To be knocked about by the winds.

Bag. Bag and Baggage, as "Got away with you, bag and baggage," i.e., get away, and carry with you all your belongings. The bag or sack is the pouch in which a soldier packs his few articles when he moves from place to place. Baggage is a contemptuous term for a woman, either because soldiers send their wives in the baggage wagons, or from the Italian bagagia (a harlot), French bagasse, Spanish bagaza, Persian, baga.

"Bag and baggage policy. In 1876 Mr. Gladstone, speaking on the Eastern question, said, 'Let the Turks now carry away their abuses in the only possible manner, namely, by carrying away themselves . . . One and all, bag and baggage, shall, I hope, clear out from the province they have desolated and profaned.' This was termed by the Conservatives the bag and baggage policy.

"A bag of bones. Very emaciated; generally "A mere bag of bones."

"A bag of game. A large battue, from the custom of carrying game home in "bags."

"A bag of tricks or A whole bag of tricks. Numerous expedients. In allusion to the fable of the Fox and the Cat. The fox was commiserating the cat because she had only one shift in the case of danger, while he had a thousand tricks to evade it. Being set upon by a pack of hounds, the fox was soon caught, while puss ran up a tree and was quite secure.

"A good bag. A large catch of game, fish, or other animals sought after by sportmen.

"Got the bag. Got his dismissal. (See Sack.)"

"The bottom of the bag. The last expedient, having emptied every other one out of his bag.

To empty the bag. To tell the whole matter and conceal nothing. (French, vider le sac, to expose all to view.)

To let the cat out of the bag. (See under CAT.)

Bag (76). To steal, or slip into one's bag, as a poacher or pilferer who slyly slips into his bag what he has contrived to purloin.

Bags. A slang word for trousers, which are the bags of the body. When the pattern was very staring and "loud," they once were called howling-bags.

Bag-man (A). A commercial traveller, who carries a bag with specimens to show to those whose custom he solicits. In former times commercial travellers used to ride a horse with saddle-bags sometimes so large as almost to conceal the rider.

Bag o' Nails. Some hundreds of years ago there stood in the Tyburn Road, Oxford Street, a public-house called The Bacchanals; the sign was Pan and the Satyrs. The jolly god, with his cloven hoof and his horns, was called "The devil;" and the word Bacchanals soon got corrupted into "Bag o' Nails." The Devil and the Bag o' Nails is a sign not uncommon even now in the midland counties.

Baga de Secrétis. Records in the Record Office of trials for high treason and other State offences from the reign of Edward IV, to the close of the reign of George III. These records contain the proceedings in the trials of Anne Boleyn, Sir Walter Raleigh, Guy Fawkes, the regicides, and of the risings of 1715 and 1745. (Baga = Bag.)

Bagatelle (A). A trifle; a thing of no consideration. "Oh! nothing. A mere bagatelle." In French, "Il dépendse tout son argent en bagatelles" means, he squanders his money on trash. "Il ne s'amuse qu'à des bagatelles," he finds no pleasure except in frivolities. Bagatelle! as an exclamation, means Nonsense! as "Vous dites qu'il me fera un procès. Bagatelle!" (fiddlesticks!)

"He considered his wife a bagatelle, to be shut up at pleasure."—The Depraved Husband.

Baguette d'Armide (Le). The sorcerer's wand. Armida is a sorceress in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. Baguette is a rod or wand.

Bahagnia. Bohemia; Bahaignons, Bohemians. (1330.)

Bahr Geist (A). A banshee or grey-spectre.

"Know then (said Eveline) it [the Bahr Geist] is a spectre, usually the image of the departed person, who, either for wrong suffered, sustained during life, or through treasure hidden, haunts the spot from time to time, becomes familiar to those who dwell there, and takes an interest in their fate."—Sir W. Scott: The Borderer, chap. 13.

Bail (French, bailier). To deliver up.

Common bail or bail below. A bail given to the sheriff, after arresting a person, to guarantee that the defendant will appear in court at any day and time the court demands.

Special bail or bail above, consists of persons who undertake to satisfy all claims made on the defendant, and to guarantee his rendering himself up to justice when required.

Bail. (See LEG-BAIL.)

To bail up. To disarm before robbing, to force to throw up the arms. (Australi-an.)

Bailiff. At Constantinople, the person who had charge of the imperial children used to be called the bajifins, from bais, a child. The word was subsequently attached to the Venetian consul at Constantinople, and the Venetian ambassador was called the bailo, a word afterwards extended to any superintend-ent or magistrate. In France the bailiff was a superintendent of the royal domains and commander of the troops. In time, any superintendent of even a private estate was so called, whence our farmer's bailiff. The sheriff is the king's bailiff—a title now applied almost exclusively to his deputies or officers. (See BUMBAILIFF.)

Bailleur. Un bon bailleur en fait bailier deuz (French). Yawning is catching.

Bailiff (Harry). Mine host in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. When the poet began the second "Fit" of the Bain Marie. A saucepan containing hot water into which a smaller saucepan is plunged, either to keep it hot, or that it may boil without burning. A glue pot is a good example. Mons. Bouillet says, "Ainsi appelé du nom de l'inventeur" (Balneum Maris). But derivations from proper names require authentication.

Bilram (3 syl.). The name given to two movable Moslem feasts. The first, which begins on the first day of the moon which follows that of Ramadan, and lasts three days, is a kind of Paschal feast. The second, seventy days later, lasts four days, and is not unlike the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles.

"As the Mohammedan year is a lunar one, in 33 years these feasts will have occurred at all the four seasons.

Baisser. Il semble qu'il n'y a qu'à se baisser et en prendre (French). One would think he has only to pick up and choose. Said of a person who fancies that fortune will fall into his lap, without his stirring. Literally, "to stoop down and pick up what he wants."

Bait. Food to entice or allure, as bait for fish. Bait for travellers is a "feed" by way of refreshment taken en passant. (Anglo-Saxon, betan, to bait or feed.)

Bajaderes. Indian dancing girls. A corruption of the Portuguese baladeira, whence bataderca, bajaderc.

Bajulus. A pedagogue. A Grand Bajulus, a "big" pedagogue. In the Greek court, the preceptor of the Emperor was called the Grand Bajulus. Originally porter. (Cf. Bailiff.)

Bajura. Mahomet's standard.

Baked. Half-baked. Imbecile, of weak mind. The metaphor from half-baked food.

Baked Meat means meat-pie. "The funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage table" (Hamlet); i.e., the hot meat-pies (vainson pasties) at the funeral and not eaten, were served cold at the marriage banquet.

Baker (The). Louis XVI. was called "the Baker," the queen was called "the baker's wife" (or La Boulangère), and the dauphin the "shop boy," because a heavy trade in corn was carried on at Versailles, and consequently very little was brought to Paris.

The return of the baker, his wife, and the shop-boy to Paris [after the king was brought from Versailles] had not had the expected effect. Flour and bread were still scarce. — A. Dunbar: The Countess de Charly, chap. ix.

Baker's Dozen. Thirteen for twelve. When a heavy penalty was inflicted for short weight, bakers used to give a surplus number of loaves called the inbread, to avoid all risk of incurring the fine. The 13th was the "vantage loaf."

Mr. Riley (Liber Albis) tells us that the 13th loaf was "the extent of the profit allowed to retail dealers," and therefore the vantage loaf means, the loaf allowed for profit.

To give one a baker's dozen, in slang phraseology, is to give him a sound drubbing—i.e., all he deserves and one stroke more.

Baker's Knee (A). A knop-knee, or knee bent inwards, from carrying the heavy bread-basket on the right arm.

Bakshish. A Persian word for a gratuity. These gifts are insolently demanded by all sorts of officials in Turkey, Egypt, and Asia Minor, more as a claim than a gratuity.

Bal. Donner le bal à quelqu'un (French). To make one dance for it; to abuse one. In several games played with a ball, the person who catches the ball or to whom the ball is given, is put to an immense amount of labour. Thus, in Hurling, the person who holds the ball has one of the labours of Hercules to pass through. His opponent tries to lay hold of him, and the hurler makes his way over hills, dales, hedges, and ditches, through bushes, briars, mire, plashes, and even rivers. Sometimes twenty or thirty persons lie tugging together in the water, scrambling and scratching for the ball. (See Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, section xii.) (See Ball.)

Balsam. The Earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in Monmouth's army.

"And, therefore, in the name of dulness, he
The well-hung Balsam."
Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, 1673-4.

Balsam. A "citizen of sober fame," who lived hard by the Monument of London: "he was a plain, good man; religious, punctual, and frugal," his week-day meal being only "one solid dish." He grew rich; got knighted; seldom went to church; became a courtier; "took a bribe from France;" was hanged for treason, and all his goods were confiscated to the State. (See Diamond Pitt.) It was Thomas Pitt, grandfather of the Earl of Chatham, who suggested to Pope this sketch. (Pope: Moral Essays, Ep. iii.)

Balaam. Matter kept in type for filling up odd spaces in periodicals. These are generally refuse bits—the words of an oft, who talks like "Balaam’s ass." (Numb. xxii. 30.) (American.)

Balaam Basket or Box (A). An ass's pannier. In printer's slang of America, it is the place where rejected articles are deposited. (See Balaam.)

Balafré, Le [the gashed]. Henri, son of François, second Duke of Guise. In the battle of Doirmans he received a sword-cut which left a frightful scar on his face. (1550-1588). So Ludovic Lealy, an old archer of the Scottish Guards, is called, in Sir Walter Scott's Quentin Durward.

Balai. Donner trois tours de balai par la cheminée (French). To be a witch. Literally, to run your brush three times up the chimney. According to an ancient superstition, all witches had to pass their brooms on which they rode three times up the chimney between one Sabbath and the other.

Balaik, in the second part of Abanlon and Achitophel, a satire by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Dr. Burnet, author of Burnet's Own Time.

Balâm the ox, and the fish Nun, are the food of Mahomet's paradise; the mere lobes of the livers of these animals will suffice for 70,000 saints. (Al Koran.)

Balàn. Bravest and strongest of the giant race. Vasco de Lobeira, in Amadis of Gaul. Also, Emir of the Saracens, and father of Ferumbras or Fierabras (q.v.).

Balance (The). "Libra," the 7th sign of the zodiac, which contains the autumnal equinox. According to fable it is Astrea, who, in the iron age, returned from earth to heaven. Virgil, to praise the equity of Augustus, promises him a future residence in this sign.

"According to Persian mythology, at the last day there will be a huge balance big as the vault of heaven. The two scales parts will be called that of light and that of darkness. In the former all good will be placed, in the latter all evil. And each individual will receive an award according to the judgment of the balance.

Balance. He has a good balance at his bankers. His credit side shows a large balance in his favour.

Balance of power. The States of Europe being so balanced that no one nation shall have such a preponderance as to endanger the independence of another.

Balance of trade. The money-value difference between the exports and imports of a nation.

To balance an account. To add up the debit and credit sides, and subtract the less of the two from the greater. The remainder is called the balance.

To strike a balance. To calculate the exact difference, if any, between the debit and credit side of an account.

Balayer. Chausu doit balayer devant sa porte (French), "Let everyone correct his own faults." The allusion is to a custom, nearly obsolete in large towns, but common still in London and in villages, for each housewife to sweep and keep clean the pavement before her own dwelling.

Balustra (The tower of), in Ossian, is Dun-dee, where Dun means a tower. Those circular buildings so common in the Orkney and Shetland Islands, the Hebrides, and all the north of Scotland, are duns. Dee is a corruption of Tay, the river on which the city is built; in Latin, Tuo-dunnium.

Bald. Charles le Chasseur. Charles I., son of Louis de Débonnaire (823, 810-877).

Baldachin. The dais or canopy under which, in Roman Catholic processions, the Holy Sacrament is carried (Italian, baldacchino, so-called from Baldacco (Italian for Bagdad), where the cloth was made). Also the canopy above an altar.

Baldassare. Chief of the monastery of St. Jacopo di Compostella. (Donizetti's opera La Favorita.)

Baldor, the god of peace, second son of Odin and Friga. He was killed by the blind god Höder, at the instigation of Loki, but restored to life at the general request of the gods. (Scandinavian mythology.)

N.B.—Sydney Dobell (born 1824) has a poem entitled Baldor, published in 1854.

Baldor is the sun or daylight which is killed by the blind god at the instigation of Loki or darkness, but is restored to life the next day.
Balders dash. Ribaldry, jargon.

Baldwin. The youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne's paladins; and the nephew of Sir Roland.

Baldein (in Jerusalem Delivered). The restless and ambitious Duke of Bologna, leader of 1,200 horse in the allied Christian army. He was Godfrey's brother; not so tall, but very like him.

Baldivian, the Ass (in the tale of Reynard the Fox). In the third part of the Beast-epeic he is called "Dr. Baldwin." (Old German, bold friend.)

Bale. When bale is highest, boot is lowest. When things have come to the worst they must needs mend.

Balearea Tormenta. Here tormenta means instruments for throwing stones. Caesar (Gallic War, iv. 25) says: "Fundis, tormentis, sagittis hostes propellere." The inhabitants of the Balearic Islands were noted slingers, and indeed owe their name to this skill. (Greek, balleo, to cast or hurl.) Pronounce Bal-e-ari-ca.

Balfour of Burley. Leader of the Covenanters in Scott's Old Mortality, a novel (1816).

Ball. (See Horse.)

Ballista. or Ballista. Roger's sword, made by a sorcerer, and capable of cutting through enchanted substances.

"With Ballista's slightest blow
Nor helm, nor shield, nor curass could avail,
Nor strong-tempered plate, nor twisted mail."

Arms of Orlando Furioso, Book XXIII.

Ballistrata. Narrow apertures in the form of a cross in the walls of ancient castles, through which cross-bowmen discharged their arrows.

Balliverse (in Orlando Furioso). The basest knight in the Saracen army.

Balk means the high ridge between furrows (Anglo-Saxon balca, a beam, a ridge); hence a rising ground.

A balk of timber is a beam running across the ceiling, etc., like a ridge. As the balk is the part not cut by the plough, therefore "to balk" means to leave untouched, or to disappoint.

To make a balk. To miss a part of the field in ploughing. Hence to disappoint, to withhold deceitfully.

To make a balk of good ground. To throw away a good chance.

Baller. One who from an eminence balks or directs fishermen where shoals of herrings have gathered together. (Anglo-Saxon, baell-an, to shout.)

Ballis. The Queen of Sheba or Saba, who visited Solomon. (Al Koran, c. ii.)

Ball. To strike the ball under the line. To fail in one's object. The allusion is to the game of tennis, in which a line is stretched in the middle of the court, and the players standing on each side have, with their rackets, to knock it alternately over the line.

"Thou hast stricken the ball under the line."—John Reynolds's Works (London, 1820).

To take the ball before the bound. To anticipate an opportunity; to be over-hasty. A metaphor from cricket, as when a batsman runs up to meet the ball at full pitch, before it bounds. (See BALLE.)

Ball of Fortune (A). One tossed, like a ball, from pillar to post; one who has experienced many vicissitudes of fortune.

"Brown had been from infancy a ball for fortune to spurn at"—Sir Walter Scott; Guy Mannering, chap. XV.

The ball is with you. It is your turn now.

To have the ball at your feet. To have a thing in one's power. A metaphor from foot-ball.

"We have the ball at our feet; and if the government will allow it, we can now crush out the rebellion."—Lord Auckland.

To keep the ball a-rolling. To continue without interruption. To keep the fun alive; to keep the matter going. A metaphor from the game of bandy, or la jèf de la croix.

"It is Russian that keeps the ball rolling [the Servian and Bulgarian War, 1876, denounced and encouraged by Russian agents]."—Newspaper paragraph, 1883.

To keep the ball up. Not to let conversation or fun flag; to keep the thing going. A metaphor taken from several games played with balls.

"I put in a word now and then to keep the ball up."—Bentham.

To open the ball. To lead off the first dance at a ball. (Italian, ballarre, to dance.)

Balls. The three golden balls. The emblem of St. Nicholas, who is said to have given three purses of gold to three virgin sisters to enable them to marry.

As the cognisance of the Medici family, they probably represent three golden pills—a punning device on the name. Be this, however, as it may, it is from the Ballad

Lombard family (the first great money-lenders in England) that the sign has been appropriated by pawnbrokers. (See MUGELLO for another account.)

Ballad means, strictly, a song to dance-music, or a song sung while dancing. (Italian, ballata, to dance, ballata, our ballad, ballet [q.v.].)

Ballads. "Let me make the ballads, and who will make the laws?" Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in Scotland, wrote to the Marquis of Montrose, "I knew a very wise man of Sir Christopher Musgrave’s sentiment. He believed, if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws" (1703).

Ballambangian (The Straits of). A sailor’s joke for a place where he may lay any wonderful adventure. These straits, he will tell us, are so narrow that a ship cannot pass through without jamming the tails of the monkeys which haunt the trees on each side of the strait; or any other rigmarole which his fancy may conjure up at the moment.

Ballast. A man of no ballast. Not steady; not to be depended on. Unsteady as a ship without ballast. A similar phrase is, "The man wants ballast."

Balle. Prendre la bale au bond (French). Strike while the iron is hot; make hay while the sun shines. The allusion is to certain games at ball, which must be struck at the moment of the rebound.

Renvoyer le balle a quelqu’un (French). To pay one off in his own coin. Literally, to strike back the ball to the sender.

Ballendine (Don Antonio). Intended for Anthony Munday, the dramatist. (Ben Jonson, The Case Altered, a comedy.)

Ballet (pronounce bal-ley). A theatrical representation of some adventure or intrigue by pantomime and dancing. Baltazar’n’i, director of music to Catherinou de’ Medici, was the inventor of modern ballets.

Balliol College, Oxford, founded in 1263, by John de Balliol, Knight (father of Balliol, King of Scotland).

Balloon (a pilot). Metaphorically, a fooler, sent to ascertain public opinion. "The pilot balloon sent from... has shown [the sender] the direction of the wind, and he now turns his sails accordingly." — Newspaper paragraph, January, 1860.

Balloon Post. During the siege of Paris, in 1871, fifty-four balloon posts were dispatched, carrying two-and-a-half million letters, weighing ten tons.

Balm (French, baume). Contraction of balansum (q.v.). The Balm of Gilead = the balsam of Gilead.

Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no remedy, no consolation, not even in religion?

Balmawhapple. A stupid, obstinate Scottish laird in Scott’s Waverley, a novel (1805).

Balmérino (Lord) was beheaded, but the executioner at the first stroke cut only half through the neck, and (we are told) his lordship turned round and grinned at the bungler.

Balmung or Gram. The sword of Siegfried, forged by Wieland, the Vulcan of the Scandinavians. Wieland, in a trial of merit, clove Amilias, a brother smith, through steel helmet and armour, down to the waist; but the cut was so fine that Amilias was not even aware that he was wounded till he attempted to move, when he fell into two pieces. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Balm. "I am going to the balm" — i.e. to "Balm sleep;" one of Dick Swiveller’s pet phrases. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Balm-stick (To put on the). In prison slang means to feign insanity; and the "Balm Yard" is the prison ward in which the insane, real or feigned, are confined.

Balmbar’bi. A land occupied by projectors. (Swift: Gulliver’s Travels.)

Balthasar. One of the kings of Cologne — i.e. the three Magi, who came from the East to pay reverence to the infant Jesus. The two other magi were Melchior and Gasper.

Baltic. The Mediterranean of the north (Swedish, balt; Danish, balt; Latin, baltius; English, belt), the sea of the "Belts."

Balwhidder (The Rev. Micah). A Scotch Presbyterian minister, full of fossilised national prejudices, but both kind-hearted and sincere. (Galt: Annals of the Parish, a novel (1821).)

Bambino. A picture or image of the infant Jesus, swaddled (Italian, bamba’no, a little boy). The most celebrated is that in the church of Sta. Maria, in the Ara Coeli of Rome.
Bambocciaides (4 syl.). Pictures of grotesque scenes in low life, such as country wakes, penny weddings, and so on. They are so called from the Italian word bambocci (a cripple), a nickname given to Pieter van Laer, the first Dutch painter of such scenes, distinguished in Rome.

Bamboccio or Bambocchino. (See Michael-Angelo del Bambocci.)

Bamboccio. To cheat by cunning, or daze with tricks.

"The third refinement observable in the letter I send you, consists of the choice of certain words invented by some pretty fellows, such as bateau, bambocci...and kidnes...some of which are now struggling for the vogue, and others are in possession of it."—Swift: The Tatler (Sept. 29, 1710).

To bambocci into (doing something). To induce by trickery.

To bambocci one out of something. To get something by trickery.

Bampton Lectures. Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury. He left an estate to the university of Oxford, to pay for eight divinity lectures on given subjects, to be preached at Great St. Mary's, and printed afterwards.

Ban. A proclamation of outlawry: a denunciation by the church (Anglo-Saxon, ge-ban, a proclamation; verb, ge-ban). Marriage ban. (See BANNS.)

To ban is to make a proclamation of outlawry. To banish is to proclaim a man an exile. (See BANDIT.)

Lever le ban et l'arriere ban (French). To levy the ban was to call the king's vassals to active service; to levy the arriere ban was to levy the vassals of a suzerain or under-lord.

"Le mot ban, qui signifie bannière, se duit de l'appel fait par le seigneur a ses vassaux pour les convoquer sous son émandat. On distinguait le ban comme des vassaux immédiats, qui étaient convoqués par le roi lui-même, et l'arrière ban, comme des vassaux convoqués par leurs suzerains."—Pouillet: Dictionnaire d'Histoire, etc.

Banagher. (See under BEAT.)

Banat. A territory under a ban (lord), from the Illyrian word bojan, a lord. The Turks gave this title to the lords of frontier provinces—e.g. the Banat of Croatia, which now forms part of the kingdom of Hungary.

Banbury. A Banbury-man—i.e. a Puritan (Ben Jonson); a bigot. From the reign of Elizabeth to that of Charles II. Banbury was noted for its number of Puritans and its religious "zeal."

As thin as Banbury cheese. In Jack Drum's Entertainment we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring;" and Bardolph compares Slender to Banbury cheese (Merry Wives, i. 1). The Banbury cheese is a rich milk cheese about an inch in thickness.

Banco. Sitgings in Buno. Sittings of the Superior Court of Common Law in its own bench or court, and not in circuit, as a judge of nisi prius (q.v.). (Banc is Italian for "bench" or "seat of justice.")

So much banco—i.e. so much bunk money, as distinguished from current coin. At Hamburg, etc., currency is inferior to "bank money." (Not money in the bank, but the fictitious value set on cash by bankers.)

Bancus Regius. The king's or queen's bench. Bancus Communis, the bench of common pleas.

Banding or Bandannas. A pocket-handkerchief. It is an Indian word, properly applied to silk goods, but now restricted to cotton handkerchiefs having a dark ground of Turky red or blue, with little white or yellow spots. (Hindou, banthu, a mode of dyeing.)

Bandbox. He comes out of a bandbox—i.e. he is so neat and precise, so carefully got up in his dress and person, that he looks like some company dress, carefully kept in a bandbox.

Next as a bandbox. Next as clothes folded and put by in a bandbox.

Bandbox Plot. Rapin (History of England, iv. 297) tells us that a bandbox was sent to the lord-treasurer, in Queen Anne's reign, with three pistols charged and cocked, the triggers being tied to a pack-thread fastened to the lid. When the lid was lifted, the pistols would go off, and shoot the person who opened the lid. He adds that [dean] Swift happened to be by at the time, and seeing the pack-thread, cut it, thereby saving the life of the lord-treasurer.

Two thin horn tops your Whips did fill
With impasture and lead:
Which with two seeds was made of quill,
You in a bandbox hid.
A tinder-box there was beside,
Which had a trigger to it,
To which the very string was tied
That was designed to do it—
Plot upon Plot (about 1713).

Bande Noire. Properly, a black band; metaphorically, the Vandal Society. Those capitalists that bought up the Church property confiscated in the great French revolution were so called, because they recklessly pulled down ancient buildings and destroyed relics of great antiquity.
Bandit, plural banditti or bandits, properly means outlaw (Italian, bandito; banished, men pronounced "banned"). As these outlaws very often became robbers, the term soon came to signify banded highwaymen.

Banda. Clerical bands are a relic of the ancient amice, a square linen tippet tied about the neck of priests during the administration of mass (Discontinued by the parochial clergy the latter part of the 19th century, but still used by clerics on the Continent.)

Legal bands are a relic of the wide collars which formed a part of the ordinary dress in the reign of Henry VIII., and which were especially conspicuous in the reign of the Stuarts. In the showy days of Charles II. the plain bands were changed for lace ends.

"The eight Henry, as I understand, was the first prince that ever wore a band."—John Taylor, the Water Poet (1588-1644).

Bandy. I am not going to bandy words with you—i.e. to dispute about words. The reference is to a game called Bandy. The players have each a stick with a crook at the end to strike a wooden or other hard ball. The ball is banded from side to side, each party trying to beat it home to the opposite goal. (Anglo-Saxon, benden, to bend.)

"The bat was called a bandy from its being bent."—Bank: Popular Antiquities (article "Bandy").

Bane really means ruin, death, or destruction (Anglo-Saxon, bana, a murderer); and "I will be his bane," means I will ruin or murder him. Bane is, therefore, a mortal injury.

"My bane and antidote are both before it. This word: in a moment brings me to an end, but this Plato assures me I shall never die."—Addison: Cato.

Bangorian Controversy. A theological paper-war stirred up by a sermon preached March 31st, 1717, before George I., by Dr. Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, on the text, "My kingdom is not of this world." The best reply is by Law, in a series of Letters to Hoadly.

Bang-up, or Slap-bang. First-rate, thumping, as a "thumping legacy." It is a slang punning synonym of thumping or striking. Slap-bang is double bang, or doubly striking.

Banî or Banian (A). A loose coat (Anglo-Indian).

"His coat was brownish black; perhaps of silk, in summer time a lavender loose he wore."—Lewis: Pilgrim's Story (stanza 12).

Banian Days [Ban-ian]. Days when no meat is served to a ship's crew. The term is derived from the Banians, a class of Hindu merchants, who carried on a most extensive trade with the interior of Asia, but being a caste of the Vaiyasa, abstained from the use of meat. (Sanskrit, banij, a merchant.)

Bank. A money-changer’s bench or table. (Italian banco or banca.)

Bank of a River. Stand with your back to the source, and face to the sea or outlet: the left bank is on your left, and right bank on your right hand.

Sisters of the Bank, i.e. of the bank-side, "the brothel quarter" of London. Now removed to a different quarter, and divided into "North" and "South.

"On this side of the Banke was sometimes the banckido or newen."—Shakspeare: Surry.

Bankrupt. Money-lenders in Italy used to display the money they had to lend out on a banco or bench. When one of these money-lenders was unable to continue business, his bench or counter was broken up, and he himself was spoken of as a bancozetto—i.e. a bankrupt.

Bankside. Part of the borough of Southwark, noted in the time of Shakespeare for its theatres and retreats of the demi-monde, called "Sisters of the Bank."

"Come, I will send for a whole coach or two of Bankside ladies, and we will be jovial."—Ran- dall: The Masque of Blackness.

Bank’s Horse. A learned horse, called Marocce, belonging to one Banks, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is said that his shoes were of silver. One of his exploits was "the ascent of St. Paul’s steeples."

Bannatyne Club. A literary club which takes its name from George Bannatyne, to whose industry we owe the preservation of very much of the early Scotch poetry. It was instituted in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scotch history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1859.

Banner means a piece of cloth. (Anglo-Saxon, fauna; Latin, pannus; Welsh, baner; Italian, bandiera; French, bannière.)

"An emperor’s banner should be nine foot long, and the same in breadth, a king’s banner six foot; a prince’s and a duke’s banner, four foot; a marquis’s, an earl’s, a viscount’s, a baron’s, and a baronet’s banner shall be but three foot square."—Park.

The banner of the Prophet is called Banneret.

One who leads his vassals to battle under his own banner. A knight made in the field was called a banneret, because the chief ceremony was cutting or tearing off the pointed ends of his banner.

Bannière. Cent ans bannière, cent ans cuivre. The ups and downs of life. A grand seigneur who has had his banner carried before him for a century, may come to drive his hand-barrow through the streets as a costermonger.

Bannière. Il faut la croix et la bannière pour l'or. If you want to have him, you must make a great fuss over him—you must go to meet him with cross and banner, "aller au devant de lui avec un croix et la bannière."

Banns of Marriage. The publication in the parish church for three successive Sundays of an intended marriage. It is made after the Second Lesson of the Morning Service. To announce the intention is called "Publishing the banns," from the words "I publish the banns of marriage between . . . ." (Anglo-Saxon, ge-bannan, to proclaim. To forbid the banns. To object to the proposed marriage.

"And a better fate did poor Maria deserve than to have a banns forbidden by the curate of the parish who published them."—Stevens: Sentimental Journey.

Banquet used at one time to mean the dessert. Thus, Taylor, in the Penniless Pilgrim, says: "Our first and second course being three course dishes at one board, and after that, always a banquet." (French, banquet: bâtre, a bench or table. We use "table" also for a meal or feast, as "the funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage table," i.e. feast.)

"After supper . . . a delicate banquet, with abundance of wine."—Cromer (126).
A banquet of braise. A flood of tears.

My heart was charged to overflowing, and forced into my eyes a banquet of brine."—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 548.

Banquet. A Scotch general of royal extraction, who obtained several victories over the Highlanders and Danes in the reign of Donald VII. He was murdered by the order of Macbeth, and his ghost haunted the guilty usurper. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

Banshee. The supposed domestic spirit of certain Irish or Highland Scottish families, supposed to take an interest in its welfare, and to wail at the death of one of the family. The Welsh "Cyhyraeth" is a sort of Banshee.

The distinction of Banshee is allowed only to families of pure Milesian stock. (Gaelic, ban-sith, a woman-fairy.)

Bantam. A little bantam cock. A little plucky fellow that will not be bullied by a person bigger than himself. The bantam cock will encounter a dunghill cock five times his own weight, and is therefore said to "have a great soul in a little body." The bantam originally came from Bantam, in Java.

Bantling. Bony Bantling. Reducing superfluous fat by living on meat diet, and abstaining from beer, furinaceous food, and vegetables, according to the method adopted by William Banting, a London cabinet-maker, once a very fat man (born 1796, died 1878). The word was introduced about 1864.

Bantling. A child. Mahn suggests the German, bänkling, a bastard. (Querje, bandling, a little one in swaddling-clothes.)

Banyan. A Hindû shopkeeper. In Bengal it denotes a native who manages the money concerns of a European, and also serves as an interpreter. In Madras such an agent is called Dobash (i.e. one who can speak two languages). (See BANIAN DAYS.)

Bap or Baphomet. An imaginary idol or symbol, which the Templars were said to employ in their mysterious rites. The word is a corruption of Mahomet. (French, Baphomet; Old Spanish, Mahomet.)

Baptes (2 syl.). Priests of the goddess Cotytta, whose midnight orgies were so obscene that they disgusted even Cotytta, the goddess of obscenity. They received their name from the Greek verb bapt, to wash, because they bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner. (Juvénal, ii. 91.)
Baptist. John the Baptist. His symbol is a sword, the instrument by which he was beheaded.

Bar. The whole body of barristers; as bench means the whole body of bishops.

"A dinner was given to the English Bar."—The Times.

Bar, excepting. In racing phrase a man will bet "Two to one, bar one," that is, two to one against any horse in the field with one exception. The word means "barring out" one, shutting out, or debarring one.

Bar. At the bar. As the prisoner at the bar, the prisoner in the dock before the judge.

Trial at bar, i.e. by the full court of judges. The bar means the place set apart for the business of the court.

To be called to the bar. To be admitted a barrister. The bar is the partition separating the seats of the benchers from the rest of the hall. Students having attained a certain status used to be called from the body of the hall within the bar, to take part in the proceedings of the court. To disbar is to disregard from the bar. Now, "to be called within the bar" means to be appointed king's (or queen's) counsel; and to disbar means to expel a barrister from his profession.

Bar, in heraldry. An honourable ordinary, consisting of two parallel lines drawn across the shield and containing a fifth part of the field.

"A bar ... is drawn overhawt the ca- rchon; it containeth the fifth part of the Field."—Gielman: Heraldry.

A Bar sinister in an heraldic shield means one drawn the reverse way; that is, not from left to right, but from right to left. Popularly but erroneously supposed to indicate bastardy.

Bar (Trial at). The examination of a difficult cause before the four judges in the superior courts.

"A mere monster, brought in with a large painted mane. ... He kills in sport, poisons whole nations, invents infernal machines."—C. Lamb.

Barataria. Sancho Panza's island-city, over which he was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Doctor Pedro Reezio de Aguo're, who caused every dish set upon the board to be removed without being tasted—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it; some for one ill effect, and some for another; so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing. The word is from barato (cheap).

"The meat was put on the table, and whisked away, like Sancho's inauguration feast at Barbary."—Thackeray.

Barathron. A deep ditch behind the Acropolis of Athens into which malefactors were thrown: somewhat in the same way as criminals at Rome were cast from the "Tarpeian Rock."

Barb. An arrow. The feathers under the beak of a hawk were called barb feathers (beard feathers). The point of an arrow has two iron "feathers," which stick out so as to hinder the extraction of the arrow. (Latin, barba, a beard.)

N.B.—The barb is not the feather on the upper part of the shaft, but the hooked iron point or head.

Barb. A Barbary steed, noted for docility, speed, endurance, and spirit. (See BARBED STEED.)

Barbari. Quod non fecerunt Barbari, fecerunt Barberini (What the barbarians left standing, Barberini contrived to destroy). Pope Barberini robbed the roof of the Pantheon to build the Baldacchino, or canopy of St. Peter's. It is made entirely of bronze, and weighs ninety tons.

Barbarians is certainly not derived from the Latin barba (a beard), as many suppose, because it is a Greek word, and has many analogous ones. The Greeks and Romans called all foreigners barbarians (babblers; men who spoke a language not understood by them); the Jews called them Gentiles (other nations); the Russians Ostrogs (foreigners). The reproachful meaning crept in from the natural egotism of man. It is not very long ago that an Englishman looked with disdainful pity on a foreigner, and the French still retain much of the same national exclusiveness. (Sir Wunderberg.)

"If they know not the meaning of the word [words], I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian [a foreigner], and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto him."—1 Cor. iiv. 11.

Barbarossa [Red-beard, similar to Rufus]. The surname of Frederick I. of Germany (1121-1190). Also Khudr-eddin Barbarossa, a famous corsair of the sixteenth century.

Barbary. St. Barbary, the patron saint of arsenals and powder magazines. Her father delivered her up to Martian, governor of Nicomedias, for being a Christian. After she had been subjected to the most cruel tortures, her unnatural father was about to strike off her head, when a lightning flash laid him dead at her feet. Hence, those who invoke saints select St. Barbara in thunderstorms. (See Barbe.)

Roua Barbary. The favourite horse of Richard II. (See Horse.)

"O, how it yearned my heart when I beheld in London streets that coronation day. When Bolingbroke rode on Roua Barbary. To win the heart that thou [Rich. II.] so often hast hea'rid. That horse that so carefully have dressed." Shakespeare: Richard II., i. 5.

Barbason. A fiend mentioned by Shakespeare in the Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2, and in Henry V., ii. 1.

"Amazons sounds well, Lucifer well, Barbason well; yet they are . . . the names of gods."—Merry Wives.

Barbassure (or Blue-Beard). See "Punch's Prize Novelists," by Thackeray.

Barbe (Sect.). The powder-room in a French ship; so called from St. Barbara, the patron saint of artillery. (Sec Barbary.)

A barbe de fon appell--on à laire (French). An apprentice is taught to shave on the chin of a fool.

Tui a fait sa barbe, qu$n' est pas bien fait (French). You may shave half the day on making your toilet, and yet not come forth an Adonius. You cannot make a silk purse of a sow's ear. Not every block will make a Mercury.

"Honest lying curls a million on your head. On socks, a cubic high, plant your proud tread, You're just what you are—that's all about it."—Pope: Satires, ii. 28, 39.

Barbouze (3 syl.). A West Indian dish, consisting of a hog roasted whole, stuffed with spice, and soaked with Madeira wine. Any animal roasted whole is so called.

"Oldfield, with more than busy throat intempest, Crues, 'Send me, ye gods, a whole hog lath-bocused!'—Pope: Satires, ii. 28, 39.

Barbed Steed (a corruption of harried). A horse in armour. (French, barrié, caparisoned.)

"And now, instead of mounting barbed steeds To snort the souls of fearful adversaries, He enbars him in a lady's crimson, To the lasting praise of a host."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, III. i. 65.

Barbel. Latin, barbelo (the barbed fish); so called from the barbules, or fleshy appendages round the mouth.

Barbellota. A sect of Gnostics. Their first immortal son they called Barbeloth, omniscient, eternal, and incorruptible. He engendered light by the instrumentality of Christ, author of Wisdom. From Wisdom sprang Autogenes, and from Autogenes, Adam (male and female), and from Adam, matter. The first angel created was the Holy Ghost, from whom sprang the first prince, named Protarchontos, who married Arrogance, whose offspring was Sin.

Barber. Every barber knows that "Omnibus notum tumultibus."—Horace: Satires, vii. 3.

In Rome the tonnarium or barber's shops were the fashionable resort of loungers and idlers. Here every scandal was known, and all the talk of the town was repeated.

Barber Poet. Jacques Jasmin, last of the Troubadours, who was a barber of Gascony. (1798-1864.)

Barber's Pole. The gilt knob at the end represents a brass basin, which is sometimes actually suspended on the pole. The basin has a notch cut in it to fit the throat, and was used for lathering customers who came to be shaved. The pole represents the staff held by persons in venescence; and the two spiral ribbons painted round it represent the two bandages, one for twisting round the arm previous to blood-letting, and the other for binding. Barbers used to be the surgeons, but have fallen from "their high estate" since science has made its voice "to be heard on high."

N.B. — The Barbers' Hall stood in Monkwell Street, Cripplegate. The last barber-surgeon in London was Middle-ditch, of Great Suffolk Street, in the Borough. He died 1821.

"To this year" (1511), says Worsam, "belongs the Barber-Surgeons' picture of Henry VIII. granting a charter to the Corporation. The barbers and surgeons of London, originally comprising one company, had been separated, but were again, in the 3 Henry VIII., combined into a single society and it was the ceremony of presenting them with a new charter which is commemorated in Holbein's picture, now in their hall in Monkwell Street."

Barbian (The) or Barbacun. The outwork or def to defend the drawbridge in a fortified town or castle (French, barbacun). Also a opening or loophole in the wall of a fortress, through which guns may be fired.

Barbier. Un barbier rave l'autre (French). Caw me and I'll caw thee. One good turn deserves another. One barber shaves another.

Barcarole (3 syl.). A song sung by Venetian barcaroli, as they row their gondolas. (Italian, barcarola, a boatman.)

Barcelona (adj). A fichu, piece of velvet for the neck, or small necktie, made at Barcelona, and common in England in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Also a neckcloth of some bright colour, as red with yellow spots.

"And on this handkerchief so starched and white she pinned a Barcelona black and tight."--Peter Pindar: Portfolio (Dinah).

"A double Barcelona protected his neck."--Scott: Poems of the Peak (Prefatory Letter.)

Barclayan. (See BERFANS.)

Barcochebah or Barcohieba (Shimeon). A fanatical leader of the Jews who headed a revolt of the Jews against the Romans A.D. 132, took Jerusalem in 132, and was slain by Julius Severus in an assault of Bethol, A.D. 133. (Iudot: Nouvelle Biographie Universelle.)

"Blazed the tall of the Antichrist Barcohieba."--Professor Sedley: Ecro Homo.

Bardeanista. Followers of Bardeanes, of Edessa, founder of a Gnostic sect in the second century. They believed that the human body was ethereal till it became imbruted with sin. Milton, in his Comus, refers to this:

"When Lust
By unequal steps, loose gestures, and foul talk,
But now so grand, and his face so sin.
Let in delibement to the inward part.
The soul aways cloyed with contagion, Idiocy and misfortune."

Bardit. The ancient German chant, which incited to war.

Bardo de Bardi. A wealthy Florentine scholar, father of Romola, in George Eliot's Romola, a novel (1863).

Bardolph. One of Falstaff's inferior officers. Falstaff calls him "the knight of the burning lamp," because his nose was so red, and his face so "full of meteors." He is a low-bred, drunken swaggerer, without principle, and poor as a church mouse. (Merry Wives; Henry IV, i., ii.)

"We must have better assurance for Sir John than Bardolph. We like not the security."--Lord Macaulay.

Bards. The oldest bardic compositions that have been preserved are of the fifth century; the oldest existing manuscript is the Psalter of Cashel, a collection of bardic legends, compiled in the ninth century by Cormac Mac Cullinan, bishop of Cashel and king of Munster.

Bard of Arvon. Shakespeare, who was born and buried at Stratford-upon-Avon. Also called "The bard of all times." (1564-1616.)

Bard of Arvistry. Robert Burns, a native of Ayrshire. (1759-1796.)

Bard of Hope. Thomas Campbell, author of The Pleasures of Hope. (1777-1844.)

Bark

Bard of the Imagination. Mark Akenside, author of Pleasures of the Imagination. (1721-1770.)

Bard of Memory. Rogers, author of The Pleasures of Memory. (1762-1855.)

Bard of Obey. Cowper, who resided at Olney, in Bucks, for many years. (1731-1800.)

"The Bard of Praise."

"He of the hundred tales of love."--Childs Harold, iv. 50.

i.e. Boccaccio.

The Bard of Rydal Mount. William Wordsworth; so called because Rydal Mount was his mountain home. Also called the "Poet of the Excursion," from his principal poem. (1770-1850.)

Bard of Twickenham, Alexander Pope, who resided at Twickenham. (1688-1744.)

Barebone Parliament (The). The Parliament convened by Cromwell in 1653; so called from Praise-God Barebone, a fanatical leader, who was a prominent member.

Barefooted. Certain monks and nuns, who use sandals instead of shoes. The Jews and Romans used to put off their shoes in mourning and public calamities, by way of humiliation. The practice is defended by the command of our Lord to His disciples: "Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes" (Luke x. 4).

Bare Poles (Under) implies that the weather is rough and the wind so high that the ship displays no sails on the masts. Figuratively applied to a man reduced to the last extremity. Figuratively, a disingenuous person sails under bare poles.

"We were scudding before a heavy gale, under bare poles."--Capt. Marryat.

Bargain. Into the bargain. In addition thereto; besides what was bargained for.

To make the best of a bad bargain. To bear bad luck, or a bad bargain, with equanimity.

Bark. Dogs in their wild state never bark: they howl, whine, and growl, but do not bark. Bark ing is an acquired habit; and as only domesticated dogs
Barnacle

BARK, this effort of a dog to speak is no indication of a savage temper.

Barking dogs seldom bite. Huffing, barking fellows rarely possess cool courage. Similar proverbs are found in Latin, French, Italian, and German.

To bark at the moon. To rail at those in high places, as a dog thinks to frighten the moon by baying at it. There is a superstition that it portends death or ill-luck.

"I'd rather be a dog, and bay the moon,

Than such a Roman."—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iv. 2.

His bark is worse than his bite. He scolds and abuses roundly, but does not bear malice, or do mischief. The proverb says, "Barking dogs never bite."

Barber. A pistol, which barks or makes a loud report.

Barkis is willin'. The message sent by Barkis to Peggotty by David Copperfield, expressing his desire to marry. It has passed into a proverbial expression indicating willingness or consent. (Dickens: David Copperfield.)

Barktan. The famous black stone in the eastern corner of the Kaaba; it is 1 1/2 feet in length, and is surrounded with a circle of gold. The legend is that when Abraham wished to build the Kaaba, the stones came to him of their own accord, and the patriarch commanded all the faithful to kiss the Barktan.

Barlam. A hermit who converted Josaphat, an Indian prince. This German romance, entitled Barlam and Josaphat, was immensely popular in the Middle Ages. It was written by Rudolf of Ems (13th century).

Barley. To cry barley. To ask for truce (in children's games). Query, a corruption of parley.

"A proper lad and his quarters, that will a arley in a bruit.

So W. Scott, W.

Barley-broth. Barley-broth: that is, malt liquor brewed from barley (Scotch).

The rank in

And ye a taste the

But Walse Buc Puck: Munt.

Barley Cap. To wear the barley cap. To be top-heavy or tipsy with barley-broth. The liquor got into the head.

Barleycorn. John or Sir John Barleycorn. A personification of malt liquor. The term has been made popular by Robert Burns.

"Inspiring bold John Barleycorn,

What danger dost thou cast on us, scoundrel?"

Burns: Tam o' Shanter, 105, 106.

Barley-mow. A heap of barley housed, or where it is housed. (Anglo-Saxon, moe, a heap; Italian, mucchio; Spanish, mucha.)

Barley Sugar. Sugar boiled in a decoction of barley. It is not now made so, but with saffron, sugar, and water, flavoured with oil of citron, orange, or lemon.

"Barley sugar was prepared by boiling down ordinary sugar in a decoction of pearl-barley."—Knowledge (July 11, 1863).

Barmecide (3 syl.). The word is used to express the uncertainty of things on which we set our heart. As the beggar looked forward to a feast, but found only empty dishes; so many a joy is found to be mere illusion when we come to partake of it.

"To-morrow! the mysterious unknown guest.

Who eats afloat! Remember Barmecide!

And tremble to be happy with the rest."—Longfellow.

Barmecide's Feast. A feast where there is nothing to eat; any illusion. Barmecide asked Schac'abac, a poor, starving wretch, to dinner, and set before him an empty plate. "How do you like your soup?" asked the merchant. "Excellent well," replied Schac'abac. "Did you ever see whiter bread?" "Never, honourable sir," was the civil answer. Wine was then brought in, and Schac'abac was pressed to drink, but excused himself by saying he was always quarrelsome in his cups. Being over-persuaded, he fell foul of his host, and was provided with food to his heart's content. (Arabian Nights: Barber's Sixth Brother.

Barnabas. St. Barnabas' Day, June 11. St. Barnabas was a fellow-labourer of St. Paul. His symbol is a rake, because the 11th of June is the time of hay-harvest.

Barnabites. (3 syl.). An Order of monks, so called because the church of St. Barnabas, in Milan, was given to them to preach in. They are also called "Canautes of St. Paul," because the original society made a point of reading St. Paul’s Epistles.

Barnaby Lecturers. Four lecturers in the University of Cambridge, elected annually on St. Barnabas' Day (June 11), to lecture on mathematics, philosophy, rhetoric, and logic.

Barnaby Rudge. A half-witted lad whose companion is a raven. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge.)

Barnacle. The Solan goose. The strange tales of this creature have arisen Barnacles. Placemen who stick to their offices but do little work, like the barnacles which live on the ship but impede its progress.

"The redundant would be 'Barnacles' with a vengeance... and the work be all the worse done for the beggars on."—Nineteenth Century August, 1888, p. 280.

Barnacles. Spectacles, or rather reading-glasses; so called because in shape they resemble the twitches used by farriers to keep under restraint unruly horses during the process of bleeding, dressing, or shoeing. This instrument, formerly called a barnacle, consisting of two branches joined at one end by a hinge, was fixed on the horse's nose. Dr. Latham considers the word a corruption of binocles (double-eyes), Latin, binus oculus. Another suggestion is "binnacle", the case on board ship in which the steering compass is placed, illuminated when it is dark by a lamp.

Barnardine. A reckless, dissolute fellow, "fearless of what's past, present, and to come." (Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.)

Barn-burners. Destructives, who, like the Dutchman of story, would burn down their barns to rid themselves of the rats.

Barnet. An epicure who falls in love with, and marries, a lady on account of her skill in dressing a dish of stewed eel. (Edward, a novel by Dr. John Moore, 1796.)

Barnwell (George). The chief character in a prose tragedy, so called, by George Lillo. He was a London apprentice, who fell in with a wanton in Shore-ditch, named Sarah Millwood, whom he visited, and to whom he gave £200 of his master's money, and ran away. He next robbed his uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow, and beat out his brains. Having spent the money, Sarah turned him out of doors, and each informed against the other. Sarah Millwood and George Barnwell were both hanged. (Lillo, 1693-1739.)

Baro-Devel. The great god of the gypsies. His son is named Alako.

Baron properly means a man (Old High German, baro). It was a term applied to a serving-soldier, then to a military chief, and ultimately to a lord. The reverse of this is seen in our word slave (a servile menial), which is the Slavonic word slav (noble). (See Index.)

Baron Bung. Mine host, master of the beer bung.

Baron Munchausen (pron. Mookha-za'oon). Said to be a satire on Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, to whom the work was dedicated. The author was Raspe, a German fugitive from the officers of justice, living in Cornwall (1785). The chief incidents were compiled from various sources.

Baron of Beef. Two sirloins left uncut at the backbone. The baron is the backpart of the ox, called in Danish, the rug. Jocosely, but wrongly, said to be a pun upon baron and sir loin.

Barons' War (The). An historical poem by Michael Drayton (1603),

"The pictures of Mortimer and the queen, and of Edward's entrance into the castle, are splendid and spirited."—Campbell.

Barrack Hack (The). A lady who hangs on the sleeve of a military officer, attends all barrack fêtes of every description, and is always ready to get up a dance, dinner, or picnic, to please the officers on whom she dances attendance.

Barracks means huts made of the branches of trees (Gaelic, barr, the top of anything; barrach, the top-branches of trees; barrachad, a hut made of branches). Our word is plural, indicative of the whole collection; but the French baraque is singular. (See B. K. S.)

Barrack (To). To jeer at, to receive with derisive applause. The substantive barracking = derisive cheers and shouts, is also in use. These terms were introduced during the visit of the Australian cricketers in 1899.

Barraty or Baratry. Qui fait barat, barat lui vient (French). With what measure ye meet, it shall be measured to you again. Barraty is false faith to one's employers. It is a sea term, and means the commission of a fraud on the owners or insurers of a ship by the captain or the crew. The fraud may consist of many phases, such as deserting the ship, sinking her, falsifying her cargo, etc. The French have other proverbs to the same effect: as, La tricheuse revient presque toujours à son maître. "He made a pit and ... is fallen into the ditch which he made. His mischief shall return upon his own head." (Psalm vii. 14, 15, 16.)

Barrister's Bags

Barrel Fever. Intoxication or illness from intemperance in drink.

Barron's Blues. The 4th Foot; so called from the colour of their facing, and William Barrall, colonel of the regiment (1784-1790). Now called "The King's Own (Royal Lancaster Regiment)." They were called "Lions" from their badge, The Lion of England.

Barrette. Parler à tabarrette (French). To give one a thump o' the head. The word barrette means the cap worn by the lower orders.

"Et moi, je pourrais interroger à ta barrette." Molière: L'Amour en Eclipse.

It is also used to signify the ordinary birretta of ecclesiastics, and (probably) of French lawyers. Il à reçu le chapeau or la barrette. He has been made a cardinal.

"Le pape lui envoyait la barrette, mais elle ne servit qu’à le faire mourir cardinal."—Voltaire: Salons de Louis XIV., chap. xxix.

Barrière-dé (3 syl.). To block up. The term rose in France in 1588, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king's order. The king sent for his Swiss Guards, and the Parisians tore up the pavement, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss as they passed through the streets. The French for barrel is barrique, and to barricade is to stop up the streets with these barrels.

The day of the Barricades:
(1) May 12th, 1588, when the people forced Henri III. to flee from Paris.
(2) August 6th, 1648, the beginning of the Fronde War.
(3) July 27th, 1830, the first day of le grand sénat which drove Charles X. from the throne.
(4) February 21st, 1848, which drove Louis Philippe to abdicate and flee to England.
(5) June 23rd, 1848, when Affre, Archbishop of Paris, was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.
(6) December 2nd, 1851, the day of the coup d'état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for re-election to the Presidency for ten years.

Barrier Treaty, November 5th, 1715, by which the Dutch reserved the right of holding garrisons in certain fortresses of the Spanish Netherlands.

Barricade. Jargon, words not understood. (Old French, barassen, from the Breton, bara gwyn, "white bread," taken as a type of barbarous words; modern French, baragouin, gibberish.)

Barring-out. A practice of barring the master out of the schoolroom in order to dictate terms to him. It was once common, but is now numbered with past customs. Miss Edgeworth has a tale so called.

Barrister. One admitted to plead at the bar; one who has been "called to the bar." The bar is the rail which divides the counsel from the audience, or the place thus enclosed. Tantamount to the rood-screen of a church, which separates the chancel from the rest of the building. Both these are relics of the ancient notion that the bar is an inferior order to the privileged class.

"A silk gown or bencher pleads within the bar, a stuff gown or outer barrister pleads without the bar.

An Outer or Utter Barrister. This phrase alludes to an ancient custom observed in courts of law, when certain barristers were allowed to plead; but not being benchers (king's counsel or sergeants-at-law) they took their seats "at the end of the forms called the bar." The Utter Barrister comes next to a bencher, and all barristers inferior to the Utter Barristers are termed "Inner Barristers."

"The whole society is divided into three ranks: Benchers, Utter Barristers, and Inner Barristers.

An Inner Barrister. A barrister inferior in grade to a Bencher or Utter Barrister.

A Revising Barrister. One appointed to revise the lists of electors.

A Vacation Barrister. One newly called to the bar, who for three years has to attend in "long vacation."

Barristers' Bags. In the Common Law bar, barristers' bags are either red or dark blue. Red bags are reserved for Queen's Counsel and sergeants; but a stuff gownswoman may carry one "if presented with it by a silk." Only red bags may be taken into Common Law Courts; blue bags must be carried no farther. than the robing room. In the Chancery Courts the etiquette is not so strict.

Barristers’ Gowns. "Utter barristers wear a stuff or bombazine gown, and the pucked material between the shoulders of the gown is all that is now left of the purse into which, in early days, the successful litigant ... dropped his ... pecuniary tribute ... for services rendered.” *(Notes and Queries, 11 March, 1893, p. 124). The fact is that the counsel was supposed to appear merely as a friend of the litigant. Even now he cannot recover his fees.

Barry Cornwall. poet. A nom de plume of Bryan Waller Proctor. It is an anagram of his name. (1788-1874.)

Barzillia. Heretics who arose in the sixteenth century. They made their sacrifices consist in taking wheat flour on the top of their first finger, and carrying it to their mouth.

Bar-sur-Aube (Prévot). Je ne voudrais pas être roi, si j'étais prévot de Bar-sur-Aube (French). I should not care to be king, if I were Provost of Bar-sur-Aube [the most lucrative and honourable of all the provostships of France]. Almost the same idea is expressed in the words "And often to our comfort we shall find,

The sharpened beetle in a safer hold
Than is the full-winged eagle."

Almost to the same effect Pope says:

"And more true joy Marcellus exults feels,
Than Calvin with a minute at his heel."

See CASTLE OF BUNGAY.

Bartolo. A doctor in the comedies of Le Mariage de Figaro, and Le Barbier de Séville, by Beaumarchais.

Bartholomew (St.). The symbol of this saint is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was slayed alive.

St. Bartholomew’s Day, August 24th. Probably Bartholomew is the apostle called “Nathaniel” by St. John the Evangelist (i. 45-51).

Massacre of St. Bartholomew. The slaughter of the French Protestants in the reign of Charles IX., begun on St. Bartholomew’s Day, i.e. between the 24th and 25th August, 1572. It is said that 30,000 persons fell in this dreadful persecution.

Bartholomew Fair. Held in West Smithfield (1133-1855) on St. Bartholomew’s Day.

A Bartholomew doll. A tawdry, overdressed woman; like a flashy, bespangled doll offered for sale at Bartholomew Fair.

A Bartholomew pig. A very fat person. At Bartholomew Fair one of the chief attractions used to be a pig, roasted whole, and sold piping hot. Falstaff calls himself,

"A little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig."—Henry IV. i. 4.

Barthram’s Dirge (in Sir Walter Scott’s Border Minstrelsy). Sir Noel Paton, in a private letter, says: "The subject of this dirge was communi cated to Sir Walter as a genuine fragment of the ancient Border Muse by his friend Mr. Surtees, who is in reality its author. The ballad has no foundation in history; and the fair lady, her lover, and the nine brothers, are but the creation of the poet’s fancy.” Sir Noel adds: "I never painted a picture of this subject, though I have often thought of doing so. The engraving which appeared in the Art Journal was executed without my concurrence from the oil sketch, still, I presume, in the collection of Mr. Pender, the late M.P., by whom it was brought to the Exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy here" (at Edinburgh) November 19th, 1866.

Bartoldo. A rich old miser, who died of fear and penurious self-denial. Fazio rifled his treasures, and, being accused by his own wife Bianca, was put to death. (Dean Milman: Fazio.)

Bartole (2 syl.). He knows his “Bartole” as well as a cordelier his “Dormi” (French). Bartole was an Italian lawyer, born in Umbria (1313-1356), whose authority amongst French barristers is equal to that of Blackstone with us. The cordeliers or Franciscans were not great at preaching, and perhaps for this reason used a collection called Dormi, containing the best specimens of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. This compilation was called Dormi from the first word in the book. The compilation is anonymous.

Bartolist. One skilled in law. (See above.)

Barzillai (3 syl.). The Duke of Ormond, a friend and staunch adherent of Charles II. The allusion is to Barzillai, who assisted David when he was expelled by Absalom from his kingdom (2 Sam. xvii. 27-29).

"Barzillai crowned with honour and with years.
In exile with his godlike prince he mourned.
For him he suffered, and with him returned.”

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, i. 317-319.

Bas Bleu. (See BLUE STOCKING.)
Base. The basis, or that on which an animal walks (Greek, báno, to go, and basis, a footstep). The foot is the foundation—hence, base of a pillar, etc. It is also the lowest part, and hence the notion of worthless. Base in music (Italian, basso) is the lowest part, or the part for the lowest compass of voice.

Base Tenure. Holding by copy of court-roll, in opposition to freeholders.

Base of Operation, in war. That is, a fortified or otherwise secure spot, where the magazines of all sorts can be formed, whence the army can derive stores, and upon which (in case of reverse) it can fall back. If a fleet, it is called a movable base; if a fortified or other immovable spot, it is called a fixed base. The line from such a base to the object aimed at is called "the Line of Operation."

Basilisk. A bragfast; a character in an old play entitled Soliman and Perseda. Shakespeare makes the Bas- diate say to his mother, who asks him why he boasted of his ill-birth, "Knight, knight, good mother, Basilisco-like"—i.e., my boasting has made me a knight. (King John, i. 1.)

Basiliscus. The king of serpents (Greek, basiléus, a king), supposed to have the power of "looking any one dead on whom it fixed its eyes." Hence Dryden makes Clytus say to Alexander, "Nay, frown not so; you cannot look me dead."

Basket. To be left in the basket. Neglected or uncared for. Left in the waste-basket.

To give a basket. To refuse to marry.

Bask. Matting made of bast, that is the lime or linden tree. Dutch, bast, bark; Swedish, basta, to bind; so called because used for binding. "Ribbons from the linden tree give a wreath no charms to me." The shepherds of Bastard. Any sweetened wine, but more correctly applied to a sweet Spanish wine (white or brown) made of the bastard muscadine grape.

"I will pledge you willingly in a cup of bastard."—See Walter Scott: Kenilworth, chap. iii.

Baste (1 syl.). I'll baste your jacket for you, i.e. cane you. I'll give you a thorough basting, i.e. beating. (Spanish, baston, a stick; Italian, bastone; French, bâton.)

Bastille means simply a building (French, bastir, now bâtir, to build). Charles V. built it as a royal château; Philippe-Auguste enclosed it with a high wall; St. Louis administered justice in the park, under the oak-trees; Philippe de Valois demolished the old château and commenced a new one; Louis XI. first used it as a state prison; and it was demolished by the rabble in the French Revolution, July 14th, 1789.

Bastina'do. A beating (Italian, bastone; French, baston, now bâton, a stick). The Chinese, Turks, and Persians punish offenders by beating them on the soles of the feet. The Turks call the punishment zarb.

Bastion (4), in fortification, is a work having two faces and two flanks, all the angles of which are acute, that is, pointing outwards towards the country. The line of rampart which joins together the flanks of two bastions is technically called a curtain.

Bastions in fortifications were invented in 1567 by Archimedes of Tarentum, but San Micchell of Verona, in 1577, is said by Maffei and Vassali to have been the real inventor.

Bat. Harlequin's lath wand (French, batte, a wooden sword).

To carry out one's bat (in cricket). Not to be "out" when the time for drawing the stump has arrived.

Off his own bat. By his own exertions; on his own account. A cricketer's phrase, meaning runs won by a single player.

Bat-horses and Bat-men. Bat-horses are those which carry officers' baggage during a campaign (French, bât, a pack-saddle). Bat-men are those who look after the pack-horses.

Batavia. The Netherlands; so called from the Batavi, a Celtic tribe who dwelt there.

"Flat Batavia's willowy groves."

Wordsworth.

Bate me an Ace. (See Bolton.)

Bath. Knights of the Bath. This name is derived from the ceremony of bathing, which used to be practised at the inauguration of a knight, as a symbol of purity. The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II. in 1661. G.C.B. stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first-class); K.C.B. Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class); C.B. Companion of the Bath (the third class).

King of Bath. Richard Nash, generally called Beau Nash, a celebrated master of the ceremonies at Bath for fifty-six years. (1674-1761.)

There, go to Bath with you! Don't talk nonsense. Insane persons used to be sent to Bath for the benefit of its mineral waters. The implied reproof is, what you say is so silly, you ought to go to Bath and get your head shaved.

Bath Brick. Alluvial matter made in the form of a brick, and used for cleaning knives and polishing metals. It is not made at Bath, but at Bridgewater, being dredged from the river Parrett, which runs through Bridgewater.

Bath Chair (A). A chair mounted on wheels and used for invalids. Much used at Bath, frequented by invalids for its hot springs.

Bath Metal. The same as Pinchbeck (q.v.). An alloy consisting of sixteen parts copper and five of zinc.

Bath Post. A letter paper with a highly-glazed surface, used by the highly-fashionable visitors of Bath when that watering-place was at its prime. (See Post.) Since the introduction of the penny post and envelope system, this paper has gone out of general use.

Bath Shillings. Silver tokens coined at Bath in 1811-1812, and issued for 4s., for 2s., and for 1s., by C. Culverhouse, J. Urchard, and J. Phipps.

Bath Stone. A species of limestone, used for building, and found in the Lower Oolite, in Wiltshire and Somersetshire. It is easily wrought in the quarry, but hardens on exposure to the air. Called "Bath" stone because several of the quarries are near Bath, in Somersetshire.
Battle (Major). A poor, high-minded officer, who tries to conceal his poverty by bold speech and ostentatious bearing. Colman’s Poor Gentleman (Lieutenant Worthington) is a similar character. (Fielding: Amelia (a novel) 1753.)

Bath-kol (daughter of the voice). A sort of divination common among the ancient Jews after the gift of prophecy had ceased. When an appeal was made to Bath-kol, the first words uttered after the appeal were considered oracular.

Bathos [Greek, bathos, depth]. A ludicrous descent from grandiloquence to commonplace. A literary mermaid.

"Humanae capitis certe inet pictor aquam jungere at velit ... ut tarturus armum Desinit in piscem mulier fominae superna."—Horace: De Arte Poetica, line 150.

A good example is the well-known couplet:

"And thoust, Dalhunie, the great god of war, Lieutenant-general to the earl of Mar."—

Bathsheba. The Duchess of Portsmouth, a favourite court lady of Charles II. The allusion is to the wife of Uriah the Hittite, criminally beloved by David (2 Sam. xi). The Duke of Monmouth says:

"My father, whom with reverence yet I revere, Charmed into ease, is careless of his fame;
And, bribed with petty sums of foreign gold,

Bathyllus. A beautiful boy of Samos, greatly beloved by Polycrates the tyrant, and by the poet Anacreon. (See Horace: Epistle xiv. 9.)

"To them [i.e. the aesthetic school] the boyhood of Bathyllus is of more import than the manhood of Napoleon."—Malory: The Nie Republic, book vi, chap. 1.

Battiste. The fabric is so called from Baptiste of Cambrai, who first manufactured it.

Batratombomachia (pronounce Ba-trako-myoo-bak’ia). A storm in a pudding; much ado about nothing. The word is the name of a mock heroic poem in Greek, supposed to be by Pigras of Caris, and means The Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Batta or Batty (Hindustanee). Perquisites; wages. Properly, an allowance to East Indian troops in the field. In garrison they are put on half-batta.

"He would rather live on half-pay in garrison
That could boast of a fine court, than vegetate
On full batta where there was none."—O. E. Wing: Thomas Muir, vol. i, chap. xvi, p. 257.

Battar, Al [the Trenchant]. One of Mahomet’s swords, confiscated from the Jews when they were expelled from Medina.

Battels. Rations or “commons” allowed to students at the University of Oxford. (To batten, to feast.)

Battle Bills. Buttery bills at the universities. (See above.)

Battersea. You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut. A reproof to a simpleton, or one who makes a very foolish observation. The market gardeners of Battersea used to grow simples (medicinal herbs), and the London apothecaries went there to select or cut such as they wanted. (See Navia.)

Battle. Professor Creasy says there are fifteen decisive battles, which led to some great political change: B.C. 490, Marathôn; 413, Syracuse; 331, Arbela; 207, Meroë; the defeat of the Romans under Varus by Arminius, 9; Chalons, A.D. 451; Tours, 732; Hastings, 1066; Joan of Arc’s victory at Orleans, 1429; the Armada, 1588; Blenheim, 1704; Pultowa, 1709; Saratoga, 1777; Valmy, 1792; and Waterloo, 1815.

Battle royal. A certain number of cocks, say sixteen, are pitted together; the eight victors are then pitted, then the four, and last of all the two; and the winner is victor of the battle royal. Metaphorically, the term is applied to chess, etc.

Battle scenes. Le Clerc could arrange on a small piece of paper not larger than one’s hand an army of 20,000 men.

The Battle-painter or Belle Bataglie. (See Michael Angelo.)

Battle of the Books. A satire, by Dean Swift, on the contention among literary men whether ancient or modern authors were the better. In the battle the ancient books fight against the modern books in St. James’s Library.

Battle of the Giants; i.e. the battle of Marignan (Ma-rim-yon) in 1515, when Francois I. won a complete victory over 12,000 Swiss, allies of the Milanese.

Battle of the Herrings, in 1428. A sortie made by the men of Orleans, during the siege of their city, to intercept a supply of salt herrings sent to the besiegers.

Battle of the Moat. A skirmish or battle between Mahomet and Abú Sofian (chief of the Koreshites) before Medina; so called because the “prophet” had a moss dug before the city to keep off the invaders; and in the most much of the fighting took place.

Battle of the Standard, in 1138, when the English overthrew the Scotch, at Northallerton, in Yorkshire. The standard was a high crucifix borne by the English on a wagon.

Battle of the Spurs (1302), in which the allied citizens of Ghent and Bruges won a famous victory over the chivalry of France under the walls of Courtray. After the battle more than 700 gilt spurs (worn by French nobles) were gathered from the field.

In English history the Battle of Guinegate (1613) is so called, "because the French spurred their horses to flight, almost as soon as they came in sight of the English troops."

A close battle. A naval fight at "close quarters," in which opposing ships engage each other side by side.

A line of battle. The position of troops drawn up in battle array. At sea, the arrangement formed by ships in a naval engagement. A line-of-battle ship is a ship fit to take part in a main attack. Frigates do not join in a general engagement.

A pitched battle. A battle which has been planned, and the ground pitched on or chosen beforehand, by both sides.

Half the battle. Half determines the battle. Thus, "The first stroke is half the battle," that is, the way in which the battle is begun half determines what the end will be.

Trial by battle. The submission of a legal suit to a combat between the litigants, under the notion that God would defend the right. It was legal in England till the nineteenth century.

Wager of battle. One of the forms of ordeal or appeal to the judgment of God, in the old Norman courts of the kingdom. It consisted of a personal combat between the plaintiff and the defendant, in the presence of the court itself. Abolished by 50 Geo. III. c. 46.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice (The). [See BATRACHYMOMACHIA.]

Battle of the Kegs (The). A mock-heroe by Francis Hopkinson (1738-1791). In the War of Independence certain machines, in the form of kegs, charged with gunpowder, were sent down the river to annoy the British at Philadelph. When the British found out the nature of these machines, they waged relentless war with everything they saw floating about the river.

Battle of the Poets (The). A satirical poem by John [Sheffield], Duke of Buckingham, in which all the versifiers of the time are brought into the field (1725).

Battle of the Whips. The Scythian slaves once rose in rebellion against their masters, and many a bloody encounter followed. At length, one of the Scythian masters said to his followers: Let us throw away our spears and swords, and fight in future with whips. We get killed by the former weapons and weakened. So in the next encounter they armed themselves with whips, and immediately the slaves saw the whips, remembering former scourings, they turned tail and were no more trouble.

Battle (Sarah), who considered whilst the business of life and literature one of the relaxations. When a young gentleman, of a literary turn, said to her he had no objection to unbind his mind for a little time by taking a hand with her, Sarah was indignant, and declared it worse than sacrilege to speak thus of her noble occupation. Whist "was her life business; her duty; the thing she came into the world to do, and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards over a book." (W. Lamb: Eton.)

Battledore (3 syl.) means, properly, a baton for washing linen by striking on it to knock out the dirt. The plan is still common in France. The word is the French battoir, a beater used by washerwomen; Portuguese, Batidor; Spanish, battidero, a wash-board.

Battu. Antaut plieue mal battu que bien battu (French). It little matters whether stripes are given maliciously or not, as they smart the same. Whether misfortunes come from God or Satan, they are misfortunes still. A slight variant is "Antaut eant bien battu que mal battu," which means, it is of no consequence whether badly beaten or not, enough that I am beaten; "over shoes, over boots."

Battu de fol Oiseau (Etre), or "Etre battu de l'oiseau," to be utterly dismayed; to be dazed. The allusion is to bird-catching at night, when a candle or lantern is held up before the birds aroused from their sleep; the birds, being dazed, are beaten down easily with sticks.

Battus paieron (Les). Ven victis! Those who lose must pay the piper. "C'est le loi du pays de Bearn que le battu paye l'amende," Again, "C'est la coutume de Lorré, les battus paient
Baubee. (See BAWBEE.)

Bauble. A fool should never hold a bauble in his hand. "Tis a foolish bird that fouls its own nest." The bauble was a short stick, ornamented with ass's ears, carried by licensed fools. (French, balnoite, a plaything; Old French, baubel, a child's toy.)

If every fool held a bauble, fuel would be dear. The proverb indicates that the world contains so many fools that if each had a separate bauble there would be but little wood left for lighting fires.

To deserve the bauble. To be so foolish as to be qualified to carry a fool's emblem of office.

Baucia. (See PHILEMON.)

Baviad (The). A merciless satire by Gifford on the Della Cruscan poetry, published 1794. The word is from Virgil's Elegy, iii. 9.

He may with foxes plough, and mule he-grants, Who praises Ba'viad or on Marcus dotes.

E. C. B.

Bavice'a. The Cil's horse.

Bavius. Any bad poet. (See BAVIAD.)

"May none choice patron bless each grey goose quail!
May every Ba'vius have his Buto still,
" Pope: Prologue to the Nativity, 264-66.

Bawbee.

"Will 'tire, will 'tire, will 'tire me?
"Three plumbs and a wallup ofar bawbee."

The tale is that the people of Kirkmahoe were so poor, they could not afford to put any meat into their broth. A 'cute cobbler invested all his money in buying four sheep-shanks, and when a neighbour wanted to make mutton broth, for the payment of one halfpenny the cobbler would "plump" one of the sheep-shanks into the boiling water, and give it a "wallup" or whisk round. He then wrapped it in a cabbage-leaf and took it home. This was called a guslin bone, and was supposed to give a rich "gust" to the broth. The cobbler found his guslin bone very profitable.

Jenny's barber. Her marriage portion. The word means, properly, a debased copper coin, equal in value to a halfpenny, issued in the reign of James V. of Scotland. (French, bas bilon, debased copper money.)

The word "bawbee" is derived from the laird of Sillebawby, a mintmaster. That there was such a laird is quite certain from the Treasurer's account, September 7th, 1541, "In argento receptis a Jacobo Atzinson, et Alexandro Orok de Sillebawby respective."

Bawley Boat (A). A small fishing-smack used on the coasts of Kent and Essex, about the mouth of the Thames and Medway. Bawleys are generally about 40 feet long, 13 feet beam, 5 feet draught, and from 15 to 20 tons measurement. They differ in rig from a cutter in having no booms to the mainsail, which is, consequently, easily brailed up when working the trawl-nets. They are half-decked, with a wet well to keep fish alive.

Bawtry. Like the saddler of Bawtry, who was hanged for leaving his liquor (Yorkshire proverb). It was customary for criminals on their way to execution to stop at a certain tavern in York for a "putting draught." The saddler of Bawtry refused to accept the liquor and was hanged. If he had stopped a few minutes at the tavern, his reprieve, which was on the road, would have arrived in time to save his life.

Baxtorians. Those who entertain the same religious views as Richard Baxter. The chief points are—(1) That Christ died in a spiritual sense for the elect, and in a general sense for all; (2) that there is no such thing as reprobation; (3) that even saints may fall from grace. Dr. Isaac Watts and Dr. Doddridge held these views.

Bay. Supposed to be an antidote against lightning, because it was the tree of Apollo. Hence Tiberius and some other of the Roman emperors wore a wreath of bay as an amulet, especially in thunder-storms. (Pliny.)

"Reach the bay—
I'll put a garland here about his head;" Twill keep my bay from lightning."

The Whole Duty.

The withering of a bay-tree was supposed to be the omen of a death.

"Tis thought the king is dead. We'll not stay— The bay-trees in our country are withered." Shakespeare: Richard II., ii. 4.

Crowned with bays, in sign of victory. The general who obtained a victory among the Romans was crowned with a wreath of bay leaves.

Bay. The reason why Apollo and all those under his protection are crowned with bay is a pretty fable. Daphne, daughter of the river-god Peneus, in Thessaly, was very beautiful and resolved to pass her life in perpetual virginity. Apollo fell in love with her, but she rejected his suit. On one occasion the god was so importunate that Daphne fled from him and sought the protection of her father, who changed her into the bay-tree. The gallant god declared henceforth he would wear bay leaves on his brow and lyre instead of the oak, and that all who sought his favour should follow his example.
Bay the Moon 106 Bead

The Queen's Bays. The 2nd Dragoon Guards; so called because they are mounted on bay horses. Now called The Queen's.

Bay. The colour of a horse is Varro's equest badius, given by Ainsworth as, "brown, bay, sorrel, chestnut colour." Coles gives the same. Our bayard; bright bay, light bay, blood bay, etc.

Bay the Moon (To). To bark at the moon. (French, aboyer, to bark at.) (See Bark.)

Bay Salt is salt of a bay colour. It is the salt of sea-water hardened by the heat of the sun.

Bayadere (bah-yah-dare). A dancing girl dressed in Eastern costume; so called from the bajaderes of India, whose duty is to dance before the images of the gods; but the grandees employ similar dancers for their private amusements. The word is a corruption of the Portuguese bailadeira.

Bayard (Chevalier), Pierre du Terrail, a celebrated French knight (1476-1521). Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche.

The British Bayard. Sir Philip Sidney. (1554-1586.)

Bayard of the East (The) or Of the Indian Army. Sir James Outram (1803-1863).

Bayard. A horse of incredible swiftness, belonging to the four sons of Aymon. If only one of the sons mounted, the horse was of the ordinary size; but if all four mounted, his body became elongated to the requisite length. The name is used for any valuable or wonderful horse, and means a "high-bay" (bay-ard). (Villeneuve: Les Quatre-Fils Aymon.) (See Horse.) Keep Bayard in the stable, i.e. keep what is of value under lock and key. (See above.)

Bold as Blind Bayard. Foolhardy. If a blind horse leaps, the chance is he will fall into a ditch. Grose mentions the following expression, To ride bayard of ten toes—"Going by the narrow-bone stage"—i.e. walking.

Bayardo. The famous steed of Rinaldo, which once belonged to Amadis of Gaul. (See Horse.)

Bayardo's Leap. Three stones, about thirty yards apart, near Sleaford. It is said that Rinaldo was riding on his favourite steed Bayardo, when the demon of the place sprang behind him; but the animal in terror took three tremendous leaps and unhorsed the fiend.

Bayes, in the Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham, was designed to satirize John Dryden, the poet laureate.

Bayes' Troops. Dead men may rise again, like Bayes' troops, or the savages in the Fantocvii (Something New). In the Rehearsal, by George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, a battle is fought between foot-soldiers and great hobby-horses. At last Drawcosis kills all on both sides. Smith then asks how they are to go off, to which Bayes replies, "As they came on—upon their legs"; upon which they all jump up alive again.

Bayeux Tapestry. Supposed to be the work of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It represents the mission of Harold to the duke, and all the incidents of his history from that event till his death at Hastings in 1066. It is called Bayeux from the place where it is preserved. A drawing, on a reduced scale, of this curious antique is preserved in the Guildhall Library.

Bayle (2 syl.). Dances of the common people were so called in Spain, in opposition to the stately court dances, called danza. The Bayles were of Moorish invention, the most celebrated being La Sarabanda, La Chacona, Las Gambelas, and El Hermoso Bartolo.

Bayonet. So called from La Bayonette, a lower ridge of the Montagne d'Arrhune. A Basque regiment, early in the seventeenth century, running short of powder, stuck their knives into their muskets, and charged the Spaniards with success. Some derive this word from Bayonne.

Bayonets. A synonym of "rank and file," that is, privates and corporals of infantry. As "the number of bayonets was 25,000."

"It is on the bayonets that a Quartermaster-General relies for his waiting and fatigue parties."—Howitt: Hist. of Eng. (Year 1854, p. 260.)

Bead (Anglo-Saxon, bed, a prayer). When little balls with a hole through them were used for keeping account of the number of prayers repeated, the term was applied to the prayers also. (See Beadsman.)

To count one's beads. To say one's prayers. In the Catholic Church beads are threaded on a string, some large and some small, to assist in keeping count how often a person repeats a certain form of words.

To pray without one's beads. To be out of one's reckoning. (See above.)

Baily's Beads. When the disc of the moon has (in an eclipse) reduced that of the sun to a thin crescent, the crescent assumes the appearance of a string of beads. This was first observed by Francis Baily, whence the name of the phenomenon.

St. Cuthbert's Beads: Single joints of the articulated stems of encrinites. They are perforated in the centre, and bear a fanciful resemblance to a cross; hence, they were once used for rosaries (beads). St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be called the St. Patrick of the north of England and south of Scotland.

St. Martin's beads. Flash jewellery. St. Martin's-le-Grand was at one time a noted place for shambale jewellery.

Bead-house. An almshouse for beadsmen.

Bead-roll. A list of persons to be prayed for; hence, also, any list.

Beadle. A person whose duty it is to bid or cite persons to appear to a summons; also a church servant, whose duty it is to bid the parishioners to attend the vestry, or to give notice of vestry meetings. (Anglo-Saxon, beadel, from beadan, to bid or summon.)

Beadsman or Beadsman. An inhabitant of an almshouse; so called because in Catholic times most charities of this class were instituted that the inmates might "pray for the soul of the founder." (See Bead.)

"Seated with some grey beadsman." Crabbes: Borough.

Beak. A magistrate. (Anglo-Saxon benign, a gold collar worn by civic magistrates.)

W. H. Black says, "The term is derived from a Mr. Beke, who was formerly a resident magistrate at the Tower of London.

Beaker. A drinking-glass; a rummer. (Greek, bikos, a wine jar.)

"Here, terrors, reach your beaker." Browning: "In the Southen."

Beams. Thrown on my beam-ends. Driven to my last shift. A ship is said to be on her beam-ends when she is laid by a heavy gale completely on her beams or sides. Not unfrequently the only means of righting her in such a case is to cut away her masts.

On the starboard beam: A distant point out at sea on the right-hand side, and at right angles to the keel.

On the port beam: A similar point on the left-hand side.

On the weather beam: On that side of a ship which faces the wind.

Beam (of a stage). That part of the head from which the horns spring. (Anglo-Saxon beam, a tree; the horns are called branches.)

Bean. Every bean has its black. Nemo sine vitis mortuus, "everyone has his faults." The bean has a black eye. (Ogni grano ha la sua semola.)

He has found the bean in the cake, he has got a prize in the lottery, has come to some unexpected good fortune. The allusion is to twelfth cakes in which a bean is buried. When the cake is cut up and distributed, he who gets the bean is the twelfth-night king.

(See Barristers' Gowns.)

Beans. Pythag'orass forbade the use of beans to his disciples—not the use of beans as a food, but the use of beans for political elections. Magistrates and other public officers were elected by beans cast by the voters into a helmet, and what Pythag'orass advised was that his disciples should not interfere with politics or "love beans"—i.e. office.

Aristotle says the word bean means ven'ery, and that the prohibition to "abstain from beans" was equivalent to "keeping the body chaste." "The French have the proverb, "If he gives me beans I will give him beans," S'il me donne des pois, je lui donnerai des féves, i.e. I will give him tit for tat, a Rowland for an Oliver.

Beans are in flower, les fèves fleuries sent, and this will account for your being so silly. Our forefathers imagined that the perfume of the flowering bean was bad for the head, and made men silly or light-headed.

He knows how many beans go to make Bear Feast. Much the same as wayz-goose (q.t.). A feast given by an employer to those he employs.

Bean Goose (The). A migratory bird which appears in England in the autumn of the year, and is so named from a mark on its bill like a horse-bean. It is next in size to the Gray Lag-goose. The term comes from the northern counties where the bean (goose) is common.

"Empere d'oeuf dont les mamelles sont tallies en forme de fouetsol."—Royal Dictionnaire.

Bean-king (The). Rey de Habas, the child appointed to play the part of king on twelfth-night. In France it was at one time customary to hide a bean in a large cake, and he to whom the bean fell, when the cake was distributed, was for the nonce the bean king, to whom all the other guests showed playful reverence. The Greeks used beans for voting by ballot.

Bean-King's festival. Twelfth-night. (See above.)

Bear (A). (Stock Exchange), a fall, or a speculator for a fall. To operate for a bear. To realise a profitable bear.

Bearing the market is using every effort to depress the price of stocks in order to buy it.

The aunts of bears and bulls, i.e. the Stock Exchange.

Dr. Warton says the term bear came from the proverb of "Selling the skin before you have caught the bear," and referred to those who entered into contracts in the South Sea Scheme to transfer stock at a stated price. (See Bull.)

"So was the huntsman by the bear oppressed, Whose hide he sold before he caught the beast."—Wallace: Battle of the Summer Islands, a.f.

A Bear account. A speculation in stocks on the chance of a fall in the price of the stock sold, with a view of buying it back at a lower price or receiving the difference. (See Bull.)

Bear (The). Albert, marquess of Brandenburg. He was also called "The Fair" (1106-1170).

The bloody Bear, in Dryden's poem called The Hind and Panther, means the Independents.

"The bloody bear, an independent beast, Unlikely to form in groans her hate expressed."—Pt. i. 58, 36.

The Great Bear and Little Bear. The constellations so called are specimens of a large class of blunders founded on approximate sounds. The Sanskrit rakh means "to be bright;" the Greeks corrupted the word into arktos, which means a bear; so that the "bear" should in reality be the "bright ones." The fable is that Calisto, a nymph of Diana, had two sons by Jupiter, which Juno changed into bears, and Jupiter converted into constellations.

"The wind-slayed surge, with high and monstrous mane, Seems to cast water on the burning bear, And quench the guards of th'ever-fixed pole."—Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1.

"Twas here we saw Calisto's star retire Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno's ire,"—Chambers: Lusiad, book v.

The Bear or Northern Bear. Russia.

"France turns from her abandoned friends afar, And amongst the bears that growl for patriot flesh,"—Campbell: Poland, stanza 5.

A Bridled Bear. A young nobleman under the control of a travelling tutor. (See Bear-Leader.)

The Bear and Ragged Staff. A public-house sign in compliment to Warwick, the king-maker, whose cognizance it was. The first earl was Arth or Arthgal, of the Round Table, whose cognizance was a bear, because arth means a bear (Latin, ursa). Morvid, the second earl, overcame, in single combat, a mighty giant, who came against him with a club, which was a tree pulled up by the roots, but stripped of its branches. In remembrance of his victory over the giant he added "the ragged staff."

The Bear and the Tea-kettle (Kama-chatka). Said of a person who injures himself by foolish rage. One day a bear entered a hut in Kamtschatka, where a kettle was on the fire. Master Bruin went to the kettle, and smelling at it burnt his nose; being greatly irritated, he seized the kettle with his paws, and squeezed it against his breast. This, of course, made matters worse, for the boiling water scalded him terribly, and he growled in agony till some neighbours put an end to his life with their guns.

A bear sucking his paws. It is said that when a bear is deprived of food, it sustains life by sucking its paws. The same is said of the English badger. Applied to industrious idleness.

As savage as a bear with a sore (or scant) head. Unreasonably ill-tempered.

As a bear has no tail, for a lion he'll fail. The same as No suit supra crep- idam, "let not the cobbler aspire above his last." Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicesters, being a descendant of the Warwick family, changed his own crest, which was "a green lion with two tails," for the Warwick crest, a "bear and ragged staff." When made governor of the Low Countries, he was suspected of aiming at absolute supremacy, or the desire of being the monarch of h's fellows, as the lion is monarch among beasts. Some wit wrote under his crest the Latin verse, "Urca caret cauda non quies esse tec."" Your bear for lion needs must fall.

Because your true bears have no tail.

To take the bear by the tooth. To put your head into the lion's mouth; needlessly to run into danger.

You dare as soon take a bear by his tooth. You would no more attempt such a thing, than attempt to take a bear by its tooth.

Bear (To). Come, bear a hand! Come and render help! In French, "Dinner un coup a quelqu'un." Bring a hand, or bring your hand to bear on the work going on.

To bear arms. To do military service.

To bear away (Nautical). To keep away from the wind.

To bear one company. To be one's companion.

"His faithful dog shall bear him company." Pope: Essay on Man, epistle 1. lxx.

To bear down. To overpower; to force down.

"Ful[y] prepared to bear down" Copper's Pilot, chap. xvi.

To bear down upon (Nautical). To approach from the weather side.

To bear in mind. Remember: do not forget. Carry in your recollection.

"To learn by heart" means to learn memoriter. Mind and heart stand for memory in both phrases.

To bear out. To corroborate, to confirm.

To bear up. To support; to keep the spirits up.

To bear with. To show forbearance; to endure with complacency.

"How long shall I bear with this evil congregation?"—Numbers xi. 27.

To bear the bell. (See Bell.)

Bear of Bradwardine (The) was a wine goblet, holding about an English pint, and, according to Scott, was made by command of St. Duthac, Abbot of Aberbrothoc, to be presented to the Baron of Bradwardine for services rendered in defence of the monastery. Inscribed upon the goblet was the motto: "Beware the bear!"

Bear Account (A). (See Bear.)

Bear Garden. This place is a perfect bear-garden—that is, full of confusion, noise, tumult, and quarrels. Bear-gardens were places where bears used to be kept and baited for public amusement.

Bear-leader. One who undertakes the charge of a young man of rank on his travels. It was once customary to lead muzzled bears about the streets, and to make them show off in order to attract notice and gain money.

"Bear" (said Dr. Pangloss to his pupil). Under favour, young gentleman, I am the bear-leader, being appointed your tutor."—G. Cowman: Heart-Lake.

Bears are caught by Honey. In French, "J'entends aviser mauvaise bite per douceur," for, as La Fontaine says, "Plus fait douceur que violence." Bears are very fond of honey. Bribes win even bears.

There is another phrase: Divide honey with a bear, i.e., it is better to divide your honey with a bear than to provoke its anger.

Beard. Cutting the beard. The Turks think it a dire disgrace to have the beard cut. Slaves who serve in the seraglio have clean chins, as a sign of their servitude.

Kissing the beard. In Turkey wives kiss their husband, and children their father on the beard.

To make one's beard (Chuenter). This is the French "Faire la barbe à quelqu'un," and refers to a barber's taking hold of a man's beard to dress it, or to his shaving the chin of a customer. To make one's beard is to have him wholly at your mercy.
I told him to his beard. I told him to his face, regardless of consequences; to speak openly and fearlessly.

Beard (2b). To beard one is to defy him, to contradict him flatly, to insult by plucking the beard. Among the Jews, no greater insult could be offered to a man than to pluck or even touch his beard.

To beard the lion in his den. To contradict one either in his own growlery, or on some subject he has made his hobby. To defy personally or face to face.

"Dar's thou, then. To beard the lion in his den, The Douglas in his hall?"
Sir W. Scott: Marmion, cant. vi, stanza 14.

Maugre his beard, in spite of him.
To laugh at one's beard. To attempt to make a fool of a person—to deceive by ridiculous exaggeration.

"... by the prophet! but he laughs at our beards," exclaimed the Pacha angrily. "These are foolish lies."—Harriot: Pacha of Many Tales.

To laugh in one's beard ['Rire dans sa barbe'] To laugh in one's sleeve.

To run in one's beard. To offer opposition to a person; to do something obnoxious to a person before his face. The French say, "à la barbe de quelqu'un," under one's very nose.

With the beard on the shoulder (Spanish). In the attitude of listening to overhear something; with circumspection, looking in all directions for surprises and ambuscades.

"They rode, as the Spanish proverb expresses it, 'with the beard on the shoulder,' looking round from time to time, and using every precaution... against pursuit."—Sir W. Scott: Peers of the Peak, chap. vii.

Tax upon beards. Peter the Great imposed a tax upon boards. Every one above the lowest class had to pay 100 roubles, and the lowest class had to pay a copece, for enjoying this "luxury." Clerks were stationed at the gates of every town to collect the beard-tax.

Bearded. Bearded Master (Magister barbatius). So Porusian styled Socrates, under the notion that the beard is the symbol of wisdom. (n.c. 468-399.)

Pogonatus (Bearded). Constantino IV., Emperor of Rome (648, 688-685).

The Bearded. Geoffrey the Crusader, and Bouchard of the house of Montmorency.

Hampshoar-bar. Baldwin IV., Earl of Flanders. (1160-1186.)

John the Bearded. Johann Mayo, the German painter, whose beard touched the ground when he stood upright.

Bearded Woman: Bartel Gratjé, of Stuttgart, born 1562.

The Duke of Saxeony had the portrait taken of a poor Swiss woman, remarkable for her large bushy beard.

In 1728 a female dancer appeared at Venice, with a large bushy beard.

Charles XII. had in his army a woman whose beard was a yard and a half long. She was taken prisoner at the battle of Pultowa, and presented to the Czar, 1724.

Mlle. Bois de Chéne, born at Geneva in 1834, was exhibited in London in 1852-3; she had a profuse beard of hair, a strong black beard, large whiskers, and thick hair on her arms and back.

Julia Pastrana was exhibited in London in 1857; died, 1862, at Moscow; was embaled by Professor Suckaloff; and the embalmed body was exhibited at 191, Piccadilly. She was found among the Digger Indians of Mexico.

Margaret of Holland had a long, stiff beard.

Bearers. I'll bring him to his bearings. I'll bring him to his senses. A sea term. The bearings of a ship at anchor is that part of her hull which is on the water-line when she is in good trim. To bring a ship to her bearings is to get her into this trim. (Dana: The Seaman's Manual, 84.)

To lose one's bearings. To become bewildered; to get perplexed as to which is the right road.

To take the bearings. To ascertain the relative position of some object.

Bearnans (Le). Henri IV. of France; so called from Le Beau, his native province (1553-1610).

Beasts (Heraldic):

_Conechant_, lying down.

_Counter-passant_, moving in opposite directions.

_Dormant_, sleeping.

_Gardant_, full-faced.

_Assant_, rising from the top or bottom of an ordinary.

_Nascent_, rising out of the middle of an ordinary.

_Passant_, walking.

_Passant gardant_, walking, and with full face.

_Passant regardant_, walking and looking behind.

_Rampant_, rearing.

_Regardant_, looking back.

_Sequant_, seated.

_Salient_, springing.

_Statant_, standing still.
Beastly Drunk. It was an ancient notion that men in their cups exhibited the vicious qualities of beasts. Nash describes seven kinds of drunkards:—
1. The Ape-drunk, who leaps and sings;
2. The Lion-drunk, who is quarrelsome;
3. The Sheep-drunk, who is sleepy and yapping;
4. The Ape-drunk, who leaps and sings;
5. The Martin-drunk, who drinks himself sober again;
6. The Goat-drunk, who is lascivious; and
7. The Fox-drunk, who is crafty, like a Dutchman in his cups. [See MAUDLIN.]

Beat. A track, line, or appointed range. A walk often trodden or beaten by the feet, as a policeman's beat. The word means a beaten path.

Not in my beat. Not in my line; not in the range of my talents or inclination.

Off his beat. Not on duty; not in his appointed walk; not his specialty or line.

"Off his own best his opinions were of no value."— Emerson: English Traits, chap. I.

On his beat. In his appointed walk; on duty.

Out of his beat. In his wrong walk; out of his proper sphere.

To beat up one's quarters. To hunt out where one lives; to visit without ceremony. A military term, signifying to make an unexpected attack on an enemy in camp.

"To beat up the quarters of some of our less-known relations."— LAMB: ESSAYS OF ELIZA.

Beat (To). To strike. (Anglo-Saxon, batan.)

To beat an alarm. To give notice of danger by beat of drum.

To beat or drum a thing into one. To repeat as a drummer repeats his strokes on a drum.

To beat a retreat (French, battre en retraite); to beat to arms; to beat a charge. Military terms similar to the above.

To beat the air. To strike out at nothing, merely to bring one's muscles into play, as pugilists do before they begin to fight; to toil without profit; to work to no purpose.

"To fight I. not as one that beateth the air."—1 Cor. Ix. 26.

To beat the bush. One beat the bush and another caught the hare. "Il a battu les buissons, et autre a pris les oiseaux." "Il bat le buisson sans prendre les oisillons" is a slightly different idea, meaning he has toiled in vain. "Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours" (John iv. 48). The allusion is to beaters, whose business it is to beat the bushes and start the game for a shooting party.

To beat the Devil's Tattoo. (See TARROO.)

To beat the Dutch. To draw a very long bow; to say something very incredible.

"Well! if that don't beat the Dutch!"

To beat time. To mark time in music by beating or moving the hands, feet, or a wand.

To beat up supporters. To hunt them up or call them together, as soldiers are by beat of drum.

Beat (To). To overcome or get the better of. This does not mean to strike, which is the Anglo-Saxon beaten, but to better, to be better, from the Anglo-Saxon verb biteu.

Dead beat. So completely beaten or worsted as to have no leg to stand on. Like a dead man with no fight left in him; quite tired out.

"I'm dead beat, but I thought I'd like to come in and see you all once more."— TOLK: WITHOUT A HOME, p. 22.

Dead beat escapement (of a watch). One in which there is no reverse motion of the escape-wheel.

That beats Banagher. Wonderfully inconsistent and absurd—exceedingly ridiculous. Banagher is a town in Ireland, on the Shannon, in King's County. It formerly sent two members to Parliament, and was, of course, a famous pocket borough. When a member spoke of a family borough where every voter was a man employed by the lord, it was not unusual to reply, "Well, that beats Banagher.

"Well," says he, 'to gratify them I will. So just a muddle. But, Jack, this beats Banagher!"— W. B. YEATS: FAIRY TALES OF THE IRISH PEASANTS, p. 106.

That beats Tormagunt. Your ranting, raging pomposity, or exaggeration, surpasses that of Tormagunt (q.v.).

To beat hollow is to beat wholly, to be wholly the superior.

To beat up against the wind. To tack against an adverse wind; to get the better of the wind.

Beat. (French, abattre, to abate.)

To beat down. To make a seller "abate" his price.

Beaten to a Mummy. Beaten so that one can distinguish neither form nor feature.

Beaten with his own Staff. Confuted by one's own words. An argumentum ad hominem.

"Can High Church bigots go farther than this? And how well have I since been beaten with mine own staff."—J. Wesley. (He refers to Beauti and an so turn into at took Imt Scotland Fielding” Beau^ Beaurice, beloved from girlhood by Dante, a native of Florence, was of the Portinari family. She died under twenty-four years of age (1260-1290). Beatrice married Simone de’ Bardi, and Dante married Gemma Donati.

Beauty. Beautiful or fair as an angel. Throughout the Middle Ages it was common to associate beauty with virtue, and ugliness with sin; hence the expressions given above, and the following also—“Seraphic beauty,” “Cherubin loveliness,” “Ugly as sin,” etc.

Beautiful Parricide. Beatrice Cenci, the daughter of a Roman nobleman, who plotted the death of her father because he violently defiled her. (Died 1599.) “Francesco Cencé (vix, siècle, ... avait quatre fils et une fille (Beatrice). Il les maîtrisait cruellement, on les faisait servir à ses plaisirs bruyants. ... Révélée de tant d’horreurs, Beatrice, en fille, de concert avec deux de ses frères, et Lucrèce leur mère, fit assassiner Francesco Cenci, Arécine de Parricide, il perdit tous quatre sur l’échafaud par la sentence de Clément VIII, 1599.” Beauty. ‘This is Muratori’s version of the affair, but it is much disputed. It is a favourite theme for fables.”

Beauty and the Beast. The hero and heroine of Madame Villeneuve’s fairy tale. Beauty saved the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast; and the Beast, being disinherited by Beauty’s love, became a handsome prince, and married her. (Contes Marins, 1740.)
A handsome woman with an uncouth or uncoupled male companion.

Beauty of Buttermere. Mary Robinson, married to John Hatfield, a heartless impostor, executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803.

Beauty Sleep. Sleep taken before midnight. Those who habitually go to bed, especially during youth, after midnight, are usually pale and more or less haggard.

"Would I were to remember, that I had raised him up at right . . . [in] his beauty sleep."—Wordsworth: Lorna Doone, chap. 64.

Beaux Esprits (French). Men of wit or genius (singular number, Un bel esprit, a wit, a genius).

Beaux Yeux (French). Beautiful eyes or attractive looks. "I will do it for your beaux yeux" (because you are so pretty, or because your eyes are so attractive).

Beaver. A hat; so called from its being made of beaver-skins.

Beaver. That part of the helmet which lifted up to enable the wearer to drink. Similarly bever, the afternoon draught in the harvest-field, called fours. (Italian, bevere, to drink; Spanish, beber; Latin, bibo; French, buevre, a drinker; Armoric, bevauxt, beverage, etc.)

"Hamlet: Then you saw not his face."

"Horatio: O, yes, my lord; he wore his beaver up."

Becarr, Bedel. Sauter de becarr en bénol (French), to jump from one subject to another without regard to pertinence; "Sauter du coq à l'âne" from Genesis to Revelation. Literally, to jump from sharps to flats. Becarr is the Latin B quadratum or B quadratus. In old musical notation B sharp was expressed by a square B, and n flat by a round B.

"Bénol is B mollis, soft (flat)."

Becasse. You goose; you simpleton; you hooly. Bécasse is a woodcock. "C'est une bécasse," he or she is a fool.

Becket's Assassins. William de Tracy, Hugh de Morville, Richard Brito (or the Brel), and Fitz-Ursæ.

Bed. The great bed of Ware. A bed twelve feet square, and capable of holding twelve persons; assigned by tradition to the Earl of Warwick, the kug-maker. It is now in Rye House.

"Although the sheet were long enough for the bed of Ware in England."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

Beauty bed-post

To make the bed. To arrange it and make it fit for use. In America this sense of "make" is much more common than it is with us. "Your room is made," arranged in due order. To make it all right.

"As you make your bed you must lie on it. Everyone must bear the consequences of his own acts. "As you sow, so must you reap." "As you brew, so must you bake."

To bed out. To plant what are called "bedding-out plants" in a flower-bed.

"Bedding-out plants are reared in pots, generally in a hot-house, and are transferred into garden-beds early in the summer. Such plants as geraniums, marguerites, fuchsias, penstemons, pelunias, verbenas, lobelias, calceolarias, etc., are meant.

You got out of bed in the wrong way, or with the left leg foremost. Said of a person who is patchy and ill-tempered. It was an ancient superstition that it was unlucky to set the left foot on the ground first on getting out of bed. The same superstition applies to putting on the left shoe first, a "fancy" not yet wholly exploded.

"Augustus Caesar was very superstitious in this respect.

Bed of Justice. (See Lit.)

Bed of Roses (A). A situation of case and pleasure.

Bed of Thorns (A). A situation of great anxiety and apprehension.

Bed-post. In the twinkling of a bed-post. As quickly as possible. In the ancient bed-frames movable staves were laid as we now lay iron laths; there were also staves in the two sides of the bedstead for keeping the bed-clothes from rolling off; and in some cases a staff was used to beat the bed and clean it. In the reign of Edward I., Sir John Chichester had a mock skirmish with his servant (Sir John with his rapier and the servant with the bed-staff), in which the servant was accidentally killed. Wright, in his Domestic Manners, shows us a chambermaid of the seventeenth century using a bed-staff to beat up the bedding. "Twinking" means a rapid twist or turn. (Old French, guinecher: Welsh, gung, gungaw, our wriggle.)

"I'll do it instantly, in the twinkling of a bed-staff."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, i. 5.

"He would have cut him down in the twinkling of a bed-post."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost.

Bobadil, in Every Man in His Humour, and Lord Duberley, in the Heir-at-Law.

Bede (Adam). A novel by George Eliot (Marian Evans), 1859. One of the chief characters is Mrs. Poyser, a woman of shrewd observation, and as full of wise saws as Sancho Panza.

Bedell. The Vice-chancellor’s bedell (not beadle). The officer who carries the mace before the Vice-Chancellor, etc., in the universities is not a beadle but a bedell (the same word in an older form).

Beder. A valley famous for the victory gained by Mahomet, in which "he was assisted by 3,000 angels, led by Gabriel, mounted on his horse Haizum." (Al Koran.)

Beder. King of Persia, who married Giauha’re, daughter of the most powerful of the under-sea emperors. Queen Labé tried to change him into a horse, but he changed her into a mare instead. (Arabian Nights, "Beder and Giuhat’s.")

Bedford. Saxon, Bedeou furdus (fortress ford)—that is, the ford at the fortress of the river Ouse.

Bedford Level. Land drained by the Earl of Bedford in 1649. This large tract of fenny land lay in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire.

Bedfordshire. I am off to Bedfordshire. To the land of Nod, to bed. The language abounds with these puns, e.g. "the narrowbone stage," "A Dunse scholar," "Knight of the beer-barrel," "Admiral of the blue," "Master of the Mint" (q.c.), "Master of the Rolls" (q.e.), etc. And the French even more than the English.

Bediver. A knight of the Round Table, and the butler of King Arthur.

Bedlam. A lunatic asylum or madhouse; a contraction for Bethlehem, the name of a religious house in London, converted into a hospital for lunatics. Tom o’ Bedlam. (See Tom.)

* St. Mary of Bethlehem, London, was founded as a priory in 1247, and in 1547 it was given to the mayor and corporation of London, and incorporated as a royal foundation for lunatics.

Bedlamite (3 syl.). A madman, a fool, an inhabitant of a Bedlam.

Bedoins [Bed-wins]. The homeless street poor are so called. Thus the Times calls the ragged, houseless boys "the Bedouns of London." The Bedouns are the nomadic tribes of Arabia (Arabic, bedawín, a dweller in a desert; ād, a desert). (See STREET ARABS.)

"These Bedouns of the prairie lazily carry their ladies with them."—A.D. Richardson: Beyond the Mississippi, chap. v.

Bedreddin’ Hassan, in the story of Nour’eddin and his Son, in the Arabian Nights.

"Comparing herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier ... discovered by his superlative skill in composing cream-pies without pepper in them."—Scott, Head of Multathala.

Bed-rock. American slang for one’s last shilling. A miner’s term, called in England the "stone-head," and in America, the "Bed-rock," the hard basis rock. When miners get to this bed the mine is exhausted. "I’m come down to the bed-rock," i.e. my last dollar.

"No, no! continued Tennessee’s partner, hastily, ‘I’ll play this yer hand alone. I’ve come down to the bed-rock; it’s just as Tennessee, that, has played it pretty rough and expensive, like, on a stranger... Now what’s the fair thing? Some would say more, and some would say less. Here’s seventeen hundred dollars in coarse gold and a watch—’ it’s about all my pile: and call it square.’ —Fred Hoyle: Tainoc’s Partner.

Bedver. King Arthur’s butler; Caius or Kaye was his sewer. (Geoffrey: British History, ix. 13.)

Bee. The Athenian Bee. Plato. (See AThENIAN Bee, page 72, col. 1.)

It is said that when Plato was in his cradle, a swarm of bees alighted on his mouth. The story is good enough for poets and orators. The same tale is told of St. Ambrose. (See AMBROSE, page 41, col. 1.)

Xenophon (b.c. 444-356) is also called "the Bee of Athens," or "the Athenian Bee."

* See also ANIMALS (SYMBOLICAL), page 50, col. 2.

To have your head full of bees. Full of devices, crotchets, fancies, inventions, and dreamy theories. The connection between bees and the soul was once generally maintained: hence Mahomet admits bees to Paradise. Porphyry says of fountains, "they are adapted to the nymphs, or those souls which the ancients called bees." The moon was called a bee by the priestesses of Cérès, and the word lunatic or moon-struck still means one with" "bees in his head."

"Il a des rats dans la tête."—French Proverb.

(See MAGGOT.)

To have a bee in your bonnet. To be cranky; to have an idiosyncrasy; also, to carry a jewel or ornament in your cap. (See Hughes.)

"For play, sir, find out that bee
That bore my love away—
I'll seek him in your honest face!..." —Herrick: The Mad Maid's Song.

Beefeaters. A social gathering for some useful work. The object generally precedes the word, as a spelling-bee (a gathering to compete in spelling). There are apple-bees, husking-bees, and half a dozen other sorts of bees or gatherings. It was an old Devonshire custom, which was carried across the Atlantic in Elizabethan times.

Beeline. The line that a bee takes in making for the hive; the shortest distance between two given points.

"Our footmarks, seen afterwards, showed that we had steered a bee-line to the hive." —Kane: Arctic Explorations, vol. i. chap. xvi. p. 108.

Bees. Jupiter was nourished by bees in infancy. (See Athenian Bee, p. 72, col. 1.)

Pindar is said to have been nourished by bees with honey instead of milk.

The coins of Ephesus had a bee on the reverse.

The Greeks consecrated bees to the moon.

With the Romans a flight of bees was considered a bad omen. Appian (Civil War, book ii.) says a swarm of bees lighted on the altar and prognosticated the fatal issue of the battle of Pharsalia.

The priestesses of Cerès were called bees.

In Christian Art St. Ambrose is represented with a beehive, from the tradition that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth in his infancy.

Beef, Ox. The former is Norman, and the latter Saxon. The Normans had the cooked meat, and when set before them used the word they were accustomed to. The Saxon was the herdsman, and while the beast was under his charge called it by its Saxon name.

"Old Alemann Ox continues to hold his Saxon title while he is under the charge of serfs and bondmen; but becomes Beef, a very French gallant, when he arrives before the worshipful jaws that are destined to consume him." —Townsh.

Weaver's bee of Colchester, i.e. sprats, caught abundantly in the neighbourhood. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Beefeaters. Yeomen of the Guard in the royal household, appointed in 1483, by Henry VII., to form part of the royal train in banquets and other grand occasions. The old theory was that the word means "an attendant on the royal buffets," Anglicised into buffets or buffetors, and corrupted into Beefeaters; but Professor Skeat says no such word as buffetor has yet been found in any book; nor does buffetier exist in French.

A plausible reply to this objection is that the word may have got corrupted almost ab initio in those unlettered days; and the earliest quotation of "Beefeater," already adduced, is above 150 years from the institution of the force, and even then the allusions are either satirical or humorous: as "Begone, ye greedy bee-eaters, y' are best" (Institu- mexitix, iii. 1; A.D. 1610); "Bows, or Beefeaters, as the French were pleased to term us" (1628); "You beef-eater, you saucy cur" (1671). Not one of the quotations fixes the word on the Yeomen of the Guard, and that the English have been called Beefeaters none will deny. Even if the allusion given above could be certainly affixed to Yeomen of the Guard it would only prove that 150 or 160 years after their establishment in the palace they were so called (corruptly, humorously or otherwise).

Arguments in favour of the old derivation:

(1) Certainly Henry VII. himself did not call these yeomen "beef-eaters." He was as much French as Welsh, and must have been familiar with the buffet (buffe); he had no spark of humour in his constitution, and it is extremely doubtful whether beef was a standing dish at the time, certainly it was not so in Wales. We have a good number of menus extant of the period, but beef does not appear in any of them.

(2) We have a host of similar corruptions in our language, as Andrew Min (q.r.), Billy-ruffians (see Belle-a-Bphon), Hull and Mouth (q.r.), Charivari Wam (q.r.), Bag-a-Nails, Goat and Compass, Sparrow-greens (asparagus), ancient (en- sign), Intrusted (sustained, from lustre), Bog-cheap (gud-kepe, i.e. a good bargain), and many more of the same sort.

(3) There can be no doubt that the "beefeaters" waited at the royal table, for in 1602 we read that "the dishes were brought in by the halberdiers [beefeaters], who are fine, big fellows" (quoted in Notes and Queries, February 4th, 1893, p. 86).

(4) If beef was a general food in the sixteenth century, which is extremely doubtful, it would be supremely ridiculous to call a few yeomen "eaters of beef," unless beef was restricted to them. In the present Argentine Republic, beef dried, called "jerked beef,"... is the common diet, and it would be foolish indeed to restrict the phrase "eaters of jerked beef" to some half-score waiters at the President's table.

(6) That the word butcher or butchery is not to be found (in the English sense) in any French author, does not prove that it was never used in Anglo-French. We have scores of perverted French words, with English meanings, unrecognized by the French; for example: encore, double entendre, surtout (a frock coat), epervine, and so on.

(6) Historic etymology has its value, but, like all other general rules, it requires to be narrowly watched, or it may not frequently over-ride the truth. Historically, Howe comes from Romulus, Scotland from Scotia or Scotia, Britain from Brutus. All sorts of rubbishy etymology belong to the historic craze.

Beefsteaks. Yeomen Extraordinary of the Guard appointed as warders of the Tower by Edward VI. They wear the same costume as the Yeomen of the Guard mentioned above. (See BUPHA-UG.)

Beef-steak Club owed its origin to an accidental dinner taken by Lord Peterborough in the scene-room of Rich, over Covent Garden Theatre. The original grilliron on which Rich broiled the peer's steak is still preserved in the palladium of the club, and the members have it engraved on their buttons. (History of the Clubs of London.)

Beefington or Milor Beefington, a character in Canning's mock tragedy, The Rovers, a burlesque, in the Anti-Jacobin, on the sentimental German dramas of the period. Casimer is a Polish emigrant, and Beefington an English nobleman, exiled by the tyranny of King John.

Beelzebub. God of flies, supposed to ward off flies from his votaries. One of the gods of the Philistines. (See AVITO.) The Greeks had a similar deity, Zeus Apotrosis. The Jews, by way of reproach, changed Beelzebub into Baal Zeboub (q.v.), and placed him among the demons. Milton says he was next in rank to Satan, and stood "With Athens' shoulders, fit to bear The weight of mightiest monarchs." (Book xi.)

"One next himself in power; and next in crime, (Since after known in Palestine, and named Beelzebub.)" Paradise Lost, 1, 76-81.

Beer. Ceres, when wandering over the earth in quest of her daughter, taught men the art of making beer, because "ils me ne purent apprendre l'art de faire le vin." (Mem. de l'Académie des Inscriptions, xvii.) (See ALE.)

He does not think small beer of himself. [See SMALL BEER.]

Beer and Skittles. Life is not all beer and skittles, i.e. not all eating, drinking, and play; not all pleasure; not all harmony and love.

"Sport like life, and life like sport, Isn't all skittles and beer."

Beer aux Monches, or Bière aux cornelies. To stand gaping in the air (at the flies or the rooks). Bière, Old French for bayer, to gape.

Beeswing. The film which forms on the sides of a bottle of good old port. This film, broken up into small pieces, looks like the wings of bees. A port drinker is very particular not to "break the beeswing" by shaking the bottle, or turning it the wrong way up.

"Beeeswinged put in old port which has formed its second crust or becswing.

Beetle (To). To overhang, to threaten, to jut over (Anglo-Saxon, bost-inu, to menace). Hence beetle or beetled brow.

"As to the dreadful summit of the cliff, That beetles on his base into the sea," Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1, 4.

Beetle-crusher. A large, flat foot. The expression was first used in French, in one of Leech's caricatures. Those who know London know how it is overrun with cockroaches, wrongly called black-beetles.

Befana. The good fairy of Italian children, who is supposed to fill their stockings with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth Night. Some one enters the children's bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, "Ecco la Befana." According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to look after the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would wait to see them on their return; but they went another way, and Befana, every Twelfth Night, watches to see them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Before the Lights, in theatrical parlance, means on the stage, before the foot-lights.

Before the Mast. To serve before the mast. To be one of the common sailors, whose quarters are in the forward part of the ship. The half-deck is the sanctum of the second mate, and, in Greenland fischers, of the spike-snow, harpooners, carpenters, coopers, boatswains, and all secondary officers; of low birth.

"I myself came from before the mast."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xx.

Beg the Question (To). (See Begging.)

Beggar. A beggar may sing before a pickpocket. (In Latin, "Cantisbit vacus coron latrone visor.") A beggar may sing before a highwayman because he has nothing in his pocket to lose.

Set a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to the de'il. There is no one so proud and arrogant as a beggar who has suddenly grown rich.

"Such is the sad effect of wealth—rank pride—Mount but a beggar, how the rogue will rule!"

Ister Finder: Epistle to Lord Londes.

Latin: "Asperius nihil est humilium surgit in altum."

French: "Il n'est orgueil que de pauvre enrichi."

Italian: "Il vilan nobilitato non conosce il parentado" (A beggar enrolled does not know his own kinsmen).

Spanish: "Quando el villano está en el mulo, non conoza a dios, ni al mundo" (when a beggar is mounted on a mule, he knows neither gods nor men).

Beggars should not be choosers. Beggars should take what is given them, and not dictate to the giver what they like best. They must accept and be thankful.

Beggars' Barn. The thick foam which collects on the surface of ponds, brooks, and other pieces of water where the current meets stoppage. It looks like barn or yeast, but, being unfit for use, is only beggarly barn at best.

Beggars' Bullets. Stones.

Beggar's Bush. To go by beggar's bush, or Go home by beggar's bush—is to go to ruin. Beggar's bush is the name of a tree which once stood on the left hand of the London road from Huntingdon to Caxton: so called because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars. These punning phrases and proverbs are very common.

Beggar's Daughter. Bessie, the beggar's daughter of Bethnal Green. Bessie was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once—a knight, a gentleman of fortune, a London merchant, and the son of the innkeeper at Romford. She told them that they must obtain the consent of her father, the poor blind beggar of Bethnal Green. When they heard that, they all slunk off except the knight, who went to ask the beggar's leave to wed the "pretty Bessie." The beggar gave her £3,000 for her dowry, and £100 to buy her wedding gown. At the wedding feast he explained to the guests that he was Henry, son and heir of Sir Simon de Montfort. At the battle of Evesham the barons were routed, Montfort slain, and himself left on the field for dead. A baron's daughter discovered him, nursed him with care, and married him; the fruit of this marriage was "pretty Bessie." Henry de Montfort assumed the garb and semblance of a beggar to escape the vigilance of King Henry's spies. (Percy: Reliques.)

Begging Hermit were of the Augustinian order; they renounced all property, and lived on the voluntary alms of "the faithful."

*Begging Friars were restricted to four orders: Franciscans (Grey Friars), Augustines (Black Friars), Carmelites (White Friars), and Dominicans (Preaching Friars).

Begging the Question. Assuming a proposition which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing you profess to prove. The phrase is a translation of the Latin term, petitio principii, and was first used by Aristotle.

Beghards. A brotherhood which rose in the Low Countries in the twelfth century, and was so called from Lambert Bègue. The male society were Beghards, the female, Besgins. They took no vows, and were free to leave the society when they liked. In the fourteenth century, those who survived the persecutions of the popes and inquisition joined the Tertiarii of the Franciscans. (See Bégins.)

Begtashi. A religious order in the Ottoman Empire, which had its origin in the fourteenth century. The word is derived from Hadji Begtash, a dervish, its founder.

Begue d'entendement. This is a really happy phrase for one whose wits are gone wool-gathering; he is a man of "stammering understanding."

Béguins. A sisterhood instituted in the twelfth century, founded by Lambert Bègue or Lambert le Bègue. The members of the male society were called Beghards (q.v.). The Béguines were at liberty to quit the cloister, if they chose, and marry. The cap called a béguin was named from this sisterhood.

"Secta quaedam postera illeum qui Beoquin vulgaret appellator, qui se Fratres Panpers de terra ordine S. Francisci communiter nominabant, aut unius placebus fluctuans tamquam harencacondemnatus et combustus."—Bernard Guido: Life of John, xxii.

Begum. A lady, princess, or woman of high rank in India; the wife of a ruler. (Beg or Beg, governor of a Turkish province, a title of honour.)

Behemoth (Hebrew). The hippopotamus: once thought to be the rhinoceros. (See Job xl. 15.)

"Behemoth the great and exceedingly large, and higher than a mountain. Behemoth rears his head."—Thomson: Summer, 708, 710.

"The word is generally, but incorrectly, pronounced Be'hemoth; but Milton, like Thomson, places the accent on the second syllable."

"Scourge from his mold Behemoth, largest form of earth, upheaved. His vastness."—Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 471.

Béhmenistes. A sect of visionary religionists, so called from Jacob Behmen (Böhme), their founder. (1575-1625.)

Behram. The most holy kind of fire, according to Parseeism. (See Adaran.)

Bejan. A freshman or greenhorn. This term is employed in the French and Scotch universities, and is evidently a corruption of ber jambe (yellow heel), a French expression to designate a nestling or unfledged bird. In the university of Vienna the freshman is termed bejana, and in France foot-money is bejunia.

"His grandmother yielded, and Robert was straightway a bejan or yellow-heel."—Macdonald I: R. Falconer.

Bel-a-faire-pour. A handsome, dare-devil of a fellow.

Bel Esprit (French). A vivacious wit: a man or woman of quick and lively parts, ready at repartee. (Plural, beaus esprits.)

Belch. Sir Toby Belch. A reckless, roistering, jolly knight of the Elizabethan period. (Shakespeare: Twelfth Night.)

Belcher. A pocket-handkerchief—proprily, a blue ground with white spots; so called from Jim Belcher, the pugilist, who adopted it.

Beldam. An old woman; literally, a grandmother. The French also use bel age for old age.

"Old men and beldames in the streets Do prophesy upon it dangerously."—Shakespeare: King John, iv. 2.

Bélises (3 syl.). A Chaldean soothsayer and Assyrian satrap, who told Arba'cès, governor of Média, that he would one day sit on the throne of Sarđanapu'r, King of Nineveh and Assyria. His prophecy was verified, and he was rewarded by Arba'cès with the government of Babylon. (Byron: Sar'danapalus.)

Belfast Regiment (The). The 35th Foot, which was raised in Belfast in 1701. There is no such regiment now in the British Army. What used to be called No. 35 is now called the 1st battalion of the Royal Sussex, the 2nd battalion being the old No. 107.

Bel-fires. Between Bel's two fires, Scylla on one side and Charybdis on the other. In Irish, Íthar ána taisc Réidh, in a dilemma. The reference is to the two fires kindled on May Eve in every village, between which all men and beasts devoted to sacrifice were compelled to pass.

Belford. A friend of Lovelace in Richardson's Clarissa Harlowe. These "friends" made a covenant to pardon every sort of liberty which they took with each other.

Belfry. A military tower, pushed by besiegers against the wall of a besieged city, that missiles may be thrown more easily against the defenders. Probably a church steeple is called a belfry from its resemblance to these towers, and not because bells are hung in it. (French, beffroi, a watch-tower, Old French, beftroi, beffroi, from German, borgen, to protect, besch, a place fenced in for security.)

"Alone, and warming his fire with
The white owt in the biffry sits."—Tennyson: The Owl, stanza 1.

Belial (Hebrew). The worthless or lawless one, i.e. the devil. Milton, in his pandemonium, makes him a very high and distinguished prince of darkness. (Paradise Lost.)

"What concord hath Christ with Belial?"—2 Cor. vi. 15.

"Belial came last—than whom a spirit more low Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love Virtue for its sake."

Sons of Belial. Lawless, worthless, rebellious people. (See above.)

"Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial."—1 Sam. ii. 12.
Belinda. The heroine of Pope's serio-comical poem, entitled the Rape of the Lock. The poem is based on a real incident:—Lord Petre cut off a lock of Miss Fermor's hair, and this liberty gave rise to a bitter feud between the two noble families. The poet says that Belinda wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa. Belinda, in anger, demanded back the ringlet; but it had flown to the skies and become a meteor, which "shot through liquid air, and drew behind a radiant trail of hair." (See Berenice.)

Belisarius. Belisarius, the greatest of Justinian's generals, being accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, was deprived of all his property; and his eyes being put out, he lived a beggar in Constantinople. The tale is that he fastened a bag to his road-side hut, and had inscribed over it, "Give an obolus to poor old Belisarius." This tradition is of no historic value.

Bell. As the bell clinks, so the foot thinks, or, As the foot thinks, so the bell clinks. The tale says when Whittington ran away from his master, and had got as far as Hounslow Heath, he was hungry, tired, and wished to return. Bow Bells began to ring, and Whittington fancied they said, "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London." The bells clinked in response to the boy's thoughts. "Les gens de peu de jugement sont comme les clocbres, a qui l'on fait dire tout ce que l'on veut," Dickens has the same idea in his Christmas Chimes.

The Passing Bell is the hallowed bell which used to be rung when persons were in extremis, to scare away evil spirits which were supposed to lurk about the dying, to pounce on the soul while "passing from the body to its resting-place." A secondary object was to announce to the neighbourhood the fact that all good Christians might offer up a prayer for the safe passage of the dying person into Paradise. We now call the bell rung at a person's decease the "passing bell."

The Athenians used to beat on brased kettles at the moment of a decease to scare away the Furies.

Ringing the hallowed bell. Bells were believed to disperse storms and pestilence, drive away devils, and extinguish fire. In France it is still by no means unusual to ring church bells to ward off the effects of lightning. Nor is this peculiar to France, for even in 1852 the Bishop of Malta ordered the church bells to be rung for an hour to "lay a gale of wind." Of course, the supposed efficacy of a bell resides in its having been consecrated.

"Pu' nem plango, ful'gura frango, ma'vata pango, Ex'cito lenos, dis'ipvo ventos, paco cruentos."

(Death's tale I tell, the winds dispel, ill-feeling quell, The fruitful shake, the storm-clouds break, the Sabbath wake. E. O. B.)

(See Ringing the Bells Backwards.)

Sound as a bell. (See Similar.)

Telling the bell (for church). A relic of the Ava Bell, which, before the Reformation, was tolled before service to invite worshippers to a preparatory prayer to the Virgin.

To hear the bell. To be first fiddle: to carry off the palm: to be the best. Before cups were presented to winners of horse-races, etc., a little gold or silver bell used to be given for the prize.

"Jockey and his horse were by their masters sent To put in for the bell. . . . They are to run and cannot miss the bell."

"It does not refer to bell-wethers, or the leading horse of a team, but "bear" means bear or carry off.

Who is to bell the cat? Who will risk his own life to save his neighbour? Any one who encounters great personal hazard for the sake of others undertakes to "bell the cat." The allusion is to the fable of the cunning old mouse, who suggested that they should hang a bell on the cat's neck to give notice to all mice of her approach. "Excellent," said a wise young mouse, "but who is to undertake the job?" (See Bell-the-Cat.)

"Is there a man in all Spain able and willing to bell the cat (i.e. persuade the queen to abdicate)?" —The Times.

Bells. The Koran says that bells hang on the trees of Paradise, and are set in motion by wind from the throne of God, as often as the blessed wish for music. (Sad.)

"Bells as musical As those that, on the golden-shafted trees Of Eden, shook by the eternal breeze."

T. Moore: Lola Rockh, part I.
At three bells, at five bells, etc. A term on board ship pretty nearly tantamount to our expression o'clock. Five out of the seven watches last four hours, and each half-hour is marked by a bell, which gives a number of strokes corresponding to the number of half-hours passed. Thus, "three bells" denotes the third half-hour of the watch, "five bells" the fifth half-hour of the watch, and so on. The two short watches, which last only two hours each, are from four to six and six to eight in the afternoon. At eight bells a new watch begins. (See Watch.)

"Do you there hear? Clean shirt and a shave for master at five bells."—Daniel Hume.

I'll not hang all my bells on one horse. I'll not leave all my property to one son. The allusion is manifest.

Give her the bells and let her fly. Don't throw good money after bad; make the best of the matter, but do not attempt to bolster it up. When a hawk was worthless, the bells were taken off, and the bird was suffered to escape, but the advice given above is to "leave the bells and let the hawk go."

Ringing the bells backwards, is ringing a muffled peal. Backwards is often used to denote "in a contrary direction" (tout le contraire), as, "I hear you are grown rich." "Yes, backwards." To ring a muffled peal, is to ring a peal of sorrow, not of joy.

In olden times bells were rung backwards as a tocsin, or notice of danger.

"Bells were lighted upon crises and calamities; the bells were rung backwards in the churches, and the general summons to arm announced an extremity of danger."—Sir W. Scott: The Barossa, chap. iii.

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh (Hamlet, iii. 1). A most exquisite metaphor for a deranged mind, such as that of Don Quixote.

Warwick shakes his bells. Beware of danger, for Warwick is in the field. Trojans beware, Achilles has donned his armour. The bells mean the bells of a hawk, the hawk shakes his bells.

"Neither the king, nor he that loves him best, Dares stir a wing, if Warwick shakes his bells."—Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., 1. 1.

Bell, Book, and Candle. A ceremony in the greater excommunication introduced into the Catholic Church in the eight century. After reading the sentence a bell is rung, a book closed, and a candle extinguished. From that moment the excommunicated person is excluded from the sacraments and even divine worship.

"Bell, book, and candle shall not drive me back."—Shakespeare: King John, iii. 3.

In spite of bell, book, and candle, i.e. in spite of all the opposition which the Christian hierarchy can offer. (See Cursing.)

Bell of Patrick's Will (clox on endhachta Phairdain) is six inches high, five broad, and four deep. It certainly was in existence in the sixth century. In the eleventh century a shrine was made for it of gold and silver filigree, adorned with jewels.

Bell Savage, or La Belle Sauvage = Pocahontas. According to one derivation it is a contraction of Isabelle Savage, who originally kept the inn. It is somewhat remarkable that the sign of the inn was a pun on the Christian name, a "bell on the Hope" (hoop), as may be seen in the Close Roll of 1463. The hoop seems to have formed a garter or frame to most signs. The site of the inn is now occupied by the premises of Messrs. Cusitl & Co.

"They now returned to their inn, the famous Bell Savage."—Scott: Kenilworth, iv.

Bell-the-Cat. Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, was so called. James III. made favourites of architects and masons. One mason, named Cochrun, he created Earl of Mar. The Scotch nobles held a council in the church of Tauler for the purpose of putting down these upstarts, when Lord Gray asked, "Who will bell the cat?" "That will I," said Douglas, and he fearlessly put to death, in the king's presence, the obnoxious minions. (See Bell.)

Bell-wavering. Vexillating, avaying from side to side like a bell. A man whose mind jangles out of tune from delirium, drunkenness, or temporary insanity, is said to have his wits gone bell-wavering.

"I doubt me his wits have gone bell-wavering by the road."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. vi.

Belladonna (Italian, beautiful lady). This name was given to the Deadly Nightshade, from a practice once common among ladies of touching their eyes with it to make the pupils large and lustrous.

Bellarmine (A). A large Flemish potch, i.e. a copulent beer-jug of some strong ware, originally made in Flan- ders in ridicule of Cardinal Bellarmine, the great persecutor of the reformed party there. These jugs had at the Belle'ston (Lady). A profligate, whose conduct and conversation are a life-like photograph of the court "beauties" of Louis XV. (Fielding: Tom Jones.)

Belle. A lady. The Belle of the room. The most beautiful lady in the room (French).

La belle France. A common French phrase applied to France, as "Merry England" is to our own country.

Bellees LETTRES. Polite literature (French); similarly, Beaux arts, the fine arts.

Bellefontaine (Benedict). The most wealthy farmer of Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), and father of Evangeline. When the inhabitants of his village were exiled, and he was about to embark, he died of a broken heart, and was buried on the sea-shore. (Longfellow: Evangeline.)

Bellerophon. One of the ships which took part in the Battle of the Nile, and was called by the English sailors "the Bully-ruffian," or "Belly-ruffron."

"Why she, and the Belly-ruffron seem to have pretty well shared and shared alike."—Captain Marruyd: Poor Jack, chap. xiv.

Bellerophon. The Joseph of Greek mythology: Antea, the wife of Proitos, being the "Potiphar's wife" who tempted him, and afterwards falsely accused him. Being successful in various enterprises, he attempted to fly to heaven on the winged horse Peg-a-sos, but Zeus sent a gad-fly to sting the horse, and the rider was overthrown.

Letters of Bellerophon. Letters or other documents either dangerous or prejudicial to the bearer. Proitos sent Bellerophon with a letter to the King of Lydia, his wife's father, recounting the charge, and praying that the bearer might be put to death.

Pausa'nias, the Spartan, sent messengers from time to time to King Xerxes, with similar letters; the discovery by one of the bearers proved the ruin of the traitor.

David's letter sent by Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14) was of a similar treacherous character; hence the phrase, "Letters of Uriah."

Bellerus. Bellerius is the Land's End, Cornwall, the fabled land of the giant Bellerus.

"Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old."—Milton: L'Allegro, 110.

Bellocent. Daughter of Gorloise and Igerna. According to Tenison, she was the wife of Lot, King of Orkney; but in La Mort d'Arthur Margarase is called Lot's wife.

Belin. The ram, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Bellsant. Sister to King Pepin of France, wife of Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. Being accused of infidelity, the emperor banished her, and she became the mother of Valentine and Orson. (Valentine and Orson.)

Bellman. Before the new police force was established, watchmen or bellmen used to parade the streets at night, and at Easter a copy of verses was left at the chief houses in the hope of obtaining an offering. These verses were the relics of the old incantations sung or said by the bellman to keep off elves and hobgoblins. The town crier.

Bel'ona. Goddess of war and wife of Mars. (Roman mythology.)

"Her features, late so exquisitely lovely, infamed with the fury of frenzy, resembled those of a Bellona."—Sir Walter Scott.

Bellows. The pit of the stomach. To knock a man on the "bellows" takes his "wind (breath) away."

Sing old rose and burn the bellows. (See SNG.)

Bellwether of the Flock. A jocose and rather depreciating term applied to the leader of a party. Of course the allusion is to the wether or sheep which leads the flock with a bell fastened to its neck.

Belly. The belly and its members. The fable of Menenius Agrippa to the Roman people when they seceded to the Sacred Mount: "Once on a time the members refused to work for the lazy belly; but, as the supply of food was thus stopped, they found there was a necessary and mutual dependence between them." Shakespeare introduces the fable in his Coriolanus, i. 1.

The belly has no ears. A hungry man will not listen to advice or arguments. The Romans had the same proverb, l'enter non habet audus; and in French, l'entra affané n'a point d'oreille.

Belly-timber. Food.

"And now, Dame Peveril, to dinner, to dinner. The old fox must have his belly-timber, though the hounds have been after him the whole day." —Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. 48.

Belomancy (Greek). Divination by arrows. Labels being attached to a given number of arrows, the archers let them fly, and the advice on the label of the arrow which flies farthest is accepted and acted on. This practice is common with the Arabs.

Beloved Disciple. St. John. (John xiii. 23, etc.)

Beloved Physician. St. Luke. (Col. iv. 14.)

Below the Belt. (See Belt.)

Belphogor. A nasty, licentious, obscene fellow. Bel-Phegor was a Moabish deity, whose rites were celebrated on Mount Phegor, and were noted for their obscenity. The Standard, speaking of certain museums in London, says, "When will men cease to be deluded by these unscrupulous Bel'phegors?" (meaning "quacks").

* Phegor, Phogor, or Peor, a famous mountain beyond the Jordan. Nebi and Pisgah were neighbouring mountains. Beth-Peor is referred to in Deut. iii. 29.

Belphoebe, meant for Queen Elizabeth. She was sister of Amoret. Equally chaste, but of the Diana and Minerva type. Cold as an idiole, passionless, immovable. She is a white flower without perfume, and her only tender passion is that of chivalry. Like a moonbeam, she is light without warmth. You admire her as you admire a marble statue. (Spencer: Fuerie Queene, book iii.)

Belt. To hit below the belt. To strike unfairly. It is prohibited in prize-fighting to hit below the waist-belt.

To call men knaves and fools, to charge a man with nepotism, to make a slandering report which is not actionable, indeed to take away a man’s character in any way where self-defence is impossible, is "hitting him below the belt."

"Lord Salisbury hits hard, but never hits below the belt." —Daily Telegraph, November, 1885.

To hold the belt. To be the champion.

In pugilism, etc., a belt is passed on to the champion.

Bel’tane (3 syl.). A festival observed in Ireland on June 21st, and in some parts of Scotland on May Day. A fire is kindled on the hills, and the young people dance round it, and feast on cakes made of milk and eggs. It is supposed to be a relic of the worship of Bel. The word is Gaelic, and means Bel’s fire; and the cakes are called beltane-cakes.

Belted Knight. The right of wearing belt and spurs. Even to the present day knights of the shire are "girt with a belt and sword," when the declaration of their election is officially made.

Belted Will. Lord William Howard, warden of the western marches (1563-1640).

"His Bilboa blade, by march-men felt, Hung in a broad and studded belt; Hence, in rude phrase, theborderer still Called noble Howard Belted Will." —Scott.

Beltenbros. Amadis of Gaul so calls himself after he retires to the Poor Rock. His lady-love is Oriana. (Amadis of Gaul, ii. 6.)

Belvawney (Minn.), of the Portsmouth theatre. She always took the part of a page, and wore tights and silk stockings. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, 1838.)

Belvedere [bel-ve-deer]. A sort of pleasure-house or look-out on the top of a house. The word is Italian, and means a fine prospect.

Belvidéra (in Otway’s Venier Preserved). Sir Walter Scott says, "More tears have been shed for the sorrows of Belvidera and Monimia than for those of Juliet and Desdemona."

"And Belvidera pours her soul in love."

—Thomson: Winter.

Bemuse (2 syl.). To get into a dreamy, half-intoxicated state.

"Bemusing himself with beer." —Sara: Gaslight and Daylight.

Ben. The Neptune of the Saxons.

Ben (a theatrical word). Benefit.

"A big ben," a good or bumping benefit.

Big Ben of Westminster. A name given to the large bell, which weighs 13 tons 10 cwt., and is named after Sir Benjamin Hall, the Chief Commissioner of Works when the bell was cast. (1856.)
Ben Joohanah

Ben Joohanah, in the satire of Abulom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who suffered much persecution for his defence of the right of private judgment.

"A Jew (Englishman) of humble parentage was he:

To trade a Levite (clergyman), though of low degree."

Part II. 354, 355.

Ben trovato (Italian). Well found; a happy discovery or invention.

Benai'ah (3 syl.), in the satire of Abulom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for George Edward Sackville, called General Sackville, a gentleman of family, and a zealous partisan of the Duke of York. Beuiaah was captain in David's army, and was made by Solomon generalissimo. (1 Kings ii. 35.)

"You can Beuiaah's worth forgotten be. Of publick soul what publick storms were high: Whose conduct, while the Moon's fierce influences made, Secured at once our honour and our trade." Part II. 359, 360.

Benares (3 syl.). One of the "most holy" cities of the Hindus, reverenced by them as much as Mecca is by the Mohammedans.

Benbow (Admiral), in an engagement with the French near St. Malo, on the Spanish coast, in 1701, had his legs and thighs shattered into splinters by a chain-shot, but, supported in a wooden frame, he remained on the quarter-deck till morning, when Du Casse bore away. Already, the Portuguese governor of India, in his engagement with the united fleet of Cumbay's and Egypt, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar manner; but, instead of retreating, had himself bound to the ship's mast, where he "waved his sword to cheer on the combatants," till he died from loss of blood. (See CUMBERS, JAAPEP, etc.)

"Whirled by the cannon's rage, in shiver'd form,
His thighs far shattered o'er the waves are borne:

Bound to the mast the god-like hero stands,
Waves his proud sword and cheers his woeful band:

Though winds and seas their wonted aid deny,
Yet he knows not but, but he knows to die."

Benbow. A sort, generous, free, idle, and always hanging about the ale-house. He inherited a good estate, spent it all, and ended life in the workhouse. The tale is in Crabbe's Borough.

"Benbow, a been companion, long approved
In jovial merriment (as he thought),
Was judged as one to joy and friendship prone,
And deemed injurious to himself alone." Yarrow: 16

Bench. The seat of a judge in the law courts; the office of judge.

To be raised to the bench. To be made a judge.

The King's [queen's] bench. The Supreme Court of Common Law; so called because at one time the sovereign presided in this court, and the court followed the sovereign when he moved from one place to another. Now a division of the High Court of Judicature.

Bench. Bench of bishops. The whole body of English prelates, who sit together on a bench in the House of Lords.

To be raised to the Epycspeut bench. To be made a bishop.

Bench and Bar. Judges and pleaders. The bench is the seat on which a judge sits. The bar of a court was formerly a wooden barrier, to separate the counsel from the audience. Now, silk gowns (q.r.) sit nearer the judge, and their juniors behind them. (See BARRISTERS.)

Benchers. Senior members of the Inns of Court; so called from the bench on which they used to sit. They exercise the function of calling students to the bar, and have the right of expelling the obnoxious. (See BAR, page 94, col. 7.)

"He was made successively, Barrister, Utter Barrister, Benchers, and Reader."

Bend, meaning power, as Beyond my bend, i.e. my means or power. The allusion is to a bow or spring; if strained beyond its bending power, it breaks. (See BENT.)

Bend Sinister. He has a bend sinister. He was not born in lawful wedlock. In heraldry, a band running from the upper right-hand corner to the lower left-hand corner (as the shield appears before you on paper) is called a bend-sinister, and is popularly, but erroneously, supposed to indicate bastardy.

Bendeemer. A river that flows near the ruins of Chilmirar or Istarchar, in the province of Chusistan in Persia.

"There's a lower of stones by Bendeemer's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day long."

T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, Part I.

Bender. Sixpence.

Ben'digo. A rough fur cap, named from a noted pugilist, William Thompson; so nicknamed from his birthplace in Australia.
Benfie (Old). The devil, who is willing to bend to anyone's inclination. The way of sin is so broad that every shade of error can be admitted without obstruction.

Benedicta (5 syl.). "Bless you:" a benediction used in the Roman Catholic Church; also the canticle.

Benedick. A sworn bachelor caught in the wiles of matrimony, like Benedick in Shakespeare's comedy of Much Ado about Nothing.

"Let our worthy Cæcub be bachelor or Ben- diedick, what concern is it of ours."—Mrs. Edwards: A Country Girl, chap. 11.

* Benedict and Benedick are used indiscriminately, but the distinction should be observed.

Benedict. A bachelor, not necessarily one pledged to celibacy, but simply a man of marriageable age, not married. St. Benedict was a most uncompromising stickler for celibacy.

"Is it not a pun? There is an old saying, 'Needles and pin; when a man marries his trouble begins.' If so, the unmarried man is benedicta."—Life of the West.

Benedictines (4 syl.). Monks who follow the rule of St. Benedict, viz. implicit obedience, celibacy, abstaining from laughter, spare diet, poverty, the exercise of hospitality, and unremitting industry.

Ben'efice (3 syl.). Under the Romans certain grants of lands made to veteran soldiers were called beneficia, and in the Middle Ages an estate held ex norte beneficio of the donor was called "a benefice." When the popes assumed the power of the feudal lords with reference to ecclesiastical patronage, a "living" was termed by them a benefice held under the pope as superior lord. This assumption roused the jealousy of France and England, and was stoutly resisted.

Benefit of Clergy. Exemption of the clerical order from civil punishment, based on the text, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm" (1 Chron. xvi. 22). In time it comprehended not only the ordained clergy, but all whose being able to write and read, were capable of entering into holy orders. This law was abolished in the reign of George IV. (1827).

Ben'en-gëll. (See Hamet.)

Benet (French). A simpleton, so called because they were supposed to be, in a special way, the objects of God's care. (French, bënt, Old French, benet, from Latin, benedictus.) We call an idiot an "Innocent" (q.v.).

Benevolence. A "forced" charity, under the excuse of a loan, exacted by some of the Plantagenet kings. First enforced in 1473, it was declared illegal by the Bill of Rights in 1689.

Benevolus, in Cowper's Task, is John Courtney Throckmorton of Weston Underwood.

Bengal Tigers. The old 17th Foot, whose badge, a royal tiger, was granted them for their services in India (1802-23). Now the Leicester Regiment.

Bengalees (3 syl.) for Beng'alis or Bengalees. Natives of Bengal. (Singular, Beng'ali or Bengalee.)

Bengol'di. A wonderful country where "they tie the vines with sausages, where you may buy a fat goose for a penny and have the giblets given into the bargain. In this place there is a mountain of Parmesan cheese, and people's employment is making cheesecakes and macaroons. There is also a river which runs Malmsley wine of the very best quality. (Boccaccio: Eighth Day, Noveř iii.)

Benfiea Boy. John C. Heenan, the American pugilist, who challenged and fought Tom Sayers for the belt in 1860; so called from Benfiea in California, his birthplace.

Benjamin. The pet, the youngest. Queensland is the Benjamin of our colonial possessions. The allusion is to Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Benjamin. A smart overcoat; so called from a tailor of the name, and rendered popular by its association with Joseph's "coat of many colours."

Benjamin's Mess. The largest share. The allusion is to the banquet given by Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, to his brethren. "Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs" (Gen. xliii. 34).

Benmskar. A wealthy merchant and magician of Delhi, in Ridley's Tales of the Genii.

"Like the jeweller of Delhi, in the house of the magician Benmskar. I at length reached a vaulted room dedicated to secrecy and silence."—Sir W. Scott.

Beneshie. Ben'ashe (see Banseher). The Scotch Bodach Glåy, or Grey Spectre, is a similar superstition; and the Pari-Banou (Nymph of the Air) of the Arabian Nights is also a sort of Bemmee.

"How oft has the Bemmee cried!" [How busy death has been of late with our nobilities.]—J. Moore: Irish Melodies, No. 11.

Bent. Inclination; talent for something. Out of my bent, not in my way, not in the range of my talent. Bent on it, inclined to it. As a thing bent is inclined, so a bent is an inclination or bias. Genius or talent is a bent or bias.

"Wherever is done bent, is done from the natural bent and disposition of the mind."—Hume: Table Talk.

They fool me to the top of my bent, i.e. as far as the bow can be bent without snapping. (Hamlet, iii. 2.) (See BEND.)

Benvolio. Nephew to Montague, a testy, litigious gentleman, who would "quarrel with a man that had a hair more or a hair less in his beard than he had." Mercutio says to him, "Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun." (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 1.)

Beppo. The contraction of Giuseppe, and therefore equal to our Joe. Husband of Laura, a Venetian lady. He was taken captive in Troy, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, grew rich, and, after several years' absence, returned to his native land, where he discovered his wife at a carnival ball with her cavaliro servente. He made himself known to her, and they lived together again as man and wife. (Byron: Beppo.)

Berchta [the white lady]. This fairy, in Southern Germany, answers to Hulda (the gracious lady) of Northern Germany; but after the introduction of Christianity, when pagan deities were represented as demons, Berchta lost her former character, and became a bogie to frighten children.

Beroaneus (3 syl.). The followers of the Rev. John Barclay, of Kincardinshire (1773). They believe that all we know of God is from revelation; that all the Psalms refer to Christ; that assurance is the proof of faith; and that unbelief is the unpardonable sin. They took their name from the Bereans, mentioned in the Book of the Acts (xvii. 11), who "received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily."

Berecythan Hero. Midas, the Phrygian king; so called from Mount Berecythus, in Phrygia.

Beroniaceae (4 syl.). The sister-wife of Ptolemy III., who vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods, if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. She suspended her hair in the temple of the war-god, but it was stolen the first night, and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had wafted it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo, called Coma Berenices.

* Pope, in his Rape of the Lock, converts the purloined ringlet into a star or meteor, "which drew behind a radiant trail of hair." (Canto v.)

Berg Folk. Pagan spirits doomed to live on the Scandinavian hills till the day of redemption. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bergaen (A.). A great liar; so called from Antiphanes Berga.

Bergamolir. A frost-giant, father of the Jötuns, or second dynasty of giants. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Berger. L'heure du Berger (French). The shepherd's hour, i.e. the swain's or lover's hour; the happy hour of tryst; the critical moment.

Bergomask. A clown or merry-andrew; a native of Bergamo. Compare, a gasconader; a Booseian.

Berkley (Mr.). An Englishman of fortune, good-humoured, and humane. He is a bachelor and somewhat eccentric, but sound common sense is a silver thread which is never lost. (Longfellow: Hyperion [a romance], 1839.)

Berkshire (Saxon, Beorne-seire, forest-shire), a name peculiarly appropriate to this county, which contains the forest districts of Windsor and Bagshot.

Berlin Decree. A decree issued at Berlin by Napoleon I., forbidding any of the nations of Europe to trade with Great Britain (1806). This mad fancy was the first step to the great man's fall.

Berlin Time. The new Berlin Observatory is 44° 14' east of Paris, and 53° 35' east of Greenwich. The Berlin day begins at noon, but our civil day begins the midnight preceding.
Berliners. The people of Berlin, in Prussia.

Bermeja. Insula de la Torre, from which Amasis of Gaul starts when he goes in quest of the Enchantress-Damsel, daughter of Fin'etor the necromancer.

Bermonde. An hypothetical island feigned by Shakespeare to be enchanted, and inhabited by witches and devils. Supposed by some to be Bermudas; but a correspondent in Notes and Queries (January 23rd, 1886, p. 72) utterly denies this, and favours the suggestion that the island meant was Lampedusa.

"From the still-versed Bermudas, there she's hid." Shakespeare: The Tempest, 1. 2.

Bermudas. To live in the Bermudas, i.e. in some out-of-the-way place for cheapness. The shabby genteel hire a knocker in some West-end square, where letters may be left for them, or live in the Bermudas, or narrow passages north of the Strand, near Covent Garden.

Bernard (St.). Abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the twelfth century. His fame for wisdom was very great, and few church matters were undertaken without his being consulted.

Petit Bernard. Solomon Bernard, engraver of Lyons. (Sixteenth century.)

Poor Bernard. Claude Bernard, of Dijon, philanthropist (1588-1641).

Bernard. Bonus Bernardus non videt annus (see above). We are all apt to forget sometimes; events do not always turn out as they are planned beforehand.

"Poor Peter was to win honours at Shrewsbury school, and carry them thick to Cambridge; and after that, a living awaited him, the gift of his good mother, Sir Peter Arley, but Poor Peter's lot in life was very different to what his friends had planned.

--Mr. Gaskell, Chaucer, chap. vi.

Bernard Soup (St.). (See Stone Sour.)

Bernardo, in Dibdin's Bibliomania (a romance), is meant for Joseph Hazlewood, antiquary and critic (1811).

Bernardo del Carpio. One of the most favourite subjects of the Spanish minstrels; the other two being the Cid and Lara's seven infants.

Bernard's Inn. Formerly called Mackworth Inn, from Dean Mackworth, who died 1454.

"This house was, in the thirty-first year of the reign of Henry VI., a messuage belonging to Dr. John Mackworth, dean of the cathedral church of Lincoln, and at that time in the holding of one Lionel Bernard, and it hath ever since retained the name of Bernard's Inn."--Harleian MSS. No. 1104.

Berners or Barnes (Juliana). Prioress of Sopewell nunnery, near St. Albans, reputed authoress of the Book of Hawking and Hunting (1486). Generally called "Dame Berners." Another book ascribed to her is the Boke of the Blazing of Arms (1485).

Bernese (2 syl.). A native of Berne, in Switzerland.

Bernesque Poetry. Scrio-comic poetry: so called from Francesco Berni, of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it. (1490-1536.)

Bernouilli's Numbers or the properties of numbers first discovered by James Bernoulli, professor of mathematics at Basle (1654-1705).

Berserker. Grandson of the eighth-handed Starkadder and the beautiful Alfhilde, called her-serv (bare of mail) because he went into battle unharnessed. Hence, any man with the fighting fever on him.

"You say that I am berserker. And...I answer I go to war to win the war."--Rev. C. Kingsley: Berserard the Waite.

Berth. He has tumbled into a nice berth. A nice situation or fortune. The place in which a ship is anchored is called her berth, and the sailors call it a good or bad berth as they think it favourable or otherwise. The space also allotted to a seaman for his hammock is called his berth. (Norman, berth, a cradle.)

To give a wide berth. Not to come near a person; to keep a person at a distance. The place where a ship lies in harbour is called her berth: hence, to give a "wide berth" is to give a ship plenty of room to swing at anchor.

Bertha. The betrothed of John of Leyden, but, being a vassal of Count Oberthal, she was unable to marry without her lord's consent. When she went with her mother to ask permission of marriage, the count, struck with her beauty, determined to make her his mistress. She afterwards makes her escape from the castle, and, fancying that the "prophet" had caused the death of her lover, goes to Munster fully resolved to compass his death by setting fire to the palace. She is apprehended, and, being brought before the prophet-king, recognises her lover in-him, saying, "I loved thee once, but now my love is turned to hate," and stabs herself. (Meyerbeer's opera, Le Prophète.)

Bertha. The blind daughter of Caleb Plummer in Dickens's Cricket on the Heath (a Christmas story), 1845.

Bertha (Frau). A German impersonation of the Epiphany, corresponding to the Italian Befana. Represented as a white lady, who steals softly into nurseries and rocks infants asleep in the absence of negligent nurses; she is, however, the terror of all naughty children. Her feet are very large, and she has an iron nose. (See Befana.)

Berthas [Stock Exchange term]. The London, Brighton, & South Coast Railway Deferred Stock.

Berthe au Grand Pied. Mother of Charlemagne, and great granddaughter of Charles Martel; so called because she had a club-foot.

Bertoldo [Bay-told]. Imperturbable as Bertoldo, i.e. not to be taken by surprise, thrown off your guard, or disconcerted at anything. Bertoldo is the hero of a little jeu d'esprit in Italian prose, J. Cesare Croce. He is a comedian by profession, whom nothings astonishes, and is as much at his ease with kings and queens as with persons of his own rank and vocation.

Bertram. One of the conspirators against the Republic of Venice "in whom there was a hesitating softness fatal to a great enterprise." He betrayed the conspiracy to the senate. (Byron: Marino Faliero.)

Bertram (Henry), in Sir W. Scott's novel of Guy Mannering, was suggested by James Annesley, Esq., rightful heir of the earldom of Anglesey, of which he was dispossessed by his uncle Richard. He died in 1743.

Bertram, Count of Rosillion, beloved by Heléna, the hero of Shakespeare's comedy, All's Well that Ends Well.

"I cannot reconcile my heart to Bertram, a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who marries Heléna as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate."—Dr. Johnson.

Bertram Risingham. The vassal of Philip of Mortham. Oswald Wycliffe induced him to shoot his lord at Marston Moor, and for this vile deed the vassal demanded of him all the gold and movables of his late master. Oswald, being a villain, tried to outwit Bertram, and even murder him; but in the end it turns out that Mortham was not killed, neither was Oswald his heir, for Redmond O'Neale, the page of Rokeby, is found to be Mortham's son. (Scott: Rokeby.)

Bertramò. The fiend-father of Robert le Diable. After alluring his son to gamble away all his possessions, he meets him near the rocks St. Irène, and Heléna seduces him in the "Dance of Love." When Bertramò at last comes to claim his victim, he is resisted by Alice, the foster-sister of the duke, who reads to him his mother's will, and angels come to celebrate the triumph of good over evil. (Meyerbeer's opera of Roberto il Diavolo.)

Berwick [Stock Exchange term]. The London, Brighton, & South Coast Railway shares. The line runs to Berwick.

Beryl Molezane (3 syl.). The lady beloved by George Geitch; a laughing, loving beauty, all sunshine and artlessness; tender, frank, full of innocent chatter; helping everyone and loving everyone. Her lot is painfully unhappy, and she dies. (P. G. Travford [J. H. Riddell]: George Geitch.)

Bersok [the interval]. The space between death and the resurrection. (The Koran.)

Beassile. A great grandfather (French, bismule). This word should be restored.

Besants or Bezzards. Circular pieces of bullion without any impression, supposed to represent the old coinage of Byzantium, and to have been brought to Europe by the Crusaders.

Beside the Cushion. Beside the question; not to the point; not pertinent to the matter in hand. French, hors de propos; Latin, nihil ad rhombum. It was Judge Jeffreys who used the phrase, "Besides [sic] the cushion."

Besom. To hang out the besom. To have a fling when your wife is gone on a visit. To be a quasi bachelor once more. Taking this in connection with the following phrase, it evidently means, holding the marriage service in abeyance.

"This is French argot. Retirer le balai (to burn the besom) means to live the life of a literator, whence balard, Paris slang for a literate. Probably our phrase, "burn the besom," is pretty much the same as retirer le balai.

Jumping the besom. Omitting the marriage service after the publication of banns, and living together as man and wife. In Southern Scotch, a street-walker is called a bess, and in French balai (a besom) means the life of a libertine, as Édité le balai; Il ont bien vouti le balai ensemble, where balai means a bunch or something worse. No further explanation can be needed or could be given.

Bess. Good Queen Bess. Queen Elizabeth (1533, 1558-1603).

Bess o’ Bedlam. A female lunatic vagrant. Bedlam is a common name for a madhouse, and Bess is a national name for a woman, especially of the lower order. The male lunatic is a Tom o’ Bedlam.

Bess of Hardwicke. Elizabeth, Countess of Shrewsbury, to whose charge, in 1572, Mary Queen of Scots was committed. The countess treated the captive queen with great harshness, being jealous of the earl her husband. Bess of Hardwicke married four times: Alexander Barley (when she was only fourteen years of age); William Cavendish; Sir William St. Loe, Captain of Queen Elizabeth’s Guard; and lastly, George, Earl of Shrewsbury. She built Hardwicke Hall, and founded the wealth and dignity of the Cavendish family.

Bessemor Iron. Pig-iron refined, and converted into steel or malleable iron by passing currents of air through the molten metal, according to a process discovered by Sir H. Bessemor, and patented in 1853.

Bessie Bell and Mary Gray. A ballad. The tale is that these two young ladies, natives of Perth, to avoid the plague of 1666, retired to a rural retreat called the Burnbraes, about a mile from Lynedock, the residence of Mary Gray. A young man, in love with both, carried them provisions. Both ladies died of the plague, and were buried at Dornock Hough.

Besus. A cowardly, braggart captain, a sort of Bobadil (q.v.). Brannum and Fletcher: I King and no King.

Best. *At best or At the very best.

At one’s best. At the highest or best point attainable by the person referred to. For the best. With the best of motives; with the view of obtaining the best results.

I must make the best of my way home.

It is getting late and I must use my utmost diligence to get home as soon as possible.

To have the best of it, or, To have the best of the bargain. To have the advantage or best of a transaction.

To make the best of the matter. To submit to ill-luck with the best grace in your power.

Best Man (at a wedding). The bridegroom’s chosen friend who waits on him, as the bride’s maids wait on the bride.

Best Things (The Eight), according to Scandianavian mythology:—

1. The ash Yggdrasil is the best of trees;
2. Skidbladnir, of ships;
3. Odin, of the Ásgör;
4. Sleipnir, of steeds;
5. Bifrost, of bridges;
6. Bragi, of bards;
7. Habrok, of hawks
8. Garm, of hounds.

Bestiaries or Bestials. Books very popular in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, containing the pictures of animals and their symbolisms.

“The unicorn has but one horn in the middle of its forehead. It is the only animal that ventures to attack the elephant; and so alarum is the nail of its foot, that with one blow it can rip the belly of that beast. Hunters can catch the unicorn only by placing a young virgin in its haunts. No sooner does he see the damsel, than he runs towards her, and lies down at her feet, and so suffers himself to be captured by the hunters. The unicorn represents Jesus Christ, who took on Him our nature in the Virgin’s womb, was betrayed to the Jews, and delivered into the hands of Pontius Pilate. Its one horn signifies the gospel of Truth;…” —Le Bestiaire Dixneuf de Guillaume d’Emerainville, de la Normandie (13th century).

Bête. Morte la bête, mort le vein.

Dead men tell no tales: dead dogs don’t bite. When one is dead his power of mischief is over. Literally, if the beast is dead, its poison is dead also.

Quand Jean-Bête est mort, il a laissé bien des héritiers. Casimir Delavigne says to the same effect. Les sots depuis Adam sont en majorité. Jean-Bête means a fool or dolt.

Bête Noire. The thorn in the side, the bitter in the cup, the spoke in the wheel, the black sheep, the object of aversion. A black sheep has always been considered an eyesore in a flock, and its wool is really less valuable. In times of superstition it was looked on as bearing the devil’s mark.

“The Dutch sale of th is the bête noire of the Cornish inners.” —The Times.

Beth Gelert, or “the Grave of the Greyhound.” A ballad by the Hon. William Robert Spencer. The tale is that one day Llewellyn returned from hunting, when his favourite hound, covered with gore, ran to meet him. The chief-0 ain run to se if anything had happened to his infant son, found the cradle overturned, and all around was sprinkled with gore and blood. Thinking the hound had eaten the child, he stabbed it to the heart. Afterwards he found the babe quite safe, and a huge wolf under the bed, quite dead. Gelfert had killed the wolf and saved the child.

Bethlemites (4 syl.). Followers of John Huss, so called because he used to preach in the church called Bethlehem of Prague.

Betrothed (The). One of the Tales of the Crusaders, by Sir Walter Scott, 1832. Lady Eveline Berenger is the betrothed of Sir Damian de Lacy, whom she marries.

Better. My better half. A jocose way of saying my wife. As the twain are one, each is half. Horace calls his friend animam dimidiam mee. (1 Odes iii. 8.)
To be better than his word. To do more than he promised.
To think better of the matter. To give it further consideration; to form a more correct opinion respecting it.

Better kind Friend, etc. Better kind friend than friend kind. Friend is a corruption of frend, meaning a stranger. Better [a] kind stranger than a kinsman who makes himself a stranger, or an estranged kinsman.

Better off. In more easy circumstances.

Bettina. A mascot who always brought good luck wherever she went.
Though a mere peasant, she is taken to the Prince of Piombino's palace of Laurent, to avert his ill-luck; but by marrying Pippo (a shepherd) she loses her gift. However, the prince is re-mined that the children of a mascot are hereditary mascots, and makes Bettina promise that her first child shall be adopted by the prince. (See Mas-cotte.)

Bettina. The name under which Elizabeth Brentano translated into English Goethe's Letters to a Child in 1835. She was the wife of Ludwig Achim von Arnim, and it was her correspondence with Goethe which were the Letters to a Child referred to. Elizabeth Brentano was born 1785.

Betty. A name of contempt given to a man who interferes with the duties of female servants, or occupies himself in female pursuits; also called a “Molly.”

Betty. A skeleton key: the servant of a picklock. Burglars call their short crowbars for forcing locks Jennies and Jemmys. “Jenny” is a “small engine,” i.e. ‘ginie, and Jimmy is merely a variant.

Betulium. Dumby, or the Cape of St. Andrew, in Scotland.

“THE northern-shattered tempest foams
Over Orka's and Bethulium's highest peak”

Thomas: Autumn, v. 2.

Between. Between hay and grass.
Neither one thing nor yet another: a hobbled-dhoe, neither a man nor yet a boy.

Between cup and lip. (See Slip.) Between Scylla and Charybdis. Between two equal dangers; on the horns of a dilemma. (See Charybdis.)

Between two fires. Between two dangers. In war, an army fired upon from opposite sides is in imminent danger.

Between two stools you came to the ground. “Like a man on double business bound, I stand in pause where I shall first begin, and both neglect.” He who hunts two hares leaves one and loses the other.” Simul sorbiye ac flave non possum. The allusion is to a children’s game called “The Ambassador,” also a practical joke at one time played at sea when the ship crossed the line. Two stools are set side by side, but somewhat apart, and a cloth is covered over them.
A person sits on each stool to keep the cloth taut, and the ambassador is invited to sit in the middle; but, as soon as he is seated, the two rise and the ambassador comes to the ground.

Between you and me. (French, entre vous). In confidence be it spoken.
Sometimes, Between you and me and the gate-post. These phrases, for the most part, indicate that some ill-natured remark or slander is about to be made of a third person, but occasionally they refer to some offer or private affair. “Between ourselves” is another form of the same phrase.

Betwixt and Between. Neither one nor the other, but somewhere between the two. Thus, grey is neither white nor black, but betwixt and between the two.

Beurre. Avoir beurre n'ay la tête. To be covered with crimes. Taken from a Jewish saying, “If you have butter on your head (i.e. have stolen butter and put it in your cap), don’t go into the sun.”

(Vidocq: Volcurs, vol. i. p. 16.)
Beuvres (1 syl.), or Inu'ro of Aymre'-mout. The father of Malagigi, and uncle of Rinaldo. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Bever. A “drink” between meals (Italian, bereve, to drink—our beverage; Latin, bibere—our in-bibre). At Eton they used to have “Bever days,” when extra beer and bread were served during the afternoon in the College Hall to scholars, and any friends whom they might bring in.

“...will devour three breakfasts... without prejudice to his bevers.”—Beaumont and Fletcher: Hemon Hater, I. 3.

“Whate’er can deck mankind,
Or charm the heart, in generous Bev. I shrow’d.”—Thomson: Winter, 61-5.

Bevis. The horse of Lord Marmion. (Sir Walter Scott.) (See Horse.)

Beris of Southampton. A knight of romance, whose exploits are recounted in Dryden’s Polyolbion. The French call him Bevres de Hantone.

Bevoriskius, whose Commentary on the Generations of Adam is referred to by Sterne in the Sentimental Journey, was Johannes Bevoriscius, physician and senator, author of a large number of books. The Commentary will be found at fol. 1 (1652).

Bevy. A bevy of ladies. A throng or company; properly applied to rebecks, quails, and peaseants. Timid gregarious animals, in self-defence, go down to a river to drink in beves or small companies. Ladies, from their timidity, are placed in the same category (Italian, bereve, to drink).

“A and upon her deck what a bevy of human flowers—young women, how lovely!—out from me, how noble!”—De Quincey: Dream-foamer.

Bevan’iel, in the satire of Abulon and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Marquis of Worcester, afterwards Duke of Beaufort.

“Beauhles with each grace and virtue fraught,
Serene his looks, serene his life and thoughts;
On whom so largely Nature heaped her store,
There LNGE remained for arts to give him more.”—Part II. u. 47-50.

Bezon’ian. A new recruit; applied originally in derision, to young soldiers sent from Spain to Italy, who landed both ill-accoutered and in want of everything (Ital. besogni, from bisogno, need; French besoin).

“Besog and piffering besogniis and marauders.”—Sir W. Scott: Monastery, xvi.

“Great men oft die by a ze bezonians.”—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., act v. 1.

“Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die” (2 Hen. IV., act v. 3). Choose your leader or take the consequences —Cesar or Pompey? “Speak or die.”

Bheem or Bhima. One of the five Pandos, or brotherhoods of Indian demi-gods, famous for his strength. He slew the giant Kinchick, and dragged his body from the hills, thereby making the Kinchick ravine.

Bisum, in rhetoric, means converting the proof into a disproof. As thus: That you were the murderer is proved by your being on the spot at the time. Reply: Just the contrary, if I had been the guilty person most certainly I should have run away. (Greek, biason.)

Biana. Wife of Fazio. When Fazio became rich, and got entangled with the Marchioness Aldabella, she accused him to the Duke of Florence of being privy to the death of Bartolido, an old miser. Fazio was arrested and condemned to death. Bianca now repented of her jealous rashness, and tried to save her husband, but failing in her endeavours, went mad, and died of a broken heart. (Dram Milman: Fazio.)

X.B. — The name is employed by Shakespeare both in his Taming of the Shrew and also in Othello.

Biach (S-e NERL)

Bias. The weight in bowls which makes them deviate from the straight line; hence any favourite idea or pursuit, or whatever predisposes the mind in a particular direction.

Bows are not now loaded, but the bias depends on the shape of the bowls. They are flattened on one side, and therefore roll obliquely.

“Your stomach makes your fabric roll,
Just as the bias rules the bow.”—Prior: Alina, iii. line 120.
Bibliss Caldhuo Merq. The punning nickname of Tiberiuus Claudius Nero, Bibliss [Tiberius], drink-loving, Caldhuo Merq [Claudius Nero], by metathesis for calidus merq, hot with wine.

Bible means simply a book, but is now exclusively confined to the “Book of Books.” (Greek, biblos, a book.)
The headings of the chapters were prefixed by Miles Smith, Bishop of Gloucester, one of the translators.
(i) Bibles named from errors of type, or from archaic words:

The Breach of Bible. So called because Genesis iii. 7 was rendered, “The eyes of them both were opened... and they sowed fig-tree leaves together, and made themselves breeches.” By Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson, 1579.
The Idle Bible, 1809. In which the “idole shepherd” (Zech. xi. 17) is printed “the idle shepherd.”
The Bug Bible, 1551. So called because Psalm xxi. 5 is translated, “Thou shalt not be afraid of bugs [bogies] by night.”
The Great Bible. The same as Matthew Parker’s Bible (q.v.).
The Place-maker’s Bible. So called from a printer’s error in Matt. v. 9, “Blessed are the placemakers [peace-makers], for they shall be called the children of God.”
The Profligate Bible makes David pathetically complain that “the printers [princes] have persecuted me without a cause” (Ps. cxix. 161).
The Tryacle Bible, 1549 (Beck’s Bible), in which the word “balm” is rendered “treacle.” The Bishops’ Bible has tryacle in Jer. iii. 28; xlvi. 11; and in Ezek. xxvii. 17.
The Unrighteous Bible, 1652 (Cambridge Press). So called from the printer’s error, “Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the Kingdom of God?” (1 Cor. vi. 9).
The Vinegar Bible. So called because the heading to Luke xx. is given as “The parable of the Vinegar” (instead of Vineyard). Printed at the Clarendon Press in 1549.
The Wicked Bible. So called because the word not is omitted in the seventh commandment, making it, “Thou shalt commit adultery.” Printed by Barker and Lucas, 1632.

To these may be added: the Discharge Bible, the Ezra to Bar Bible, Rebecca’s Canons Bible, the Royal Bible, the Standing Fishes Bible, and some others.

(ii) Bibles named from proper names, or dignities.

Bishop’s Bible. The revised edition of Archbishop Parker’s version. Published 1668.
Coverdale’s Bible, 1535. Translated by Miles Coverdale, afterwards Bishop of Exeter. This was the first Bible sanctioned by royal authority.
Cranmer’s Bible, 1539. This is Coverdale’s Bible corrected by Archbishop Cranmer. It was printed in 1540, and in 1549 every parish church was enjoined to have a copy under a penalty of 40s. a month.
The Douay Bible, 1581. A translation made by the professors of the Douay College for the use of English boys designed for the Catholic priesthood.
The Geneva Bible. The Bible translated by the English exiles at Geneva, the same as the “Breeches Bible” (q.v.).
The King James’s Bible. The Authorised Version; so called because it was undertaken by command of James I. Published 1611.
Matthew Parker’s Bible, or “The Great Bible,” published in the reign of Henry VIII. under the care of Archbishop Parker and his staff (1530-1641). In 1572 several prolegomena were added.
Matthew’s Bible is Tindal’s version. It was so called by John Rogers, superintendent of the English churches in Germany, and was published with notes under the fictitious name of Thomas Matthew, 1537.
The Mazarine Bible. The earliest book printed in moveable metal type. It contains no date. Copies have been recently sold from £2,000 to £5,000. Called the Mazarine Bible from the Bibliothèque Mazarine, founded in Paris by Cardinal Mazarine in 1648.
Sacy’s Bible. So called from Isaac Louis Sacy (Le-maistre), director of the Port Royal Monastery. He was imprisoned for three years in the Bastille for his Jansenist opinions, and translated the Bible during his captivity (1666-1670).
Tyndale’s Bible. William Tyndale, or Tindal, having embraced the Reformed religion, retired to Antwerp, where he printed an English translation of the Scriptures. All the copies were bought up, whereupon Tyndale printed a revised edition. The book excited the rancour of the Catholics, who strangled the “heretic” and burnt his body near Antwerp in 1536.
Wyclif’s Bible, 1380, but first printed in 1550.
Bible-backed

Bickerstaff

The letter א in the Hebrew text occurs 76,023 times. These are the most frequent.

The letter ת appears 11,023 times.

The letter י is the most frequent.

The Bible was divided into chapters by Cardinal Hugo de Sancto-Caro, about 1250.

The Old Testament was divided into verses by Rabbi Mordecai Nathan, and the New Testament, in 1544, by B. Stephens, a French printer, it is said, while on horseback.

The 3,000 languages and dialects on the earth, the Bible has been translated into 750.

The Sephardim, a translation into Greek, was made in 1753. The first complete English translation was by Wicliffe, A.D. 1580.

The Old Testament was divided into verses by B. Stephens, a French printer, it is said, while on horseback.

Bibliomancy. Forecasting future events by the Bible. The plan was to open the sacred volume at random, and lay your finger on a passage without looking at it. The text thus pointed out was supposed to be applicable to the person who pointed it out. (Greek, biblia, Bible; manteia, prophecy.) (See Sortes.)

Another process was to weigh a person suspected of magic against a Bible. If the Bible bore down the other scale, the accused was acquitted.

Bibulus. Colleague of Julius Caesar, a mere cipher in office, whence his name has become proverbial for one in office who is a mere factotum.

Biceps. Muscular strength of the arm; properly, the prominent muscles of the upper arm; so called because they have two heads. (Latin, biceps, two heads.)

Biceps Parnassus (Pers. Tr. 2), i.e. Parnassus with two heads or tops (his caput).

Nec fonte huma procul calamino,
Nec in Iungulis somnantes Parnass
Almei, in regione arc poetarum prolorum.
Persius: Satires (prologue).

Bickerstaff (Isaac). A name assumed by Dean Swift in a satirical pamphlet against Partridge, the almanack-maker. This produced a paper war so diverting that Steele issued the Tatter under the editorial name of "Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., Astrologer." (1709.)
Bicorn. An hypothetical beast supposed to devour all men under petty-coat government. It is described as very fat and well liking. There was another beast called Chichevache, which fed on obedient wives, but the famished beast was thinner than the most rascal of Pharaoh's lean kine, for its food always fell short. Of course, bi-corn (two-horns) contains an allusion familiar to all readers of our early literature.

Bid. To bid fair. To seem likely: as “He bids fair to do well;” “It bids fair to be a fine day.” (Anglo-Saxon, bidden, to promise, to offer.)

To bid for [votes]. To promise to support in Parliament certain measures, in order to obtain votes.

To bid against one. To offer or promise a higher price for an article at auction.

“I bid him defiance. I offer him defiance; I defy him.”

Bid. I bid you good night. I wish you good night, or I pray that you may have a good night. This is the Anglo-Saxon bidon, to ask, pray, or intreat. Whence “beads-men” (q.v.), “bidding prayer” (q.v.). “Bid him welcome.”

“Neither beat him God-speed.”—2 John 10, 11.

To bid the [marriage] banus. To ask if anyone objects to the marriage of the persons named. “Si quis” (q.v.).

To bid to the wedding. In the New Testament is to ask to the wedding feast.

Bideford Postman. Edward Capern, the poet (born 1819), so called because at one time he was a letter-carrier at Bideford. He died in 1894.

Bidpai. [See PILPAI.]

Biforked Letter of the Greeks. The capital Μ, made thus Μ, which resembles a bird flying.

“[The birds] flying, write upon the sky
The biforked letter of the Greeks.”

Bifrost, in Scandinavian mythology, is the name of the bridge between heaven and earth; the rainbow may be considered to be this bridge, and its various colours are the reflections of its precious stones. (Icelandic, bifa, tremble, and rost, path.)

The keeper of the bridge is Heimdall. It leads to Doomstead, the palace of the Norns or Fates.

Big. To look big. To assume a consequential air.

To talk big. To boast or brag.

Big Bird. To get the big bird (i.e. the goose). To be hissed on the stage. A theatrical expression.

Big-endians. A religious party in the empire of Lilliput, who made it a matter of conscience to break their eggs at the big end; they were looked on as heretics by the orthodox party, who broke theirs at the small end. The Big-endians are the Catholics, and the Little-endians the Protestants.

Big Gooseberry Season (The). The time when Parliament is not assembled.
Big-wig. A person in authority, a "nobilissimus." Of course, the term arises from the custom of judges, bishops, and so on, wearing large wigs. Bishops no longer wear them.

Bigarron. Incorrectly spelt Bienne-ron. A white-heart cherry. (French, bigarron; Latin, bigarella; i.e. bis var-ellus, double-variegated, red and white mixed. The French word, bigarrure, means party-colour, bigarrer.)

Biggles (pron. beeys). Jewels, female ornaments. (Also written bee.) She is all in her biggles to-day—i.e. in full fig, in excellent spirits, in good humour.

Bight. To hook the bight—i.e. to get entangled. The bight is the bend or double part of a rope, and when the rope of one anchor gets into the "bight" of another, it gets "hooked."

Bigorne (2 syl.). A corruption of "Bicorn" (q.v.).

Big'ot means simply a worshipper (Anglo-Saxon, bigan, to worship; German, bigott). Various explanations have been given from time to time, but none are well supported.

Bigot and his Castle of Bungay. (See Castle, etc.)

Bill. A rapier or sword. So called from Bilba'o, in Spain, once famous for its finely-tempered blades. Falstaff says to Ford:

"I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; first, an invisible fright, to be detected; next, to be encompassed, like a good bill, hit to point, heel to head; and then . . ."—Merry Wives, iii. 5.

Billboes. A bar of iron with fetters annexed to it, by which mutinous sailors are linked together. The word is derived from Bilba'o, in Spain, where they were first made. Some of the billboes taken from the Spanish Arma'das are still kept in the Tower of London.

Bill. It raises my bile. It makes me angry or indignant. In Latin, biliosa (a bilious man) meant a choleric one. According to the ancient theory, bile is one of the humours of the body, and when excited abnormally it produces cholera or rage.

"It raised my bile to see him reflect their grief aside."—Hood: Flora of Midsummer Fairies, stanza 54.

"Black bile is melancholy."

Bilge Water. Filthy drainings. The bilge in the lowest part of a ship, and, as the rain or sea-water which trickles down to this part is hard to get at, it is apt to become foul and very offensive.

Bill. To cheat, to obtain goods and decamp without paying for them.

"The landlord explained it by saying that 'a bilk' is a man who never misses a meal and never pays a cent."—A. K. McClure: Rocky Mountains, letter xxvii. p. 211.

"To 'bilk' in cribbage is to spoil your adversaries' score; to balk him. Perhaps the two words are mere variants."

Bilker (A). A person who gives a cabman less than his fare, and, when remonstrated with, gives a false name and address. Sometimes a "bilker" gets out and says, "Cabby, I shall be back in a minute," turns the corner and is no more seen.

"The time for taking out a summons expires in a few days, but it often takes longer than that, to hunt a 'bilker' down."—Nineteenth Century (March, 1863, p. 177).

Also a cabman who does not pay the owner for the cab.

Bill (The). The nose, also called the beak. Hence, "Billy" is slang for a pocket-handkerchief.

"Lastly came Winter, clothed all in frize. Clattering his teeth, for cold that did him chill; Whims' on his hoary head his breath did freeze: And the dull drops that from his purple bill (nose). As from a humbuck, did dawn a distill."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, canto vii.

A public bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament affecting the general public. A privata bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament for the granting of something to a company, corporation, or certain individuals.

A true bill. I confess what you say is true. The case against the accused is first submitted to the grand jury. If they think the charge has a fair colour, they write on the declaration "A true bill," and the case is submitted to the petty jury. Otherwise, they write "No true bill," or "Not found," and the cause is at once dismissed or "ignored."

To ignore a bill is to write on it ignoramus.

"Ignoramus" is the word properly used by the Grand Enquest . . . and written upon the bill."—Cowper.
Bill of Fare. A list of the menu provided, or which may be ordered, at a restaurant.

Bill of Health. A clean bill of health. A document, duly signed by the proper authorities, to certify that when the ship set sail no infectious disorder existed in the place.

A foul bill of health is a document to show that the place was suffering from some infection when the ship set sail. If a captain cannot show a clean bill, he is supposed to have a foul one.

Bill of Lading. A document signed by the master of a ship in acknowledgment of goods laden in his vessel. In this document he binds himself to deliver the articles in good condition to the persons named in the bill, certain exceptions being duly provided for. These bills are generally in triplicate—one for the sender, one for the receiver, and one for the master of the vessel.

Bill of Pains and Penalties (J.). A legislative act imposing punishment (less than capital) upon a person charged with treason or other high crimes.

Bill of Quantities. An abstract of the probable cost of a building.

Bill of Rights. The declaration delivered to the Prince of Orange on his election to the British throne, confirming the rights and privileges of the people. (Feb. 13th, 1689.)

Bill of Sale. When a person borrows money and delivers goods as security, he gives him a bill of sale, that is, permission to sell the goods if the money is not returned on a stated day.

Bills of Mortality took their rise in 1562, when a great pestilence broke out, which continued till 1595. The term is now used for those abstracts from parish registers which show the births, deaths, and baptisms of the district.

Within the Bills of Mortality = within the district.

Bills of Parcels. An itemised statement of articles purchased. These bills are itemised by the seller.

Billete (Little). The youngest of "Three sailors of Bristol city," who "took a boat and went to sea."

"There was gorging Jack, and gazing Jimmy, And the youngest—he was little Bille. Now, when they got as far as the equator, They had nothing left but one ship's pee. To gorging Jack says gazing Jimmy, 'We've no water left, we must eat sea.'"

[They decide to eat Little Billee, but he contrives to escape.]

Billett-doux [pronounce billy doo]. French, a love-letter, a sweet or affectionate letter.

Billiards. A corrupt form of the French billiard. "Antrefois, le banton arce legant on poussait les billes"; then "In table vorte sur ligne y un;" and, lastly, the "game itself."

Similar plural forms are the games called bowls, cards, dominoes, draughts, marbles, quoits, skittles, tops, etc.

Billings (Josh). The mon de plume of H. W. Shaw, an American humorist, who died 1885. His Book of Sayings was published in 1866.

Billingsgate (London). Gate = quay, and bellan is to bawl or holler. This quay is so called from the shouting of the fishermen in trying to attract attention and vend their fish.

That's Billingsgate. Vulgar and coarse, like the manners and language of Billingsgate fish-fags.

"Parnasius spoke the cant of Billingsgate." DRYDEN. Art of Poetry, c. 1.

To talk Billingsgate, i.e. to slang, to scold in a vulgar, coarse style.

You are no better than a Billingsgate fish-fag, i.e. you are as rude and ill-mannered as the women of Billingsgate fish-market. The French say "Maubert," instead of Billingsgate, as your compliments are like those of the Place Maubert, i.e. no compliments at all, but vulgar dirt-flinging. The "Place Maubert" has long been noted for its market.

Billingsgate Pheasant (J.). A red herring.

Billy. A policeman's staff, which is a little bill or billet.

A pocket-handkerchief. "A blue billy" is a handkerchief with blue ground and white spots.

Billy Barlow. A street droll, a merry Andrew; so called from a half-idiot of the name, who fancied himself "some great personage." He was well known in the East of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his Billycock Hats. First used by Billy Coke (Mr. William Coke) at the great shooting parties at Holkham. The old-established hatters in the West End still call them "Coke hats."

Bi-metalism. The employment of two metals, silver and gold, of fixed relative value. Now gold is the only standard metal in England and some other countries. Silver coins are mere tokens, like copper coins; and if given in payment of large sums are estimated at the market value, so much an ounce; but a gold sovereign is always of one fixed legal value.

Binary Arithmetic. Arithmetic in which the base of the notation is 2 instead of 10. The unit followed by a cipher signifies two, by another unit it signifies three, by two ciphers it signifies four, and so on. Thus, 10 signifies two, 100 signifies four; while 11 signifies 3, etc.

Binary Theory. A theory which supposes that all definite chemical salts are combinations of two radicles or elements, one of which is electro-positive (basic), and the other electro-negative (acid).

Bingham's Dandies. The 17th Lancers: so called from their colonel, the Earl of Lucan, formerly Lord Bingham. The uniform is noted for its admirable fit and smartness. Now called "The Duke of Cambridge's Own Lancers."

Binnacle. The case of the mariner's compass, which used to be written bittacle, a corruption of the Portuguese bitacola, French, habitacle, properly an abode.

Birchin Lane. I must send you to Birchin Lane, i.e. whip you. The play is on birch (a rod).

A suit in Birchin Lane. Birchin Lane was once famous for all sorts of apparel; references to second-hand clothes in Birchin Lane are common enough in Elizabethan books.

"Passing through Birchin Lane amidst a camp-royal of hose and doublets, I took... men... to slip into a captain's suit—a valiant buff doublet stuffed with pollys and a pair of velvet shoes scored thick with lace."—Madjolin: Black Book (1604).

Bird. An endearing name for girl.

And by my word, your homely bird
In danger shall not tarry
But when the waves are raging white,
I'll row you over the ferry.

Campbell: Lord Villois's Daughter.

Bird is the Anglo-Saxon bird, the young of any animal, hence bride, verb, bera, to bring forth.

A bird of ill-omen. A person who is regarded as unlucky; one who is in the habit of bringing ill-news. The ancients thought that some birds indicated good luck, and others evil. Even to the present day many look upon owls, crows, and ravens as unlucky birds; swallows and storks as lucky ones.

Ravens, by their acute sense of smell, discern the savour of dying bodies, and, under the hope of preying on them, light on chimney-tops or flutter about sick rooms; hence the raven indicates death. Owls screech when bad weather is at hand, and as foul weather often precedes sickness, so the owl is looked on as a funeral bird.

A bird of passage. A person who shifts from place to place; a temporary visitant, like a cuckoo, the swallows, starlings, etc.

A jail-bird. (See JAIL.)

The bird of Juno. The peacock.

Minerva's bird is either the cock or the owl; that of Venus is the dove.

The bird of Washington. The American or baldheaded eagle.

"The well-known half-headed eagle, sometimes called the Bird of Washington."—Wood.

The Arabian bird. The phoenix.

The green bird tells everything a person wishes to know. (Cherry and Fairstar.)

The talking bird spoke with a human voice, and could bid all other birds join in concert. (Arabian Nights.)

Old birds are not to be dealt with chaff. Experience teaches wisdom.

One beats the bush, and another takes the bird. The workman does the work, the master makes the money.

'Tis the early bird that catches the worm.

"Early to bed and early to rise,
Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise."

A little bird told me so. From Eccles.

x. 20: "Curse not the king, no not in thy thought... for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter."

Bird in the hand. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. Possession is better than expectation.

Italian: "E meglio aver oggi un nov, che domani una gallina."

French: "Il vaut mieux avoir l'œuf aujourd'hui, que le poulet demain." (Turkish)

"I'en veux mieux que deux en l'aurait."

"Un son, quand il est assuré, vaut mieux que cing en espérance."

German: "Ein Vogel in der Hand ist besser als sieben über Land."
Bird in thy Bosom. Thou hast kept well the bird in thy bosom. Thou hast remained faithful to thy allegiance or faith. The expression was used by Sir Ralph Percy (alain in the battle of Hedgeley Moor in 1464) to express his having preserved unainted his fidelity to the House of Lancaster.

Bird of Ezé. The white eagle, the cognisance of the house.

"His dazzling way
The bird of Ezé soars beyond the solar ray."

Turco: Jerusalem Delivered, x.

To kill two birds with one stone. To effect two objects with one outlay of trouble.

Birds (protected by superstitions).

Choughs are protected in Cornwall, because the soul of King Arthur migrated into a chough.

The Hawk is held sacred by the Egyptians, because it is the form assumed by Ba or Horus.

The Ibis is sacred in Egypt, and to kill one was at one time a capital offence. It is said that the god Thoth escaped (as an Ibis) from the pursuit of Typhon. Mother Carey's Chickens, or Storm Petrels are protected by sailors, from a superstition that they are the living forms of the souls of deceased sailors. The Robins is protected, both from Christian tradition and nursery legend. (See Roman Redbreast.)

The Stork is a sacred bird in Sweden, from the legend that it flew round the cross, crying Strâyka, Strâyka, when Jesus was crucified. (See Stork.)

Swans are superstitiously protected in Ireland from the legend of the Fianna (daughter of Lir), who was metamorphosed into a swan and condemned to wander in lakes and rivers till Christianity was introduced. (See Irish Melodies, Silent O'Moyle.)

The bat (a winged animal) was regarded by the Caribs as a good angel, which protected their dwellings at night; and it was accounted mori- fugous to kill one.

Bird's-eye View. A mode of perspective drawing in which the artist is supposed to be over the objects delineated, in which case he beholds them as a bird in the air would see them. A general view.

Birdcage Walk (St. James's Park, London); so called from an aviary.

Birmingham Post. John Freeth, who died at the age of seventy-eight in 1808. He was wit, poet, and publican, who not only wrote the words and tunes of songs, but sang them also, and sang them well.

Birthday Suit. He was in his birthday suit. Quite nude, as when first born.

Bis. Bis dat, qui cito dat (he gives twice who gives promptly)—i.e. prompt relief will do as much good as twice the sum at a future period (Publius Syrus Proverbs.)

Purple and bis, i.e. purple and fine linen (Latin, byssus, fine flax). The spelling is sometimes bis, bys, etc.

Biscuit (French-Latin, bis, twice; cuir, baked). So called because it was originally twice ovened. The Romans had a bread of this kind.

In pottery, earthenware or porcelain, after it has been hardened in the fire, but has not yet been glazed, is so called.

Bise. A wind that acts notably on the nervous system. It is prevalent in those valleys of Savoy that open to the north.

"The Bise blew cold." Rogers: Italy, part 1, div. 11, stanza 4.

Bishop (Evêque), the same word, episcopus; whence episc, esse, esseque, etique; also 'episcop, bishop.

Bishop, Cardinal, Pope (as beverages):

Pope is made by pouring red wine (such as claret or burgundy), either hot or cold, on ripe bitter oranges. The liquor is then sugared and spiced to taste. In Germany, ‘‘bishop’’ is a mixture of wine, sugar, nutmeg, and orange or lemon. It is sometimes called ‘‘Purple Wine,’’ and has received its name of bishop from its colour.

Cardinal is made by using white wine instead of red.

Pope is made by using toky.

"When I was at college, I was sued as a_slandale; Bishop was 'cup' with wine (properly claret or burgundy) added; Cardinal was 'cup' with brandy added. All were served with a hedge-bog (i.e. a whole lemon or orange bristling with cloves) floating in the midst. Each must have his own glass or cup filled by a ladie from the common bowl of a larger niter one.
Bishop Barnaby

The bishop hath put his foot in it. Said of milk or porridge that is burnt, or of meate over-roasted. Tyndale says, "If the pondech be burned-to, or the meates over rosted, we say the bisho hath put his fote in the potte," and explains it thus, "because the bishopes burn who they lust." Such food is also said to be bishopped.

Bishop Barnaby. The May-bug, lady-bird, etc.

Bishop in Partibus. (See In Partibus.)

Bishop of Hippo. St. Augustine (354-430) is often so referred to, He held the See for many years.

Bishop's Apron represents the short cassock which, by the 74th canon, all clergymen were enjoined to wear.

Bishop's Bible (The). (See under Bible, page 131, col. 2.)

Bishop's Mitre. Dean Stanley tells us that the cleft of a bishop's mitre represents the mark of the cross of the miter, when folded and carried under the arm, like an opera hat. (Christian Institutions, p. 151.)

Bissextile. Leap-year. We add a day to February in leap-year, but the Romans counted the 24th of February now. The 24th of February was called by them "dieis bisextus" (serto calendas Martias), the sextile or sixth day before March 1st; and this day being reckoned twice (bit) in leap-year, was called "annus bisextus."

Bisson or Bisen [blind] is the Anglo-Saxon bisea, Shakespeare (Hamlet, ii.
2) speaks of bisonne rheum (blinding tears), and in Coriolanus, ii. 1, "What harm can your bissonn spectucities gleam out of this character?"

Bisthorps'. The Thracians; so called from Biston, son of Mars, who built Bisthorps on the Lake Bistonis.

"So the Bisthopian race a maddeing team, fruit, and veg of the Thracian plan
With milk their bloody battaques they alay, or from the lion eat his quilling pre."-
On some abandoned scene fiercely th
Scene, tear, devour, and think it joy,"

Bit. A piece.

A bit of my mind, as "I'll tell him a bit of my mind," I'll reproape him.
Some word as bite, meaning a piece bit off, hence a piece generally.
(Ange-Saxen, bitan, to bite.)

Bit by bit. A little at a time; piecemeal.

Not a bit, or Not the least bit. Not at all; not the least likely. This may be not a morsel, or not a doit, rap, or sou.
"Bit" used to be a small Jamaica coin.
We still talk of a threepenny-bit. Bit, of course, is the substantive of bite, as morsel (French morceau) of murder.

Bit (of a horse). To take the bit in (or between) his teeth. To be obstinately self-willed; to make up one's mind not to yield. When a horse has a mind to run away, he takes the bit between his teeth, and the driver has no longer control over him.

"Mr. X. will not yield. He has taken the bit between his teeth, and is resolved to carry out his original measure."—Newspaper paragraph,
April 1, 1886.

Bit. Money. The word is used in the West Indies for a halfpence (fivepence). In Jamaica, a bit is worth sixpence, English; in America, 12½ cents; in Ireland, tempeence.

The word is still thieves' slang for money generally, and coiners are called bit-makers.

* In English we use the word for a coin which is a fraction of a unit. Thus, a shilling being a unit, we have a six-penny bit and threepenny bit (or not in bits but in divers pieces). So, taking a sovereign for a unit, we had seven-shillng bits, etc.

Bite. A cheat; one who bites us.
"The biter bit" explains the origin.
We say "a man was bitten" when he "burns his fingers" meddling with something which promised well but turned out a failure.

To bite the dust, as "Their enemies shall bite the dust," i.e. be slain in battle.

Bite. To bite one's thumb at another.
To insult; to provoke to a quarrel.

"Gregory, I will frown as I pass by; and let them take it as they list.
"Sampson. Nay, as they dare. I will bite my thumb at them; which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juiet, 1. 1.

To bite the lip, indicative of suppressed chagrin, passion, or annoyance.

"She had to bite her lips till the blood came in order to keep down the many words that would tuse in her heart."—Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, chap. 3.

To bite upon the bridle. To chump the bit, like an impatient or restless horse.

Bit'elas. Sister of Fairlimb, and daughter of Rukenaw, the ape, in the story of Reynard the Fox. (Akinvar.)

Bites and Bams. Hoaxes and quizzes; humbugery.

"[His] humble efforts at pecuniary were chiefly confined to... bites and bams."—Mr W. Scott:
The Anniversary, chap. 3.
Biting Remark (A). A remark more biting than Zeno's. Nearcho's ordered Zeno the philosopher to be pounded to death in a mortar. When he had been pounded some time, he told Nearcho's he had an important secret to communicate to him; but, when the tyrant bent over the mortar to hear what Zeno had to say, the dying man bit off his ear.

"That would have been a biting jest." Shakespeare: Richard III, act ii. 4.

Bitten. Imposed upon, let in, made to suffer loss. "I was terribly bitten in that affair" I suffered great loss. To bite is to cheat or suffer retaliation. Thus, Pope says, "The rogue was bit," he intended to cheat, but was himself taken in. "The biter bit" is the moral of Aesop's fable called The Viper and the File; and Goldsmith's mad dog, which, "for some private ends, went mad and bit a man," but the biter was bit, for "The man recovered of the bite, the dog it was that died."

Bitter End (The). A convert; with relentless hostility; also applied to affliction, as, "she bore it to the bitter end," meaning to the last stroke of adverse fortune. All Thy waves have gone over me, but I have borne up under them to the bitter end. Here "bitter end" means the end of the rope. The "bitter-end" is a sea term meaning "that part of the cable which is abaft the bitt." When there is no windlass the cables are fastened to bits, that is, pieces of timber so called; and when a rope is payed out to the bitter-end, or to these pieces of timber, all of it is let out, and no more remains. However, we read in Prov. v. 4, "Her end is bitter as wormwood," which, after all, may be the origin of the phrase.

Bitter as Gall, as soot, as wormwood. Absinthe is made of wormwood. (See Similes.)

Bittock. A little bit; -ock as a diminutive is preserved in bull-ock, hill-ock, butt-ock, etc. "A mile and a bittock" is a mile and a little bit. (Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, i.)

Biz, in theatrical slang, means "business." Good biz means full houses; but an actor's "biz" is quite another thing, meaning by-play. Thus, Hamlet trifling with Ophelia's fan, Lord Dundreary's hop, and so on, are the special "business" of the actor of the part. As a rule, the "business" is invented by the actor who creates the part, and is handed down by tradition.

Black for mourning was a Roman custom (Juvenal, x. 245) borrowed from the Egyptians.

Black, in blasonry, means constancy, wisdom, and prudence.

Black, in several of the Oriental nations, is a badge of servitude, slavery, and low birth. Our word blackguard seems to point to this meaning. The Latin niger meant bad, unpropitious. (See Blackguard.)

Black. (See under Colours for its symbolisms, etc.).

Black as a Crow (or as a raven); "as a raven's wing," as ink; as hell, i.e. hades (2 syl.), meaning death or the grave; as your hat, etc. (See Similes.)

Black as a Newgate Knocker. A Newgate knocker is the fringe or lock of hair which costermongers and thieves twist back towards the ear.

Black in the Face. Extremely angry. The face discoloured with passion or distress.

"Mr. Winkle pulled . . . till he was black in the face."—Derek: Pickwick Papers.

"He swore himself black in the face."—Peter Pindar, Wolcott.

Black is White. (See Swear.)

Beaten black and blue. So that the skin is black and blue with the marks of the beating.

I must have it in black and white, i.e. in plain writing; the paper being white and the ink black.

To say black's his eye, i.e. to vituperate, to blame. The expression, Black's the white of his eye, is a modern corruption. To say the eye is black or evil, is to accuse a person of an evil heart or great ignorance. The Latin niger also meant evil. (See Black Prince.)

"A fool may do all things, and no man say black's his eye."—The Tell Tale.

Black Act. 9 Geo. I. c. 22 is so called, because it was directed against the Waltham deer-stealers, who blackened their faces for disguise, and, under the name of Blacks, appeared in Epping Forest. This Act was repealed in 1827.

Black Acts. Acts of the Scottish Parliament between the accession of James I. and the year 1587; so called because they were printed in black characters.
Black Art. The art practised by conjurors, wizards, and others, who professed to have dealings with the devil. Black here means diabolical or wicked. Some derive it from nigromancy, a corruption of necromancy.

Black Assize. July 6th, 1577, when a putrid pestilence broke out at Oxford during the time of assize.

Black-balled. Not admitted to a club; the candidate proposed is not accepted as a member. In voting by ballot, those who accept the person proposed drop a white or red ball into the box, but those who would exclude the candidate drop into it a black one. It is now more usually done by two compartments, for "yes" and "no" respectively.

Black Book. A book exposing abuses in Church and State, which furnished much material for political reform in the early part of the present century. (See BLACK BOOKS.)

Amhurst speaks of the Proctor's black book, and tells us that no one can proceed to a degree whose name is found there. (1729.) It also appears that each regiment keeps a black book or record of ill-behaviour.

Black Book of the Admiralty. An old nautical code, said to have been compiled in the reign of Edward III.

Black Books. To be in my black books. In bad odour; in disgrace; out of favour. The black books were those compiled in the reign of Henry VIII. to set forth the scandalous proceedings of the English monasteries, and were so called from the colour of their binding. We have similarly the Blue Book, the Red Book, and so on.

Black Books of the Exchequer. An official account of the royal revenues, payments, perquisites, etc., in the reign of Henry II. Its cover was black leather. There are two of them preserved in the Public Record Office.

Black Brunswickers. A corps of 700 volunteer Hussars under the command of Frederick William, Duke of Brunswick, who had been forbidden by Napoleon to succeed to his father's dukedom. They were called "Black" because they wore mourning for the deceased Duke. Frederick William fell at Quatre-Bras, 1815. One of Millais's best pictures is called "The Black Brunswicker."

Black Cap, or the Judgment Cap, worn by a judge when he pass sentence of death on a prisoner. This cap is part of the judge's full dress. The judges wear their black caps on November 9th, when the Lord Mayor is presented in the Court of Exchequer. Covering the head was a sign of mourning among the Israelites, Greeks, Romans, and Anglo-Saxons. (2 Sam. xv. 30.)

Black Cattle. Oxen for slaughter; so called because black is their prevailing colour, at least in the north.

Black Cattle. Negro slaves.

"She was chartered for the West Coast of Africa to trade with the natives, but not in black cattle, for slavery was never our line of business." -- J. Grant: Dick Rodney, chap. 11.

Black Death. A putrid typhus, in which the body turned black with rapid putrefaction. It occurred in 1348, and carried off twenty-five millions in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater.

Black Diamonds. Coals; also clever fellows of the lower orders. Coals and diamonds are both carbon.

Black Dog. A fiend still dreaded in many country places. (See DOG.)

Black Doll. The sign of a marine store shop. The doll was a dummy dressed to indicate that cast-off garments were bought.

Black Flag. A denotes a pirate, and is called the "Jolly Roger."

Black Flags. Moslem soldiers. The banner of the Abbasides (3 syl.) is black; that of the Fatimites (3 syl.) green; and that of the Ommiades (3 syl.) white. Hence the banner of the Calif of Baghdad is black, but that of the Sultan of Damascus is green. (Gibbon, chap. iii.)

Black Flage. Pirates of the Chinese Sea who opposed the French in Tonquin, etc.

Black-foot. There is a powerful and numerous tribe of North American Indians called Black-foot. A black-foot is an intermediary in love affairs; but if perfidious to the wooer he was called a white-foot.

Blackfoot (The). One of the many Irish factions which disturbed the peace in the first half of the nineteenth century.

"And the Blackfoot, who courted each foeman's Fate? "In hot-foot speeity he'd fly from the stout Father Roach."-Lover.

Black Friars. The Dominicans were formerly so called in England.

Black Friday. December 6th, 1745, the day on which the news arrived in London that the Pretender had reached Derby.

Black Game. Heath-fowl; in contra-distinction to red game, as grouse. The male bird is called a blackcock.

Black Genevan (A). A black preaching gown; once used in some Anglican churches, and still used by some Dissenters in the pulpit. So called from Geneva, where Calvin preached in such a robe.

"The Nonconformist divine leaves his vestry in his black Genevan, loaded by his deacons and elders." —Newspaper paragraph, July 1st, 1693
(on Sunday bands).

Black-guards. These horse-boys and unmilitary folk, such as cooks with their pots, pans, and other kitchen utensils, which travel with an army, and greatly impede its march.

Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says: "In all great houses there were a number of dirty dependents, whose office it was to attend the wool-yards, sculleries, etc. Of these the most forlorn selected to carry coals to the kitchen. They rode with the pots and pans, and were in derision called the black-guards."

In the Lord Steward's office a proclamation (May 7th, 1683) begins thus:

"Whereas... a sort of vicious, idle, and masterless boys and rogues, commonly called the Black-guard, with divers other lewd and loose fellows...
do usually haunt and follow the court...
... Wee do hereby strictly charge... all those so called,... with all other loose, idle... men... who have intruded themselves into his Majesty's court and stables... to depart upon pain of imprisonment."

Black Hole of Calcutta. A dark cell in a prison into which Surajah Dow-lah thrust 146 British prisoners. Next morning only twenty-three were found alive (1756).

The punishment cell or lock-up in barracks.

Black Horse. The 7th Dragoon
Guards, or "the Princess Royal's D. G."

Their "facings" are black. Also called "Strawboots," "The Blacks."

Black Jack. Black Jack rides a good horse (Cornish). The miners call blend or sulphide of zinc "Black Jack," the occurrence of which is considered by them a favourable indication. The blende rides upon a lode of good ore.

Black Jack (A). A large leather gotch for beer and ale, so called from the outside being tarred.

Black Joe. An old tune, now called The Sprig of Shillelagh. Tom Moore has adapted words to the tune, beginning, "Sublime was the warning which Liberty spoke."

Black Leg. A swindler, especially in cards and races. Also, one who works for less than trade-union wages;
a non-union workman.

"Pleading the strikers not to return to work so long as a single Black-leg was retained in the 543.

Black Letter. The Gothic or Gom-man type. So called because of its black appearance. The initial items of this book are now called "black letter," sometimes called "Clarendon type."

Black Letter Day. An unlucky day; one to be recalled with regret.
The Roman, marked their unlucky days with a piece of black charcoal, and their lucky ones with white chalk.

Black-letter dogs. Literary antiquaries who poke and pry into every hole and corner to find out black-letter copies of books.

"By fell black-letter dogs... That from Gothic curiosities digested.
Matthews: On unity of Literature.

Black Lists. Lists of insolvent and bankruptcy, for the private guidance of the mercantile community. (See Black Books.)

Black Looks. Looks of displeasure.
To look black. To look displeased. The figure is from black clouds indicative of foul weather.

Black Mail. Money given to freebooters by way of exempting property from depredation. (Anglo-Saxon, was.
"rent-tax;" French, malle, an old coin worth 083 farthing). Grass mail was rent paid for pasturage. Mails and duties (Scottish) are rents of an estate in money or otherwise. "Black" in this phrase does not mean wicked or wrongful, but is the Gaelic, to cherish or protect.
Black mail was a rent paid to Free Companies for protecting the property paid for, from the depredations of freebooters, etc.

To levy black mail now means to exact exorbitant charges: thus the cabs and omnibuses during the Great Exhibition years "levied black mail" on the public.

Black Man (7th). The Evil One.

Black Maria. The black van which conveys prisoners from the police courts to jail. The French call a mud-barge a "Marie-salope." The tradition is that the van referred to was so called from Maria Lee, a negress, who kept a sailors' boarding house in Boston. She was a woman of such great size and strength that the unruly stood in dread of her, and when constables required help, it was a common thing to send for Black Maria, who soon collared the refractory and led them to the lock-up. So a prison-van was called a "Black Maria."

Black Monday. Easter Monday, April 14th, 1360, was so called. Edward III. was with his army lying before Paris, and the day was so dark, with mist and hail, so bitterly cold and so windy, that many of his horses and men died. Monday after Easter holidays is called "Black Monday," in allusion to this fatal day. Launcelot says:

"It was not for nothing that my nose fell a-bleeding on Black Monday last, at six o'clock in the morning."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 5.

February 27th, 1865, was so called in Melbourne from a terrible sirocco from the N.N.W., which produced dreadful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemaine.

Black Monday. In schoolboy phraseology is the first Monday after the holidays are over, when lessons begin again.

Black Money. Base coin brought to England by foreigners, and prohibited by Edward III.

Black Ox. The black ox has trod on his foot—i.e., misfortune has come to him. Black oxen were sacrificed to Pluto and other infernal deities.

Black Parliament. The Parliament held by Henry VIII. in Bridewell.

Black Prince. Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Edward III. Froissart says he was "styled black by terror of his arms" (c. 169). Strutt confirms this saying: "for his martial deeds surnamed Black the Prince" (Antiquities). Meyrick says there is not the slightest proof that Edward, Prince of Wales, ever wore black armour (vol. ii.); indeed, we have much indirect proof against the supposition. Thus Shaw (vol. i. plate 31) gives a facsimile from a picture on the wall of St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, in which the prince is clad in gilt armour. Stothard says "the effigy is of copper gilt." In the British Museum is an Illumination of Edward III, granting to his son the duchy of Aquitaine, in which both figures are represented in silver armour with gilt joints. The first mention of the term "Black Prince" occurs in a parliamentary paper of the second year of Richard II.; so that Shakespeare has good reason for the use of the word in his tragedy of that king:—

"Brave Gaunt, thy father and myself Rescued the Black Prince, that young Mars of men, From forth the ranks of many thousand French,"—Richard II., ii. 3.

"That black name, Edward, Black Prince of Wales."—Henry V. ii. 4.

Black Republicans. The Republicans were so called by the pro-slavery party of the States, because they resisted the introduction of slavery into any State where it was not already recognised.

Black Rod. i.e., "Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod," so called from his staff of office—a black wand surmounted by a lion.

Black Rood of Scotland. The "piece of the true cross" or rood, set in an ebony crucifix, which Margaret, the wife of King Malcolm, left at death to the Scottish nation. It passed into various hands, but was lost at the Reformation.

Black Russia. Central and Southern Russia is so called from its black soil.

"The winter crops in the whole of European Russia are very good, especially in the black-earth regions. In the government of Northern Russia the condition is less favorable."—Newspaper paragraph, December, 1863.

Black Saturday. August 4th, 1621; so called in Scotland, because a violent storm occurred at the very moment the Parliament was sitting to enforce episcopacy on the people.

Black Sea. So called from the abounding black rock in the extensive coal-fields between the Bosphorus and Heraclea.

Black Sheep [Kord-Koin-loo]. A tribe of Turkomans, so called from their standards. This tribe was extirpated by the White Sheep (q.v.).

A Black Sheep. A disgrace to the family; a mauvais sujet; a workman who will not join in a strike. Black sheep are looked on with dislike by shepherds, and are not so valuable as white ones.

Black Standard. The dress, turbans, and standards of the Abbassid caliphs were all black. (D'Herbelot.)

Black Strap. Bad port wine. A sailor's name for any bad liquor. In North America, "Black-strap" is a mixture of rum and molasses, sometimes vinegar is added.

"The soothing blackstrap was pronounced ready for use."—Pinkerton: Molly Maguires, chap. xvii. p 174.

Black Swan. (See Rara Avis.)

Black-thorn Winter (The). The cold weather which frequently occurs when the black-thorn is in blossom. (See Borrowed Days.)

Black Thursday. February 6th, 1831; so called in the colony of Victoria, from a terrible bush-fire which then occurred.

Black Tom. The Earl of Ormonde, Lord Deputy of Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth; so called from his ungracious ways and "black looks."

"He being very stately in apparel, and erect in port, despite his great age, yet with a dark, dour, and menacing look upon his face, so that all who met his gaze seemed to quake before the same."—Hon. Emily Louisa: With Esco in Ireland, p 16.

Black Watch. Companies employed to watch the Islands of Scotland. They dressed in a "black" or dark tartan (1725). Subsequently they were enrolled into the 42nd regiment, under the Earl of Crawford, in 1737. Their tartan is still called "The Black Watch Tartan." The regiment is now called "The Royal Highlanders."

Black-White. To swear black is white. To persist in an obvious untruth. The French location, Si vous liez blâmes, il viendra noir, means, He will contradict what you say point blank.

Blacks. Mutes at funerals, who wore a black cloak; sometimes called the Black Guards.

"I do pray ye
To give me leave to live a little longer,
You stand about me like my blacks,"

Rembrandt and Hogarth: Men, Themselves, ill. 1.

Blacks (The), or "The 7th Dragoon Guards," or "The Princess Royal's D. G." Called Blacks from their facings. Nicknames: "The Virgin Mary's Guard," "Straw boots," "Lingoniers," etc.

Blacksore (Widow). The best of Wycherley's comic characters; she is a masculine, litigious, pettifogging, headstrong woman. (The Plain Dealer.)

Blackamoor. Washing the blackamoor white—i.e., engaged upon a hopeless and useless task. The allusion is to one of Æsop's fables so entitled.

Blackness. All faces shall gather blackness (Joel ii. 6)—i.e. be downcast in consequence of trouble.

Blacksmith. The learned blacksmith. Elihu Burritt, U.S. (1811-1879.)

Blad amore. The friend of Par'dol in Spenser's Fáere Queene. The poet had his eye upon the Earl of Northumberland, one of the leaders in the northern insurrection of 1569. (See Par'del.)

Blade. A knowing blade, a sharp fellow; a regular blade, a buck or fop. (Anglo-Saxon, blad or bleed, a branch or spring.)

*: Bleed = "branch," whence "fruit, prosperity, glory," etc. The compound, Bled-deg = a prosperous day; bled-gifis a glory-giver, i.e. a king, a "regular blade."

Bladud. A mythical king of England, and father of King Lear. He built the city of Bath, and dedicated the medicinal springs to Minerva. Bladud studied magic, and, attempting to fly, fell into the temple of Apollo and was dashed to pieces. (Griffith of Mommouth.)

"Inexhaustible as Bladud's well."—Thackeray.

Blanche fœur. The heroine of Boccaccio's prose romance called II Filooco. Her lover, Flores, is Boccaccio himself, and Blanchefleur was a young lady passionately beloved by him, the natural daughter of King Robert. The story of Blanchefleur and Flores is substantially the same as that of Dorigen and Aurelius by Chaucer, and that of Diana and Ansaldo in the Ivameric. (See Dianora and Dormen.)

Blain d'man. The faithful manservant of fair Bellissant (q.r.), who attended her when she was divorced. (Valentine and Orson.)

Blaney. A wealthy heir, ruined by dissipation, in Crabbe's Brougham.

"Merry and mirth are blended in his place, Much merry business, and some outward grace... The wenches' cunning and the sinner's fall..."

Letter xiv.

Blank Cartridge. Cartridge with powder only, that is, without shot, bullet, or ball. Used in drill and in saluting. Figuratively, empty threats.
Blank Cheque. A cheque duly signed, but without specifying any sum of money; the amount to be filled in by the payee.

Blank Practice. Shooting for practice with blank cartridges.

Blank Verse. English verse without rhyme.

Blanket. The wrong side of the blanket. A love-child is said to come of the wrong side of the blanket.

"He grew up to be a fine waiste fellow, like mony are that comes o' the wrong side o' the blanket."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxiv.

A wet blanket. A disapproving, a marplot. A person is a wet blanket who discourages a proposed scheme. "Treated with a wet blanket," discouraged. "A wet blanket influence," etc. A wet blanket is used to another fire, or to prevent one escaping from a fire from being burnt.

Blanketeers. The Coxeyites were so called in 1894. "General" Coxey of the United States induced 50,000 persons to undertake a 700 miles' march to Washington, with blankets on their backs, to coerce Congress into finding work for the unemployed.

Previous to this, the word had been applied to some 5,000 Radical operatives who assembled on St. Peter's Field, near Manchester, March 10, 1817. They provided themselves with blankets and rugs, intending to march to London, to lay before the Prince Regent a petition of grievances. Only six got as far as Ashbourne Bridge, when the expedition collapsed.

"The Americans have no royal dukes, no bench of bishops, no House of Lords, no estate monarchical; but they have Home Rule, one man one vote, and Coxey with his blanketeers."—Liberty Review, May 24th, 1884, p. 354.

Blare. To cry with a great noise, like a child in a tricky temper; to bellow. (Latin, plora, to weep with noise.)

Blarney. None of your blarney. Soft, wheedling speeches to gain some end; sugar-words. Cormack MacCarthy held the castle of Blarney in 1602, and concluded an armistice with Carew, the Lord President, on condition of surrendering the fort to the English garrison. Day after day his lordship looked for the fulfilment of the terms, but received nothing except protocols and soft speeches, till he became the laughing-stock of Elizabeth's ministers, and the dupe of the Lord of Blarney.

To kiss the Blarney Stone. Whoever does this shall be able to persuade to anything. The Blarney Stone is triangular, lowered from the north angle of the castle, about twenty feet from the top, and containing this inscription: "Coromac Mac Carthy fornis me veteri feri fecit, a.d. 1446." Blarney is near Cork.

Blasé (pronounce blaz-zay). Surfeited with pleasure. A man blâsé is one who has had full swing to all the pleasures of life, and has no longer any appetite for any of them. A worn out debauchée (French, blaser, to exhaust with enjoyment).

Blasphemous Balfour. Sir James Balfour, the Scottish judge, was so called because of his apostasy. He died 1563.

Blas. In full blast. In the extreme. In America will be heard such a sentence as this: "When she came to the meeting in her yellow hat and feathers, wasn't she in full blast?" A metaphor from the blast furnace in full operation.

Blast. To strike by lightning; to make to wither. The "blasted oak." This is the sense in which the word is used as an exclamation.

"If it 'the [ghost] assume my noble father's person, I'll cross it, though it blast me."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 1.

Blatant Beast (The). "A dreadful fiend of gods and men, ydraid," type of "Common Rumour" or "Slander." He has 100 tongues and a sting; with his tongues he speaks things "most shameful, most unrighteous, most untrue;" and with his sting "stEEps them in poison." Sir Caldore muzzled the monster, and drew him with a chain to Faerie Land. After a time the beast broke his chain and regained his liberty.

(Saxon, blatean, to bellow.) (Spenser: Faerie Queene, books v. vi.)

Blayney's Bloodhounds. The old 89th Foot; so called because of their unerring certainty, and untiring perseverance in hunting down the Irish rebels in 1798, when the corps was commanded by Lord Blayney.

This regiment is now called "the Second Battalion of the Princess Victoria's Irish Fusiliers." The first battalion is the old 87th Foot.

Blaze. A white mark in the forehead of a horse. (Icelandic, blei, a white star on the forehead of a horse; German, blaus, pale.)
Blessing

7. A star is a sort of white diamond in the forehead. A blaze is an elongated star or dash of white.

To blaze a path. To notch trees as a clue. Trees so notched are called in America “blazed trees,” and the white wood shown by the notch is called “a blaze.” (See above.)

"Guided by the blazed trees . . . they came to the spynet."—Goulding: The Young Marooners, 115.

"They buried him where he lay, a blazed tree marking his last resting-place."—Adventures in Australia and New Zealand, p. 151.

Blaze (7b) To blaze abroad. To noise abroad is the German verb blasen, to blow or sound. Shakespeare uses the noun blazon:

"But this eternal blazon must not be To ears of flesh and blood."—Hamlet, i. 5.

Blaser (A). A boatman’s jacket. Properly and originally applied to the Johnian crew (Camb.), whose boat jackets are the brightest possible scarlet.

"A blaser is the red flannel boating jacket worn by the Lady Margaret, St. John’s College, Cambridge, Boat Club."—Daily News, August 22nd, 1896.

Blazon [Blazonry]. To blazon is to announce with a trumpet, hence the Ghost in Hamlet says, "But this eternal blazon must not be to ears of flesh and blood; i.e. this babbling about eternal things, or things of the other world, must not be made to persons still in the flesh. Knights were wont to be announced by the blast of a trumpet on their entrance into the lists; the flourish was answered by the heralds, who described aloud the arms and devices borne by the knight; hence, to blazon came to signify to describe the charges borne; and blazonry is the science of describing or deciphering arms." (German, blasen, to blow.)

Blés. Manger son blé en herbe (French), to eat the calf before it is cast; to spend your fortune before it comes to you; to spend your income in advance. Literally, to feed off your green wheat.

Blair-eyed (The). Aurelius Brandolini, the Italian poet, called Il Lippo (1440–1497).

Blood. To make a man bleed is to make him pay dearly for something; to victimise him. Money is the life-blood of commerce.

It makes my heart bleed. It makes me very sorrowful.

"she found them indeed,
But it made her heart bleed."—Little Bo-Peep.

Bleeding of a Dead Body (The). It was at one time believed that, at the approach of a murderer, the blood of the murdered body gushed out. If in a dead body the slightest change was observable in the eyes, mouth, feet, or hands, the murderer was supposed to be present. The notion still survives in some places.

Blefuscu. An island severed from Lilliput by a channel 800 yards wide, inhabited by pigmies. Swift meant it for France. (Gulliver’s Travels.)

Bleiddahlir [cast splendour]. The abode of Baldur, the Scandinavian Apollo.

Blennymas (of Africa). Men said to have no head, their eyes and mouth being placed in the breast. (See ACPHALEITES; CAORA.)

Blenheim Dog. A small spaniel; so called from Blenheim Palace in Oxfordshire, where the breed has been preserved ever since the palace was built.

Blenheim House (Oxfordshire). The house given by the nation to the Duke of Marlborough, for his victory over the French at Blenheim, in Bavaria, in the reign of Queen Anne (1704).

"When Europe freed confess’d the saving power Of Marlborough’s hand, Britain who sent him forth,
Chief of confederate hosts, to fight the cause Of liberty and justice, grateful raised
This palace, sacred to the leader’s fame."

Blenheim Steps. Once noted for an anatomical school, over which Sir Ashley Cooper presided. Here "resurrectionists" were sure to find a ready mart for their gruesome wares, for which they received sums of money varying from £3 to £10, and sometimes more. Such phrases as "going to Blenheim Steps," meant going to be dissected, or unearthed from one’s grave.

Bless. He has not a [sycence] to bless himself with, i.e. in his possession: wherewith to make himself happy. This expression may probably be traced to the time when coins were marked with a deeply-indented cross, if. To keep the devil out of one’s pocket.

Blessing with three fingers is symbolical of the Trinity, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.
Blindmen’s Dinner.

Blest. I’ll be blest if I do it. I am resolved not to do it. A euphemism for curing.

Blitzen-dabel [splendid misery]. The canopy of the goddess Hel or Hela (g.v.).

Blimber (Miss). A blue-stocking, who knows the dead languages, and wears learned spectacles. She is the daughter of Dr. Blimber, a fossil schoolmaster of the high and dry grammar type. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Blind. That’s a mere blind. A pretense; something ostensible to conceal a covert design. The metaphor is from window-blinds, which prevent outsiders from seeing into a room.

Blind as a bat. A bat is not blind, but when it enters a room well lighted, it cannot see, and blunders about. It sees best, like a cut, in the dusk. (See SIMILES.)

Blind as a beetle. Beetles are not blind, but the dor-beetle or hedge-chaffer, in its rapid flight, will occasionally bump against one as if it could not see.

Blind as a mole. Moles are not blind, but as they work underground, their eyes are very small. There is a mole found in the south of Europe, the eyes of which are covered by membranes, and probably this is the animal to which Aristotle refers when he says, “the mole is blind.” (See SIMILES.)

Blind as an owl. Owls are not blind, but being night birds, they see better in partial darkness than in the full light of day. (See SIMILES.)

You came on his blind side. His soft or tender-hearted side. Said of persons who wheedle some favour out of another. He yielded because he was not wide awake to his own interest.

“Lincoln wrote to the same friend that the nomination took the democrats on the blind side.”—Nicolay and Hay: Abraham Lincoln, vol. i. chap. x. p. 252.

Blind leaders of the blind. The allusion is to a sect of the Pharisees, who were wont to shut their eyes when they walked abroad, and often ran their heads against a wall or fell into a ditch. (Matt. xvi, 14.)

The Blind:

Francesco Bello, called Il Cieco.
Luigi Grotto, called Il Cieco, the Italian poet. (1641-1585.)
Lieutenant James Holman, The Blind Traveller. (1787-1857.)
Ludwig III., Emperor of Germany, L’Avenue. (880, 895-934.)

Blind Alley (A). A “cul de sac,” an alley with no outlet. It is blind because it has no “eye” or passage through it.

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green (The). A public-house sign in the Whitechapel Road. (Hotten: History of Sign-Boards.) (See Beggar.)

Blind Department (The). In Post Office parlance, means that department where letters with incoherent, insufficient, or illegible addresses are examined, and, if possible, put upon the proper track for delivery. The clerk so employed is called “The Blind Man.”

“One of these addresses was “Santling’s, Hlire-wite” (St. Helen’s, Isle of Wight). I myself, had one from France addressed, ‘A Mons. E. Thumian, brevnaur, Angletibers,’ and it reached me. Another address was ‘Hasselfetch in no fant-sphere’ (Hasleheish, Northamptonshire.)

Blind Ditch (A). One which cannot be seen. Here blind means obscure, as a blind village.

Blind Harper (The). John Parry, who died 1739.

Blind Hedge (A). A hawhaw hedge, not easily seen. Milton uses the word blind for concealed, as “In the blind mazes of this tangled wood.” (Comus, line 181.)

Blind old Man of Scio’s rocky Isle. Homer is so called by Byron in his Bride of Abydos.

Blind Magistrate (The). Sir John Fielding, knighted in 1761, was born blind. He was in the commission of the Peace for Middlesex, Surrey, Essex, and the liberties of Westminster.

Blindman’s Holiday. The hour of dusk, when it is too dark to work, and too soon to light candles.

Blindman’s Lantern (The), or “Eyes to the Blind.” A walking stick with which a blind man guides his way. In French argot bongie means a walking stick.

Blindmen’s Dinner (The). A dinner unpaid for. A dinner in which the landlord is made the victim. Eulen-spiegel being asked for alms by twelve blind men, said, “Go to the inn; eat, drink, and be merry, my men; and here are twenty florins to pay the fare.” The blind men thanked him; each supposing one of the others had received the money. Reaching the inn, they told the landlord of their luck, and were at once provided with food and drink to the amount of twenty florins. On asking for payment, they all said, "Let him who received the money pay for the dinner;" but none had received a penny.

Blinkers. Spectacles; the allusion is to a horse’s blinkers.

Block. To block a Bill. In parliamentary language means to postpone or prevent the passage of a Bill by giving notice of opposition, and thus preventing its being taken after half-past twelve at night.

"By blocking the Bill [he] denied to two million persons the right of saving votes."—Contemporary Review, August, 1864, p. 171.

Blockhead. A stupid person; one without brains. The allusion is to a wig-maker’s dummy or tête à perroque, on which he fits his wig.

"Your wit will not so soon out as another man’s will; his strangely wedged up in a block-head."—
Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 3.

Blood. A buck, an aristocratic rowdy.
A term taken from blood horses.

"A blood or dandy about town."—Thackeray:
Vanity Fair, chap. x. p. 49.

Blood. Family descent.

"And hath made of one blood all nations of Blood thicker than water. Relationship has a claim which is generally acknowledged. It is better to seek kindness from a kinsman than from a stranger. Water soon evaporates and leaves no mark behind; not so blood.

So the interest we take in a stranger is thinner and more evanescent than that which we take in a blood relation.

"Weel! blude’s thicker than water. She’s welcome to the cheeses and the limps just the same."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering.

A Prince of the Blood. One of the Royal Family.

Bad blood. Anger, quarrels; as, It stirred up bad blood. It provokes to ill-feeling and contention.

Blue blood. (See under BLUE.)

Young blood. Fresh members; as,
"To bring young blood into the concern."

In cold blood. Deliberately: not in the excitement of passion or of battle.
It makes one’s blood boil. It provokes indignation and anger.

It runs in the blood. It inherited or exists in the family race.

"It runs in the blood of our family."—Sheriden: The Rivals, iv. 2.

My own flesh and blood. My own children, brothers, sisters, or other near kindred.

Laws written in blood. Dema’des said that the laws of Draco were written in blood, because every offence was punished by death.

The field of blood. Acl’damas (Acts i.
19), the piece of ground purchased with the blood-money of our Saviour, and set apart for the burial of strangers.

The field of the battle of Canne, where Hannibal defeated the Romans,
b.c. 216.

Blood of our Saviour. An order of knighthood in Mantua; so called because their special office was to guard "the drops of the Saviour’s blood" preserved in St. Andrew’s church, Mantua.

Blood and iron policy—i.e. war policy.
No explanation needed.

Blood-guiltiness. The guilt of murder.

Blood-horse (A). A thorough-bred.

Bloodhound. Figuratively, one who follows up an enemy with pertinacity.
Bloodhounds used to be employed for tracking wounded game by the blood spilt; subsequently they were employed for tracking criminals and slaves who had made their escape, and were hunters of blood, not hunters by blood. The most noted breeds are the African,
Cuban, and English.

Blood Money. Money paid to a person for giving such evidence as shall lead to the conviction of another; money paid to the next of kin to induce him to forego his "right" of seeking blood for blood; money paid to a person for betraying another, as Judas was paid blood-money for showing the band the place where Jesus might be found.

Blood Relation (A). One in direct descent from the same father or mother;
one of the same family stock.

Blood-thirsty. Eager for shedding blood.

Blood of the Groggers (The).
Taffety gentility; make-believe aristoocratic blood. Grogger is a coarse silk taffety stiffened with gum (French, gro-grain).

"Our first tragedian was always boasting of his being an old actor; and was full of the blood of the Groggers."—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 230.

Bloody, used as an expletive in such phrases as "A bloody fool," "Bloody drink," etc., arose from associating folly and drunkenness, etc., with what Bloody

are called "Bloods," or aristocratic rowdies. Similar to "Drunk as a lord."

"It was bloody hot walking to-day."—Swift: Journal to Stella, letter xxii.

Bloody (The). Otho II., Emperor of Germany. (955, 973-983.)

The Bloody Eleventh. The old 11th Foot was so called from their having been several times nearly annihilated, as at Almanza, Fontenoy, Rosend; and Salamanca (1812), in capturing a French standard. Now called "The Devonshire Regiment."

Bloody Assizes. The infamous assizes held by Judge Jeffreys in 1685. Three hundred were executed, more whipped or imprisoned, and a thousand sent to the plantations for taking part in Monmouth's rebellion.

Bloody Bill. The 31 Henry VIII., c. 14, which denounced death, by hanging or burning, on all who denied the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Bloody-bones. A hobgoblin; generally "Raw-head and Bloody-Bones."

Bloody Butcher. (See Butcher.)

Bloody Hand. A man whose hand was bloody, and was therefore presumed to be the person guilty of killing the deer shot or otherwise slain. (Cf. Red Hand.) Also the badge of a baronet.

Bloody Wedding. St. Bartholomew's slaughter in 1572 is so called because it took place during the marriage feast of Henri (afterwards Henri IV.) and Marguerite (daughter of Catherine de Medici).

Bloody Week (The). The week ending on Sunday, May 28th, 1871, when Paris was burning, being set on fire by the Communists in hundreds of places. The destruction was frightful, but Notre Dame, the Hôtel Dieu, and the magnificent collection of pictures in the Louvre, happily escaped demolition.

Bloom. From bloom to bloom. A floral rent. The Lord of the Manor received a red rose or gillyflower, on the Feast of John the Baptist, yearly (July 6th, O. S.). (See Notes and Queries, Feb. 13th, 1886, p. 135.)

Bloom' erism. A female costume; so called from Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, of New York, who tried in 1849 to introduce the fashion. The dress consisted of a short skirt and loose trousers gathered closely round the ankles—becoming enough to young ladies in their teens, but ridiculous for "the fat and forty."

Blount (Charles). Author of some spiritual writings in the time of Charles II. (1654-1693.)

"He heard of Blount, etc."—Crabbe: Borough.

Blouse. A short smock-frock of a blue colour worn commonly by French workmen. Bleu is French argot for manteau.

"A garment called blous or bliaus, which appears to have been another name for a surcoat... in this bliaus we may discover the modern French blouse, n. . . . smock-frock."—Planché: British Costume.

1. Blow (To). As the wind blows; or to blow with the breath. (Anglo-Saxon, blowan, to blow or breathe.)

_It will soon blow over._ It will soon be no longer talked about; it will soon come to an end, as a gale or storm blows over or ceases.

_"To blow off is another form of the same phrase._

To blow great guns. The wind blows so violently that its noise resembles the roar of artillery.

To blow hot and cold. (or) To blow hot and cold with the same breath. To be inconsistent. The allusion is to the fable of a traveller who was entertained by a satyr. Being cold, the traveller blew his fingers to warm them, and afterwards blew his hot broth to cool it. The satyr, in great indignation, turned him out of doors, because he blew both hot and cold with the same breath.

To blow off the steam. To get rid of superfluous energy. The allusion is to the forcible escape of superfluous steam no longer required.

2. Blow (To). To sound a trumpet.

_"But when the blast of war blows in our ears, Let us be tigers in our fierce department._"—Shakespeare: Henry V., iii. 1.

To blow. To inform against a companion; to "peach." The reference is to the announcing of knights by blast of trumpet.

3. Blow (To). To blast as with gunpowder.

_I will blow him up sky high._ Give him a good scolding. _A regular blowing up._ is a thorough jobation. The metaphor is from blasting by gunpowder.

_"But to blow up a bladder, etc., means to inflate it._

4. Blow. A stroke. (Germ., blähen, to beat or strike.)

_At one blow. By one stroke.

_The first blow is half the battle._ Well begun is half done. Pythagoras used to Blow a Cloud. To smoke a cigar or pipe. This term was in use in Queen Elizabeth's reign.

Blow Me (an oath). You blowed (an oath), a play on the word Dash me, which is a euphemism for a more offensive oath.

"Well, if you won't stand a punt, 'tis the fad man. 'Twill, that's all, and blow temporary."

-Kingst.: Allen Locke, chap. ii.

Blow Out (A). A "tuck in," or feast which swells out the paunch.

Blow-point. A game similar to our pea-puffing, only instead of peas small wooden skewers or bits of pointed wood were puffed through the tubs. The game is alluded to by Flosco, Strutt, and several other authors.

Blown, in the phrase "fly-blown," has nothing to do with the verb to blow (as the wind blows). It means that flies have deposited their eggs and tainted the article. In French, déposer des œufs de mouche sur . . . and a fly-blow is un œuf de mouche. The word seems to be connected with blot, the egg of a moth or other insect.

Blown HERRINGS are bloated herrings. The French bouffi (blown) is analogous to both expressions. Blown herrings are herrings bloated, swollen, or cured by smoking.

Blown upon. Made the subject of a scandal. His reputation has been blown upon, means has been the subject of talk whereon something derogatory was hinted at or even asserted. Blown upon by the breath of slander.

"Blown," meaning stale, tainted, is probably the same as the above; but blown upon cannot be.

Blowzell'nd. A country maiden in Gay's pastoral called The Shepherd's Week.

"Sweet is my health when Blowzellin' is near; Of her bereft, 'tis winter all the year. . . .

Blowzy. Coarse, red-faced, bloated; applied to women. The word is allied to blush, blaze, etc. (Dutch, blozen and blazen; Danish, blisster, blaze.)

Blubber. To cry like a child, with noise and slaver. Connected with slobber, slaver.

"I play the boy, and blubber in thy bosom."—Owst: Venier Preserved, i. 1.

Blubber Cheeks. Fat, flabby cheeks, like whale's blubber. "The blubber cheeks of my friend the baronet."

Blue or Azure is the symbol of Divine eternity and human immortality. Consequently, it is a mortuary colour—hence its use in covering the coffins of young persons. When used for the garment of an angel, it signifies faith and fidelity. As the dress of the Virgin, it indicates modesty. In blazonry, it signifies chastity, loyalty, fidelity, and a spotless reputation.

The Cornishmen wore blue as their badge, in opposition to the scarlet of royalty. They based their choice on Numb. xvi. 38, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments . . . and that they put upon the fringe . . . a ribband of blue." (See Colours for its symbolisms.)

Blue (A), or a "staunch blue," descriptive of political opinions, for the most part means a Tory, for in most counties the Conservative colour is blue. (See True Blue.)

"This was a blue demonstration, a gathering of the Conservative clans."—History 176.

. . . blue. (See Blue Stocking.)

. . . dark blue. An Oxford man or Harrow boy.

. . . light blue. A Cambridge man or Eton boy.

. . . old blue. One who has pulled in a University boat-race, or taken part in any of their athletic contests.

"There were the old blues playing."—Standard, May 8th, 1869.

True blue. This is a Spanish phrase, and refers to the notion that the veins shown in the skin of aristocratic families are more blue than that of inferior persons. (See Sang.)

True blue will never stain. A really noble heart will never disgrace itself. The reference is to blue aprons and blousons worn by butchers, which do not show blood-stains.

True as Coventry blue. The reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made at Coventry, noted for its permanent dye.

'Twixt Presbyterian true blue (Hudibras, i, 1). The allusion is to the blue apron.
which some of the Presbyterian preachers used to throw over their preaching-tub before they began to address the people. In one of the Rump songs we read of a person going to hear a lecture, and the song says—

"Where I a tub did view,
Hung with an apron blue;
Twas the preacher's, I conjecture."

To look blue. To be discontented. He was blue in the face. Aghast with wonder. The effect of fear and wonder is to drive the colour from the cheeks, and give them a pale-blushing tinge.

Blue-apron Statesman (A). A lay politician, a trade who interferes with the affairs of the nation. The reference is to the blue apron once worn by almost all tradesmen, but now restricted to butchers, poulterers, fishmongers, and so on.

Blue Beans. Bullets. Lead is blue.

"Many a valiant Gaul had no breakfast that morning but what the Germans call 'blue beans,' i.e. bullets."—W. Macaulay: My School Days.

Three blue beans in a blue bottle or bladder. (See under BEANS.)

Bluebeard. A booby, a merciless tyrant, in Charles Perrault's Contes du Temps. The tale of Bluebeard (Chevalier Raoul) is known to every child, but many have speculated on the original of this deed: Some say it was a satire on Henry VIII., of wife-killing notoriety. Dr. C. Taylor thinks it is a type of the castle lords in the days of knight-errantry. Holinshed calls Giles de Hetz, Marquis de Laval, the original Bluebeard. This Giles or Gilles who lived at Machecoul, in Brittany, was accused of murdering six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled and burnt in 1440.

"The Bluebeard chamber of his mind, into which no eye but his own must look."—Corintia.

Campbell has a Bluebeard story in his Tales of the Western Highlands, called The Widow and her Daughters. A similar one is No. 39 of Visconti's collection of Italian stories. So is No. 3 of Bernoni's collection.

Bluebeard's Key. When the blood stain of this key was rubbed out on one side, it appeared on the opposite side; so prodigality being overcome will appear in the form of meanness; and friends, over-fond, will often become enemies.

Blue Billy (A). A blue neckcloth with white spots, worn by William Mace. More likely the allusion is to the pill or nose. (See BILLY.)

Blue Blood. (See page 140, True Blue.)

Blue Bear. A public-house sign; the cognizance of Richard III. In Leicester is a lane in the parish of St. Nicholas, called the Blue Bear Lane, because Richard slept there the night before the battle of Bosworth Field.

"The bristly bear, in infant gore, Wallows beneath the thorny shade."—Grey: The Bard.

Blue Bonnets (Thir). The Scotch Highlanders; the Scotch generally. So called from the blue woollen cap at one time in very general use in Scotland, and still far from uncommon.

"England shall many a day
Tell of the bloody fray,
When the blue bonnets came over the border."—Sir W. Scott.

Blue Books. In England, parliamentary reports and official publications presented by the Crown to both Houses of Parliament. Each volume is in folio, and is covered with a blue wrapper.

"Short Acts of Parliament, etc., even without a wrapper, come under the same designation.

In America, the "Blue Books" (like our "Red Books") contain lists of those persons who hold government appointments. The official colour of Spain is red, of Italy green, of France yellow, of Germany and Portugal white.

Blue Bottle. A beadman, a policeman; so called from the colour of his dress. Shakespeare makes Doll Tearsheet denomine the headle as a "blue-bottle rogue."

"You proud varlets, you need not be ashamed to wear blue, when your master is one of your fellows."—Dekker: The Honest Whore (1609).

"I'll have you soundly swung for this, you blue-bottle rogue."—Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV., iii. 4.

Blue Caps or Blue Bonnets. The Scotch.

"He is there, too, and a thousand blue caps more."—Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV., ii. 4.

Blue-coat School. Christ's Hospital is so called because the boys there wear a long blue coat girded at the loins with a leather belt. Some who attend the mathematical school are termed King's boys, and those who constitute the highest class are Grecians. Founded by Edward VI. in the year of his death. There are several other blue-coat schools in England besides Christ's Hospital.

Blue Devils, or A fit of the blues. A fit of spleen, low spirits. Roach and Esquirol affirm, from observation, that indigo dyers are especially subject to melancholy; and that those who dye scarlet are choleric. Paracelsus also asserts that blue is injurious to the health and spirits. There may, therefore, be more science in calling melancholy "blue" than is generally allowed. The German blei (lead) which gives rise to our slang word blue or bluey (lead) seems to bear upon the "leaden downward eyes" of melancholy.

Blue-eyed Maid (The). Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, is so called by Homer.

"Now Prudence gently pulled the poet's ear, And thus the daughter of the Blue-eyed Maid, In flattery's soothing sounds, divinely said, "{O Peter, eldest-born of Phœbus, hear."

Peter Pindar: A Falling Minister.

Blue Fish (The). The shark, technically called Carcharhinus glaucaus, the upper parts of which are blue.

Blue Flag. He has hoisted the blue flag. He has turned publican or fishmonger, in allusion to the blue apron at one time worn by publicans, and still worn by fishmongers.

Blue Gown (A). A harlot. Nares tells us that "a blue gown was a dress of ignominy for a harlot in the House of Correction. (See below.)

Blue-gowns. The bedesmen, to whom the kings of Scotland distributed certain alms. Their dress was a cloak or gown of coarse blue cloth, with a pewter badge. The number of these bedesmen was equal to that of the king's years, so that an extra one was added every returning birthday. These paupers were privileged to ask alms through the whole realm of Scotland. No new member has been added since 1833. (See GABERLUNZIE.)

Blue Guards (The). So the Oxford Blues, now called the Royal Horse Guards, were called during the campaign in Flanders (1742-1745).

Blue Hen. Captain Caldwell used to say that no cock could be truly game whose mother was not a blue hen. As Caldwell commanded the 1st Delaware regiment in the war, the State of Delaware was nicknamed Blue Hen.

Your mother was a blue hen, no doubt.

A reproof given to a braggart. (See above.)

Blue-jackets. Sailors; so called because the colour of their jackets is blue.

Blue John (A). A petrefaction of blue fluor-spar, found in the Blue John mine of Tre Cliff, Derbyshire; and so called to distinguish it from the Black Jack, an ore of zinc. Called John from John Kirk, a miner, who first noticed it.

Blue Laws. These were puritanical laws enacted in 1732, at New Haven, Connecticut, in the United States of America. Their object was to stamp out "heresy," and enforce a strict observance of the Sunday. Many persons insist that they are apocryphal; but in October, 1891, the American Lincoln Club protested against their enforcement by a democratic judge, and resolved—

"To call upon all right-thinking citizens to assist in an effort to have the laws repealed, by supporting and voting only for such candidates for the legislature as would pledge themselves to vote for their repeal."

Blue-light Federalists. A name given to those Americans who were believed to have made friendly ("blue-light") signals to British ships in the war. (1812.)

Blue-mantle. The English pursuivant at arms is so called from his official robe.

Blue Monday. The Monday before Lent, spent in dissipation. (German, der blau Montag.) It is said that dissipation gives everything a blue tinge. Hence "blue" means tipsy. (See BLUE DEVILS.)

"Drink till all is blue, Cracking bottles till all is blue."

Blue Moon. Once in a blue moon. Very rarely indeed.

* On December 10th, 1883, we had a "blue moon." The winter was unusually mild.

Blue Mould. Applied to cheese which has become the bed of a fungus, technically called Aspergillus glaucus.

The blue mould of bread, paste, jams, etc., is the fungus called Mucor Mucedo.

Blue Murder. To shoot blue murder. Indicative more of terror or alarm than of danger. It appears to be a play on the French exclamation murdere. There may also be a distinct allusion to the common phrase "blue ruin."

Blue-noses. The Nova Scotians.

"Pray sir," said one of my fellow-passengers, "can you tell me the reason why the Nova Scotians are called " Blue-noses"?"

"It is the name of a potato," said I, "which they produce in the greatest perfection and boast to be the best in the world. The Americans have, in consequence, given them the nickname of Blue Noses." —Haldimand: Sum Stock.

Blue Peter. A flag with a blue ground and white square in the centre, hoisted as a signal that the ship is about to sail. Peter is a corruption of the Blue-pigeon Flyer. A man who steals the lead off of a house or church. "Blucy" is slang for lead, so called from its colour. To "pigeon" is to pull, cheat, or fob. Hence, blue-pigeon, one who cheats another of his lead, or fobs his lead. "Flyer," of course, is one who flies off with the stolen lead.

Blue Ribbon (The). "To be adorned with the blue ribbon," to be made knight of the garter, or adorned with a blue ribbon at the knee. Blue ribbon is also a temperament badge. (See Connom Bleu.)

"Lord Kimber is to be made Knight of the Garter . . . . though there is no vacancy. Lord Kimber received the Blue Ribbon in 1805, although there was no vacancy."—Truth, March, 1881.

The Blue Ribbon of the Turf. The Derby. Lord George Bentinck sold his stud, and found to his vexation that one of the horses sold won the Derby a few months afterwards. Bewailing his ill-luck, he said to Disraeli, "Ah! you don't know what the Derby is." "Yes, I do," replied Disraeli; "it is the blue ribbon of the turf," alluding to the term cordou blue (g.r.); or else to the blue garter, the highest of all orders.

"The blue ribbon of the profession" is the highest point of honour attainable therein. The blue ribbon of the Church is the Archbishop of Canterbury, that in law is the office of Lord Chancellor.

Blue Ribbon (.1). A wale from a blow. A bruise turns the skin blue.

"Do you want a blue ribbon round those white sides of yours? you monkey!" answered Greystes; because, if you do, the hippopotamus hide hangs ready outside."—Kingsley: Hypatia, chap. iv.

Blue Ruin. Gin. Called blue from its tint, and ruin from its effects.

Blue Squadron (The). One of the three divisions of the British Fleet in the seventeenth century. (See Admiral of the Blue.)

Blue Stocking. A female pedant. In 1490 a society of ladies and gentlemen was formed at Venice, distinguished by the colour of their stockings, and called della calza. It lasted till 1690, when it appeared in Paris and was the rage among the lady savantes. From France it came to England in 1780, when Mrs. Montague displayed the badge of the Bas-bleu club at her evening assemblies. Mr. Benjamin Stillingsfleet was a constant attendant of the soirees. The last of the clique was Miss Monckton, afterwards Countess of Cork, who died 1840.

"You need not be fond enough of books . . . a regular blue-stocking Mr. Bland called you."—E. N. Phelps: The Gates Ajar, chap. iv.

Blue Talk. Indecent conversation, from the French, Bibliotheque Bleu. (Harlots are called "Blues" from the blue gown they were once compelled to wear in the House of Correction.)

Blue Wonder (A). The German Blaues Wunder, which means "a queer story," as In solut dein blaues wunder sehen, You will be filled with amazement (at the queer story I have to relate). A "blue wonder" is a cock and bull story, an improbable tale, something to make one stare. The French, contes bleus.

Blue and Red, in public-house signs, are heraldic colours, as the Blue Pig, the Blue Cow, the Red Lion, the Red Hurt, etc.

Blue and Yellow (The). The Edinburgh Review; so called from its yellow and blue cover. The back is yellow, the rest of the cover is blue.

Blues (The), applied to troops.

The Oxford Blues. The Royal Horse Guards were so called in 1690, from the Earl of Oxford their commander and the blue facings. Wellington, in one of his despatches, writes:—"I have been appointed colonel of the Blues."

"It was also known as the 'Blue Guards' during the campaign in Flanders (1742-1743)."—Trumpp: Reminiscences of the British Army.

Bluff (To), in the game called Poker, is to stake on a bad hand. This is a dodge resorted to by players to lead an adversary to throw up his cards and forfeit his stake rather than risk them against the "bluffer."

"The same proceeded, George, although he affected an ignorance of the ordinary principles of poker, played like a novice—that is to say, he bluffed extravagantly on absurdly low hands."—Truth: Queer Stories, Sept. 3rd, 1885.
Boar's Flesh

From this name comes our bogie, a hobgoblin or little Bo. Gifford Castle is called Bo Hall, being said to have been constructed by bogies or magic. Compare Greek, boi, bah! verb, boasting, to shout out; Latin, boi, to bellow like a bull (boe). (See Bogie.)

You cannot say Bo! to a goose—i.e., you are a coward who dare not say bo! even to a fool. When Ben Jonson was introduced to a nobleman, the peer was so struck with his homely appearance that he exclaimed, "What! are you Ben Jonson? Why, you look as if you could not say Bo! to a goose." "Bo!" exclaimed the witty dramatist, turning to the peer and making his bow. (Latin, bo-ave; Greek, boa-ein, to cry aloud.)

Bo-tree. A corruption of bodhi or bodhi-vana (the tree of wisdom), under which Sakyamuni used to sit when he concocted the system called Buddhism.

Boa. Pliny says the word is from bos (a cow), and arose from the supposition that the boa sucked the milk of cows.

Boanerges (sons of thunder). A name given to James and John, the sons of Zebedee, because they wanted to call down "fire from heaven" to consume the Samaritans for not "receiving" the Lord Jesus. (Luke ix. 54; see Mark iii. 17.)

Boar. The Boar, Richard III.; so called from his cognisance.

"The white and bloody, and overreaching bear
That spoiled your summer field and fruitful vines...
This foul swarm... lies now...
Near to the town of Ledkrace, we learn."—Shakespeare: Richard III., i. 3

The bristled Baptist boar. So Dryden denominates the Anabaptists in his Hind and Panther.

"The bristled Baptist boar, impure as he [the ape],
But whiterened with the finam of sanctity,
With fat pollutions filled the sacred place,
And mountains levelled in his furious race."—Part i. 43-46.

The wild boar of Ardenes (Le sanglier des Ardennes).—Guillaume, Comte de la Marché, so called because he was fierce as the wild boar, which he delighted to hunt. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott as William, Count of la Marché, in Quentin Durward.

Boar (The), eaten every evening in Valhalla by the Æsir, was named S.E.H.-RIMNIR. It was eaten every evening and next morning was restored whole again.

Boar's Flesh. Buddha died from a meal of dried boar's flesh. Mr. Sinnett
Boar’s Head

Board of Green Cloth. So called because the lord steward and his board sat at a table covered with green cloth. It existed certainly in the reign of Henry I., and probably earlier, and was abolished in 1849.

“Board of Green Cloth. June 15th, 1849. Order was this day given that the lords of honour should have cherry-tarts instead of gooseberry-tarts, it being observed that cherries are three-pence a pound.”

Board School (A). An undenominational elementary school managed by a School Board, and supported by a parliamentary grant collected by a rate.

Boarding School. I am going to boarding school. Going to prison to be taught good behaviour.

Boards. He is on the boards, i.e. an actor by profession.

Boast (The). The vainglory, the ostentation, that which a person boasts of, or is proud of.

“The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power, Awaits (sic) alike the inevitable hour.”

Gray: The Ebbtide, stanza 6.

Boast of England (The). Tom Thumb or Tom-a-lin. Richard Johnson, in 1599, published a “history of this ever-renowned soldier, the Red Rose Knight, surnamed The Boast of England, showing his honorable victories in foreign countries, with his strange fortunes in Fairy Land, and how he married the fair Angiliera, daughter of Prester John. . . .”

Boat. Both in the same boat. Both treated alike: both placed in the same conditions. The reference is to the boat launched when a ship is wrecked.

To be represented in a boat is the ordinary symbol of apotheosis. Many sovereigns are so represented on coins.

Boatswain. The officer who has charge of the boats, sails, rigging, anchors, cordage, cables, and colours.

Swain is the Saxon swein (a boy, servant), Swedish serin. Hence, a shepherd is a swain, and a sweetheart is a woman’s servant or swain.

Boatwine. The name of Byron’s favourite dog, buried in Newstead Abbey garden.

Boaz and Jachin. The names of the two brazen pillars set up by Solomon at the entrance of his temple—Boaz (strength) on the left hand, and Jachin (stability) on the right. (1 Kings vii. 21.)

“Two pillars raising by their skill profound, Boaz and Jachin, thro’ the fame renowned.”

Crockett. Berounch.

Boar’s Head [The Christmas dish.] Freyr, the Scandinavian god of peace and plenty, used to ride on the boar Gullinbursti; his festival was held at Yuletide (winter solstice), when a boar was sacrificed to his honour.

The Boar’s Head. This tavern, made immortal by Shakespeare, used to stand in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV. It was the cognisance of the Gordons, the progenitor of which clan slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse (1093).

Board. A council which sits at a board or table; as “Board of Directors,” “Board of Guardians,” “School Board,” “Board of Trade,” etc. (Anglo-Saxon, bord, a board, table, etc.)

To sweep the board. To win and carry off all the stakes in a game of cards.

2. Board, in sea phrases, is all that space of the sea which a ship passes over in tacking.

On board. In the ship. “To go on board,” to enter the ship or other sea vessel.

Overboard. Fallen out of the ship into the sea.

To board a ship is to get on board an enemy’s vessel.

To make a good board. To make a good or long tack in beating to windward.

To make a short board. To make a short tack. “To make short boards,” to tack frequently.

To make a stern board. To sail stern foremost.

To run aboard of. To run foul of [another ship].

3. To board. To feed and lodge together, is taken from the custom of the university members, etc., dining together at a common table or board.

Board. To accost. (French, aborder, to accost.)

“I’ll board her, though she chide as loud As thunder.”

Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, i. 3.

(See also Daniel, ii. 2.)

Boar’s Head tells us that the “boar” referred to was the boar avatar of Vishnu, and that “dried boar’s flesh” means esoteric knowledge prepared for popular use. None but Buddha himself must take the responsibility of giving out occult secrets, and he died while so occupied, i.e. in preparing for the general esoteric knowledge. The protreptics of Jamblicus are examples of similar interpretations. (See Nineteenth Century, June, 1898, p. 1021.)
Bob. A shilling. A "bender" is a sixpence. (Compare Rawbee.)

To give the bob to any one. To deceive, to balk. This word is a corruption of pop. The bob of a pendulum or mason's plumb-line is the weight that pops backwards and forwards. The bob of a fishing-line pops up and down when fish nibble at the bait. To bob for apples or cherries is to try and catch them while they swing backwards and forwards. As this is very deceptive, it is easy to see how the word signifies to balk, etc.

To bob means also to thump, and a bob is a blow.

"He that a fool doth very wisely hit,
Both very foolishly, although he smart,
Not to seem senseless of the bob."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Bore a bob. Be brisk. The allusion is to bobbing for apples, in which it requires great agility and quickness to catch the apple.

A bob wig. A wig in which the bottom locks are turned up into bobs or short curls.

Bobadil. A military bragart of the first water. Captain Bobadil is a character in Ben Jonson's comedy of Every Man in His Humour. This name was probably suggested by Bobadilla, first governor of Cuba, who sent Columbus home in chains. (See Vincent.)

"Bobadil is the author's best invention, and is worthy to march in the same regiment with Buceas and Platyl, Paroles, and the Copper Captain" (q.v.)—B. W. Procter.

* * * See all these names in their proper places.

Bobbery, as "Kicking up a bobbery," making a squabble or tumult, kicking up a shindy. It is much used in India, and Colonel Yule says it is of Indian origin.

Bobbish. Pretty bobbish. Pretty well (in spirits and health), from bob, brisk. (See above.) A very ancient expression.

Bobbit. If it isn't weel bobbit we'll bob it again. If it is not done well enough, we will try again. To bob is to dance, and literally the proverb means, "If it is not well danc'd, we will dance over again."

Bobby. A policeman; so called because Sir Robert Peel introduced the force, at least into Ireland. (See Phibs.)

"But oh! for the grip of the bobby's hand Upon his neck that day."—Punch: July 26, 1864.

Bocceus (King). A kind of Solomon, who not only drank strong poison "in the name of the Trinity" without hurt; but also answered questions of wisdom, morality, and natural science. (The History of King Bocceus and Syladrich, from the French.)

Bockland or Bookland. Land severed from the folieland, and converted into a private estate of perpetual inheritance by a short and simple deed or beck.

Bod. The divinity invoked by Indian women who desire fecundity. Children born after an invocation to Bod must be redeemed, or else serve in the temple of the goddess. (Indians mythology.)

Boden-See. The Lake of Constance; so called because it lies in the Boden, or low country at the foot of the Alps. (Latin, Senus Bodanicus.)

Bodies. Compound bodies, in chemical phraseology, mean those which have two or more simple bodies or elements in their composition, as water.

Simple bodies, in chemical phraseology, mean the elements.

The heavenly bodies. The sun, moon, stars, and so on.

The seven bodies (of alchemists). The seven metals supposed to correspond with the seven "planets."

Bobkin. A dagger. (Welshe, bodgyn, a small dagger.)

Bobkin. When he himself might his quietus make with a bare bodkin (Hamlet, iii. 1). A stiletto worn by ladies in the hair, not a dagger. In the Seven Champions, Castria took her silver bodkin from her hair, and stabbed to death first her sister and then herself. Praxida stabbed herself in a similar manner. Shakespeare could not mean that a man might kill himself with a naked dagger, but that even a hair-pin would suffice to give a man his quietus.

Bobkin. To ride bodkin. To ride in a carriage between two others, the accommodation being only for two.

Dr. Payne says that bodkin in this sense is a contraction of bodykin, a little body, which may be squeezed into a small space.

"If you can bodkin the sweet creature into the coach."—Gibbon.

"There is hardly room between Mr. and Miss Sharp, who are on the front seat, and our siting bodkin opposite, between Captain Dobbin and Amelia."—Thackeray: Vanity Fair.

Bodle. A Scotch coin, worth the sixth of a penny; so called from Bothwell, a mint-master.

"Fair play, he car'd na dail a boddle."—Burns: Tam o'Shanter, line 110.

To care not a bodle = our English phrase, "Not to care a farthing."

Bodleian Library (Oxford). So called because it was restored by Sir Thomas Bodley in 1507.

Body. (Anglo-Saxon, bodig.)

A regular body, in geometry, means one of the five regular solids, called "Platonic" because first suggested by Plato. (See PLATONIC BODIES.)

To body forth. To give mental shape to an ideal form.

"Imagination bodies forth The forms of things unknown."—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, v. 1.

Body and Soul. To keep body and soul together. To sustain life; from the notion that the soul gives life. The Latin anima, and the Greek psyche, mean both soul and life; and, according to Homeric mythology, the departed soul retains the shape and semblance of the body, hence the notion of ghosts. Indeed, if the soul is the "principle of life," it must of necessity be the fac-simile of every living atom of the body. (See ASTRAL BODY.)

Body-colour (A). Is a paint containing a body or consistency. In water-colours it is mixed with white lead and laid on thickly.

Body Corporate (A). An aggregate of individuals legally united into a corporation.

Body Politic (A). A whole nation considered as a political corporation; the state. (Latin, totius corpus reipublicae.)

Body-snatcher (A). One who snatches or purloins bodies, newly buried, to sell them to surgeons for dissection. By a play on the words, a bum-bailiff was so called, because his duty was to snatch or capture the body of a delinquent.

*The first instance of body-snatching on record was in 1777. It was the body of Mrs. Jane Sainsbury from the burial ground near Gray's Inn Lane. The man, being convicted, were imprisoned for six months,

Boemond. The Christian King of Antioch, who tried to teach his subjects arts, laws, and religion. Pyrrhus delivered to him a fort, by which Antioch was taken by the Christians after an eight months' siege. Boemond and Roger ro were two brothers, the sons of Roberto Guiscardo, of the Norman race. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.)

Boeotia. According to fable it is so-called because Cadmus was conducted by an ox (Greek bou) to the spot where he built Thebes; but, according to fact, it was so called because it abounded in cattle. (Greek, Bóeotía.)

Boeotian. A rude, unlettered person, a dull blockhead. The ancient Boeotians loved agricultural and pastoral pursuits, so the Athenians used to say they were dull and thick as their own atmosphere; yet Hesiod, Pindar, Corinna, Plutarch, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, were all Boeotians.

Boeotian Ears. Ears unable to appreciate music or rhetoric.

"Well, friend, I assure thee thou hast not got Boeotian ears (because you can appreciate the beauty of my song)."—Le Sage: Gil Blas, vii. 3.

Boethius. Last of the Latin authors, properly so called (470-524). Alfred the Great translated his De Consolatione Philosophiae into Anglo-Saxon.

Bogia. A scurvy-crow, a goblin. (Bulgarian, boj, a god; Slavonic, bagi; Welsh, bogy, a goblin; our bugbear.)

The Assyrian mothers used to scare their children with the name of Narens (Gibbon): the Syrians with that of Richard Coeur de Lion; the Dutch with Boë, the Gothic general (Warton); the Jews with Lilith; the Turks with Mathius Corvinus, the Hungarian king; and the English with the name of Luns-fort (q. v.). (See Bo.)

Bogio (in Orlando Furioso). One of the allies of Charlemagne. He promised his wife to return within six moons, but was slain by Dardinello.

Bogio Swindle. A gigantic swindle concocted in Paris by fourteen persons, who expected to net at least a million sterling. It was exposed in the Times.

Bogomill. A religious sect of the twelfth century, whose chief seat was Thrace. So called from their constant repetition of the words, "Lord, have mercy upon us," which, in Bulgarian, is boj (Lord), milui (have mercy).

Bogtrotters. Irish tramps; so called from their skill in crossing the Irish.
Bolt. An arrow, a shaft (Anglo-Saxon, bolt; Danish, bolt; Greek, ball, to cast; Latin, pello, to drive). A door bolt is a shaft of wood or iron, which may be shot or driven forward to secure a door. A thunderbolt is an hypothetical shaft cast from the clouds; an aerolite. Cupid's bolt is Cupid's arrow.
The foot's bolt is soon spent. A foolish archer shoots all his arrows so heedlessly that he leaves himself no resources in case of need.
I must bolt. Be off like an arrow.
To bolt food. To swallow it quickly without waiting to chew it.
To bolt out the truth. To blurt it out; also To bolt out, to exclude or shut out by bolting the door.
To bolt. To sift, as flour is bolted.
This has a different derivation to the above (Low Latin, bolt-ella, a boulter, from an Old French word for coarse cloth).
"I cannot bolt this matter to the braun,
As Bradwarden and only Austin can,"
Dryden's Pulitzer of the Clock and Far.

Bolt from the blue (A). There fell a bolt from the blue. A sudden and wholly unexpected catastrophe or event occurred, like a "thunderbolt" from the blue sky, or flash of lightning without warning and wholly unexpected.
"Namque Desperti
igual corsuso auditum dividens,
Pleraque, per purum tonantes
Egit equus volucreque currum..."
Horace: I Ode xxxiv 3, etc.
"On Monday, Dec. 22d [1857], there fell a bolt from the blue. The morning papers announced that the men were out [on strike]."—Nineteenth

* In this phrase the word "bolt," is used in the popular sense for lightning, the Latin fulmen, the French foudre and tomberre, in English sometimes for an aerolite. Of course, in strict scientific language, a flash of lightning is not a thunderbolt. Metaphorically, it means a sudden and wholly unexpected catatrophe, like a thunderbolt [flash of lightning] from a blue or serene sky.

German: Wie ein Blitzstrahl aus blauem Aether.
Italian: Come un fulmine a ciel sereno.
Latin: Audil et ceel gentor de parte serena intuitu iuvam. (Virgil: Aenid, ix. 680.)

Bolt in Tun, a public-house sign, is heraldic. In heraldry it is applied to a bird-bolt, in pale, piercing through a tun. The punning crest of Serjeant Bolton, who died 1787, was "on a wreath a tun erect proper, transperced by an arrow fesseways or." Another family of the same name has for crest "a tun with a bird-bolt through it proper." A third, harping on the same string, has "a bolt gules in a tun or." The public-house sign distinguished by this device or name adopted it in honour of some family claiming one of the devices mentioned above.

Bolt upright. Straight as an arrow.
A bolt is an arrow with a round knob at the end, used for shooting at rocks, etc.

Bolted. Bolted out. Either ran off suddenly, or being barred out of the house.
The horse bolted. The horse shot off like a bolt or arrow.

Bolted arrow. A blunt arrow for shooting young rocks with a cross-bow; called "bolting rocks." A gun would not do, and an arrow would mangle the little things too much.

Bolton. The Bolton Ass. This creature is said to have chewed tobacco and taken snuff. (Dr. Iorun.)
'Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton. Give me some advantage. What you say must be qualified, as it is too strong.
Rav says that a collection of proverbs were once presented to the Virgin Queen, with the assurance that it contained all the proverbs in the language; but the Queen rebuked the boaster with the proverb, "Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton," a proverb omitted in the compilation.
John Bolton was one of the courtiers who used to play cards and dice with Henry VIII., and flattered the king by asking him to allow him an ace or some advantage in the game.

Bolus. An apothecary. Apothecaries are so called because they administer boluses. Similarly Mrs. Suds is a washerwoman; Boots is the shoeback of an inn, etc.

George Colman adopts the name for his apothecary, who wrote his labels in rhyme, one of which was—
"When taken,
To be well shaken";
but the patient being shaken, instead of the mixture, died.

Bomb. A shell filled with gunpowder.
(Greek, bombos; Latin, bombus, any Bone

Bona-robea. A courtesan (Italian); so called from the smartness of their robes or dresses.

"We knew where the bona-robeas were."
Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iii. 2.

Bondocus = Bondicola. (Fletcher's Tragedy, 1647.)

Bone. Bred in the bone. A part of one's nature. "What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh." A natural propensity cannot be repressed. Nature juris expellis, aetemque redidit.

Bone in my Throat. I have a bone in my throat. I cannot talk; I cannot answer your question.

I have a bone in my leg. An excuse given to children for not moving from one's seat. Similarly, "I have a bone in my arm," and must be excused using it for the present.

Bone of Contention. A disputed point; a point not yet settled. The metaphor is taken from the proverb about "Two dogs fighting for a bone," etc.

Bones. Duca'lian, after the Deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother, i.e. the stones of mother earth. Those thrown by Duca'lian became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women.

Pliny suggests that laeso, a stone, is a pun on laues, the people. Both words in the genitive case singular, are alike laeus. (Histories, ix. 46.)

Bone to pick (4). A sop to Cerberus. A lucrative appointment given to a troublesome opponent in order to silence him. Thus Chisholm Austay was sent to Hong-Kong as a judge to keep him away from the House of Commons. Of course the allusion is to throwing a bone to a dog barking at you.

"In those days the usual plan to get rid of an oratorical patriot in the House was to give him 'a bone to pick.'"—Anthony Collins.

I have a bone to pick with you. An unpleasant matter to settle with you. At the marriage banquet of the Sicilian poor, the bride's father, after the meal, used to hand the bridegroom a bone, saying, "Pick this bone, for you have taken in hand a much harder task."

Bone. (See Albadara; Luz; Os Sacrum.)

Bone (To). To filch, as, I boned it. Shakespeare (2 Henry IV., act i. 3) says: "By these ten bones, my lord . . . meaning his ten fingers; and (Hamlet, iii. 2) calls the fingers "pickers and stealers." Putting the two together, there can be no doubt that "to bone" Bone-grubber (A). A person who grubs about dust-bins, gutters, etc., for refuse bones, which he sells to bone-grinders, and other dealers in such stores.

Bone-lace. Lace woven on bobbins made of trocker-bones.

Bone-shaker (A). A four-wheel cab; also an old bicycle.

"A good swift hackam is worth twice as much as a bone-shaker any day."—Nineteenth Century, March, 1859, p. 473.

Bonéd. I boned him. Caught or seized him. (See above, To Bone.)

Bones. The man who rattles or plays the bones inigger troupeas.

To make no bones about the matter, i.e., no difficulty, no scruple. Dice are called "bones," and the French, flatter le dé (to mince the matter), is the opposite of our expression. To make no bones of a thing is not to flatter, or "make much of," or humour the dice in order to show favour.

Napier's bones. (See under Napier.)

Without more bones. Without further scruple or objection. (See above, "Make no bones, Bonée (2 syl.). The inhabitants of Bo'ni, one of the Celebés.

Bonfire. Ignis ariuinus. The Athenaeum means that the word was a fire made of bones; one quotation runs thus, "In the worship of St. John, the people...made three manner of fires: one was of clean bones and no wood, and that is called a bonfire; another of clean wood and no bones, and that is called a woodfire...and the third is made of wood and bones, and is called 'St. John's fire'" (Quatror Sermoine, 1499). Certainly bone (Scotch, bone) is the more ancient way of spelling the first syllable of the word; but some suggest that "bonfire" is really "boon-fire."

"In some parts of Lincolnshire...they make fires in the public streets...with bones of oxen, sheep, etc...heaped together, hence came the origin of bonfire."—Leighland, 128.

Boness. Whatever the origin of the word, it has long been used to signify either a beacon fire, or a boon fire, i.e., a fire expressive of joy. We often find the word spelt "bone-fire," where bone may mean "bone" or beacon. Welsh ban, lofty; allied to the Norwegian bann, a beacon or cresset.

Bon'homme. Kindness, good nature; free and easy manners; cordial benevolence. (French.)

"I never knew a more prepossessing man. His bonhomme was infectious."—C. D. Warner: Little Journey, ch. 1.

Bonhomme (Up). A goodly man; according to Dr. Young's line, "What is mere good nature, but a fool?" The word, divided into two, is used in a good sense, as Enre un bon homme. Jacques Bonhomme means a peasant.

Jacques Bonhomme (French). A peasant who ventures to interfere in politics. Hence, the peasant's rebellion in 1358 was called La Jacquerie. The term means "James Goodfellow"; we also often address the poor as "My good fellow."

Bon'iface. A sleek, good-tempered, jolly landlord. From Farquhar's comedy of The Beaux' Stratagem.

"A regular British Boniface."—The John Bull.

St. Boniface. The apostle of Germany, an Anglo-Saxon whose original name was Winifred or Winfrith. (680-750.)

St. Boniface's cup. An extra cup of wine (to the health of the Pope). Pope Boniface, we are told in the Ehiridii Encomium, instituted an indulgence to those who drank his good health after grace, or the health of the Pope of the time being. An excuse for an extra glass.

Bonne (French). A nursemaid, a nursery governess.

Bonne Bouche (A). A delicious morsel; a tit-bit (tid-bit).

"Now I'll give you a real bonne-bouche. This is a bottle of the famous comet port of 1611."—The Easpveer.

Bonet. A pretended player at a gaming-table, or bidder at an auction, to lure others to play; so called because he blinks the eyes of his dupes, just as if he had struck their bonet over their eyes.

"A man who sits at a gaming table, and appears to be playing against the table; when a stranger appears the Bonet generally wins."—The Times.

Bonet. Bruid Bonet. The old Scotch cap, made of milled woollen, without seam or lining.

Glengarry Bonet. The Highland bonet, which rises to a point in front.

He has a green bonet. Has failed in trade. In France it used to be customary, even in the seventeenth century, for bankrupts to wear a green bonet (cloth cap).

He has a be in his bonet. (See Bee.)
Booby (Lady). A caricature on Richardson's Pamela. A vulgar upstart, who tries to seduce Joseph Andrews. (Fielding: Joseph Andrews.)

Booby-trap (A). A pitcher of water, book, or something else, balanced gingerly on the top of a door set ajar, so that when the booby or victim is enticed to pass through the door, the pitcher or book falls on him.

Book (Ang.-Saxon, booc; Danish, bukke; German, buche, a beech-tree). Beech-bark was employed for carving names on before the invention of printing.

"Here on my trunk's surging frame, carved many a long-forgotten name... As love's own altar, honour me: Spare, woodman, spare the beechen tree." — Campbell: Beech Tree's Petition.

Book. The oldest in the world. That by Ptah-Hotep, the Egyptian, compiled in the reign of Assa, about b.c. 3366. This MS. is preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. It is written on papyrus in hieratic characters, and is a compilation of moral, political, and religious aphorisms. It strongly insists on reverence to women, politeness, and monotheism. Ptah-Hotep was a prince of the blood, and lived to the age of 110 years.

Book: Logistilla gave Astolpho, at parting, a book which would tell him anything he wanted to know, and save him from the power of enchantment. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, book viii)

Beware of a man of one book. Never attempt to controvert the statement of any one in his own special subject. A shepherd who cannot read will know more about sheep than the wisest book-worm. This caution is given by St. Thomas Aquinas.

That does not suit my book. Does not accord with my arrangements. The reference is to betting-books, in which the bets are formally entered.

To bring him to book. To make him prove his words; to call him to account. Make him show what he says accords with what is written down in the indentures, the written agreement, or the book which treats of the subject.

To book it. To take down an order: to make a memorandum: to enter in a book.

To speak by the book. With minute

Boon. A bounty over and above the interest of a share in any company. (Latin, bonus quæstus, a good profit or bounty. The interest or fruit of money put out in an investment was by the Romans called the quæstus)

Bonum Homœum. (See HOMER.)

Bonne (sing. Bonne). Indian priests. In China they are the priests of the Fohists; their number is 50,000, and they are represented as idle and dissolute. In Japan they are men of rank and family. In Tonquin every yugoda has at least two bonnes, and some as many as fifty.

Booby. A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon. In England, the Solan goose is called a booby or noddy. (Spanish, bobo; German, bobo.)

A booby will never make a hock. The bird called the booby, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself.

Bonnet Lairds. Local magnates of Scotland, who wore the Braid Bonnet.

Bonnet-piece. A gold coin of James V. of Scotland, the king's head on which wears a bonnet.

Bonnet Rouge. The red cap of Liberty worn by the leaders of the French revolution. It is the emblem of Red Republicanism.

Bonnyclabber. A drink made of beer and buttermilk. (Irish, bainne, milk; elba, thick or thickened.)

"With beer and buttermilk, mingled together... To drink such... bonny-clabber." — Ben Jonson: The New Inn, i, 3.

Bone Johnny. John Bull is so called in the East Indies.

Bontemps. Roger Bontemps (French). The personification of "Never say die." The phrase is from Bracanger.

"Vous parvies, pleins d'avide; Vous riches, deureux; Vous, dont le cœur divin A prou un cours heureux; Vous, qui perdez peut-être Plus tôt que vous croyez, Eh! gai! prenez ma hoir Le gros Roger Bontemps." — Déry uer.

Ye poor, with envy feeded; Ye rich, for more who long; Ye who by fortune loaded, Find all things going wrong; Ye who by some disaster See all your cables break; From henceforth for your master Bluff Roger Bontemps take.

E.C.B.

Bonus. A bounty over and above the interest of a share in any company. (Latin, bonus quæstus, a good profit or bounty. The interest or fruit of money put out in an investment was by the Romans called the quæstus.)

Bonus Homœum. (See HOMER.)

Boo (sing. Bonn'). Indian priests. In China they are the priests of the Fohists; their number is 50,000, and they are represented as idle and dissolute. In Japan they are men of rank and family. In Tonquin every yugoda has at least two bonnes, and some as many as fifty.

Booby. A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon. In England, the Solan goose is called a booby or noddy. (Spanish, bobo; German, bobo.)

A booby will never make a hock. The bird called the booby, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself.
exactness. To speak literatim, according to what is in the book.

To speak like a book. To speak with great precision and accuracy; to be full of information.

To speak without book. Without authority; from memory only, without consulting or referring to the book.

Bell, book, and candle. (See under Bell.)

Book of Books (The).* The Bible.

Book of Life (The). In Bible language, a register of the names of those who are to inherit eternal life. (Phil. iv. 3; Rev. xx. 12.)

Books.

He is in my books, or in my good books. The former is the older form; both mean to be in favour. The word book was at one time used more widely, a single sheet, or even a list being called a book. To be in my books is to be on my list of friends.

"I was so much in his books, that at his decease he left me his lamp."—Addison.

"If you want to keep in her good books, don't call her the old lady."—Dickens.

He is in my black (or bad) books. In disfavour. (See Black Books.)

On the books. On the list of a club, on the list of candidates, on the list of voters, etc. At Cambridge University they say "on the books," out of my books. Not in favour; no longer in my list of friends.

The battle of the books. The Boyle controversy (q.v.). (See Battle.)

To take one's name off the books. To withdraw from a club. In the passive voice it means to be excluded, or no longer admissible to enjoy the benefits of the institution. The Cambridge University phrase is "to take my name off the boards," etc.

Book-keeper. One who borrows books, but does not return them.

Book-keeping. The system of keeping the debtor and creditor accounts of merchants in books provided for the purpose, either by single or by double entry.

Waste-book. A book in which items are not posted under heads, but are left at random, as each transaction occurred.

Day-book. A book in which are set down the debits and credits which occur day by day. These are ultimately sorted into the ledger.

*Ledger (Dutch, leggen, to lay).* The book which is laid up in counting-houses. In the ledger the different items are regularly sorted according to the system in use. (Ledger-lines.)

By single entry. Book-keeping in which each debit or credit is entered only once into the ledger, either as a debit or credit item, under the customer's or salesman's name.

By double entry. By which each item is entered twice into the ledger, once on the debit and once on the credit side.

Bookworm. One always poring over his books; so called in allusion to the insect that eats holes in books, and lives both in and on its leaves.

Boom. A sudden and great demand of a thing, with a corresponding rise in its price. The rush of a ship under press of sail. The word arises from the sound of booming or rushing water.

"The boom was something wonderful. Everybody bought, everybody sold."—Mark Twain: Life on the Mississippi, chap. 57.

Boom-Passerger (A).* A convict on board ship, who was chained to the boom when made to take his daily exercise.

Boon Companion (A).* A convivial companion. A bon vivant is one fond of good living. "Who leads a good life is sure to live well." (French, bon, good.)

Boot. I will give you that to boot, i.e. in addition. The Anglo-Saxon boot or bot means "compensation." (Gothic, bota, profit.)

"As anyone shall be more powerful... or higher in degree, shall he the more deeply make boot for sin, and pay for every mischief."—Law of King Ethelred.

Boot-Jack. (See under Jack.)

Boots. Seven-league boots. The boots worn by the giant in the fairy tale, called The Seven-league Boots. These boots would stride over seven leagues at a pace.

I measure nine feet ten inches without my boots. The allusion is to the chopine or high-heeled boot, worn at one time to increase the stature. Hamlet says of the lady actress, "You are nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine." (ii. 2.)

Boots (an instrument of torture). They were made of four pieces of narrow board nailed together, of a competent length to fit the leg. The leg being placed therein, wedges were inserted till the sufferer confessed or fainted.

"All your empire could never do the like cure upon the gout as the rack in England or your Scotch boots."—Marston: The Malcontent.
Boots. The youngest bishop of the House of Lords, whose duty it is to read prayers; so called because he walks into the house in a dead man's shoes or boots, i.e. he was not in the house till some bishop there died, and left a vacancy.

Boots. To go to bed in his boots. To be very tipsy.

Boots at an Inn. A servant whose duty it is to clean the boots. The Boots of the Holly-tree Inn, a Christmas tale by Charles Dickens (1855).

Boots errand. An unprofitable or futile message. The Saxon bot means "reparation"—"overplus to profit": as "I will give you that to boot"; "what boots it me?" (what does it profit me?)

"I sent him
Bootsless home and weather-beaten back."
Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. i.

Boottes (Boo'-tees), or the ox-driver, a constellation. According to ancient mythology, Bootes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death, being taken to heaven with his plough and oxen, was made a constellation. Homer calls it "the wagoneer."

"Wide over the spacious regions of the north,
That sees Bootes over his tardy van."

Booth. Husband of Amelia. (Fielding: Amelia.)

Boory. Partly intoxicated. (Russian, buza, millet-beer; Latin, buzca, from buo, to fill; Welsh, bozi; Old Dutch, byzen, to tipple; Coptic, boza, intoxicating drink.)

"In Egypt there is a beer called 'Bozer,' which is intoxicating."—Morning Chronicle, Aug. 27th, 1832.

Bor (in Norfolk) is a familiar term of address to a lad or young man; as, "Well, bor, I saw the mother you spoke of"—i.e. "Well, sir, I saw the lass. . . ." "Bor" is the Dutch boer, a farmer; and "mor" the Dutch morg, a female.

Borachio. A drunkard. From the Spanish borachio or borracho, a bottle made of pig's skin, with the hair inside, dressed with resin and pitch to keep the wine sweet. (Mnauhet.)

Borachio. A follower of Don John, in Much Ado About Nothing, who thus plays upon his own name:

"I will, like a true drunkard (borachio), utter all to thee."—Act iii. 5.

Bor'ak or Al Borak (the lightning). The animal brought by Gabriel to carry Mahomet to the seventh heaven. It had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had the wings of an eagle, spoke with the voice of a man, and glittered all over with radiant light. This creature was received into Paradise. (See ANIMALS, CAMEL.)

Bord Halfpenny. A toll paid by the Saxons to the lord for the privilege of having a bord or bench at some fair for the sale of articles.

Bordarii or Bordamen. A class of agriculturists superior to the Villani, who paid their rent by supplying the lord's board with eggs and poultry. (Domesday Book.)

Border (Th'ry). The frontier of England and Scotland, which, from the eleventh to the fifteenth century, was the field of constant forays, and a most fertile source of ill blood between North and South Britain.

"March, march, Ettrick and Teviotdale;
Why the devil dinna ye march forward in order?
March, march, Eskdale and Liddesdale—
All the Blue Burrets are bound for the border."
Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery.

Border Minstrel. Sir Walter Scott, because he sang of the border. (1771-1832.)

Border States (The). The five "slave" states (Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri) which lay next to the "free states" were so called in the Civil War, 1861-1865.

Bordlands. Lands kept by lords in Saxon times for the supply of their own board or table. (Anglo-Saxon, bore, a table.)

Bordlode. Service paid for the land.

Bore (A). A person who bestows his tediousness upon you; one who wearsies you with his prate, his company, or his solicitations. Verb bear, bore, borne, to endure. A bore is someone we bore with or endured.

"At this instant
He bores me with some tramp."
Shakespeare: Henry VIII., i. 1.

Bore. A tidal wave. The most celebrated bores are those of the Brahmaputra, Ganges, Hooghly, Indus, and Tsingtau (in China). Bores occur regularly in the Bristol Channel and Solway Frith; occasionally (in high tides), in the Clyde, Dee (Cheshire), Dornoch Frith, Lune, Severn, Trent (enigne), and Wye. The bore of the Bay of Fundy is caused by the collision of the tides. (Icelandic bóra, a wave or blow.)

Bore (in pugilistic language) is one who bears or presses on a man so as to force him to the ropes of the ring by his physical weight; figuratively, one who bears or presses on you by his pertinacity.

“All beggars are liable to rebuke with the certainty besides of being considered bores.”—Prince Albert, 1st earl.

Bor'cal. Northern.

“In radiant streams, bright over Europe, burns the Boréal main.”—Thomas: Adarna, 1st.

Bor'cea. The north wind. According to mythology, he was the son of Astraeus, a Titan, and Eos, the morning, and lived in a cave of Mount Haemon, in Thrace. (Greek, borax, voracious; Boræas, the north wind; Russian, bora, storm.)

“Fear, rude Boræus' blustering raider.”—Geo. Long, Sorrows.

“Omnia putes haurit saxa vorax.”—Lucan.

Bor'gheso (Bor-ga-zy). The Princess Borghese pulled down a church contiguous to her palace, because the incense turned her sick and the organ made her head uneasy.

Bor'gia. (See Lucrezia.)

Born. Not born yesterday. Not to be taken in; worldly wise.

Born Days. In my born days. Ever since I was born.

Born in the Purple (a translation of porphyrogentus). The infant of royal parents in opposition to born in the gutter, or child of beggars. This has nothing to do with the purple robes of royalty. It refers to the chamber lined with porphyry by one of the Byzantine empresses for her accouchement. (See Nineteenth Century, March, 1894, p. 510.)

“Zoe, the fourth wife of Leo VI., gave birth to the future Emperor Constantine Porphyrogentus in the purple chamber of the imperial palace.”—Pinning: History of the Byzantine and Greek Empire, Vol. I.

Born with a Silver Spoon, or Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. Born to good luck; born with hereditary wealth. The reference is to the usual gift of a silver spoon by the godfather or godmother of a child. The lucky child does not need to wait for the gift, for it is born with it in its mouth or inherits it from infancy.

Borough English is where the youngest son inherits instead of the eldest. It is of Saxon origin, and is so called to distinguish it from the Norman custom.

“The custom of Borough English abounds in Kent, Sussex, Surrey, the neighbourhood of London, and some set. In the Midlands it is rare, and north of the Humber... it does not seem to occur.”—F. Pollock: MacCulloch's Magna, 16th (1863).

Borow. St. George to borowes, i.e. St. George being surety. (Danish, borgen, bail; Swedish, borgan, a giving of bail.)

Borr. Son of Ymer, and father of Odin, Ve, and Hertha or Earth. The Celtic priests claimed descent from this deity. (Celtic mythology.)

Borrow. A pledge. To borrow is to take something which we pledge ourselves to return. (Anglo-Saxon, borg, a loan or pledge; verb borgian.)

“Ye may return by borrow my two priests.”—Scott: Ivanhoe, chap. xxxiii.

Borrowed days of February. The 12th, 13th and 14th of February, said to be borrowed from January. If these days prove stormy, the year will be favoured with good weather; but if fine, the year will be foul and unfavourable. These three days are called by the Scotch Fauleteach, and hence the word fauleteach means execrable weather.

Borrowed days of March. The last three days of March are said to be “borrowed from April.”

* March said to April,
  I see 3 bergs [bogues, sheep] upon a hill;
  And if you lend me days 3
  I'll find a way to make them dee[d].

   The first 3 were wind and west,

   The second 3 were snow and sleet,

   The third 3 were stile a freeze

   It froze the birds' nests to the trees.

   When the 3 days were past and gone

   The swilly boggs came birling [limping] home.

Bortell. The bull, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (Heinrich von Alkm.)

Bos[e] in lingua. He is bribed to silence; he has a coin (marked with a bull's head) on his tongue. Adalardus, in Statutis Abbatis Corbieensis (bk. i. c. 8), seems to refer to the bos as a coin.

“Bore et reliquum perennium habeat unde et ipse et omnibus familiae cynis exspecti” (i.e. plenty of gold and silver...).

Plautus, however, distinctly says (Persa, ii. 5, 16), “Bores bini hic sunt in cru-cinam” (Two bulls in a purse.) The Greeks had the phrase, BOS E'I KAI GLOUSOS. Servius tells us that even the Romans had a coin with a bull stamped on it. (See Pliny, 18, 3.) Presuming that there was no such coin, there cannot be a doubt that the word Bos was used as the equivalent of the price of an ox.
Bosh. A Persian word meaning nonsense. It was popularized in 1824 by James Morier in his Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan, a Persian romance. (Turkish, bosh laterdi, silly talk.)

"I always like to read old Darwin's Loves of the Plants: 'bush as it is in a scientific point of view.'—Kingsley: Two Years Ago (chap. x.)

Boisk. On the verge of drunkenness. University slang, from boisk, to pasture, to feed. Everyone will remember how Sir John Falstaff made sack his meat and drink.

Bosom Friend. (A). A very dear friend. Nathan says, "It lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter." (2 Sam. xii. 3.) Bosom friend, amis du cœur, St. John is represented in the New Testament as the "bosom friend" of Jesus.

Bosom Sermons. Written sermons, not extemporary ones or from notes. Does it not mean committed to memory or learnt by heart?

"The preaching from "bosom sermons," or from writing, being considered a lifeless practice before the Reformation."—Home: Reformation in England, p. 178.

Bosphorus—Ox ford. The Thracian Bosphorus, or Bosporus, unites the Sea of Marmora with the Euxine (2 syl.) or Black Sea. According to Greek fable, Zeus (Jupiter) greatly loved Io, and changed her into a white cow or heifer from fear of Hera or Juno; to flee from whom she swam across the strait, which was thence called bos poros, the passage of the cow. Hera discovered the trick, and sent a gadfly to torment Io, who was made to wander, in a state of phrenzy, from land to land. The wanderings of Io were a favourite subject of story with the ancients. Ultimately, the persecuted Argive princess found rest on the banks of the Nile.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Valerius Flaccus give this account, but Apollonius says it was a ship, with the prow of an ox, sent by Thracian or Phrygian shepherds, through the straits, that gave name to this passage.

Boss, a master, is the Dutch boss, head of the household. Hence the great man, chief, a master, a swell.

"Mr. Sted calls Mr. O'Connor the 'Boss of the House.'"

Bossam. One of the two chief deities of the negroes on the Gold Coast, the other being Demonio. Bossam, the principle of good, is said to be white; and Demonio, the principle of evil, black. (African mythology.)

Bosstel or Bosstall. A narrow roadway up the steep ascent of hills or downs. (Anglo-Saxon bás, a hill; stige, a rising path; our stile.)

Botanomancy. Divination by leaves. Words were written on leaves which were exposed to the wind. The leaves left contained the response. (See BotANY.)

Botany means a treatise on fodder (Greek, botanē, fodder, from bosom, to feed). The science of plants would be phytology, from phytos (plant)-treatise.

Botch. A patch. Botch and patch are the same word; the older form was bodge, whence boggle. (Italian pezzo, pronounced putzo.)

Bother, i.e. pather (Hibernian). Halliwell gives us bother, which he says means to chatter idly.

"Sir, erose the impure, cease your pother... the creature's wither, not father..."

Lloyd: The Chevalier.

*: The Irish bochtor (broadhirt, trouble), or its cognate verb, to deafen, seems to be the original word.

Botke System. The Scotch system of building, like a barrack, all the outhouses of a farmstead, as the byres, stables, barns, etc. The farm servants live here. (Gaelic, bothy, a cot or hut; our booth.)

"The bothie system prevails, more or less, in the eastern and north-eastern districts."—I. Hepp, p. 17.

Botley Assizes. The joke is to ask a Botley man, "When the assizes are coming on?" and an innuendo is supposed to be implied to the tradition that the men of Botley once hanged a man because he could not drink so deep as his neighbours.

Bottes. A propos de bottes. By the by, thus: Mons. Monet, à propos de bottes, comment se porte madame votre mère?

"That venerable personage [the citizen Monet] not only gives Indiar instructions how to regain his health, but tells him, somewhat a propos des bottes... the long story of his peripatetic adventures."—Nineteenth Century, June 1861, p. 817.

Bottle. Looking for a needle in a bottle of hay. Looking for a very small article amidst a mass of other things. Bottle is a diminutive of the French bottle, a bundle; boute de foin, a bundle of hay.

Hang me in a bottle. (See Cat.)

Bottle-chart. A chart of ocean surface currents to show the track of sealed bottles thrown from ships into the sea.
Bottle-holder. One who gives moral but not material support. The allusion is to boxing or prize-fighting, where each combatant has a bottle-holder to wipe off blood, refresh with water, and do other services to encourage his man to persevere and win.

"Lord Palmerston considered himself the bottle-holder of open-mouthed states. He was the steadfast partisan of constitutional liberty in every part of the world."—The Times.

Bottle-imps. The Hebrew word for familiar spirits is aboth, leather bottles, to indicate that the magicians were wont to imprison in bottles those spirits which their spells had subdued.

Bottle-washer (Head). Chief agent; the principal man employed by another; a factotum. Head waiter or butler (bottelier).

Bottled Beer is said to have been discovered by Dean Nowell as a most excellent beverage. The Dean was very fond of fishing, and took a bottle of beer with him in his excursions. One day, being disturbed, he buried his bottle under the grass, and when he disinterred it some ten days afterwards, found it so greatly improved that he ever after drank bottled beer.

Bottled Moonshine. Social and benevolent schemes, such as Utopia, Coleridge's Pantisocracy, the dreams of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon, the New Republic, and so on.

"Grown! Haslitt: Coleridge's Where are those benevolent philosophies and systems? Bottled moonshine, which does not improve by keeping."—Birrell: Under Dante, p. 160 (1863).

Bottom. A ship's bottom is that part which is used for freight or stowage.

Goods imported in British bottoms are those which come in our own vessels.

Goods imported in foreign bottoms are those which come in foreign ships.

A full bottom is where the lower half of the hull is so disposed as to allow large stowage.

A sharp bottom is when a ship is capable of speed.

At bottom. Radically, fundamentally; as, the young prodigal lived a riotous life, but was good at bottom, or below the surface.

At the bottom. At the base or root.

"Pride is at the bottom of all great mistakes."—Ruskin: True and Beautiful, p. 429.

"From the bottom of my heart. Without reservation." (Jmo corde.)

"If one of the parties ... be content to forgive from the bottom of his heart all that the other has intrusted against him."—Common Prayer Book.

He was at the bottom of it. He really instigated it, or prompted it.

Never venture all in one bottom—i.e. one ship. "Do not put all your eggs into one basket."

"My ventures are not in one bottom trusted."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

To have no bottom. To be unfathomable.

To get to the bottom of the matter. To ascertain the entire truth; to bolt a matter to its bran.

To stand on one's own bottom. To be independent. "Every tub must stand on its own bottom."

"To touch bottom. To reach the lowest depth.

A horse of good bottom means of good stamina, good foundation.

Bottom (Nick), the wearer. A man who fancies he can do everything, and do it better than anyone else. Shakespeare has drawn him as profoundly ignorant, brawny, mock heroic, and with an overflow of self-conceit. He is in one part of Midsummer Night's Dream represented with an ass's head, and Titania, queen of the fairies, under a spell, caresses him as an Adonis.

"The name is very appropriate, as the word bottom means a ball of thread used in weaving, etc. Thus in Clark's Herodry we read, "The coat of Badland is argent, three bottoms in fess gules, the thread or."

"When Goldsmith, jealous of the attention which a dancing monkey attracted, said, 'I can do that,' he was but playing bottom."—H. G. White.

Bottomless. The bottomless pit. An allusion to William Pitt, who was remarkably thin.

Botty. Conceited. The frog that tried to look as big as an ox was a "botty" frog (Norfylk). A similar word is "swell," though not identical in meaning. "Bumpkin" and "bumptious" are of similar construction. (Welsh, bot, a round body, our bottle; bath, the boss of a shield; bathet, a rotundity.)

Boucan. Donner un boucan. To give a dance. Boucan or Bocan was a musician and dancing master in the middle of the seventeenth century. He was alive in 1645.

"Thibaut se dit entre Mercure. Et l'orgueilleux Colin nous jure qu'il est aussi bien Anglion que Bocan est bon violon."

Sieur de St. Amand (1661).

"Les musiciens qui jouant au balles du roi sont appelés disciples de Boucan."—Histoire Comique du Francillon (1633).
Bonders or Boudoins. A tribe of giants and evil genii, the guard of Shiva. (Indian mythology.)

Boudot, properly speaking, is the room to which a lady retires when she is in the suks. (French, boudoir, to pout or suck.)

The first boudoirs were those of the mistresses of Louis XV. (See Bower.)

Bones de St. Amand (Les). The mud baths of St. Amand (that is, St. Amand-les-Eaux, near Valenciennes, famous for its mineral waters). These mud-baths are a "sorte de limon qui se trouve près des eaux minérales." By a figure of speech, one says, by way of reproof, to an insolent, foul-mouthed fellow, "I see you have been to the mud-baths of St. Amand."

Bought and Sold, or Bought, sold, and done for. Ruined, done for, out-witted.

"Jacky of Norfolk, he not too bold.
For Hecum, thy master, be bought and sold!"

Shakespeare: Richard III, act v. 3.

"It would make a man mad as a buck to be so bought and sold."—Comedy of Errors, Act I.

Bougie. A wax candle; so called from Bougie, in Algeria, whence the wax was imported. A medical instrument used for dilating strictures or removing obstructions.

Boule or Boulk-work (not Buhl). A kind of marquetry; so called from André Charles Boule, a cabinetmaker, to whom Louis XIV. gave apartments in the Louvre. (1642-1732.)

Boul'janaus. An idol worshipped at Nantes, in ancient Gaul. An inscription was found to this god in 1592. (Vulgar mythology.)

Bounoc. That's a bounder. A gross exaggeration, a braggart's lie. (Dutch, bonz; verb bonzen, to bouncer or thump. A bouncer lie is a thumping lie, and a bouncer is a thumper.)

"He speaks plain cannon, fire, and smoke, and bounces."—Shakespeare: King John, II. 2.

Bounty. Queen Anne's Bounty. The produce of the first-fruits and tithes due to the Crown, made over by Queen Anne to a corporation established in the year 1704, for the purpose of augmenting church livings under £50 a year.

Bouquet. French for nosegay.

"Mr. Dawe was able to make a financial statement burst into a bouquet of flowers"—McCarthy: Our Own Times, vol. II. chap. xxx. p. 11.

The bouquet of thine, also called its nosegay, is its aroma.

Bourbon. So named from the castle and seigniory of Bourbon, in the old province of Bourbonnais. The Bourbon family is a branch of the Capet stock, through the brother of Philippe le Bel.

Bourgeois (French), our burgher. The class between the "gentleman" and the peasantry. It includes all merchants, shopkeepers, and what we call the "middle class."

Bourgeoisie (French). The merchants, manufacturers, and master-tradesmen considered as a class. Cito- gen is a freeman, a citizen of the State; bourgeois, an individual of the Bourgeoisie class. Molière has a comedy entitled Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.

"The commons of England, the Tierra-Stat of France, the bourgeoisie of the Continent generally, are the descendants of this class [artisans] generally."—Mili: Political Economy (Prelim. p. 125).

Bouse. (See Boozy.)

Boustrap'a. Napoleon III. The word is compounded of the first syllables Bon-logne, Stro-shourg, Pa-ris, and alludes to his escapades in 1836 and 1840.

Boustroph'edon. A method of writing or printing, alternately from right to left and left to right, like the path of oxen in ploughing. (Greek, bous-strepho, ox-turning.)

Bouts-rimés [rhymed-endings]. A person writes a line and gives the last word to another person, who writes a second to rhyme with it, and so on. Dean Swift employs the term for a poem, each stanza of which terminates with the same word. He has given a poem of nine verses, each of which ends with Domitiia, to which, of course, he finds nine rhymes. (French.)

Bovey Coal. A lignite found at Bovey Tracy, in Devonshire.

Bow (to rhyme with flow). (Anglo-Saxon, boga; verb, bogan or bogan, to arch.)

Draw not your bow till your arrow is fixed. Have everything ready before you begin.

He has a famous bow up at the castle. Said of a braggart or pretender.

He has two strings to his bow. Two means of accomplishing his object; if one fails, he can try the other. The allusion is to the custom of the British bowmen carrying a reserve string in case of accident.

To draw a bow at a venture. To attack with a random remark; to make a random remark which may hit the truth.

"A certain man drew a bow at a venture and smote the king of Israel."—1 Kings xii. 46.
To draw the long bow. To exaggerate. The long-bow was the famous English weapon till gunpowder was introduced, and it is said that a good archer could hit between the fingers of a man's hand at a considerable distance, and could propel his arrow a mile. The tales told about long-bow adventures are so wonderful that they fully justify the phrase given above.

To unstring the bow will not heal the wound (Italian). René of Anjou, king of Sicily, on the death of his wife, Isabelle of Lorraine, adopted the emblem of a bow with the string broken, and with the words given above for the motto, by which he meant, "Lamentation for the loss of his wife was but poor satisfaction."

Bow (to rhyme with now). The fore-end of a boat or ship. (Danish and Norwegian, bon or bow, a shoulder; Icelandic, boðr.)

On the bow. Within a range of 45° on one side or the other of the prow.

Bow Bells. Bows within sound of Bow bells. A true cockney. St. Mary-le-Bow has long had one of the most celebrated bell-peals in London. John Dun, mercer, gave in 1472 two tenements to maintain the ringing of Bow bell every night at nine o'clock, to direct travellers on the road to town; and in 1520 William Copland gave a bigger bell for the purpose of "sounding a retreat from work." Bow church is nearly the centre of the City. (This bow rhymes with flow.)

Bow-catcher (A). A corruption of "Beau Catcher," a love-curl, termed by the French an accrocche couv. A love-curl worn by a man is a Bell-rope, i.e. a rope to pull the belles with.

Bow-hand. The left hand; the hand which holds the bow. (This bow rhymes with flow.)

To be too much of the bow-hand. To fall in a design; not be sufficiently dexterous.

Bow-street Runners. Detectives who secured the country to find criminals, before the introduction of the police force. Bow Street, near Covent Garden, London, is where the principal police-court stands. (This bow rhymes with flow.)

Bow-window in Front (A) A big corporation.

He was a very large man... with what is termed a considerable bow-window in front."—Capt. Murfet: Poor Jack. I.

Bow-wow Word. A word in imitation of the sound made, as hiss, cackle, murmur, cuckoo, whip-poor-will, etc. (Max Müller.)

Bowden. Not every man can be vicar of Bowden. Not everyone can occupy the first place. Bowden is one of the best livings in Cheshire. (Cheshire proverb.)

Bowdlerise (To). To expurgate a book in editing it. Thomas Bowdler, in 1818, gave to the world an expurgated edition of Shakespeare's works. We have also Bowdlerism, Bowdlerian, Bowdleriser, Bowdlerisation, etc. (See Grangerise.)

Bowels of Mercy. Compassion, sympathy. The affections were at one time supposed to be the outcome of certain secretions or organs, as the bile, the kidneys, the heart, the head, the liver, the bowels, the spleen, and so on. Hence such words and phrases as melanchooly (black bile); the Psalmist says that his reins, or kidneys, instructed him (Psa. x. 7), meaning his inward conviction; the head is the seat of understanding; the heart of affection and memory (hence "learning by heart"), the bowels of mercy, the spleen of passion or anger, etc.

His bowels yearned over him (upon or towards him). He felt a secret affection for him.

"Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother."—Gen. xiii. 30; see also Kings iii. 26.

Bower. A lady's private room. (Anglo-Saxon bnr, a chamber.) To rhyme with flower. (See BOUDOIR.)

"By a back staircase she slipped to her own bower."—Byronic: Thankful blossoms, line 1.

Bower Anchor. An anchor carried at the bow of a ship. There are two: one called the best bower, and the other the small bower. (To rhyme with flower.)

"Stationed being the best bower, and part the small bower."—Spix: Sailor's Word-book.

Bower-woman (A). A lady's maid and companion. The attendants were admitted to considerable freedom of speech, and were treated with familiarity and kindness. ("Bower" to rhyme with flower.)

"This maiden, replied Evaine, is my bowe-woman, and acquainted with my most inward thoughts. I beseech you to permit her presence at our conference."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap vi.

Bower of Bliss, in Wandering Island, the enchanted residence of Acra-sia, destroyed by Sir Guyon. (Spencer: Faerie Queene, book ii.) ("Bower" to rhyme with flower.)
Bowie Knife. A long, stout knife, carried by hunters in the Western States of America. So called from Colonel James Bowie, one of the most daring characters of the States. Born in Logan, co. Kentucky. A bowie knife has a horn handle, and the curved blade is 15 in. long, and 1½ wide at the hilt. ("Bowie" to rhyme with showy.)

Bowing. We uncover the head when we wish to salute anyone with respect; but the Jews, Turks, Siamese, etc., uncover their feet. The reason is this: With us the chief act of investiture is crowning or placing a cap on the head; but in the East it is putting on the slippers. To take off our symbol of honour is to confess we are but "the humble servant" of the person whom we thus salute. ("Bowing" to rhyme with ploughing or plowing.)

Bowed. He was bowed out. A term in cricket. (Pronounce bold.)

Bowling. Tom Bowling. The type of a model sailor in Smollett's Roderick Random. (To rhyme with rolling.)

Bowls. They who play bowls must expect to meet with rubbers. Those who touch pitch must expect to defile their fingers. Those who enter upon affairs of chance, adventure, or dangerous hazard must make up their minds to encounter crossoses, losses, or difficulties. Those who play with edged instruments must expect to get cut. Soldiers in battle must look out for wounds, gamblers for losses, libertines for diseases.

Bowse. (See BOWSE.)

Bowerer God. The same as the "archer god," meaning Cupid. ("Bowerer" to rhyme with rouncer.)

Box. I've got into the wrong box. I am out of my element. Lord Lyttelton used to say he ought to have been brought up to some business; that whenever he went to Vauxhall and heard the mirth of his neighbours, he used to fancy pleasure was in every box but his own. Wherever he went for happiness, he somehow always got into the wrong box. (See CHRISTMAS BOX.)

Box and Cox. The two chief characters in John M. Morton's farce, usually called Box and Cox.

Box the Compass. Repeat in order the 32 points. (Spanish, boxar, to sail round.)

Box Days. Two days in spring and autumn, and one at Christmas, during vacation, in which pleadings may be filed. This custom was established in 1630, for the purpose of expediting business. Each judge has a private box with a slit, into which informations may be placed on box days, and the judge, who alone has the key, examines the papers in private.

Box Harry (?), among commercial travellers, is to shirk the table d'hôte and take something substantial for tea, in order to save expense. Halliwell says, "to take care after having been extravagant." To box a tree is to cut the bark to procure the sap, and these travellers drain the landlord by having a cheap tea instead of an expensive dinner. To "box the fox" is to rob an orchard.

Boxing-Day. (See Christmas Box.)

Boy in sailor language has no reference to age, but only to experience in seamanship. A boy may be fifty or any other age. A crew is divided into abbeysmen, ordinary seamen, and boys or greenhorns. A "boy" is not required to know anything about the practical working of the vessel, but an "able seaman" must know all his duties and be able to perform them.

"A boy does not ship to know anything."

Boy Bachelor. William Wotton, D.D., was admitted at St. Catherine's Hall before he was ten, and took his B.A. when he was twelve and a half. (1606-1726.)

Boy Bishop. St. Nicholas. From his cradle he is said to have manifested marvellous indications of piety, and was therefore selected for the patron saint of boys. (Fourth century.)

Boy Bishop. The custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir, etc., on St. Nicholas Day (December 6th), as a mock bishop, is very ancient. The boy possessed episcopal honour for three weeks, and the rest of the choir were his prebendaries. If he died during the time of his prelacy, he was buried in pontificalibus. Probably the reference is to Jesus Christ sitting in the Temple among the doctors while He was a boy. The custom was abolished in the reign of Henry VIII.

Boycott in buttons (A). (See BUTTONS.)

Boycott (To). To boycott a person is to refuse to deal with him, to take any notice of him, or even to sell to him. The term arose in 1881, when Captain Boycott, an Irish landlord, was thus ostracised by the Irish agrarian insurgents. The custom of ostracising is of very old standing. St. Paul exhorts Christians to "boycott" idolaters (2 Cor. vi. 17): and the Jews "boycotted" the Samaritans. The French phrases, Damnez une boutique and Domez une ville, convey the same idea; and the Catholic Church anathematises and interdicts freely.

"One word as to the way in which a man should be boycotted. When any man has taken a farm from which a tenant has been evicted, or is a grabber, let everyone in the parish turn his back on him; have no communication with him; have no dealings with him. You need never say an unkind word to him, but never say anything at all to him. If you must meet him in fair, walk away from him silently. Do him no violence, but have no dealings with him. Let every man's door be closed against him; and make him feel himself a stranger and a castaway in his own neighbourhood."—J. Dillon, M.P. (Speech to the Land League, Feb. 25, 1881.)

Boyle Controversy. A book-battle between the Hon. Charles Boyle, third Earl of Orrery, and the famous Bentley, respecting the Epistles of Phalaris. Charles Boyle edited the Epistles of Phalaris in 1695. Two years later Bentley published his celebrated Dissertatton, to prove that the epistles were not written till the second century after Christ instead of six centuries before that epoch. In 1699 he published another rejoinder, and utterly annihilated the Boyleists.

Boyle’s Law. "The volume of a gas is inversely as the pressure." If we double the pressure on a gas, its volume is reduced to one-half; if we quadruple the pressure, it will be reduced to one-fourth; and so on; so called from the Hon. Robert Boyle. (1627-1691.)

Boyle Lectures. Eight sermons a year in defence of Christianity, founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle.

Boz. Charles Dickens (1812-1870).

"For, my signature in the Morning Chronicle," he tells us, "was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Monocumque, in honour of the Vicar of Wakefield, which being pronounced Booz, got shortened into Boz;" "Who the dickens 'Boz' could be puzzled many a learned man; but time revealed the mystery. For 'Boz' appeared as Dickens' self." (Epigrams in the Carthusian.)

Bozey. James Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson (1740-1795).

Brabantonne. A Belgian patriotic song, composed in the revolution of 1830, and so named from Brabant, of which Brussels is the chief city.

Brabantons. Troops of adventurers and bandits, who made war a trade and lent themselves for money to anyone who would pay them; so called from Brabant, their great nest. (Twelfth century.)

Brace. The Brace Tavern, south-east corner of King’s Bench; originally kept by two brothers named Partridge, i.e. a brace of birds.

Brace of Shakes. In a brace of shakes. Very soon. (See SHAKE.) Similar phrases are: "In the twinkling of an eye." (See EYE.) "In the twinkling of a bed-post." (See BEDPOST.)

Bradamant or Bradamante. Sister of Rinaldo, in Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso. She is represented as a most wonderful Christian Amazon, possessed of an irresistible spear, which unhorsed every knight that it touched. The same character appears in the Orlando Innamorato of Bojardo.

Bradshaw’s Guide was started in 1839 by George Bradshaw, printer, in Manchester. The Monthly Guide was first issued in December, 1841, and consisted of thirty-two pages, giving tables of forty-three lines of English railway.

Bradwardine (Rose). The daughter of Baron Bradwardine, and the heroine of Scott’s Waverley. She is in love with young Waverley, and ultimately marries him.

Brag. A game at cards; so called because the players brag or tell of their cards to induce the company to make bets. The principal sport of the game is occasioned by any player bringing that he holds a better hand than the rest of the party, which is declared by saying "I brag," and staking a sum of money on the issue. (Boyle.)

Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Talking is all very well, but doing is far better. (Jack Brag.) A vulgar, pretentious braggar, who gets into aristocratic society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief. The character is in Theodore Hook’s novel of the same name.

"He was a sort of literary Jack Brag."—T. H. Burton.
Braggadocio

Braggadocio. A bragga. One who is very valiant with his tongue, but a great coward at heart. A barking dog that bites not. The character is from Spenser's Faerie Queene, and of a type of the "Intemperance of the Tongue." After a time, like the jackdaw in borrowed plumes, Braggadocio is stripped of all his "glories"; his shield is claimed by Sir Marinell; his lady is proved by the golden girdle to be the false Florimel; his horse is claimed by Sir Guyon; Talus shaves off his beard and scourges his aquire; and the pretender sneaks off amidst the jeers of everyone. It is thought that the poet had Felipe of Spain in his eye when he drew this character. (Faerie Queene, iii. 8, 30; v. 3.)

Bragi. Son of Odin and Frigga. According to Scandinavian mythology, he was the inventor of poetry; but, unlike Apollo, he is always represented as an old man with a long white beard. His wife was Iduna.

Bragi's Apple. An instant cure of weariness, decay of power, ill temper, and failing health. These apples were inexhaustible, for immediately one was eaten its place was supplied by another.

Bragi's Story. Always enchanting, but never coming to an end.

"But I have made my story long enough; if I say more, you may fancy that it is Bragi who has come among you, and that he has entered on his endless story."—Keats: Heroes of Asgard, p. 254.

Bragmardo. When Gargantua took the halls of Notre Dame de Paris to hang about the neck of his horse, the citizens sent Bragmardo to him with a remonstrance. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel.)

Brahma (Indian). The self-existing and invisible Creator of the universe; represented with four heads looking to the four corners of the world. The divine triad is Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva.

Brahma. One of the three beings created by God to assist in the creation of the world. The Brahmans claim him as the founder of their religious system.

"What'er in India holds the sacred name Of mighty or low, the Brahmans claim; In titles, names, vain and pale, last, Brahma, their Founder, as a soul they boast."—Cannan: Life of Buddha, book vii.

Brahmi. One of the three goddess-daughters of Vishnu, representing "creative energy."

Brahmin. A worshipper of Brahma, the highest caste in the system of Hindusm, and of the priestly order.

Bramble (Matthew). A taste, gouty, benevolent, country squire, in Smollett's novel of Humphrey Clinker. Colman has introduced the same character as Sir Robert Bramble in his Poor Gentleman. Sheridan's "Sir Anthony Absolute" is of the same type.

"Ain't I a baronet? Sir Robert Bramble at Blackberry Hall, in the county of Kent? The time you should know it, for you have been myellan, two-listed valet-de-chambre these thirty years."—The Poor Gentleman, iii. 1.

Bran. If not Bran, it is Bran's brother. If not the real "Simon Pure," it is just as good. A complimentary expression. Bran was Fingal's dog, a mighty favourite.

Bran-new or Brand-new. (Anglo-Saxon, brand, a torch.) Fire new. Shakespeare, in Love's Labour Lost, i. 1, says, "A man of fire-new words." And again in Twelfth Night, iii. 2, "Fire-new from the mint"; and again in King Lear, v. 3, "Fire-new fortune"; and again in Richard III, act i. 3, "Your fire-new stamp of honour is scarce current." Originally applied to metals and things manufactured in metal which shine. Subsequently applied generally to things quite new.

Brand. The Clicquot brand, etc., the best brand, etc. That is the merchant's or excise mark branded on the article itself, the vessel which contains the article, the wrapper which covers it, the cork of the bottle, etc., to guarantee its being genuine, etc. Madame Clicquot, of champagne notoriety, died in 1806.

He has the brand of villain in his looks. It was once customary to brand the cheeks of felons with an F. The custom was abolished by law in 1822.

Brandenburg. Confession of Brandenburg. A formulary or confession of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg, by order of the elector, with the view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the confession of Augsburg.

Brandimart, in Orlando Furioso, is Orlando's brother-in-law.

Brandon, the juggler, lived in the reign of Henry VIII.

Brandons. Lighted torches. Domínica de brandonibus (St. Valentine's Day), when boys used to carry about brandons (Cupid's torches).

Brand is Latin for Goose. Here is a pun between anser, a goose, and answer, to reply. What is the Latin for goose? Answer [aner] brandy. (See TACE THE LATIN FOR CANDELO.)

Brandy Nan. Queen Anne, who was very fond of brandy (1664, 1702-1714). On the statue of Queen Anne in St. Paul's Churchyard a wit wrote—

"Brandy Nan, Brandy Nan, left in the lurch.

How face to the gin shop; her back to the church."

A "gin palace" used to stand at the south corner of St. Paul's Churchyard.

Brangton (The). Vulgar, malicious, jealous women. The characters are taken from Miss Burney's novel called Evelina. One of the brothers is a Cockney snob.

Brack. A gag for scolds. (Dutch, prang, a fetter; German, pranger, Gaelic, braauen, a kind of pillory.)

Braseneuse (Oxford). Over the gate is a brass nose, the arms of the college; but the worst is a corruption of brazen-hair, a brasserie or brewhouse. (Latin, brazenium.)

Brass. Impudence. A lawyer said to a troublesome witness, "Why, man, you have brass enough in your head to make a teakettle." "And you, sir," replied the witness, "have water enough in yours to fill it."

Nymphon Brass. A knavish attorney; servile, affecting sympathy, but making his clients his lawful prey. (Dicken's: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Brat. A child; so called from the Welsh, brut, a child's pin-safore; and brut is a contraction of bratitch, a cloth, also a standard.

"Every man must repair to the braticha of his tribe."—Scott.

"The Israelites' household of the Lord!
O Abraham's brat! O brand of blessed seed!"

Bonsaca: De Profundis.

Brave. The Brave. Alfonso IV. of Portugal (1290, 1324-1357).

John André van der Mersch, patriot, The brave Fleming (1734-1792).

Bravery. Finery is the French bravery. The French for courage is bravoure.

"What woman in the city do I name

When that I say the city woman bear?

The cost of pelisses unworthy should we?

Who can come in and see that I mean her? . . .

On what is the worst function

That says his bravery is not of my cost?"

Shakespeare: As You Like It, II, 7.

Bravest of the Brave. Marshal Ney. So called by the troops of Fredland (1807), on account of his fearless bravery. Napoleon said of him, "That man is a lion." (1769-1815.)

Brawn. The test of the brown's head. A little boy one day came to the court of King Arthur, and, drawing his wand over a boar's head, declared, "There's never a cuckold's knife can carve this head of brawn." No knight in the court except Sir Cradock was able to accomplish the feat. (Perey's Reliques.)

Bray. (See Vicar.)

Brazen Age. The age of war and violence. It followed the silver age.

"To this next came in course the brazen age; A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody race.

Not immoveable, hard steel succeeded then,

And stubborn as the metal were the men."—Dryden: Metamorphoses, I.

Brazen-faced. Bold (in a bad sense), without shame.

"What a brazen-faced varlet art thou!"

Shakespeare: King Lear, II, 2.

Brazen Head. The following are noted:—One by Albertus Magnus, which cost him thirty years' labour, and was broken into a thousand pieces by Thomas Aquinas, his disciple, One by Friar Bacon.

"Bacon trembled for his brazen head."

Pope: Dunciad, iii, 184.

"Quoth he, 'My head's not made of brass,
As Friar Bacon's middle was.'"—S. Butler: Hudibras, ii, 2.

The brazen head of the Marquis de Villecun, of Spain. Another by a Polander, a disciple of Escotillo, an Italian.

"It was said if Bacon heard his head speak he would succeed; if not, he would fail. Miles was set to watch, and while Bacon slept the Head spoke thrice: "Time is"; half an hour later it said, "Time was." In another half-hour it said, "Time's past," fell down, and was broken to atoms. Byron refers to this legend.

"Like Friar Bacon's brazen head, I've spoken,

'Time is,' 'Time was,' 'Time's past.'"

Don Juan, I, 217.

Brazen Head. A gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Ferragus, of Portugal. It was omniscient, and told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, past, present, or to come. (Valentine and Orson.)

Brazen out (7th). To stick to an assertion knowing it to be wrong; to outface in a shameless manner; to disregard public opinion.

Breaches, meaning creeks or small bays, is to be found in Judges v. 17: Deborah, complaining of the tribes who refused to assist her in her war with Sisera, says Reuben continued in his sheepfolds, Gilead remained beyond

"They continued, . . . in breaking of bread, and in prayers."—Acts ii. 42; and again verse 46.

Bread. He took bread and salt, i.e., took his oath. Bread and salt were formerly eaten when an oath was taken.

Cast thy bread upon the waters; for thou shalt find it after many days (Eccles. xi. 1). When the Nile overflows its banks the weeds perish and the soil is disintegrated. The rice-seed being cast into the water takes root, and is found in due time growing in healthful vigour.

Don't quarrel with your bread and butter. Don't foolishly give up the pursuit by which you earn your living.

To know which side one's bread is buttered. To be mindful of one's own interest.

To take the bread out of one's mouth. To forestall another; to say something which another was on the point of saying; to take away another's livelihood. (See under Butter.)

Bread-basket (One's). The stomach.

Bread and Cheese. The barest necessities of life.

Break (To). To become a bankrupt. (See Bankrupt.)

To break a bond. To dishonour it.

To break a journey. To stop before the journey is accomplished.

To break a matter to a person. To be the first to impart it, and to do so cautiously and by piecemeal.

To break bread. To partake of the Lord's Supper.

"Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them."—Acts xx. 7.

To break one's fast. To take food after long abstinence; to eat one's breakfast after the night's fast.

To break one's neck. To dislocate the bones of one's neck.

To break on the wheel. To torture one on a "wheel" by breaking the long bones with an iron bar. (Cf. Coup de Grace.)

To break a butterfly on a wheel. To employ superabundant effort in the accomplishment of a small matter.

"Nature or sense, alas! can spurn such a fate.

Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel."

 Pope: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 301-2.

To break out of bounds. To go beyond the prescribed limits.

Break Cover (To). To start forth from a hiding-place.

Break Down (To). To lose all control of one's feelings.

Break Faith (To). To violate one's word or pledge.

Break Ground (To). To commence a new project. As a settler does.

Break In (To). To interpose a remark. To train a horse to the saddle or to harness.

"At break of day I will come to thee again." Wordsworth: Pet Lamb, stanza 13.

Break the Ice (To). To prepare the way; to cause the stiffness and reserve of intercourse with a stranger to relax; to impart to another bit by bit distressing news or a delicate subject.

Break your Back (To). Make you bankrupt. The metaphor is from carrying burdens on the back.

Break up Housekeeping (To). To discontinue keeping a separate house.

Break with One (To). To cease from intercourse.

"What came last I given him to break with me?"—Florus, Marpul.

Breakers Ahead. Hidden danger at hand. Breakers in the open sea always announce sunken rocks, sand-banks, etc.

Breaking a Stick. Part of the marriage ceremony of the American Indians, as breaking a wine-glass is part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews. (Lady Augusta Hamilton: Marriage Rites, etc., 222, 228.)

In one of Raphael's pictures we see an unsuccessful suitor of the Virginia Mary breaking his stick. This alludes to the legend that the several suitors were each to bring an almond stick, which was to be laid up in the sanctuary over-night, and the owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor which God approved of. It was thus that Joseph became the husband of Mary. (Pseudo-Matthew's Gospel, 40, 41.)

In Florence is a picture in which the rejected suitors break their sticks on Joseph's back.

Breast. To make a clean breast of it. To make a full confession: concealing nothing.

Breath. All in a breath. Without taking breath. (Latin, continei spiritu.)
It takes away one's breath. The news is so astounding it causes one to hold his breath with surprise.

Out of breath. Panting from exertion; temporarily short of breath.

Save your breath to cool your porridge. Don't talk to me, it is only wasting your breath.

"You might have saved your breath to cool your porridge."—Mrs. Gaskell: Lilian Marsh (Era 111).

To catch one's breath. To check suddenly the free act of breathing.

"I see her,' replied I, catching my breath with joy."—Capt. Marrigat: Peter Simple.

To hold one's breath. Voluntarily to cease breathing for a time.

To take breath. To cease for a little time from some exertion in order to recover from exhaustion of breath.

Under one's breath. In a whisper or undertone of voice.

Breathe. To breathe one's last. To die.

Breche de Roland. A deep defile in the crest of the Pyrenees, some three hundred feet in width, between two precipitous rocks. The legend is that Roland, the paladin, left the rock in two with his sword Durandal, when he was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvalles.

"Then would I seek the Pyrenean birth Which Roland clave with huge two-handed way."—Wordsworth.

Breach. To wear the breaches. Said of a woman who usurps the prerogative of her husband. Similar to The grey mare is the better horse. (See Grey.)

The phrase is common to the French, Dutch, Germans, etc., as Elle porte les braies. Die erwone die hosen anhaben. Sie hat die Hose.

Breach Bible. (See Bible.)

Breeze. House-sweepings, as fluff, dust, ashes, and so on, thrown as refuse into the dust-bin. We generally limit the meaning now to small ashes and cinders used for coals in burning bricks. The word is a corruption of the French, debriès (rubbish, or rather the part broken or rubbed off by wear, tear, and stress of weather). The French, breze, older form breeze, means small coke or charcoal.

The Breze-fly. The gud-fly; so called from its sting. (Anglo-Saxon, brosor; Gothic, ozy, a sting.)

Breeze. A gentle wind or gale. (French, brise, a breeze.) Figuratively, a slight quarrel.

Breiddhilk [wide-shining]. The palace of Baldur, which stood in the Milky Way. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Brennus. A Latin form of the Kymric word Brenn (a war-chief). In times of danger the Druids appointed a brenn to lead the confederate tribes to battle.

Brent. Without a wrinkle. Burns says of John Anderson, in his prime of life, his "locks were like the raven," and his "bonnie brow was brent" (without a wrinkle).

Brent-goose (4d). Properly a Brent-goose, the branta bernula, a brownish-grey goose of the genus branta.

"For the people of the village Saw the buck of brenn with wonder."—Longfellow: Hiawatha, part xvi. stanza 28.

Brent-hill means the eyebrows. Looking or gazing from under brent-hill. In Devonshire means "frowning at one;" and in West Cornwall to brenn means to wrinkle the brows. It is very remarkable that the word should have such opposite meanings.

Brentford. Like the two kings of Brentford swelling at one nosegay. Said of persons who were once rivals, but have become reconciled. The allusion is to an old farce called The Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham. "The two kings of Brentford enter hand in hand," and the actors, to heighten the absurdity, used to make them enter "smelling at one nosegay" (act ii. s. 2).

Bressommer, or Brest-summer. (French, sommer, a lintel or bressummer.) A beam supporting the whole weight of the building above it; as, the beam over a shop-front, the beam extending over an opening through a wall when a communication between two contiguous rooms is required. Sometimes these beams support a large superstructure. (The word bress, brest, or breast, in carpentry, means a rafter, and the German brett = a plank.)

Bretwalds (ruler of Britains). The chief of the kings of the heptarchy who exercised a certain undefined power over the other rulers; something like that of Hugues Capet over his peers.

"The office of Bretwalds, a kind of elective chieftainship of all Britains, was held by several Northumbrian kings, in succession."—Earl: English Tongue, p. 29.

Brevet Rank is rank one degree higher than your pay. Thus, a brevet-major has the title of major, but the Breviary

Breviary. An epitome of the old office of matins and lauds for daily service in the Roman Catholic Church. The Breviary contains the daily "Divine Office," which those in orders in the Catholic Church are bound to recite. The office consists of psalms, collects, readings from Scripture, and the life of some saint or saints.

Brew. Brew me a glass of grog, i.e. mix one for me. Brew me a cup of tea, i.e. make one for me. The tea is set to brew, i.e. to draw. The general meaning of the word is to boil or mix; the restricted meaning is to make malt liquor.

Brewer. The Brewer of Ghent, James van Artevelde. (Fourteenth century.)

It may here be remarked that it is a great error to derive proper names of any antiquity from modern words of a similar sound or spelling. As a rule, very ancient names are the names of trades; and to suppose that such words as Bacon, Hogg, and Pigg refer to swineherds, or to Miller, Tanner, Ringer, and Bottles to handicrafts is a great mistake. A few examples of a more scientific derivation will suffice for a hint:—

Brewer. This name, which exists in France as Bruhière and Brugiére, is not derived from the Saxon bröcan (to brew), but the French bruyère (heath), and is about tantamount to the German "Plantagenet" (broom-plant). (See Rymer's Fennera, William I.)

Bacon is from the High German verb bogen (to fight), and means "the fighter."

Pig and Brog are from the old High German pickan (to slash).

Hog is the Anglo-Saxon hyge (scholar), from the verb bögyn (to study). In some cases it may be from the German hoch (high).

Bottle is the Anglo-Saxon Bod-ôl (little envoy). Norse, bods; Danish, bud.

Gatter is the Saxon Garder (the darter). Celtic, gads, our good.

Miller is the old Norse, mel, our mill and maul, and means a "mauler" or "fighter."

Ringer is the Anglo-Saxon kring gar (the mailed warrior).

Smith is the man who smites.

Tanner (German Thanger', old German Danegaud) is the Dane-Goth.

This list might easily be extended.

Briareos or Aegon. A giant with fifty heads and a hundred hands. Homer says the gods called him Briareos, but men called him Aegon. (Iliad, i. 403.)

"Not he who brandished in his hundred hands his fifty swords and fifty shields in fight, could have surpassed the fierce Argantes' might."

Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, book vi.

The Briareus of languages. Cardinal Mezzofanti, who knew fifty-eight different tongues, Byron called him "a walking polyglot; a monster of languages; a Briareus of parts of speech." (1774-1849.) Generally pronounced Bri'-'a-ruce.

Briar-root Pipe. A pipe made from the root-wood of the large heath (briareum), which grows in the south of France.

Brioci. Inhabitants of part of Berkshire and the adjacent counties referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Briac or Brac. Odds and ends of curiosities. In French, a marchand de bréac-à-breac is a seller of rubbish, as old nails, old screws, old hinges, and other odds and ends of small value; but we employ the phrase for odds and ends of vertu. (Brevioler in archaic French means Faire toute espère de métier, to be Jack of all trades. Brac is the riscochet of briac, as fiddle-faddle and scores of other double words in English.)

"A man with a passion for briac-à-brac is always stumbling over antique braziers, intaglios, monstres, and curiosities of the time of Frenonetto (Celini)._Aldrich. Miss Mole-cake's Son, chap. ii.

Brick. A regular brick. A jolly good fellow. (Compare τραφαγος αμφραμος; 'square'; and "four-square" to all the winds that blow.")

"A fellow like nobody else, and, in fine, a brick."—George Cruikshank's Son and Daughters, book ii, chap. 16.

Brick-and-mortar Franchise. A Chartist phrase for the £10 household system, now abolished.

Brickdusts. The 53rd Foot; so called from the brickdust-red colour of their facings. Also called Fire-and-threepence, a play on the number and daily pay of the ensigns.

Now called the 1st battalion of the "King's Shropshire Light Infantry." The 2nd battalion is the old 83th.

Brick-tea. The inferior leaves of the tea-plant mixed with sheep's blood and pressed into cubes; the ordinary drink of the common people south of Moscow.

"The Tartars swell a horrible gruel, thick and slimy, of brick-tea, mint, salt, pepper, and sugar, boiled in a cauldron (sic)."—The Daily Telegraph, Friday, October 18th, 1891.

Bride. The bridal wreath is a relic of the corona nuptialis used by the Greeks and Romans to indicate triumph.

Bride Cake. A relic of the Roman Confrarreatio, a mode of marriage practised by the highest class in Rome. It was performed before ten witnesses by the Pontifex Maximus, and the contracting parties mutually partook of a cake made of salt, water, and flour (far). Only those born in such wedlock were eligible for the high sacred offices.

Bride or Wedding Favours represent the true lover's knot, and symbolise union.

Bride of Aby'dos. Zuleika, daughter of Giulfir, Pacha of Aby'dos. As she was never wed, she should be called the affirmed or betrothed. (Byron.)

Bride of Lammermoor. Lucy Ashton. (Scott: Bride of Lammermoor.)

Bride of the Sea. Venice; so called from the ancient ceremony of the Doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic, saying, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination."

Bridegroom is the old Dutch gom (a young man). Thus, Groom of the Stole is the young man over the wardrobes. Groom, an aster, is quite another word, being the Persian gyma (a keeper of horses), unless, indeed, it is a contracted form of stabil-groom (stable-boy). The Anglo-Saxon Bryd-guma (guma = man) confused with room, a lad.

Bridegroom's Man. In the Roman marriage by confrarreatio, the bride was led to the Pontifex Maximus by bachelors, but was conducted home by married men. Polydore Virgil says that a married man preceded the bride on her return, bearing a vessel of gold and silver. (Sc: Bride Cake.)

Bridewell. The city Bridewell, Bridge Street, Blackfriars, was built over a holy well of medical water, called St. Bride's Well, where was founded a hospital for the poor. After the Reformation, Edward VI. chartered this hospital to the city. Christ Church was given to the education of the young; St. Thomas's Hospital to the cure of the sick; and Bridewell was made a penitentiary for unruly apprentices and vagrants.

Bridge of Gold. According to a German tradition, Charlemagne's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, to bless the vineyards and cornfields.

"Thou saucy slave, like imperial Charlemagne, Upon thy bridge of gold."

Longfellow: Autumn.

Made a bridge of gold for him; i.e. enabling a man to retreat from a false position without loss of dignity.

Bridge of Jehennam. (See Serai.)

Bridge of Sighs, which connects the palace of the Doge with the state prisons of Venice. Over this bridge the state prisoners were conveyed from the judgment-hall to the place of execution.

"I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs, A palace and a prison on each hand."—Byron: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, iv. 1.

* * * Waterloo Bridge, in London, used some years ago, when suicides were frequent there, to be called The Bridge of Sighs.

Bridgewater Treatises. Instituted by the Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater, in 1825. He left the interest of £8,000 to be given to the author of the best treatise on "The power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in creation." Eight are published by the following gentlemen:—(1) The Rev. Dr. Chalmers, (2) Dr. John Kidd, (3) the Rev. Dr. Whewell, (4) Sir Charles Bell, (5) Dr. Peter M. Roget, (6) the Rev. Dr. Buckland, (7) the Rev. W. Kirby, and (8) Dr. William Prout.

Bridge. To bite on the bridle is to suffer great hardships. The bridle was an instrument for punishing a scold; to bite on the bridle is to suffer this punishment.

Bridge Road or Way. A way for a riding-horse, but not for a horse and cart.

Bridge up (To). In French, se ranover, to draw in the chin and toss the head back in scorn or pride. The metaphor is to a horse pulled up suddenly and sharply.

Bridgogoose (Judge), or Bridoie, who decided the causes brought to him by the throw of dice. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel. iii. 39.)

Bridport. Stabbed with a Bridport dyker, i.e. hanged. Bridport, in Dorsetshire, was once famous for its hempen goods, and monopolised the manufacture of ropes, cables, and tackling for the British navy. The hangman's rope being made at Bridport gave birth to the proverb. (Fuller: Worthies.)
Brigadore (3 syl.). (See Horse.)

Brigand properly means a seditious fellow. The Brigands were light-armed, irregular troops, like the Bashi-Bazouks, and like them were addicted to marauding. The Free Companies of France were Brigands. (Italian, brigante, seditious; brig, variance.)

Brigantine. A two-masted vessel with a brig's forecast and a schooner's mainmast. (Dana's Seaman's Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Brigantine (3 syl.) or Hermaphrodite Brig. A two-masted vessel with a brig's forecast and a schooner's mainmast. (Dana's Seaman's Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Brigantine (3 syl.) or Hermaphrodite Brig. A two-masted vessel with a brig's forecast and a schooner's mainmast. (Dana's Seaman's Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Brigantine (3 syl.) or Hermaphrodite Brig. A two-masted vessel with a brig's forecast and a schooner's mainmast. (Dana's Seaman's Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Brigantine (3 syl.) or Hermaphrodite Brig. A two-masted vessel with a brig's forecast and a schooner's mainmast. (Dana's Seaman's Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Bright's Disease. A degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys into fat, first investigated by Dr. Bright. The patient under this disease has a flabby, bloodless appearance, is always drowsy, and easily fatigued.

Bright's Disease. A degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys into fat, first investigated by Dr. Bright. The patient under this disease has a flabby, bloodless appearance, is always drowsy, and easily fatigued.

Bright's Disease. A degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys into fat, first investigated by Dr. Bright. The patient under this disease has a flabby, bloodless appearance, is always drowsy, and easily fatigued.

Brigands. The Castilians; so called from one of their ancient kings, named Brix or Brigu, said by monkish fabulists to be the grandson of Noah.

"Edward and Pedro, omnium of fame, Thru' the fierce Bruxans heaved their bloody way, Till in a cold embrace the striplings lay."—Camoes: Lusit.

Brigado'ro. (See Horse.)

Brilliant Madman (The), Charles XII. of Sweden. (1662-1697-1718.)

"Macedonia's madman or the Swede; Johnson: Vanity of Human Wishes.

Briney or Briny. I'm on the briny. The sea, which is salt like brine.

Bring About (To). To cause a thing to be done.

Bring Down the House (To). To cause rapturous applause in a theatre.

Bring into Play (To). To cause to act, to set in motion.

Bring Round (To). To restore to consciousness or health; to cause one to recover [from a fit, etc.].

Bring To (To). To restore to consciousness; to resuscitate. Many other meanings.

"I'll bring her to, said the driver, with a brutal grin; I'll give her something better than punishment."—Mrs. Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin Bring to Boar (To). To cause to happen successfully.

Bring to Book (To). To detect one in a mistake.

Bring to Pass (To). To cause to happen.
Brisotins. A nickname given to the advocates of reform in the French Revolution, because they were "led by the nose" by Jean Pierre Brisot. The party was subsequently called the Girondists.

Bristol Board. A stiff drawing-paper, originally manufactured at Bristol.

Bristol Boy (The). Thomas Chatterton the poet (1752-1770).

"The merry English boy, The sleepless soul that persisted in his pride." Wordsworth: Resolution and Independence.

Bristol Diamonds. Brilliant crystals of colourless quartz found in St. Vincent's Rock, Clifton, near Bristol.

Bristol Fashion (In). Methodical and orderly. More generally "Ship-shape and Bristol fashion."

"In the great mass meeting, October 10th, 1861, a route of above three miles was observed in one unbroken line. No cheering disturbed the stately solemnity: no one ran to give any direction; no noise of any kind was heard; but on, in one unbroken line, steady and silently, marched the throng in 'Bristol fashion.'"—Daily News, October 20th, 1861.

Bristol Milk. Sherry sack, at one time given by the Bristol people to their friends.

"This metaphorical milk, wherein Xeres or sherry-sack is concealed." Fuller: Worthies.

Bristol Waters. Mineral waters of Clifton, near Bristol, with a temperature not exceeding 74°; formerly celebrated in cases of pulmonary consumption. They are very rarely used now.

Britain. By far the most probable derivation of this word is that given by Bochart, from the Phœnician Baratonic (country of tin), contracted into B'ratan'. The Greek Caseterides (tin islands) is a translation of Baratonic, once applied to the whole tin group, but now restricted to the Scilly Isles. Aristotle, who lived some 300 years before the Christian era, calls the island Britannia, which is so close to B'ratan" that the suggestion of Bochart can surely admit of a doubt. (De Mundo, sec. 3.)

Pliny says, "Opposite to Celtiberia is a number of islands which the Greeks called 'Caseterides'" (evidently he means the British group). Strabo says the Caseterides are situated about the same latitude as Britain.

Great Britain consists of "Britannia prima" (England), "Britannia secunda" (Wales), and "North Britain" (Scotland), united under one sway.

Greater Britain. The whole British empire.

Britannia. The first known representation of Britannia as a female figure sitting on a globe, leaning with one arm on a shield, and grasping a spear in the other hand, is on a Roman coin of Antoninus Pius, who died A.D. 161. The figure first appeared on our copper coin in the reign of Charles II., 1665, and the model was Miss Stewart, afterwards Lady Dacre of Richmond. The engraver was Philip Boetier, 1665.

In 1825 W. Wyon made a new design. The "King's new medal, where, in little, there is Mrs. Stewart's face . . . and a pretty thing it is, that he should choose her face to represent Britannia in."—Pope's Diary (25 Feb.).

British Lion (The). The pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to the John Bull, which symbolises the substantiality, solidity, and obstinacy of the people, with all their prejudices and national peculiarities.

To rouse the British Lion is to flourish a red flag in the face of John Bull; to provoke him to resistance even to the point of war.

"To twist the lion's tail!" is a favourite phrase and favourite policy with some rival unfriendly powers.

Brit'omart [sweet maid] (see below). Daughter of King Ryence of Wales, whose desire was to be a heroine. She is the impersonation of saintly chastity and purity of mind. She encounters the "savage, fierce bandit and mountainer" without injury; is assailed by "hag and unaided ghost, goblin, and swart fairy of the mine," but "dashes their brute violence into sudden adoration and blank awe." Britomart is not the impersonation of celibacy, as she is in love with an unknown hero, but of "virgin purity." (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book II. Her marriage, book v. 6.)

"she claimed at once and tamest the heart, Incomparable Britomart." Scott.

Brit'omartis. A Cretan nymph, very fond of the Chase. King Minos fell in love with her, and persisted in his advances for nine months, when she threw herself into the sea. (Cretan, britios-martis, sweet maiden.)

 Brit' on (Like a). Vigorously, perseveringly. "To fight like a Briton" is to fight with indomitable courage. "To work like a Briton" is to work hard and perseveringly. Certainly, without the slightest flattery, dogged courage and perseverance are the strong characteristics of John Bull. A similiar phrase is "To fight like a Trojan."

Brit'tany. The damsel of Brittany, Eleanora, daughter of Geoffrey, second son of Henry II., King of England and Duke of Brittany. At the death of Broach

Broach. To broach a new subject. To start one in conversation. The allusion is to beer tubs. If one is flat, another must be tagged. A broach is a peg or pin, and to broach a cask is to bore a hole in the top for the vent-peg.

"I did broach this business to your highness."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII, ii. 4.

Broad as Long. 'Tis about as broad as it is long. One way or the other would bring about the same result.

Broad Arrow on Government stores. It was the cognisance of Henry, Viscount Sydney, Earl of Romney, master-general of the ordnance. (1693-1702.)

? It seems like a symbol of the Trinity, and Wharton says, "It was used by the Kelts to signify holiness and royalty."

Broad Bottom Ministry (1744). Formed by a coalition of parties: Pelham retained the lead; Pitt supported the Government; Bubb Dodington was treasurer of the navy.

Broadcloth. The best cloth for men's clothes. So called from its great breadth. It required two weavers, side by side, to fling the shuttle across it. Originally two yards wide, now about fifty-four inches; but the word is now used to signify the best quality of (black) cloth.

Broadsides. Printed matter spread over an entire sheet of paper. The whole must be in one type and one measure, i.e. must not be divided into columns. A folio is when the sheet is folded, in which case a page occupies only half the sheet.

"Handbills and broadsides were scattered right and left."—Fisk: American History, chap. vii, p. 311.

In naval language, a broadside means the whole side of a ship; and to "open a broadside on the enemy" is to discharge all the guns on one side at the same moment.

Brodminag. The country of gigantic giants, to whom Gulliver was a pigmy "not half so big as a round little worm plucked from the lazy finger of a maid."

"You high church steeples, you squawy stairs, Your husband must come from Brodminag."—Kane of Haria: Novus.

Brodminagian. Colossal; tall as a church steeple. (See above.)

"Limbs of Brodminagian proportions."—The Star.

Brockenhurst (The Rev. Robert). A Calvinistic clergyman, the son of Naomi Brocklehurst of Brocklehurst Hall, part founder of Lowood Institution, where young ladies were boarded, clothed, and taught for £15 a year, subsidised by private subscriptions. The Rev. Robert Brocklehurst was treasurer, and half starved the inmates in order to augment his own income, and scared the children by talking to them of hell-fire, and making capital out of their young faults or supposed shortcomings. He and his family fared sumptuously every day, but made the inmates of his institution deny themselves and carry the cross of vexation and want. ('Broune: Jane Eyre.)

Brogue (1 syl.) properly means the Irish brog, or shoe of rough hide. The application of brog to the dialect or manner of speaking is similar to that of buskin to tragedy and soco to comedy.

"And put my cloven brogues from off my feet."

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

Brogues (1 syl.). Trousers. From the Irish brog, resembling those still worn by some of the French cavalry, in which trousers and boots are all one garment.

"If an angel were to walk about, Mrs. Sam is where he came from; and perhaps with his brok Broken Music. A "consort" consisted of six viols, usually kept in one case. When the six were played together it was called a "whole consort," when less than the six were played it was called a "broken consort." Sometimes applied to open chords or arpeggios.

"Here is brok broken music."

Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 1

"Lord Bacon in his Sytla Sulbarum gives a different explanation: he says certain instruments agree together and produce concordant music, but others (as the virginal and lute, the Welsh and Irish harps) do not accord.

Broken on the Wheel. (See Break.)

Broker. Properly speaking, is one who sells refuse. In German, called mäkler, that is, "sellers of damaged Brownes (2 syl.). A blacksmith personified; one of the Cyclops. The name signifies Thunder.

"Not with such weight, to frame the forked brand,
The ponderous hammer falls from Brownes' hand."

Bronzoman'te. (See Horse.)

Brook (Master). The name assumed by Ford when he visits Sir John Falstaff. The amorous knight tells Master Brook all about his amour with Mrs. Ford, and how he duped her husband by being stowed into a basket of dirty linen.

"Ford, I'll give you a bottle of burnt sack to give me recourse to, and tell him my name is Brook, only for a jest."

"How! My hand, bully. Thou shalt have regress and regress, ... and thy name shall be Brook."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, l. 1.

Brooks of Sheffield. An imaginary individual mentioned in David Copperfield. (See Harris, Mrs.)

Broom. A broom is hung at the mast-head of ships about to be sold, to indicate that they are to be swept away. The idea is popularly taken from Admiral Tromp; but probably this allusion is more witty than true. The custom of hanging up something to attract notice seems very common. Thus an old piece of carpet from a window indicates household furniture for sale; a wisp of straw indicates oysters for sale; a bush means wige for sale; an old broom, ships to sell, etc. etc. (See PENNANT.)

A new broum. One fresh in office.

New brooms sweep clean. Those newly appointed to an office find fault and want to sweep away old customs.

Broster. Eating one out of house and home. At Eton, when a dame keeps an unusually bad table, the boys agree on a day to eat, pocket, or waste everything edible in the house. The censure is well understood, and the hint is generally effective. (Greek, broso, to eat.)

Brother or Frère. A friar not in orders. (See FATHER.)

Brother (So-and-so). A fellow-burrister.

Brother Benedict. A married man. (See BENEDICT.)

Brother Birch. A fellow-schoolmaster.

Brother Blædr. A fellow-soldier, properly; but now anyone of the same calling as yourself.

Brother Brush. A fellow-painter.

Brother Bung. A fellow-tapster.

Brother Buskin. A fellow-comediar or actor.

A Brother Chip. A fellow-carpenter.

A Brother Clergyman. A fellow-clergyman.

A Brother Crispin. A fellow-shoemaker.

A Brother Mason. A fellow-Freemason.

A Brother Quill. A fellow-author.

A Brother Sat. A fellow-seaman or sailor.

A Brother Shuttle. A fellow-weaver.

A Brother Sitch. A fellow-tailor.

A Brother String. A fellow-violinist.

Brother German. A real brother. (Latin, germanus, of the same stock; german, a bud or sprout.)

"Te in germani frater dilexi locu."—Terence: Andria, l. 3, 56.

A uterine brother is a brother by the mother's side only. (Latin, uterinus, born of the same mother, as "frater uterinus," uterus.)

Brother Jonathan. When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion could be offered. "We must consult brother Jonathan," said the general, meaning his excellency, Jonathan Trumbull, the elder governor of the State of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty was remedied. To consult brother Jonathan then became a set phrase, and brother Jonathan grew to be the John Bull of the United States. (J. R. Bartlett: Dictionary of Americanisms.)

Brother Sam. The brother of Lord Dundreary (q.r.), the hero of a comedy based on a German drama, by John Oxenford, with additions and alterations by E. A. Sothern and T. B. Buckstone. (Supplied by T. B. Buckstone, Esq.)

Browbeat. To beat or put a man down by knitting the brows.

Brown. A copper coin, a penny; so called, from its colour. Similarly a sovereign is a "yellow boy." (See BLUNT.)

To be brown. To be roasted, deceived, taken in.

Brown as a Berry. (See Similes.)

Brown, Jones, and Robinson. Three Englishmen who travel together. Their adventures were published in Brown Bess means brown barrel. The barrels were browned to keep them from rusting. (Dutch, bruin, a gun-barrel; Low German, bizze; Swedish, bisse. Our argyleus, blunderbuss.) In 1808 a process of browning was introduced, but this has, of course, nothing to do with the distinctive epithet. Probably Bess is a companion word to Bull. (See below.)

Brown Bill. A kind of halberd used by English foot-soldiers before muskets were employed. We find in the medieval ballads the expressions, "brown brand," "brown sword," "brown blade," etc. Sometimes the word rusty is substituted for brown, as in Chaucer: "And in his side he had a rousty blade"; which, being the god Mars, cannot mean a bad one. Keeping the weapons bright is a modern fashion; our forefathers preferred the honour of blood stains. Some say the weapons were varnished with a brown varnish to prevent rust, and some affirm that one Brown was a famous maker of these instruments, and that Brown Bill is a phrase similar to Armstrong gun and Colt's revolver. (See above.)

"So, with a band of bowmen and of pikers, Brown bills and targeters.
Mariners: Edward II. (1682.)"

Brown also means shining (Dutch, bruin), hence, "My bonnie brown sword," "brown as glass," etc., so that a "brown bill" might refer to the shining steel, and "brown Bess" to the bright barrel.

Brown Study. Absence of mind; apparent thought, but real vacuity. The corresponding French expression explains it—sombre rêvée. Sombre and brun both mean sad, melancholy, gloomy, dull.

"Invention flies, his brain grows muddy.
And black despair succeeds brown study..."

Brown. To astonish the Brownis. To do or say something regardless of the annoyance it may cause or the shock it may give to Mrs. Grundy. Anne Boleyn had a whole host of Brownies, or "country cousins," who were welcomed at Court in the reign of Elizabeth. The queen, however, was quick to see what was gauche, and did not scruple to reproach the Browns if she noticed anything in their conduct not comme il faut. Her bluntness of speech often "astonished the Browns."

Brownie. The house spirit in Scottish superstition. He is called in England Robin Goodfellow. At night he is supposed to busy himself in doing little jobs for the family over which he presides. Farms are his favourite abode. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits, in opposition to fairies, which are fair or elegant ones. (See Fairies.)

"It is not long since every family of considerable substance was haunted by a spirit they called Browny, which did several sorts of work; and this was the reason why they gave him offerings . . . on what they called Browny's stone."—Martin: Scotland.

Brownists. Followers of Robert Brown, of Rutherford, a violent opponent of the Established Church in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The present "Independents" hold pretty well the same religious tenets as the Brownists. Sir Andrew Aguescooch says:

"I'd as lieve be a Brownist as a politician."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, il. 2.

Browse his Jib (To). A sailor's phrase, meaning to drink till the face is flushed and swollen. The jib means the face, and to browse here means "to fatten."

"The only correct form of the phrase, however, is "to browse his jib." To browse the jib means to pour the sail taut, and as a metaphor signifies that a man is "tight."

Brue. The goose, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. The word means little-ruarier.

Brum. One of the leaders arrayed against Hudibras. He was Talgol, a Newgate butcher, who obtained a captain's commission for valour at Naseby. He married next Orsin (Joshua Gosling), landlord of the bear-gardens at Southwark.

Sir Brum. The name of the bear in the famous German beast-epic, called Reynard the Fox. (Dutch for brown.)

Brumaire. The celebrated 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9th, 1799) was the day on which the Directory was overthrown and Napoleon established his supremacy.

Brumagem. Worthless or very inferior metallic articles made in imitation of better ones. Birmingham is the great mart and manufactory of gilt toys, cheap jewellry, imitation gems, mosaic gold, and such-like. Birmingham was called by the Romans "Bremenium."

Brums. In Stock Exchange phraseology this means the "London and North-Western Railway shares." The Brum, i.e. the Birmingham line.

Brunehild (3 syl.) or Brunehilda. Daughter of the King of Island, beloved by Günther, one of the two great chieftains of the Nibelungenlied or Teutonic Iliad. She was to be carried off by force, and Günther asked his friend Siegfried to help him. Siegfried contrived the matter by snatching from her the talisman which was her protector, but she never forgave him for his treachery. (Old German, bruni, coat of mail; hilt, battle.)

Brunello (in Orlando Furioso). A deformed dwarf of Biserta, to whom King Agrasamant gave a ring which had the virtue to withstand the power of magic (book ii.). He was leader of the Tingita'uians in the Sarmen army. He also figures in Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato.

Brunswick. A native of Brunswick. (See Black Brunswick.)

Brunt. To bear the brunt. To bear the stress, the heat, and collision. The same word as "burn." (Icelandic, bruni, burning heat, bren; Anglo-Saxon, burning, burning.) The "brunt of a battle" is the hottest part of the fight. (Compare "fire-brand").

Brush. The tail of a fox or squirrel, which is brusky.

Brush away. Get along.

Brush off. Move on.

He brushed by me. He just touched me as he went quickly past. Hence also brush, a slight skirmish.

All these are metaphors from brushing with a brush.

Give it another brush. A little more attention; bestow a little more labour on it; return it to the file for a little more polish.

Brush up (7o). To renovate or revive; to bring again into use what has been neglected, as, "I must brush up my French." When a fire is slack we brush up the hearth and then sweep clean the lower bars of the stove and stir the sleepy coals into activity.

Brut. A rhyming chronicle, as the Brut d’Angleterre and Le Roman de Brut, by Wace (twelfth century). Brut is the Romance word brut (a rumour, hence a tradition, or a chronicle based on tradition). It is by mere accident that the word resembles "Brute" or "Brutus," the traditional king. (See next column.)

Brut d'Angleterre. A chronicle of the achievements of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. Arthur is described as the natural son of Uther, pendragon (or chief) of the ancient Britons. He succeeded his father, in 516, by the aid of Merlin, who gave him a magic sword, with which he conquered the Saxons, Picts, Scots, and Irish. Besides the Brut referred to, several other romances record the exploits of this heroic king. (See Arthur.)

Brute, in Cambridge University slang, is a man who has not yet matriculated. The play is evident. A "man," in college phrase, is a collegian; and, as matriculation is the sign and seal of acceptance, a scholar before that ceremony is not a "man," and therefore only a "biped brute."

Brute (Sir John). A coarse, pot-violant knight, ignobly noted for his absurdities. (Vanbrugh: The Provoked Wife.)

Brute or Brutus, in the mythological history of England, the first king of the Britons, was son of Sylvius (grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of Æneas). Having inadvertently killed his father, he first took refuge in Greece and then in Britain. In remembrance of Troy, he called the capital of his kingdom Troy-novant (New Troy), now London.

The pedigree was as follows:—

(1) Æneas, (2) Ascanius, (3) Silvius, (4) Brutus. (See Troy Novant.)

Brutum Fulmen (Latin). A noisy but harmless threatening; an innocuous thunderbolt.

"His [the Pope's] denunciations are but a brutum fulmen"—The Mandate.

Brutus (Junius), the first consul of Rome. He condemned to death his own two sons for joining a conspiracy to restore to the throne the banished Tarquín.

"The public father [Brutus], who the private quelled,
And on the d read tribunal stonily sat."

Thomson: Winter.

The Spanish Brutus. Alphonso Perez de Guzman (1258-1320). While he was governor, Castile was besieged by Don Juan, who had revolted from his brother, Sancho IV. Juan, who held in captivity one of the sons of Guzman, threatened to cut his throat unless Guzman surrendered the city. Guzman replied, "Sooner than be a traitor, I would myself lend you a sword to slay him," and he threw a sword over the city wall. The son, we are told, Brutus was slain by the father's sword before his eyes.

Brutus (Marcus). Caesar's friend, joined the conspirators to murder him, because he made himself a king.

"And thou, unhappy Brutus, kind of heart, Whose steady arm, by awful virtue urged, Lifted the Roman spear against thy friend."—Thomson: Winter, 224-4.

_Ét tu, Bruté?_ What! does my own familiar friend lift up his heel against me? The reference is to that Marcus Brutus whose "barest hand stabbed Julius Caesar." (Suetonius.)

Bruxelles. The inhabitants of Brussels or Bruxelles.

Brydport Dagger. (See Brompton.)

_Bub._ Drink. (Connected with bubble—Latin, _bulbe_, to drink; our imbibe.) (See Brum.)

"Drunk with Hellion's waters and double-brewed bub."—Prior: To a Person who wrote ill.

Bubble. The Diana of Egyptian mythology; the daughter of Isis and sister of Horus.

_Bubble (A)._ A scheme of no sterling worth and of very ephemeral duration—as worthless and frail as a bubble.

"The whole scheme [of the Fenian raid on British America] was a collapsed bubble."—The Times.

The Bubble Act, 6 George L., cap. 18; published 1719, and repealed July 5th, 1823. Its object was to punish the promoters of bubble schemes.

_A bubble company._ A company whose object is to enrich themselves at the expense of subscribers to their scheme.

_A bubble scheme._ A project for getting money from subscribers to a scheme of no value.

_Bubble and Squeak._ Cold boiled meat and greens fried. They first bubbled in water when boiled, and afterwards hissed or squeaked in the frying-pan.

Something pretentious, but of no real value, such as "rank and title," or a bit of ribbon in one's button hole.

Bucca. A goblin of the wind, supposed by the ancient inhabitants of Cornwall to foretell shipwrecks.

_Buco'caneer._ Means sellers of smoke-dried meat, from the Caribbean word _boucan_, smoke-dried meat. The term was first given to the French settlers in Hayti, whose business it was to hunt animals for their skins. The flesh they smoked, dried and sold, chiefly to the Dutch.

When the Spaniards laid claim to all America, many English and French adventurers lived by buccaneering; and hunted Spaniards as lawful prey. After the peace of Ryswick this was no longer tolerated, and the term was then applied to any desperate, lawless, piratical adventurer.

Bucountaur. A monster, half-man and half-ox. The Venetian state-galley employed by the Doge when he went on Ascension Day to wed the Adriatic was so called. (Greek, _bou_., ox; _centauros_, centaur.)

Bucephalus (bull-headed). A horse. Strictly speaking, the charger of Alexander the Great, bought of a Thessalian for thirteen talents (£3,500).

"True, true; I forgot your Bucephalus."—Sir W. Scott: _The Antiquary._

Buchanites (3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who appeared in the west of Scotland in 1753. They were named after Mrs. or Lucky Buchan, their founder, who called herself "Friend Mother in the Lord." claiming to be the woman mentioned in Rev. xii. and maintaining that the Rev. Hugh White, a convert, was the "man-child."

"I never heard of alevate that burned preacher, except Luckie Buchan in the West."—Scott: _St. Roman's Well_, c.l.

Buck. A dandy. (See below.)

"A most tremendous buck he was, as he sat there serenely, in state, driving his greys."—Thackeray: _Vanity Fair_, chap. vi.

Buck-basket. A linen-basket. To buck is to wash clothes in lye; and a buck is one whose clothes are buck, or nicely got up. When Cade says his mother was "descended from the Lascars," two men overheard him, and say, "She was a pedlar's daughter, but not being able to travel with her furred pack, she washes bucks here at home." (2 Henry IV., iv. 2) (German, _bruchen_, to steep clothes in lye; _bruch_, clothes so steeped. However, compare "bucket," a diminutive of the Anglo-Saxon _boc._)

Buck-bean. A corruption of _bog-bean_, a native of wet bog-lands.

Buck-riding (A)._ A dummy fare who enables a cabman to pass police-constables who prevent empty cabs loitering at places where cabs will be likely to be required, as at theatres, music-halls, and large hotels. A cabman who wants to get at such a place under hope of picking up a fare gives a "buck" a shilling to get into his cab that he may seem to have a fare, and so pass the police.

"Constables are stationed at certain points to stop the professional 'buck-riders.'"—Nineteenth Century (March, 1863, p. 674).
Buck-tooth. A large projecting front-tooth. (See BURR TOOTH.)

Buckwheat. A corruption of ber. German, beuche, beeche-wheat: it is so called because it is triangular, like beechmast. The botanical name is Fagopyrum (beech-wheat).

"The buckwheat Whitened broad acres, sweetening with its flowers The August wind."—Bryant: The Fountain, stanza 7.

Buckhorse. A severe blow or slap on the face. So called from a boxer of that name.

Buckingham. (Saxon, beccen-ham, beech-tree village.) Fuller, in his Worthies, speaks of the beech-trees as the most characteristic feature of this county.

Bucklaw, or rather Frank Hayston, lord of Bucklaw, a wealthy nobleman, who marries Lucia di Lammermoor (Lucy Ashton), who had pledged her troth to Edgar, master of Ravenswood. On the Bride of Lammermoor.)

Buckle. I can't buckle to. I can't give my mind to work. The allusion is to buckling on one's armour or belt.

To cut the buckle. To caper about, to heel and toe it in dancing. In jigs the two feet buckle or twist into each other with great rapidity.

"That, it wouldn't have a laugh in you to see the person dancing down the road on his way home, and the minister and methodist preacher cutting the buckle as they went along."—W. H. Yate: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 98 (see also p. 196).

To put into buckle. To put into pawn at the rate of 40 per cent. interest.

To talk buckle. To talk about marriage.

"I took a girl to dinner who talked buckle to me."—Frem, 134.

Buckler. (See SHIELD.)

Bucklersbury (London) was at one time the noted street for druggists and herbalists; hence Falstaff says—

"I cannot say, and yet then ask this and that, like a many of these lady's-hawthorn buckler (ladies like women in any woman's apparel), and smell like Bucklersbury in simple time."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, III. 3.

Buckmaster's Light Infantry. The 3rd West India Regiment was so called from Buckmaster, the tailor, who used to issue "Light Infantry uniforms" to the officers of the corps without any authority from the Commander-in-Chief.

Buckra. Superior, excellent. That's buckra! A buckra coat is a smart coat; a buckra man, a man of consequence.

This word among the West Indians does the service of burra among the Anglo-Indians: as burra saib (great master, i.e. white man), burra khans (a magnificent spread or dinner).

Buckshish or Bakhshish. A gratuity, pour boire. A term common to India, Persia, and indeed all the East.

Buddha means the Wise One. From the Indian word bddh, to know. The title was given to Prince Siddharta, generally called Sak'yamuni, the founder of Buddhism. His wife's name was Gopa.

Buddhism. A system of religion established in India in the third century. The general outline of the system is that the world is a transient reflex of deity; that the soul is a "vital spark" of deity; and that after death it will be bound to matter again till its "weaver" has, by divine contemplation, so purged and purified it that it is fit to be absorbed into the divine essence.

Buddhist. One whose system of religion is Buddhism.

Budo or Gurney Light. The latter is the name of the inventor, and the former the place of his abode. (Goldsworthy Gurney, of Budo, Cornwall.)

Budge is lambskin with the wool dressed outwards, worn on the edge of capes, bachelors' hoods, and so on. Budge Row, Cannon Street, is so-called because it was chiefly occupied by budge-makers.

"0 foolishness of men! that lend their ears To those budge-makers of the same sort!"—Milton: Comus, 186, 767.

Budge (7b) is the French bouget, to stir.

Budge Bachelors. A company of men clothed in long gowns lined with budge or lamb's wool, who used to accompany the Lord Mayor of London at his inauguration.

Budget. The statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer lays before the House of Commons every session, respecting the national income and expenditure, taxes and salaries. The word is the old French bougette, a bag, and the present use arose from the custom of bringing to the House the papers pertaining to these matters in a leather bag, and laying them on the table. Hence, to open the budget or bag, i.e. to take the papers from the bag and submit them to the House.

A budget of news is a bagful of news, a large stock of news.
Buff. Buff is a contraction of buffalo; and buff skin is the skin of the buffalo prepared. "To stand in buff" is to stand without clothing in one's bare skin. "To strip to the buff" is to strip to the skin. The French for "buff" is buffle, which also means a buffalo.

To stand buff, also written bluff, meaning firm, without flinching. Sheridan, in his School for Scandal, ii. 3, says, "That he should have stood buff to old bachelor so long, and sink into a husband at last." It is a nautical term; a "buff shore" is one with a bold and almost perpendicular front. The word buff, a blow or buffet, may have got confounded with buff, but without doubt numerous instances of "buff" can be adduced.

"And for the good old cause stood buff,

"I must, even in buff and outface him." — Foulis.

Buff in "Blind-man's buff," the well-known game, is an allusion to the three buffs or pats which the "blindman" gets when he has caught a player. (Norman-French, buffet, a blow; Welsh, paff, verb, puff, to thump; our buffet is a little slap.)

Buffalo Bill. Colonel Cody.

Buffalo Robe (A). The skin of a bison dressed without removing the hair, and used as a travelling rug. The word "robe" is often omitted.

"The large and fanny buffalo was decked with buffalo robes, red-brown, and furnished with alman eyes and ears." — The Upper Ten Thousand, p. 4.

"Leaving all hands under their buffaloes." — Kane: Arctic Expeditions.

Buffer of a railway carriage is an apparatus to rebuff or deaden the force of collision.

Buffer (A). A chap. The French buffalo (older form, buffalo) meant to eat, as ti buffalois tout seul. If this is the basis of the word, a buffer is one who eats with us, called a Commouer in our universities.

"I always said the old buffalo would." — Miss Braddon: Lady Audley's Secret.

Buffoon means one who puffs out his cheeks, and makes a ridiculous explosion by causing them suddenly to collapse. This being a standing trick with clowns, caused the name to be applied to low jesters. The Italian buffone is "to puff out the cheeks for the purpose of making an explosion;" our puff. (Italian buffone, a buffoon; French bonhomme.)

Buffoons. Names synonymous with Buffoon:—

Galimafrè. A contemporary and rival of the former.

Tabarin. Bruscambille. (Of the seventeenth century.)

Greumald. (1770-1837.) (See Scaramouch.)

Buff. The old 3rd regiment of foot soldiers. The men's coats were lined and faced with buff; they also wore buff waistcoats, buff breeches, and buff stockings. These are the "Old Buffs," raised in 1680.

At one time called the Buff. Harolds, from Howard (their colonel) (1575-1590). The "Young Buffs" are the old 2nd Foot raised in 1707; now called the "Huntingdonshire Regiment," whose present uniform is scarlet with buff facings.

The Ruthshire Buffs. The old 78th, now the second battalion of the Seaforth Highlanders.

Bugabo. A monster, or goblin, introduced into the tales of the old Italian romancers. (See below.)

Bugbear. A scarecrow. Bug is the Welsh buk, a hobgoblin, called in Russia buka. Spenser says, "A ghastly bug doth greatly them affear" (book ii. canto 3); and Hamlet has "bugs and goblins" (v. 2).

"Warwick was a bug that feared us all." — Shakespeare: A Henry IV. ii. 3.

"To the world no bugbear is so great As want of fame and a small estate." — Pope: Satires, ii. 67-68.

"The latter half of this word is somewhat doubtful. The Welsh bairn, i.e. fury, wrath, whom you harry, spiteful, seems probable.

Buggy. A light vehicle without a hood, drawn by one horse. (Hindustani, baghi.)

Buhl-work. (Cabinet-work, inlaid with brass; so called from Signor Boule, the inventor, who settled in Paris during the reign of Louis XIV. (The word should be spelt Boule-work.)

Build, for make, as A man of strong build, a man of robust make. The metaphor is evident.

Build. Applied to dress. Not so bad a build after all, not badly made.
Bullet. The nightingale. A Persian word, familiarised by Tom Moore.

"Twas like the notes, half-even, half-sigh,
The bullfinch utter'd."—Moore: Lalla Rookh (Veiled Prophet, part 1, stanza 14).

Bulla, metamorphosed into a drake; and his son, Egyptios, into a vulture.

Bull. One of the twelve signs of the Zodiac (April 20 to May 21). The time for ploughing, which in Egypt was performed by oxen or bulls.

"At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun, And the bright Bull receives him."—Thomson: Spring, 28, 27.

Bull. A blunder, or inadvertent contradiction of terms, for which the Irish are proverbial. The British Apollo, 1740, says the term is derived from one Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of London, in the reign of Henry VII., whose blundering in this way was notorious.

"Bull is a five-shilling piece. "Half a bull" is half-a-crown. From bulla, a great leaden seal. Hood, in one of his comic sketches, speaks of a crier who, being apprehended, "swallowed three hogs (shillings) and a bull."

The Pope's bull. So called from the bulla or capsule of the seal appended to the document. Subsequently the seal was called the bulla, and then the document itself.

The edict of the Emperor Charles IV. (1356) had a golden bulla, and was therefore called the golden bull. (See Golden Bull.)

Bull. A public-house sign, the cognisance of the house of Clare. The bull and the boar were signs used by the partisans of Clare, and Richard, Duke of Gloucester (Richard III.).

Bull. A bull in a china shop. A maladroit hand interfering with a delicate business; one who produces reckless destruction.

A brazen bull. An instrument of torture. (See Phalaris.)

He may hear a bull that hath borne a calf (Erasmus: Proverbs)—"He that accustomed hym-selfe to lytle thynges, by lytle and lytle shalbe able to go a waye with greater thynges (Towrerne)."

To take the bull by the horns. To attack or encounter a threatened danger fearlessly; to go forth boldly to meet a difficulty. The figure is taken from bull-fights, in which a strong and skilful matador will grasp the horns of a bull about to toss him and hold it prisoner.

John Bull. An Englishman. Applied to a native of England in Arbuthnot's ludicrous History of Europe. This history is sometimes erroneously ascribed to Dean Swift. In this satire the French are called Lewis Baboon, and the Dutch Nicholas Frog.

"One would think, in personifying itself, a nation would...picture something grand, heroic, and imposing, but it is characteristic of the peculiar humour of the English, and of their love for what is blunt, comic, and familiar, that they have embodied their national oddities in the figure of a sturdy, corpulent old fellow...with red whiskers, leather breeches and a stout oaken cudgel...[whom they call] John Bull."—Washington Irving.

Bull-dog (A). A man of relentless, savage disposition is sometimes so called. A "bull-dog courage" is one that sunches from no danger. The "bull-dog" was the dog formerly used in bull-baiting.

Bull-dogs, in University slang, are the two myrmidons of the proctor, who attend his heels like dogs, and are ready to spring on any offending undergraduate like bull-dogs. (See Myrmidons.)

Bull-necked. The Bull-necked Forger. Cagliostro, the huge impostor, was so called. (1743-1795.)

Bull-ring. (See Mayor of the Bull-Ring.)

Bull's Eye. A small cloud suddenly appearing, seemingly in violent motion, and growing out of itself. It soon covers the entire vault of heaven, producing a tumult of wind and rain. (1 Kings xviii. 44.)

Bull's Eye. The inner disc of a target. "A little way from the centre there is a spout where the shots are thickly gathered; some few have hit the bull's-eye."—Pisah: Excursions, etc., chap. vi., p. 176.

To make a bull's eye. To gain some signal advantage; a successful coup. To fire or shoot an arrow right into the centre disc of the target.

Bulls, in Stock Exchange phraseology, means those dealers who "bull," or try to raise the price of stock, with the view of effecting sales. A bull-account is a speculation made under the hope that the stock purchased will rise before the day of settlement. (See Bear.)

Bullet. Every bullet has its billet. Nothing happens by chance, and so act
Bun

Bullion properly means the mint, where bulla, little round coins, are made. Subsequently the metal in the mint.

Bully. To overbear with words. A bully is a blustering menacer. (Anglo-Saxon, bullgan, to bellow like a bull.)

It is often used, without any mixture of reproach, as a term of endearment, as:

"O sweet bully Bottom."—Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 4.

"Here, thee, bully doctor."—Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3

Bully-boy (A). A jolly companion, a "brick." (German, buhle, a lover;  bullen, a gallant.)

"We be three poor manners
Newly come from the sea,
We spend our lives in jeolod,
While others live at ease;
Shall we so dance the round, the round,
Shall we so dance the round?
And he that is a bully boy
Come pledge me on this ground"—In aemend. (1609)

Bully-rook. A blustering cheat. Like bully, it is sometimes used without any offensive meaning. Thus the Host, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, addresses Sir John Falstaff, Ford, and Page, etc., as bully-rook—"How now, my bully-rook?" equal to "my fine fellow."

"A bully rook is one who fights for fighting's sake." To bully-rook is to intimidate; bully-ragging is abuse of intimidation. According to Halliwell, a rook is a scold, and hence a "ragging" means a scolding. Connected with rage.

Bum-bailiff. The French poussé-cul seems to favour the notion that bum-bailiff is no corruption. These officers are frequently referred to as buns.

"Scout me for him at the corner of the orchard, like a bum-bailiff."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Bum-boat. A small wide boat to carry provisions to vessels lying off shore. Also called "dirt-boats," being used for removing filth from ships lying in the Thames. (Dutch, bumboot, a wide fishing boat. In Canada a punt is called a bun. A bun is a receptacle for keeping fish alive.)

Bumble. A beadle. So called from the officious, overbearing beadle in Dickens's Oliver Twist.

Bumbledom. The domain of an overbearing parish officer, the arrogance of parish authorities, the conceit of parish dignity. (See above.)

Bummarees. A class of middlemen or fish-jobbers in Billingsgate Market, who get a living by bummareeing, i.e., buying parcels of fish from the salesmen, and then retailing them. A corruption of borne marée, good fresh fish, or the seller thereof. According to the Dictionnaire de l'Académie, marée means toute sorte de poisson de mer que n'est pas salé. Borne marée, marée fraîche.

Bumper. A full glass, generally connected with a "toast." Dr. Aru says a bumper is when the surface of the wine bums up in the middle. (French, bouche, to render convex, to bulge or swell out.)

A fancied mention with bump, a swelling, has not only influenced the form of the word, but (lost added) at fullness—"Short:* Bumboinweit ii

Bumpkin. A loutish person. (Dutch, bomcken, a sprout, a fool.) This word very closely resembles the word "chit." (See Chitty.)

Bumptious. Arrogant, full of mighty airs and graces; apt to take offence at presumed slights. A corruption of presumptuous, first into "bumptious," then to bumptions.

In regard to "hot cross buns" on Good Friday, it may be stated that the Greeks offered to Apollo, Diana, Hecate, and the Moon, cakes with "horns." Such a cake was called a bun, and (it is said) never grew mouldy. The "cross" symbolised the four quarters of the moon.

"Good Friday comes this month; the old woman runs
With one penny, two a penny 'hot cross buns,'
Bunch of Fives. A slang term for the hand or fist.

Bundle (John). “A prodigal hand at matrimony; divinity, a song, and a peck.” He marries seven wives, loses all in the flower of their age, is inconsolable for two or three days, then resigns himself to the decrees of Providence, and marries again. (The Life and Opinions of John Bunce, Esq., by Thomas Amory.)

“John is a kind of innocent Henry VIII. of private life.”—Leigh Hunt.

Bundle. Bundle off. Get away. To bundle a person off, is to send him away unceremoniously. Similar to pack off. The allusion is obvious.

Bundle of Sticks. Esop, in one of his fables, shows that sticks one by one may be readily broken; not so when several are bound together in a bundle. The lesson taught is, that “Union gives strength.”

“They lay low to heart the lesson of the bundle of sticks.”—The Times.

Bundschn [highlow]. An insurrection of the peasants of Germany in the sixteenth century. So called from the highloows or clouted shoon of the insurgents.

Bung. A cant term for a toper. “Away . . . you filthy bung,” says Doll to Pistol. (2 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

Brother Bung. A cant term for a publican.

Bung up. Close up, as a bung closes a cask.

Bungalow (Indian). The house of a European in India, generally a ground floor with a verandah all round it, and the roof thatched to keep off the hot rays of the sun. There are English bungalows at Birlington and on the Norfolk coast near Cromer. A dák-bungalow is a caravansary or house built by the Government for the use of travellers. (Hindustani, bangá.)

Bungay. Go to Bungay with you!—i.e. get away and don’t bother me, or don’t talk such stuff. Bungay, in Suffolk, used to be famous for the manufacture of leather breeches, once very fashionable. Persons who required new ones, or to have their old ones mended, went or sent to Bungay for that purpose. Hence rose the cant saying, “Go to Bungay, and get your breeches mended,” shortened into “Go to Bungay with you!”

Bungay. My castle of Bungay. (See under CASTLE.)

Bunkum. Claptrap. A representative at Washington being asked why he made such a flowery and angry speech, so wholly uncalled for, made answer, “I was not speaking to the House, but to Bungacome,” which he represented (North Carolina).

“America, too, will find that caucuses, stump- oratory, and speeches to Bungacome will not carry them to the immortal gods.”—Carlyle: Latter-day pamphlets (Parliaments, p. 99).

Bunny. A rabbit. So called from the provincial word bun, a tail. The Scot’s say of the hare, “she cocks her bun.” Bunny, a diminutive of bun, applied to a rabbit, means the animal with the little tail.

“Bunny, lying in the grass.

Saw the many column pass.”—Bret Harte: Babbage, stanza 1.

Bunsby (Jack). Captain Cuttle’s friend; a Sir Oracle of his neighbours; profoundly mysterious, and keeping his eye always fixed upon invisible dream-land somewhere beyond the limits of infinite space. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Bunting. In Somersetshire bunting means sifting flour. Sieves were at one time made of a strong gauzy woollen cloth, which being tough and capable of resisting wear, was found suitable for flags, and now has changed its reference from sieves to flags. A “bunt-mill” is a machine for sifting corn.

“Not unlike . . . a baker’s mill, when he separates the flour from the bran.”—Snedman.

Buphagia. Pausanias (viii. 24) tells us that the son of Japhet was called Buphagia (glutton), as Hercules was called Adlepagus, because on one occasion he ate a whole ox (Athenaës x.). The French call the English “Beefeaters,” because they are eaters of large joints of meat, and not of delicate, well-dressed viands. Neither of these has any relation to our Yeomen of the Guards. (See BEEFEATERS, page 115.)

Burbon. A knight assailed by a rabble rout, who batter his shield to pieces, and compel him to cast it aside. Talus renders him assistance, and is informed by the rescued knight that Fourdeis, his own true love, had been enticed away from him by Grantorto. When the rabble is dispersed, and Fourdeis recovered, Burbon places her on his steed, and rides off as fast as possible. Burbon is Henri IV. of France; Fourdeis, the kingdom of France; the rabble rout, the Roman Catholic party that tried to set him aside; the shield he is compelled to abandon is Protestantism; his carrying off Bourdelis is his obtaining the kingdom by a coup after his renunciation of the Protestant cause. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, v. 11.)

Buchardise. To speak ex cathedra; to speak with authority. Buchard (who died 1026) compiled a volume of canons of such undisputed authority, that any sentence it gave was beyond appeal.

Burchell (Mr.). A baronet who passes himself off as a poor man, his real name and title being Sir William Thornhill. His favourite cant word is "Fudge." (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

Burd (Helen). The Scotch female impersonation of the French prone or prid'homme, with this difference, that she is discreet, rather than brave and wise.

Burden of a Song. The words repeated in each verse, the chorus or refrain. It is the French brouillon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double-diapason of an organ, used in forte parts and choruses.

Burden of Isaiah. The "measu"' of a prophecy announcing a calamity, or a denunciation of hardships on those against whom the burden is uttered. (Isa. xii. 1, etc.)

The burden of proof. The obligation to prove something.

"The burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative." (Because no one can prove a negative, except by reduction ad absurdum.)—Greenleaf: on Evidence (vol. i. part 2, chaps. iii. iv., p. 150.)

Bure (2 syl.). The first woman, and sister of Borr, the father of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bureaucracy. A system of government in which the business is carried on in bureaus or departments. The French bureau means not only the office of a public functionary, but also the whole staff of officers attached to the department. As a word of reproach, bureaucracy has nearly the same meaning as Dickens's word, red-tapeism (q.v.).

Burglar [burg-lar]. The robber of a burgh, castle, or house. Burglary is called, in ancient law-books, haus-schenden or haus-sechen, house-violation.

Burgundian. A Burgundian blow, i.e. decapitation. The Due de Biron, who was put to death for the treason of Henri IV., was told in his youth, by a fortune-teller, "to beware of a Burgundian blow." When going to execution, he asked who was to be his executioner, and was told he was a man from Burgundy.

Burial of an Ass. No burial at all.

"He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem."—Jer. xxix. 19.

Buridan's Ass. A man of indecision; like one "on double business bound, who stands in pause where he should first begin, and both neglects," Buridan the scholastic said: "If a hungry ass were placed exactly between two hay-stacks in every respect equal, it would starve to death, because there would be no motive why it should go to one rather than to the other."

Burke. To murder by placing something over the mouth of the person attacked to prevent his giving alarm. So called from Burke, an Irishman, who used to suffocate his victims and murder them for the sole purpose of selling the dead bodies to surgeons for dissection. Hanged at Edinburgh, 1829.

To burke a question. To strangle it in its birth. The publication was burked: suppressed before it was circulated.

Burkers. Body-snatchers; those who kill by burking.

Burl, Burler. In Cumberland, a burler is the master of the revels at a bidden-wedding, who is to see that the guests are well furnished with drink. To burl is to carouse or pour out liquor. (Anglo-Saxon, byrflan.)

Mr. H. called for a quart of beer. . . . He told me to burl out the beer, as he was in a hurry, and I handed out the glass and gave it to him.—The Times: Law Reports.

Burlaw or Byrlaw. A sort of Lynch-law in the rural districts of Scotland. The inhabitants of a district used to make certain laws for their own observance, and appoint one of their neighbours, called the Burr-law-man, to carry out the pains and penalties. The word is a corrupt form of byr-law, byr= a burgh, common in such names as Derby, the burgh on the Derwent; Grimsby (q.v.), Grims-town.

Burlesque. Father of burlesque poetry. Hippo'tax of Ephesus. (Sixth century B.C.)

Burlond. A giant whose legs Sir Tryamour cut off. (Romance of Sir Tryamour.)

Burn. His money burns a hole in his pocket. He cannot keep it in his pocket, or forbear spending it.
To burn one's boots. To cut oneself off from all means or hope of retreat. The allusion is to Julius Cesar and other generals, who burned their boats or ships when they invaded a foreign country, in order that their soldiers might feel that they must either conquer the country or die, as retreat would be impossible.

To burn one's fingers. To suffer loss by speculation or interference. The allusion is to taking chestnuts from the fire.

"He has been bolteting up these rotten iron-works. I told him he would burn his fingers."—Mrs. Lyman Tatton.

You cannot burn the candle at both ends. You cannot do two opposite things at one and the same time; you cannot exhaust your energies in one direction, and yet reserve them unimpaired for something else. If you go to bed late you cannot get up early. You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot serve God and Mammon. You cannot serve two masters.

Burning Crown (v. A crown of red-hot iron set on the head of regicides.

"He was adjudged to have his head seared with a burning crown."—Tragedy of Haffman. (1511.)

Burst. The burnt child dreads the fire. Once caught, twice shy. "What! wouldst thou have a serpent sting thee twice?"

Burst Candlemas Day. Feb. 2. 1355-6, when Edward III. marched through the Lothians with fire and sword. He burnt to the ground Edinburgh and Haddington, and then retreated from want of provisions. The Scots call the period "Burst Candlemas." (See "Epochs of History," England under the Plantagenets; and Macmillan's series, Little History of Scotland, edited by Prof. Freeman.)

Bursa (a bull's hide). So the citadel of Carthage was called. The tale is that when Dido came to Africa she bought of the natives "as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide." The agreement was made, and Dido cut the hide into thongs, so as to enclose a space sufficient for a citadel.

The following is a similar story: The Yakutaks granted to the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a cow's hide; but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the port and town of Yakutsk.

The Indians have a somewhat similar tradition. The fifth incarnation of Vishnu was in the form of a dwarf called Vamem. Vamem, presenting himself before the giant Buly, asked as a reward for services as much land as he could measure in three paces to build a hut on. Buly laughed at the request, and freely granted it. Whereupon the dwarf grew so prodigiously large that, with three paces, he strade over the whole world. (Sommerat: Voyages, vol. i. p. 24.)

Burst. To inform against an accomplice. Slang variety of "split" (turn king's evidence, impeach). The person who does this splits or breaks up the whole concern.

Bury the Hatchet. Let by-gones be by-gones. The "Great Spirit" commanded the North American Indians, when they smoked the cal'umet or peace-pipe, to bury their hatchet, scalping-knives, and war-clubs in the ground, that all thought of hostility might be buried out of sight.

"It is much to be regretted that the American government, having brought the great war to a conclusion, did not bury the hatchet altogether."—The Times.

Buried was the bloody hatchet; Buried were all warlike weapons, And the war-cry was forgotten: Then was peace among the nations."—Laminielos: Hymnatha, xii.

Burying, Exsanguination. The Parsees neither bury or burn their dead, because they will not defile the elements (fire and earth). So they carry their dead to the Tower of Silence, and leave the body there to be devoured by vultures. (See Nineteenth Century, October, 1893, p. 611.)

Burying at Cross Roads. (See Cross-Roads.)

Bus. A contraction of Omnibus. Of course, Omnibus, as a plural, though sometimes used, is quite absurd.

Busby (4). A frizzled wig. Doctor Busby, master of Westminster school, did not wear a frizzled wig, but a close cap, somewhat like a Welsh wig. (See Wius.)

Busby. The tall cap of a lussar, artillery-man, etc., which hangs from the top over the right shoulder.
Bush. One beats the bush, but another has the hare, i.e. one does the work, but another reaps the profit. The Latins said, Si eae non vosis. The allusion is to beating the bush to start game. (See BEATING.)

Good wine needs no bush. A good article will make itself known without being puffed. The booths in fairs used to be dressed with ivy, to indicate that wine was sold there, ivy being sacred to Bacchus. An ivy-bush was once the common sign of taverns, and especially of private houses where beer or wine could be obtained by travellers. In France, a peasant who sells his vineyard has to put a green bush over his door.

The proverb is Latin, and shows that the Romans introduced the custom into Europe. "Vino vendidibi, hac et non opus est." (Columella.) It was also common to France. "Au vin qui se vend bien, il ne faut point de lierre." (See) (See.)

"If it be true that good wine needs no bush, it is true that a good play needs no prologue."—Shakespeare: As You Like It (Epilogue).

To take to the bush. To become bush-rangers, like runaway convicts who live by plunder. The bush in this case means what the Dutch call bosch, the uncleared land as opposed to towns and clearings.

"Everything being much cheaper in Toronto than away in the bush."—Gekka: Life in the Woods.

Bushel. To measure other people's corn by one's own bushel. To make oneself the standard of right and wrong; to appraise everything as it accords or disaccords with one's own habits of thought and preconceived opinions; to be extremely bigoted and self-opinionated.

Under a bushel. Secretly; in order to hide it.

"Do men light a candle and put it under a bushel?"—Matt. v. 15.

Bushman (Dutch, Boowjjesman). Natives of South Africa who live in the "bush"; the aborigines of the Cape; dwellers in the Australian "bush"; a bush farmer.

"Bushmen...are the only nomads in the country. They never cultivate the soil, nor rear any domestic animal save wretched dogs."—Longstone: Travels, chap. ii. p. 82.

Bushmen. Escaped convicts who have taken refuge in the Australian "bush," and subsist by plunder.

"The bushmen at first were adventurers [i.e., escaped convicts] who were seen allured or driven to theft and violence. So early as 1824 they had, by dramatic robberies, excited feelings of alarm."—ibid: Tasmania.

Business, Busy. Saxon, bysgian, the verb, bynjeg (busy); Dutch, bezigten; German, besorgnus (care, management); sorge (care); Saxon, seogan (to see).

From the German sorgen we get the French soigner (to look after something), soigner, and be-soigne (business, or that which is our care and concern), with be-soine (something looked after but not found, hence, "want"); the Italian besognio (a beggar).

Business tomorrow. When the Spartans seized upon Thebes, they placed Archias over the garrison. Pelopidas, with eleven others, banded together to put Archias to the sword. A letter containing full details of the plot was given to the Spartan polemarch at the banquet table; but Archias thrust the letter under his cushion, saying, "Business tomorrow." But long ere that sun arose he was numbered with the dead.

Busirane (3 syl.). An enchanter bound by Britomart. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii. 11, 12.)

Busiris. A king of Egypt, who used to immolate to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. Hercules was seized by him; and would have fallen a victim, but he broke his chain, and slow the inhospitable king.

Busiris, according to Milton, is the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

"Ye'ed the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'er-\nthrow Busiris and his Memphian chivalry."—Paradise Lost, book i. 300, 307.

Bushkin. Tragedy. The Greek tragic actors used to wear a sandal some two or three inches thick, to elevate their stature. To this sole was attached a very elegant buskin, and the whole was called coturator (See Sock.)

"Of what (though rare) of latter age
Ennobled hath the buskin base.

Busi, to kiss. (Welsh, bus, the human lip; Gaelic, bus, the mouth; French, baiser, a kiss.)

"You lovers, whose wonted lips do busse the cloud Must kiss their own feet."

Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iv. 5.

Busterich. A German god. His idol may still be seen at Sandreshusen, the castle of Schwartzburg.

Busy as a Bee. The equivalent Latin phrase is "Satiesis tant quam mun in matella." (See SPRITE.)

Butcher. The Butcher. Ahmed Pasha was called djozzer (the butcher), and is said to have whipped off the heads of his seven wives. He is famous for his defence of Acre against Napoleon I.

The Butcher. John, ninth lord Clifford, also called The Black, died 1494.
The Bloody Butcher. The Duke of Cumberland, second son of George II. So called from his barbarities in suppressing the rebellion of the young Pretender.

The Royalist Butcher. Blaise de Montluc, distinguished for his cruelties to the Protestants in the reign of Charles IX. of France (1562-1572).

Butcher Boots. The black boots worn en petite tenue in the hunting field.

Butter. Soft soup, soft solder (pron. saw-dor), "wiping down" with winning words. Punch expressively calls it "the milk of human kindness churned into butter." (Anglo-Saxon, butere or byture, Latin, butyrum, Greek, bythryion, i.e. butter-cows, cow-cheese, as distinguished from goat- or ewe-butter.)

Soft words butter no parsnips. Saying "Be thou fed, will not feed a hungry man." Mere words will not fill our porridge, or butter to our parsnips.

"Fine words, saia our homely old proverb, butter no parsnips."—Lowell.

He looks as if butter would not melt in his mouth. He looks like a doll. He looks quite harmless and expressively made to be played upon. Yet beware, and touch not a cat but a glove."

"She smiles and languishes, you'd think that butter would not melt in her mouth."—Thackeray.

He knows on which side his bread is buttered. He knows his own interest. Sei uti foro.

"He that has good store of butter may lay it thick on his bread. Qui multum est piper, eam scirem insignit.

To butter our bread on both sides. To be wastefully extravagant and luxurious.

Butter-fingers. Said of a person who lets things fall out of his hand. His fingers are slippery, and things slip from them as if they were greased with butter. Often heard on the cricket field.

"I never was a butter-fingers, though a bad batte."—H. Kingsley.

Butter-tooth (A). A wide front tooth. (See BUCK-TOOTH.)

Buttered Ale. A beverage made of ale or beer (without hops) mixed with butter, sugar, and cinnamon.

Buttercups. So called because they were once supposed to increase the butter of milk. No doubt these cows give the best milk that pasture in fields where buttercups abound, not because these flowers produce butter, but because they grow only on sound, dry, old pastures, which afford the best food. Miller, in his Gardener's Dictionary, says they were so called "under the notion that the yellow colour of butter is owing to these plants."

Butterflies, in the cab trade, are those drivers who take to the occupation only in summer-time, and at the best of the season. At other times they follow some other occupation.

"The feeling of the regular drivers against these "butterflies" is very strong."—Nineteenth Century (May, 1883, p. 177).

Butterfly Kiss (A). A kiss with one's eyelashes, that is, stroking the cheek with one's eyelashes.

Button. A decoy in an auction-room; so called because he buttons or ties the unwary to bargains offered for sale. The button fastens or fixes what else would slip away.

The button of the cap. The tip-top. Thus, in Hamlet, Guildesamans says: "On fortune's cap we are not the very button" (act ii. sc. 2), i.e. the most highly favoured. The button on the cap was a mark of honour. Thus, in China to the present hour, the first grade of literary honour is the privilege of adding a gold button to the cap, a custom adopted in several collegiate schools of England. This gives the expression quoted a further force. Also, the several grades of mandarins are distinguished by a different coloured button on the top of their cap.

Button (of a foil). The piece of cork fixed to the end of a foil to protect the point and prevent injury in fencing.

Buttons. The two buttons on the back of a coat, in the fall of the back, are a survival of the buttons on the back of riding-coats and military frocks of the eighteenth century, occasionally used to button back the coat-tails.

A boy in buttons. A page, whose jacket in front is remarkable for a display of small round buttons, as close as they can be inserted, from chin to waist.

"The little (single) of an electric bell brought a large fat button, with a stage effect of being dressed to look small."—Howell; Essay of New Fashions, vol. 1, part 1, chap. xi, p. 540.

"He has not all his buttons. He is half-silly; "not all there"; he is "a button short."

Dash my buttons. Here, "buttons" means lot or destiny, and "dash" is a euphemistic form of a more offensive word.

The buttons come off the foils. Figuratively, the courtesies of controversy are neglected.

"Familiarity with controversy... will have accustomed him to the misadventures which arise when, as sometimes will happen in the heat of fence, the buttons come off the foils."—Nineteenth Century (June, 1851, p. 225).
To buy over a person's head. To out-bid another.

Buy Up (To). To purchase stock to such an amount as to obtain a virtual monopoly, and thus command the market; to make a corner, as "to buy up corn," etc.

Buying a Pig in a Poke. (See Pig, etc.)

Buzz (Sergeant). A driving, chaffing, masculine bar orator, who twists "Chops and Tomato Sauce" into a declaration of love. (Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Buzz. Empty the bottle. A corruption of bouse (to drink).

"In hunting a boar 'tware his gift to excel, And of all jolly wagers he bore off the belt." (See Booz.)

Buzz (A). A rumour, a whispered report.

"Yes, that, on every dream, Each buzz, each fancy... He may unearh his dagosage." (Shakespeare: King Lear, l. 14.)

Buzzard (The) is meant for Dr. Burnet, whose figure was luscious.

"The noble buzzard ever pleased me best." (Dryden: Hud and Panther, part iii, l. 121.)

Buzzard called hawk by courtesy. It is a euphemism—a bruit rank—a complimentary title.

"Of small renown, 'tis true; for, not to lie, We call your buzzard 'hawk' by courtesy." (Dryden: Hud and Panther, nl. 112-3.)

Between hawk and buzzard. Not quite a lady or gentleman, nor quite a servant. Applied to tutors in private houses, bear-leaders, and other grown-up persons who are allowed to come down to dessert, but not to be guests at the dinner-table.

By. Meaning against. "I know nothing by myself, yet am I not thereby justified." (1 Cor. iv. 4.)

By-and-by now means a little time hence, but when the Bible was translated it meant instantly. "When persecution ariseth... by-and-by he is offended" (Matt. xiii. 21); rendered in Mark iv. 17 by the word "immediately." Our presently means in a little time hence, but in French présentement means now, directly. Thus in France we see, "These apartments to be let presently, meaning now—a phrase which would in English signify by-and-by.

Bygones. Let bygones be bygones. Let old grievances be forgotten and never brought to mind.
By-laws. Local laws. From by, a borough. Properly, laws by a Town Council, and bearing only on the borough or company over which it has jurisdiction.

By-road (4). Not a main road; a local road.

By-the-by. En passant, laterally connected with the main subject. "By-play" is side or secondary play; "By-lanes and streets" are those which branch out of the main thoroughfare. The first "by" means passing from one to another, as in the phrase "day by day." Thus "by-the-by" is passing from the main subject to a by or secondary one.

By-the-way is an incidental remark thrown in, and tending the same way as the discourse itself.

Byrsa. (See page 191, col. 1, Bursa.)

Byzantine Art. That symbolical system which was developed by the early Greek or Byzantine artists out of the Christian symbolism. Its chief features are the circle, dome, and round arch; and its chief symbols the lily, cross, vesica, and umbus. St. Sophia, at Constantinople, and St. Mark, at Venice, are excellent examples.

Byzantine Empire (The). The Eastern or Greek Empire from 395 to 1453.

Byzantine Historians. Certain Greek historians who lived under the Eastern empire between the sixth and fifteenth centuries. They may be divided into three groups:—(1) Those whose works form a continuous history of the Byzantine empire, from the fourth century to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks; (2) general chronicles who wrote histories of the world from the oldest period; and (3) writers on Roman antiquities, statistics, and customs.

Byzantines (3 syl.). Coins of the Byzantine empire, generally called Byzants.

C.

C. This letter is the outline of the hollow of the hand, and is called in Hebrew eaph (the hollow of the hand).

C. The French c, when it is to be sounded like s, has a mark under it (ç); this mark is called a cedilla. (A diminutive of z; called ceta in Greek, cede in Spanish.)

C. There is more than one poem written of which every word begins with C. For example:

(1) One composed by Huyard in honour of Charles le Chauve. It is in Latin hexameters and runs to somewhat more than a hundred lines, the last two of which are

"Convexit claras ciautoris componere cœns. Complectur clarus cœnsu canuntile calvis."

(2) One by Hamonius, called "Certamen catholicum cum Calvisiis."

(3) One by Henry Hardwicke, of 100 lines in Latin, on "Cats," entitled: "Catum cum Catilturn carnim compositum currente calamo C. Catulli Canini." The first line is—

"Cattorum caninium certaminis clara canumque."

"Cats" cause caterwauling contests chant.

See M and P for other examples.

Ca'a Ira (it will go). Called emphatically Le Carillon National of the French Revolution (1790). It went to the tune of the Carillon National, which Marie Antoinette was for ever strumming on her harpsichord.

"Ca Ira" was the rallying cry borrowed by the Federalists from Dr. Franklin of America, who used to say, in reference to the American revolution, "Ah! ah! ça ira, ça ira!" ("twill be sure to do). The refrain of the carillon is—

Ha! la! It will speed, it will speed, it will speed! Resistance is vain, we are sure to succeed.

Caba'ba (3 syl.). The shrine of Mecca, said by the Arabs to be built on the exact spot of the tabernacle let down from heaven at the prayer of repentant Adam. Adam had been a wanderer for 200 years, and here received pardon. The shrine was built, according to Arab tradition, by Ishmael, assisted by his father Abraham, who inserted in the walls a black stone "presented to him by the angel Gabriel."

Cab. A contraction of cabriolet (a little carperen), a small carriage that scampers along like a kid.

Cabal. A juncto or council of intrigurers. One of the Ministries of Charles II. was called a cabal (1670), because the initial letters of its members formed this acrostic: Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. This accident may have popularised the word, but, without doubt, we borrowed it from the French cabale, "an intriguing faction," and Hebrew cab'ala, "secret knowledge." A junta is merely an assembly; Spanish, junta, a council. (See Notarica; Tammany Ring.)

"In dark cabala and mighty junta met."

Thomson.

"These ministers were emphatically called the Cabal, and they soon made the application so infamous that it has never since ... been used except as a term of reproach." — Macaulay: England, vol. i. chap. ii. p. 108.

Cab'ala. The oral law of the Jews delivered down from father to son by word of mouth. Some of the rabbins say that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in it, the angel Japhiel instructed Shem, and the angel Zedekiel instructed Abraham; but the more usual belief is that God instructed Moses, and Moses his brother Aaron, and so on from age to age.

N.B.—The promises held out by the cabala are: the abolition of sin and sickness, abundant provision of all things needful for our well-being during life, familiar intercourse with deity and angels, the gift of languages and prophecy, the power of transmuting metals, and also of working miracles.

Cabalist. A Jewish doctor who professed the study of the Cabala, a mysterious science said to have been delivered to the Jews by revelation, and transmitted by oral tradition. This science consisted mainly in understanding the combination of certain letters, words, and numbers, said to be significant.

Cabalistico. Mystic word-juggling. (See Cabalist.)

Caballero. A Spanish dance, grave and stately; so called from the ballad-music to which it was danced. The ballad begins—

"Esta noche le mataron al caballero."

Cabbage. It is said that no sort of food causes so much thirst as cabbage, especially that called colewort. Paulinius tells us it first sprang from the sweat of Jupiter, some drops of which fell on the earth. Cicero, Claudianus, Ovid, Suidas, and others repeat the same fable.

Cabbage (76). To titch. Sometimes a tailor is called "cabbage," from his pilfering cloth given him to make up. Thus in Motteux's Rabelais, iv. 52, we read of "Poor Cabbage's hair." (Old French, enbas, theft, verb cabasser; Dutch, kabassen; Swedish, grabba; Danish, griber, our grab.)

"Your tailor, instead of shreds, cabbages whole yards of cloth." — Arundel's John Bull.

Cabbage is also a common schoolboy term for a literary crib, or other petty theft.

Cabinet Ministers. The chief officers of state in whom the administrative government is vested. It contains the First Lord of the Treasury (the Premier), the Lord High Chancellor, Lord President of the Council, Lord Privy Seal, Chancellor of the Exchequer, six Secretaries of State, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, President of the Board of Trade, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the President of the Board of Agriculture. The five Secretaries of State are those of the Home Department, Foreign Affairs, Colonies, War, India, and Chief-Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

Sometimes other members of the Government are included, and sometimes one or two of the above left out of the Cabinet. These Ministers are privileged to consult the Sovereign in the private cabinet of the palace.

Cabiri. Mystic divinities worshipped in ancient Egypt, Phoenicia, Asia Minor, and Greece. They were inferior to the supreme gods. (Phoenician, kabbir, powerful.)

Cable's Length. 100 fathoms. 7 Some think to avoid a difficulty by rendering Matthew xix. 24 "It is easier for a cable to go through the eye of a needle . . . .", but the word is ἄδιδά, and the whole force of the passage rests on the "impossibility" of the thing, as it is distinctly stated in Mark x. 24, "How hard it is for them that trust in [their] riches, ἵνα τοὺς γράψων . . . ." It is impossible by the virtue of money or by bribes to enter the kingdom of heaven. (See page 205, col. 1, Camel.)

Cabochon (Ex). Uncut, but only polished; applied to emeralds, rubies, and other precious stones. (French, cabochon.)

Cachette Bell. A bell rung at funerals, when the pall was thrown over the coffin. (French, cache corps, cover over the body.)

Ca'chet (pron. ca'kay). Lettres de cachett (letters sealed). Under the old French régime, carte-blanche warrants, sealed with the king's seal, might be obtained for a consideration, and the person who held them in jail in any name. "Sometimes the warrant was to send a prisoner at large, but it was more frequently for detention in the Bastille.
During the administration of Cardinal Henry 30,000 of these cachets were issued, the larger number being against the Jesuits. In the reigns of Louis
XV. and XVI. fifty-nine were obtained against the one family of Mirabeau.
This scandal was abolished January 16th, 1790.

Cat's-eyes. An evil spirit. Astrologers give this same to the Twelfth.

House of Heaven, from which only evil prognostics proceed. (Greek, "kakos demon").

"Rue thee to hell for shame, and leave the world.
Thou caddemon." Shakespeare: Richard III., 1. 3.

Cacoetes (Greek). A "bad habit."
Cacoetes loquendi. A passion for making speeches or for talking.
Cacoetes scribendi. The love of rushing into print; a mania for authorship.

Cacumen. A famous robber, repreentative of three-headed, and vomiting flames. He lived in Italy, and was strangled by Hercules. Sancho Panza sees of the Lord Rinaldo and his friends.
"They are greater thieves than Cacus."
(Don Quixote.)

Cad. A low, vulgar fellow; an omnibus conductor. Either from cadet, or a contraction of cadger (a packman).
The etymology of cad, "cadence," is only certain to be known. N.B. The Scotch cadger or cadgel (a little servant, or errand-boy, or carrier of a sedan-chair), without the diminutive, offers a plausible suggestion.
"All Edinburgh men and boys know that when sedan-chairs were discontinued, the old cadgers sank into ruinous poverty, and became synonymous with rogues. The word was brought from London by James Hanley, who frequently used it."—M. Pringle.

Cadilles or Caddis. Worsted gallow, crowel. (Welsh. caddos, b roacoe; cadach is a lark-sheep; Irish, "cadan").

"We hath ritabls of all the colours I, the minor-bow, the cadillsore, cambroes, lawam."—Shakespear: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Cadilier-garter. A servant, a man of mean rank. "When garters were worn in sight, the gentry used very expensive ones, but the poorer wore worsted gallon ones. Prince Henry calls Pains a "cadilier-garter." (1 Henry IV., ii.
4.)

"Best hear, my honest cadilier-garter!"
Glaphthorn: wit in a Constable, 1630.

Caddy. A ghost, a bugbear. A caddis is a grub, a bait for anglers.
"Poor Mister Lest Even Addy! the pocket is your one bugbear, not a grub, and a caddy, too!"
Peter Pindar: Great Cry and Little Wool, epistle 1.

Cad. Jack Cad legislation. Pressure from without. The allusion is to the insurrection of Jack Cad, an Irishman, who headed about 20,000 armed men, chiefly of Kent, "to procure repress of grievances" (1460).
"You that love the commons, follow me;
Now show yourselves men; 'tis for liberty.
We will not leave our lord, one gentleman;
Spare none but such as go in clouted shoon."—
Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iv. 2.

Cadet Idris or Arthur's Seat. If any man passes the night sitting on this "chair," he will be either a poet or a madman.

Cadescia (Battle of) gave the Arabs
the monarchy of Persia. (A.D. 638.)

Cadet. Younger branches of noble families are called cadets, because their armorials are marked with a difference called a cadency.
Cadet is a student at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, or in one of her Majesty's training ships, the Excellent and the Britannia. From these places they are sent (after passing the different examinations) into the army as ensigns or second lieutenants, and into the navy as midshipmen. (French, cadet, junior member of a family.)

Cadger. One who carries butter, eggs, and poultry to market; a packman or hackster. From cadge (to carry).
Hence the frame on which hawks were carried was called "a cadder," and the man who carried it, a "cadger." A man of low degree.
"Every cadger thinks himself as good as an earl."—McDonald: Malcolm, part iii. chap. xii. p.
161.

Cadi, among the Turks, Arabs, etc., is a town magistrate or inferior judge.
"Cadi Lesker" is a superior cadi. The Spanish Alcaide is the Moors at cadd.
(Arabic, the judge.)

Cadmean Letters (The). The simple Greek letters introduced by Cadmus from Phoenicia. (Greek myth.)

Cadmean Victory (Greek, Kadmein nikè; Latin, Cadmea Victoria). A victory purchased with great loss. The allusion is to the armed men who sprang out of the ground from the teeth of the dragon sown by Cadmus. These men died foul of each other, and only five of them escaped death.
Cadmeans. The people of Carthage are called the Genus Cadunia, and so are the Thebans.

Cadmus having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dirce, in Boeotia, sowed the teeth of the monster, when a number of armed men sprang up and surrounded Cadmus with intent to kill him. By the counsel of Minerva, he threw a precious stone among the armed men, who, striving for it, killed one another. The foundation of the fable is this: Cadmus having slain a famous freebooter that infested Boeotia, his banditti set upon him to revenge their captain’s death; but Cadmus sent a bife, for which they quarrelled and slew each other.

Cadogan (Ca-dug-an). A club of hair worn by young French ladies: so called from the portrait of the first Earl of Cadogan, a print at one time very popular in France. The fashion was introduced at the court of Montbéliard by the Duchess de Bourbon.

Caduceus (4 syl.). A white wand carried by Roman officers when they went to treat for peace. The Egyptians adorned the rod with a male and female serpent twisted about it, and kissing each other. From this use of the rod, it became the symbol of eloquence and also of office. In mythology, a caduceus with wings is placed in the hands of Mercury, the herald of the gods; and the poets feign that he could therewith give sleep to whomsoever he chose; wherefore Milton styles it “his opiate rod” in Paradise Lost, xi. 133.

“So with his drest caduceus Hermes led
From the dark regions of the imprisoned dead;
Or drove in silent shadows the lingering train
To Night’s still shore and Pluto’s dreary home.”

Darwin : Loves of the Plants, p. 251.

Cadural. The people of Aquitania. Cadurs is the modern capital.

Cadmon. Cowherd of Whitby, the greatest poet of the Anglo-Saxons. In his wonderful romance we find the bold prototype of Milton’s Paradise Lost. The portions relating to the fall of the angels are most striking. The hero encounters, defeats, and finally slays Grendel, an evil being of supernatural powers.

Cæcilia Franchise (Th.). The franchise of a Roman subject in a prefecture. These subjects had the right of self-government, and were registered by the Roman censor as tax-payers; but they enjoyed none of the privileges of a Roman citizen. Cæcilia was the first community placed in this dependent position, whence the term Cæcilia franchise.

Cæter’son, on the Usk, in Wales. The habitual residence of King Arthur, where he lived in splendid state, surrounded by hundreds of knights, twelve of whom he selected as Knights of the Round Table.

Cæsar was made by Hadrian a title, conferred on the heir presumptive to the throne (A.D. 136). Diocletian conferred the title on the two vicerays, calling the two emperors Augustus (sacred majesty). The German Emperor still assumes the title of kaiser (q.v.).

“Thou art an emperor, Caesar, kaiser, and Pheenzar.”—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 3.

“No bending knees shall call thee Caesar now.”

Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI, iii. 1.

Cæsar, as a title, was pretty nearly equivalent to our Prince of Wales, and the French dauphin.

Cæsar’s wife must be above suspicion. The name of Pompeia has been mixed up with an accusation against P. Clodius, Cæsar divorced her; not, because he believed her guilty, but because the wife of Cæsar must not even be suspected of crime. (Suetonius: Julius Cæsar, 74.)

Cæsar. (See page 76, 2, Aut Cæsár.)

Julius Cæsar won 320 triumphs.

Cæsarian Operation or Cæsarian Operation. The extraction of a child from the womb by cutting the abdomen (Latin, creo, cut from the womb). Juliits Cæsar is said to have been thus brought into the world.

Cæsariam. The absolute rule of man over man, with the recognition of no law divine or human beyond that of the ruler’s will. (See Chauvinism.)

Cæteris paribus (Latin). Other things being equal; presuming all other conditions to be equal.

Caf (Mount). In Mohammedan mythology is that huge mountain in the middle of which the earth is sunk, as a night light is placed in a cup. Its foundation is the emerald Suhrust, the reflection of which gives the azure hue to the sky.

Cafat. A garment worn in Turkey and other Eastern countries. It is a sort of under-tunic or vest tied by a girdle at the waist.

Calamity

Cag Mag. Offal, bad meat; also a tough old goose; food which none can relish. (Gaelic and Welsh, cag magu.)

Cage. To whistle or sing in the cage. The cage is a jail, and to whistle in a cage is to turn Queen's evidence, or peach against a comrade.

Cagliostro. Conte de Cagliostro, or Giuseppe Balsamo of Palermo, a charlatan who offered everlasting youth to all who would pay him for his secret (1743-1795).

Cagots. A sort of gipsy race in Gascony and Bearne, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths, and shunned as something loathsome. (See CAQUEUX, COLIBERT.)

Chahors. Ueviers de Cahors. In the thirteenth century there was a colony of Jewish money-lenders settled at Cahors, which was to France what Lombard Street was to London.

Calaphas. The country-house of Calaphas, in which Judas Concluded his bargain to betray his Master, stood on “The Hill of Evil Counsel.”

Cain-coloured Beard. Yellow, symbolic of treason. In the ancient tapestries Cain and Judas are represented with yellow beards. (See YELLOW.)

“He hath but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard, a Cain-coloured beard.”—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, 1. 4.

Cainites (2 syl.). Disciples of Cain, a pseudo-Gnostic sect of the second century. They denounced the New Testament, and received instead The Gospel of Judas, which justified the false disciple and the crucifixion of Jesus. This sect maintained that heaven and earth were created by the evil principle, and that Cain with his descendants were the persecuted party.

Cairds or Jockeys. Gipsy tribes. Halliwell tells us “Caird” in Northumbeland = tinker, and gipsies are great menders of pots and pans. (Irish, caird, a tinker; Welsh, cerid, art or craft.)

“Donald Caird’s come again.” Popular Song.

Catus (Dr.). A French physician in Shakespeare’s Merry Wives of Windsor.

“The clipped English of Dr. Calus.”—Macaulay.

Cesus College (Cambridge). Elevated by Dr. John Key (Cesus), of Norwich, into a college, being previously only a hall called Gonville. Called Keys. (1567.)

Cake. A fool, a poor thing. (Cf. HALF-BAKED.)

Cake. To take the cake. To carry off the prize. The reference is to the prize-cake to the person who succeeded best in a given competition. In Notes and Queries (Feb. 27th, 1892, p. 176) a correspondent of New York tells us of a “cake walk” by the Southern negroes. It consists of walking round the prize cake in pairs, and umpires decide which pair walk the most gracefully. In ancient Greece a cake was the award of the toper who held out the longest.

In Ireland the best dancer in a dancing competition was rewarded, at one time, by a cake.

“A churn-dish stuck into the earth supported on its flat end a cake, which was to become the prize of the best dancer. . . At length the competitors yielded their claim to a young man . . . who, taking the cake, placed it gallantly in the lap of a pretty girl to whom . . . he was about to be married.”—Borrett and Coute: Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 64.

You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot spend your money and yet keep it. You cannot serve God and Mammon.

Your cake [or my cake] is dough. All my swans are turned to geese. Oceina est res tua [or mea]. Mon affaire est manquer; my project has failed.

Cake...Dough. I wish my cake were dough again. I wish I had never married. Bellenden Ker says the proverb is a corruption of Ei o’chimache my keke was d’how en geen, which he says is tantamount to “Something whispers within me—repentance; would that my marriage were set aside.”

Cakes. Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

“Land of cakes and ruther bents.” Burns.

Calabash. A drinking cup or water-holder; so called from the calabash nut of which it is made.

Calamanco Cat (A). A tortoise-shell cat. Calamanco is a glossy woollen fabric, sometimes striped or variegated. It is the Spanish word Calandéo.

Calamity. The beating down of standing corn by wind or storm. The word is derived from the Latin calamus (a stalk of corn). Hence, Cicero calls a storm Calamititum tempestas (a corn-levelling tempest).

“Another ill accident is drought, and the withering of the corn; inasmuch as the word calamity was first derived from calamus (stalk), when the corn could not get out of the ear.”—Bacon.
Calandrine. A typical simpleton frequently introduced in Boccaccio's Decameron; expressly made to be-fooled and played upon.

Calattrafa (Red Cross Knights of). Instituted at Calattrafa, in Spain, by Sancho III. of Castile in 1158: their badge is a red cross cut out in the form of flowers, on the left breast of a white mantle.

Calauria. Pro Delo Calauria (Orid: Metamorphoses, v. 384). Calauria was an island in the Sinus Saronicus which Latona gave to Neptune in exchange for Delos. A quid pro quo.

Calceolaria. Little-shoe flowers; so called from their resemblance to fairy slippers. (Latin, calceolus.)

Calceus mutavit. He has changed his shoes, that is, has become a senator. Roman senators were distinguished by their shoes, which were sandalled across the instep and up the ankles.

Calculate is from the Latin calculi (pebbles), used by the Romans for counters. In the abacus, the round balls were called cal'culi, and it was by this instrument the Roman boys were taught to count and calculate. The Greeks voted by pebbles dropped into an urn—a method adopted both in ancient Egypt and Syria; counting these pebbles was "calculating," the number of voters. (See page 2, col. 1, AnaCBur.)

I calculate. A peculiarity of expression common in the western states of North America. In the southern states the phrase is "I reckon," in the middle states "I expect," and in New England "I guess." All were imported from the mother country by early settlers.

"Your aunt won two tables, I calculate; don't she?"—Susan Warner: Querchy (vol. I, chap. xix.)

Calculators (The). Alfragan, the Arabian astronomer. Died 820.

Jedediah Buxton, of Elmton, in Derbyshire. (1705-1773.)

George Bidder and Zerah Colburn (an American), who exhibited publicly.

"Buxton, being asked "How many cubical eighth-of-an-inch there are in a body whose three sides are 23,143,706 yards, 6,524,782 yards, and 54,896 yards?" replied correctly without setting down a figure."—Colburn, being asked the square root of 100,920 and the cube root 208,320,125, replied before the audience had set the figures down.—Price: Parallel History, vol. II, p. 570.

Cal. [See KALE.]

Caleb. The enchantress who carried off St. George in infancy.

Caleb, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Lord Grey of Wark (Northumberland), one of the adherents of the Duke of Monmouth.

"And, therefore, in the name of duchess, be The well-lung'd Balanin [Earl of Huntingdon] and old Caleb free."—Pope, 1713.

Caleb Quorem. A parish clerk or jack-of-all-trades, in Colman's play called The Review, or Wags of Windsor, which first appeared in 1808. Colman borrowed the character from a farce by Henry Lee (1738) entitled Throw Physis to the Dogs.

"I resolved, like Caleb Quorem, to have a place at the review."—Washington Irving.

Caledon. Scotland. (See next article.)

"Not thus, in ancient days of Caledon, Was thy voice mute amid the festal crown."—Sir W. Scott.

Caledonia. Scotland. A corruption of Caledon, a Celtic word meaning "a dweller in woods and forests." The word Celt is itself a contraction of the same word (Celt), and means the same thing.

"Sees Caledonia in romantic view."—Thomson.

"O Caledonia, stern and wild, Meet nurse for a poetic child."—Sir W. Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Calembour (French). A pun, a jest. From the "Jester of Kahlenberg," whose name was Wigan von Thesen, a character introduced in Tyll Ulenspiegel, a German tale. Ulen'spiegel (a fool or jester) means Owl's looking-glass, and may probably have suggested the title of the periodical called the Owl, the witty but sardonic "looking-glass" of the passing follies of the day. The jester of Calembour visited Paris in the reign of Louis XV., and soon became noted for his blunders and puns.

Calendar.

The Julian Calendar, introduced B.C. 46. It fixed the ordinary year to 365 days, with an extra day every fourth year (leap year). This is called "The Old Style."

The Gregorian Year. A modification of the Julian Calendar, introduced in 1582 by Pope Gregory XIII., and adopted in Great Britain in 1752. This is called "The New Style."

The Mohammedan Calendar, used in Mohammedan countries, dates from July 16th, 622, the day of the Hegira. It consists of 12 lunar months (29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes). A cycle is 30 years. The Revolutionary Calendar was the work of Fabre d'Eglantine and Mons. Homme.

Calendar. A Newgate Calendar or "Malefactors' Bloody Register," containing the biographies, confessions, dying speeches, etc., of notorious criminals. Began in 1700.

Calendars (The Three) were three royal princes, disguised as beggins dervishes, the subjects of three tales in the Arabian Nights.

Calenda. The first of every month was so called by the Romans. Varro says the term originated in the practice of calling together or assembling the people on the first day of the month, when the pontifex informed them of the time of the new moon, the day of the nones, with the festivals and sacred days to be observed. The custom continued till A.D. 450, when the fasti or calendar was posted in public places. (See Greek Calendars.)

Calopin (A). A dictionary. (Italian, calopino.) Ambrosio Calpino, of Calepio, in Italy, was the author of a dictionary, so that "my Calepin," like my Buclid, my Johnson, according to Cocker, etc., have become common nouns from proper names. Generally called Calopin, but the subjoined quotation throws the accent on the le.

"Whom do you prefer
For the best Latin? And I freely
Said that I thought Calopin's Dictionary.
Dr. Donne: Fourand eight nativ.

Caleys (A Stock Exchange term.) Caledonian Railway Ordinary Stock. A contraction of Calèdonians. (See Stock Exchange Slang.)

Calf-love. Youthful fancy as opposed to lasting attachment.

"I thought it was a childish madness you laid for the man—a sort of calf-love... ...—Rhoda Broughton.

Calf-skin. Fools and jesters used to wear a calf-skin coat buttoned down the back. In allusion to this custom, Paulombride says insolently to the Archduke of Austria, who had acted most basely to Richard Cour-de-Lion—

"Then wear a lion's hide! Doff it, for shame.
And hang a calf-skin on those recumbent limbs."

Shakespeare: King John, ii. 1.

Caliban. Rude, uncouth, unknown; as a Caliban style, a Caliban language. The allusion is to Shakespeare's Caliban (The Tempest), in which character Lord Falkland, etc., said that Shakespeare had not only invented a new creation, but also a new language.

"Shakespeare tells us, Caliban, to use new phrases, and diction unknown."—Dr. Bentley.

Caligula says, "in him [Caliban, as in some brute animal, this advance to the intellectual faculties, without the moral sense, is marked by the appearance of vice." (Caliban is the "missing link" between brute animals and man.)

Calibre [laf-ber]. A mind of no calibre: of no capacity. A mind of great calibre: of large capacity. Calibre is the bore of a gun, and, figuratively, the bore or compass of one's intelligence.

"The enemy had generally new arms... of uniform calibre."—Grant: Memoirs, vol. i. chap. xxi. p. 572.

"We measure men's calibre by the broadest circle of achievements."—Chapin: Lessons of Faith, p. 10.

Caliburn. Same as Excalibur, King Arthur's well-known sword. (See Sword.)

"Onward Arthur paced, with hand
On Caliburn's resolute sword."

Scott: bridal of Triumphant.

Calisto. So called from Cali'cut, in Malabar, once the chief port and emporium of Hindustan.

Calidore (3 syl.). Sir Calidore is the type of courtesy, and hero of the sixth book of Spenser's Faerie Queene. He is described as the most courteous of all knights, and is entitled the "all-beloved." The model of the poet was Sir Philip Sidney. His adventure is against the Blatant Beast, whom he muzles, chains, and drags to Faerie Land.

"Sir Gawain was the Calidore of the Round Table."—Donhey.

Calig'orant. An Egyptian giant and cannibal who used to entrap strangers with a hidden net. This net was made by Vulcan to catch Mars and Venus; Mercury stole it for the purpose of catching Chloris, and left it in the temple of Anubis; Calig'orant stole it thence. At length Astolpho blew his magic horn, and the giant ran affrighted into his own net, which dragged him to the ground. Whereupon Astolpho made the giant his captive, and deprived him of his net. This is an allegory. Calig'orant was a great sophist and heretic in the days of Aristotle, who used to entangle people with his talk; but being converted by Astolpho to the true faith, was, as it were, caught in his own net, and both his sophistry and heresy were taken from him. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Caligula. A Roman emperor; so called because he wore a military sandal called a caliga, which had no upper leather, and was used only by the common soldiers. (12: 37-41.)

"The word caliga, however, continued the Paro... 'mulea', in its primitive sense, Callabre

Call of Abraham. The invitation, or command of God to Abraham, to leave his idolatrous country, under the promise of being made a great nation.

Call of God. An invitation, exhortation, or warning, by the dispensations of Providence (Isa. xxii. 12); divine influence on the mind to do or avoid something (Heb. iii. 1).

Call of the House. An imperative summons sent to every Member of Parliament to attend. This is done when the sense of the whole House is required. At the muster the names of the members are called over, and defaulters reported.

Call to Arms (7b). To summon to prepare for battle. "Ad arma vocare."

Call to the Bar. The admission of a law student to the privileges of a barrister. The names of those qualified are called over. (See page 94, col. 1, BAR.)

Call to the Pastorate. An invitation to a minister by the members of a Presbyterian or Nonconformist church to preside over a certain congregation.

Call to the Unconverted. An invitation accompanied with promises and threats, to induce the unconverted to receive the gospel. Richard Baxter wrote a book so entitled.

Call (7b). I call God to witness. I solemnly declare that what I state is true.

To call. To invite: as, the trumpet calls.

"If honour calls, where'er she points the way,
The soul of honour follow and obey."

Churchill: The Forsworn, stanza 7.

To call [a man] out. To challenge him; to appeal to a man's honour to come forth and fight a duel.

To call in question. To doubt the truth of a statement; to challenge the truth of a statement. "In dubium vocare."

To call over the coals. (See COALS.)

To call to account. To demand an explanation; to reprove.

Called. He is called to his account. He is removed by death. Called to the judgment seat of God to give an account of his deeds, whether they be good, or whether they be evil. (See page 202, col. 1, CALLING.)

Calabre or Calabry. A Calabrian fur. Durange says, "At Chichester the priest vicars' and at St. Paul's the minor canons' wore a calabre amyxos;" and Bale, in his Image of Both Churches, alludes to the "fair vouchets of Raines (Rennes), and costly grey amies of calabre and cats' tails."
“The Lord Mayor and those aldermen above the chair chose to wear their coats furled with grey silk, and also with changeable taffetas; and those below the chair with calabash and with green taffetas.”—Hotton: New View of London.

Caller Herrings. Fresh herrings. Hence “caller air.” (Anglo-Saxon, calian, to cool.)

Calligraphy (The art of). Writing very minutely and yet clearly. Peter Bale, in the sixteenth century, wrote in the compass of a silver penny the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, two Latin prayers, his own name, the day of the month and date of the year since the accession of Queen Elizabeth, and a motto. With a glass this writing could be read. By photography a sheet of the Times newspaper has been reduced to a smaller compass. (Greek, calos-grapho, I write beautifully.)

Callimachus. The Italian Callimachus. Filippo Buonaccorsi (1437-1496).

Calling. A vocation, trade, or profession. The allusion is to the calling of the apostles by Jesus Christ to follow Him. In the legal profession persons must still be called to the bar before they can practise.

Effectual calling. An invitation to believe in Jesus, rendered effectual by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost.

Calliope [Kal-ii-o-pe, 4 syl., Greek, καλός, 50, beautiful voice]. The muse of epic or heroic poetry. Her emblems are a stylus and wax tablets. The painting of this Muse by Ercolina Ercolani (1616-1687) and her statue by Clementi (who died in 1680) are very celebrated.

The Greek word is καλλιός, in which the i is short. erroneously called “Callipe.”

Callipolis. A character in the Battle of Alcazar (1594) by George Peele. It is referred to by Pistol in 2 Henry IV., act ii. 4; and Sir W. Scott uses the word over and over again as the synonym of lady-love, sweetheart, charmer. Sir Walter always spells the word Callipolis, but Peele calls it Callipolis. The drunken Mike Lambourne says to Amy Robsart—“Mark ye, most fair Callipolis, or most lovely creature of chouts, and divine duchess of dark corners.”—Kentworth, chap. xxxii.

And the modest Roland Greame calls the beautiful Catherine his “most fair Callipolis.” (The Abbot, chap. xi.)

Callippic Period. The correction of the Metonic cycle by Callippus. In four cycles, or seventy-six years, the Metonic calculation was seven and a-half in excess. Callippus proposed to quadruple the period of Meton, and deduce a day at the end of it: at the expiration of which period Callippus imagined that the new and full moons returned to the same day of the solar year.

Callirrhoe (4 syl.). The lady-love of Charon, in Chariton’s Greek romance, entitled the Loves of Charon and Callirrhoe, written in the eighth century.

Cal'emon. Hooper says—

“Th' name, which means ‘beautiful black,’ was originally given to the Ammon’s mineral, or black sulphur of mercury. It was afterwards applied in jest by Sir Theodore Maynard to the chiorides of mercury, in honour of a favourite negro servant whom he employed to prepare it. As calamen is a white powder, the name is merely a jocular misnomer.”—Medical Dictionary.

Greek, καλός, beautiful, μέλας, black.

Calories. Monks in the Greek Church, who follow the rule of St. Basil. They are divided into cenobites, who recite the offices from midnight to sunrise; anchorites, who live in hermitages; and recluse, who shut themselves up in caverns and live on alms. (Greek, καλός, beautiful, μέλας, black.

Calipe (2 syl.). Calipe and Abyla. The two pillars of Hercules. According to one account, these two were originally only one mountain, which Hercules tore asunder; but some say he piled up each mountain separately, and poured the sea between them.

“Here sits up huge Abyla on Africa’s sand.
Crowns with high Calipe Krone’s salutant strand,
Greets with upraising towers the splendid sea,
And pours from urns immense the sea between.”

Danae: Economy of Vegetation.

Calumet [The peace-pipe]. When the North American Indians make peace or form an alliance, the high contracting parties smoke together to ratify the arrangement.

The peace-pipe is about two and a-half feet long, the bowl is made of highly-polished red marble, and the stem of a reed, which is decorated with eagles’ quills, women’s hair, and so on.

“The Great Spirit at an ancient period called the Indian nations together, and standing on the precipice of the red pipe-stone rock, broke off a piece which he moulded into the bowl of a pipe, and fitting on it a long reed, filled the pipe with the bark of red willow, and smoked over them, turning to the four winds. He told them the red colour of the pipe represented their flesh, and when they smoked it they must bury their war-clubs and scalping-knives. At the last whiff the Great Spirit disappeared."

"To present the calumet to a stranger is a mark of hospitality and good-will;
to refuse the offer is an act of hostile defiance.

"Wash the war-paint from your faces,
Wash the war-stains from your fingers,
Bury your war-clubs and your weapons;
Smoke the calumet together.
And as brothers live henceforward."

Calvary [harp skull], Golgotha [skull]. The place of our Lord's crucifixion; so called from some fanciful resemblance which it bore to a human skull. The present church of "the Holy Sepulchre" has no claim to be considered the site thereof; it is far more likely that the "mosque of Omar," or the dome of the rock, occupies the real site.

A Calvary. A representation of the successive scenes of the Passion of Christ in a series of pictures, etc., in a church. The shrine containing the representations.

Calvary Clover. said to have sprung up in the track made by Pilate when he went to the cross to see his "title affixed" [Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews]. It is a common trefoil, probably a native of India or Turkey. Each of the three round leaves has a little car mine spot in the centre. In the day the three leaves of the trefoil form a sort of cross; and in the flowering season the plant bears a little yellow flower, like a "crown of thorns." Julian tells us that each of the three leaves had in his time a white cross in the centre, and that the centre cross lasts visible longer than the crosses of the other two leaves. (See CHRISTIAN TRADITIONS.)

Calvary Cross (A). A Latin cross mounted on three steps (or grises).

Calvert's Entire. The 14th Foot.
Called Calvert from their colonel, Sir Harry Calvert (1806-1826), and entire, because three entire battalions were kept up for the good of Sir Harry, when adjutant-general. The term is, of course, a play on Calvert's malt liquor. The regiment is now called The Prince of Wales' Own (West Yorks. Regiment).

Calves. The inhabitants of the Isle of Wight are so called from a legendary joke which states that a calf once got its head firmly wedged in a wooden pale, and, instead of breaking up the pale, the farm-man cut off the calf's head.

Calves gone to Grass (Hts). Said of a spindle-legged man. And another mocking taunt is, "Veal will be dear, because there are no calves."

Calves' Head. There are many ways of dressing a calf's head. Many ways of saying or doing a foolish thing: a simpleton has many ways of showing his folly; or, generally, if one way won't do we must try another. The callusion is to the great Calves' Head Club banquet, when the board was laden with calves' heads cooked in sundry ways and divers fashions.

Calves' Head Club. Instituted in ridicule of Charles I. The great annual banquet was held on the 30th January, and consisted of a god's head, to repre sent the person of Charles Stuart, in dependent of his kingly office; a pig with little ones in its mouth, an emblem of tyranny: a boar's head with an apple in its mouth torepresent the king pre paring on his subjects; and calves' heads dressed in sundry ways to represent Charles in his regal capacity. After the banquet, the king's book (Icon Basilisk) was burnt, and the parting cup was,
"To those worthy patriots who killed the tyrant."

Calvinism. The five chief points of Calvinism are:
(1) Predestination, or particular elec tion.
(2) Irresistible grace.
(3) Original sin, or the total depravity of the natural man, which renders it morally impossible to believe and turn to God of his own free will.
(4) Particular redemption.
(5) Final perseverance of the saints.

Calypso. A forest supposed, in the romances relating to King Arthur, to occupy the northern portion of England.

Calypso's Isle. Gozo, near Malta. Called in classic mythology Ogyg in.

Cam and Isla. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford; so called from the rivers on which they stand.

"May you, my Dam and Isla, prosper long.
May the right divine of kings to you forever flow."
Pope: Dunciad, iv. 167.

Cama. The God of love and marriage in Indian mythology.

Cama'oho, "richest of men," makes grand preparations for his wedding with Camaldolites 204 Cambyses

Camaldolites (4 syl.). A religious order of great rigidity of life, founded in the vale of Camaldoli, in the Tuscan Apennines, by St. Romuald, a Benedictine. (Eleventh century.)

Camaralzaman (Prince) fell in love with Badoura, Princess of China, the moment he saw her. (Arabian Nights: Prince Camaranzaman.)

Camarrilla (Spanish). A clique; the confidants or private advisers of the sovereign. It literally means a small private chamber, and is in Spain applied to the room in which boys are flogged.

"Encircled with a dangerous camarilla."—The Tempest.

Camarrina. Ne morétas Camarrinam (Don't meddle with Camarrina). Camarrina was a lake in Sicily, which, in time of drought, yielded a pestilential stench. The inhabitants consulted an oracle about draining it, and Apollo replied, "Don't meddle with it." Nevertheless, they drained it, and cre long an enemy marched an army over the bed of the lake and plundered the city. The proverb is applied to those who remove one evil, but thus give place to a greater. The Channel may be an evil to those who suffer sea-sickness, but it is million times better to endure this evil than to make it a high road to invaders. The application is very extensive, as: Don't kill the small birds, or you will be devoured by insects. One pest is a safeguard against a greater one.

A similar Latín phrase is Anagyris morte.

Cambalo. (In the land of Tartary). The model of all royal virtues. His wife was Elfeta; his two sons, Algarnis and Cambalo; and his daughter, Canace. On her birthday (October 15th) the King of Arabia and India sent Cambuscan a "steele of brasse, which, between sunrise and sunset, would carry his rider to any spot on the earth." All that was required was to whisper the name of the place in the horse's ear, mount upon his back, and turn a pin set in his ear. When the rider had arrived at the place required, he had to turn another pin, and the horse instantly descended, and, with another screw of the pin, vanished till it was again required. This story is told by Chaucer in the Squire's Tale, but was never finished. Milton (Paradise Lost) accepts the word "Cambuscan" for a place that he half-remembered.

The story of Cambuscan old.

(See CANACE.)

Cambyses (3 syl.). A pompous, ranting character in Preston's lamentable tragedy of that name.

"Give me a cup of sack, to make mine eye look red: for I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Cambyses' time."—Shakespeare, Henry IV, ii. 4.
Camden Society, for the publication of early historic and literary remains, is named in honour of William Camden, the historian.

Camel. The name of Mahomet's favourite camel was Al Kaswa. The mosque at Koba covers the spot where it knelt when Mahomet fled from Mecca. Mahomet considered the kneeling of the camel as a sign sent by God, and remained at Koba in safety for four days. The swiftest of his camels was Al Adha.

"Camel. The prophet Mahomet's camel performed the whole journey from Jerusalem to Mecca in four bounds, for which service he had a place in heaven with Alborak (the prophet's "horse"), Balaam's ass, Tobit's dog, and Kestmir (the dog of the seven sleepers)." (Curzon.)

"Camel. It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." (Matt. xix. 24). In the Koran we find a similar expression: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." In the Rabbinical writings we have a slight variety which goes to prove that the word "camel" should not be changed into "cable," as Theophylact suggests: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pamphletarians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle." (See CABLE.)

Camellia. The technical name of a genus, and the popular name of the species of overgrown shrubs; so named in honour of G. J. Kamel (Latin Camelina), a Spanish Jesuit. Introduced into England in 1739.

Cam'elot (Somersetshire), where King Arthur held his court. (See Winc- chester.)

Camelot (2 syl.). Fustian, rubbish, trash. The cloth so called ought to be made of goats' hair, but is a mixture of wool and silk; wool and hair, or wool, silk, and hair, etc. (French, camelot: Arabic, camelat.) (See page 206, CAMLET.)

Cam'eo. An anaglyph on a precious stone. The anaglyph is when the figure is raised in relief; an intaglio is when the figure is hollowed out. The word cameo means an onyx, and the most famous cameo in the world is the onyx containing the apotheosis of Augustus. These precious stones have two layers of different colours, one serving for the figure, and the other for the ground.

Cam'eron Highlanders. The 79th Regiment of Infantry, raised by Allan Cameron, of Erroch, in 1793. Now called "The Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders."

Cameronian Regiment. The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of Cameronians (q.v.), in the Revolution of 1688. Now the 1st Battalion of the Scottish Rifles; the 2nd Battalion is the old No. 90.

Camer'onian. The strictest sect of Scotch Presbyterians, organised in 1680, by Richard Cameron, who was slain in battle at Aird's Moss in 1680. He objected to the alliance of Church and State. In 1676 most of the Cameronians were merged in the Free Church. In history the Cameronians are generally called the Covenanters.

Camilla. Virgin queen of the Volscians. Virgil (Aeneid, vii. 809) says she was so swift that she could run over a field of corn without bending a single blade, or make her way over the sea without even wetting her feet.

"Not so when swift Camilla scourc the plain, Fills o'er the unseeding corn and skims along the main." Pope: Essay on Criticism, 372-3.

Camillus, five times Dictator of Rome, was falsely accused of embezzlement, and went into voluntary exile; but when the Gauls besieged Rome, he returned and delivered his country.

"Camillus, only vengeful to his foes." Thomson: Winter.

Camisard. In French history, the Camisards are the Protestant insurgents of the Cevennes, who resisted the violence of the dragonnades, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Their leader was Cavalier, afterwards Governor of Jersey.

Cam'isarde or Camisado. A night attack; so called because the attacking party wore a camise or peasant's smock over their armour, both to conceal it, and that they might the better recognise each other in the dark.

Cam'isole (3 syl.). A loose jacket worn by women when dressed in negligée (French).

Camisole de Force. A stay-waistcoat. Frequently mentioned in accounts of capital punishments in France.

Cam'lan (Battle of Cornwall), which put an end to the Knights of the Round
Here Arthur received his death wound from the hand of his nephew Modred.  (A.D. 542.)

Camel is not connected with the word camel; it is a fine cloth made of goats' hair, called Turkish yarn, and is from the Arabic word camlat, which Littre says is so called from scil et camel (the Angora goat).

Cam'mock. As crooked as a cammock. The cammock is a piece of timber bent for the knee of a ship; a hockey-stick; a skinny-club.  (Anglo-Saxon.)

"Though the cammock, the more it is bowed the better it is; yet the bow, the more it is bent the weaker it waxeth."—Lily.

Camorra. A secret society of Italy organised early in the nineteenth century. It claimed the right of settling disputes, etc.

Camorrist. One of the desperadoes belonging to the Camorra. "Camorristicism," the gospel of the league.

Camp Candlestick (A). A bottle, or a soldier's bayonet.

Camp-followers. Non-combatants (such as servants, carriers, hostlers, butlers, laundresses, and so on), who follow an army. We are told that in 1859 as many as 85,000 camp-followers were in attendance on 15,000 combatants in a Bengal army.

Campaign Wig (A), imported from France. It was made very full, was curled, and was eighteen inches in length in the front, with drop locks. In some cases the back part of the wig was put in a black silk bag. Of course the campaign referred to the victories of Marlborough.  (Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne, chap. xii.)

There were also campaign coats, campaign lace, campaign shoes, campaign shirts, campaign gowns, campaign waistcoats, etc.

Campania. Properly the Terra di Lavoro of Italy, i.e. the plain country about Capua.

"Disdainful of Campania's gentle plains."  Thomson: Summer.

Campesca (3 syl.). A beautiful harlot, whom Alexander the Great handed over to Apelles. Apelles drew her in the nude.

"When Cupid and Campesca played At cards for kisses, Cupid paid."—Lily.

Campbells are Coming (The). This soul-stirring song was composed in 1715, when the Earl of Mar raised the standard for the Stuarts against George I.

John Campbell was Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's forces, and the rebellion was quashed. The main interest now attached to the famous song is connected with the siege of Lucknow in the Indian rebellion, 1857. Nana Sahib had massacred women and children most foully, and while the survivors were expecting instant death, a Scotch woman lying ill on the ground heard the pibroch, and exclaimed, "Dinna ye hear it? Dinna ye hear it? The pipes o' Havelock sound." And soon afterwards the rescue was accomplished.

The first verse runs thus:—

"The Campbells are coming, O-ho! O-ho! The Campbells are coming, O-ho! The Campbells are coming to bonnie Loch Leven, The Campbells are coming, O-ho!"

Campbellite (3 syl.). A follower of John McLeod Campbell, who taught the universalism of the atonement, for which, in 1831, he was deposed.

Campeseling. A ceiling sloping on one side from the vertical wall towards a plane surface in the middle. A corruption of cam (twisted or bent) ceiling. (Halliwell gives cam, "awry.")

Campador (cam-pa'dor). The Cid (q.v.).

Can'acé (3 syl.). A paragon of women, the daughter of King Cambuscan', to whom the King of Arabia and India sent as a present a mirror and a ring. The mirror would tell the lady if any man on whom she set her heart would prove true or false, and the ring (which was to be worn on her thumb) would enable her to understand the language of birds and to converse with them. It would also give the wearer perfect knowledge of the medicinal properties of all roots. Chaucer never finished the tale, but probably he meant to marry Can'acé to some knight who would be able to overthrow her two brothers, Cambalo and Al'garsife, in the tournament.  (Squire's Tale.)  (See below.)

Can'acé was courted by a crowd of suitors, but her brother, Cambalo or Cambel, gave out that anyone who pretended to her hand must encounter Aim in single combat and overthrow him. She ultimately married Triamond, son of the fairy Agrapé.  (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. iv. 8.)  (See CAMBEL.)

Can'ache (3 syl.). One of Acteon's dogs.  (Greek, "the clang of metal falling.")

Canada Balsam. Made from the Pinus balseamoa, a native of Canada.
Canaille (French, can-naye'). The mob; the rabble (Italian, canaglia, a pack of dogs, from Latin canis, a dog).

Canard. A hoax. Cornished, is taken to try the gullibility of the public, reported in the papers that he had twenty ducks, one of which he cut up and threw to the nineteen, who devoured it greedily. He then cut up another, then a third, and so on till nineteen were cut up; and as the nineteenth was gobbled up by the surviving duck, it followed that this one duck actually ate nineteen ducks—a wonderful proof of duck voracity. This tale had the run of all the papers, and gave a new word to the language. (French, canard, a duck.) (Qvetolet.)

Canary (A). Slang for a guinea or sovereign. Gold coin is so called because, like a canary, it is yellow.

Canary-bird (A). A jail-bird. At one time certain desperate convicts were dressed in yellow; and jail was the cage of these canaries.

Canzon. To dance the canzon. A free-and-easy way of dancing quadrilles invented by Rigolochi, and adopted in the public gardens, the opera comique, and the casinos of Paris. (Canzon familiarity, tittle-tattle.)

"They were going through a quadrille with all those supplementary gestures introduced by the great Rigolochi, a notorious dancier, to whom the notorious canzon owed its origin."—A. Egmont Hake: Paris Originals (the Chaffower).

Cancel, to blot out, is merely "to make lattice-work." This is done by making a cross over the part to be omitted. (Latin, cancello, to make trellis.) (See Cross IT out.)

Cancer (the Crab) appears when the sun has reached his highest northern limit, and begins to go backward towards the south; but, like a crab, the return is sideways (June 21st to July 23rd).

According to fable, Cancer was the animal which Juno sent against Hercules, when he combated the Hydra of Lerne. Cancer bit the hero's foot, but Hercules killed the creature, and Juno took it up to heaven, and made it one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Candaces (3 syl.). King of Lydia, who exposed the charms of his wife to Gyges'; wherupon the queen compelled Gyges to assassinate her husband, after which she married the murderer, who became king, and reigned twenty-eight years. (716-678.)

Candidate (3 syl.) means "clothed in white." Those who solicited the office of consul, questor, prætor, etc., among the Romans, arrayed themselves in a loose white robe. It was loose that they might show the people their scars, and white in sign of fidelity and humility. (Latin, candidus, whence candidat, clothed in white, etc.)

Candide (2 syl.). The hero of Voltaire's novel so called. All sorts of misfortunes are heaped upon him, and he bears them all with cynical indifference.

Candle. Bell, Book, and Candle. (See page 120, col. 1, Bell, etc.)

Fine (or Gay) as the king's candle. "Bûriole comme la chandelle des rois," in allusion to an ancient custom of presenting, on January 6th, a candle of various colours to the three kings of Cologne. It is generally applied to a woman overdressed, especially with gay ribbons and flowers. "Fine as fivepence."

The game is not worth the candle. (Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle.) Not worth even the cost of the candle that lights the players.

To burn the candle at both ends. In French, "Brûler la chandelle par les deux bouts." To indulge in two or more expensive luxuries or dissipate habits at the same time; to haste to rise up early and late take rest, cutting the bread of carelessness.

To hold a candle to the devil. To aid or countenance that which is wrong. The allusion is to the practice of Roman Catholics, who burn candles before the image of a favourite saint, carry them in funeral processions, and place them on their altars.

"When Jessica (in the Merchant of Venice, ii. 6) says to Lorenzo: "What, must I hold a candle to my shame?" she means, Must I direct attention to this disguise, and blazon my folly abroad? Why, "Cupid himself would blush to see me thus transformed to a boy." She does not mean, Must I glory in my shame?"

To sell by the candle. A species of sale by auction. A pin is thrust through a candle about an inch from the top, and bidding goes on till the candle is burnt down to the pin, when the pin drops into the candlestick, and the last bidder is declared the purchaser. This sort of auction was employed in 1803, according to the Reading Mercury (Dec. 16), at Aldermaston, near Reading.

"The Council thinks it meet to propose the way of selling by 'inch of candle,' as being the most probable means to procure the true value of the goods."—Milton: Letters, etc.
Candle-holder 208 Cannon

Candle-holder. An abettor. The reference is to the practice of holding a candle in the Catholic Church for the reader, and in ordinary life to light a workman when he requires more light.

"Thou art a candle to the devil. To propitiate the devil by a bribe, as some seek to propitiate the saints in glory by a votive candle."

What is the Latin for candle?—Tucc. Here is a play of words: tece means hold your tongue, don't bother me. (See note.)

Candelmas Day. The feast of the purification of the Virgin Mary, when Christ was presented by her in the Temple. February 2nd, when, in the Roman Catholic Church, there is a candle procession, to consecrate all the candles which will be needed in the church during the year. The candles symbolise Jesus Christ, called "the light of the world," and "a light to lighten the Gentiles." It was the old Roman custom of burning candles to the goddess Februn, mother of Mars, to scare away evil spirits.

"On Candlemas Day Candles and candlessticks throw all away."

Canegour (Mrs.). A type of female backbiters. In Sheridan's comedy of The School for Scandal.

"The name of 'Mrs. Canegour' has become one of those formidable by-words, which have had more power in putting folly and ill-nature out of countenance than whole volumes of remonstrance."—J. Moore.

Canens. A nymph, wife of Picus, King of the Laurentes. When Circe had changed Picus into a bird, Canens lamented him so greatly that she pined away, till she became a see et proterea fragilis. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, 14 fab. 9.)

Caneophore (in architecture). Figures of young persons of either sex bearing a basket on their head. (Latin, caneophore, plural: singular, Greek, κανέφορος.) The English singular is "caneophor" (3 syl.).

Caniular Days. The dog-days, corresponding with the overflow of the Nile. From the middle of July to the beginning of the second week in September. (Latin, canicula, diminutive of canis, a dog.)

Caniular Period. A cycle of 1461 years or 1460 Julian years, called a "Sotic period." When it was supposed that any given day had passed through all the seasons of the year.

Caniular Year. The ancient Egyptian year, computed from one heliacal rising of the Dog-star (Sirius) to the next.

Canidus. A sorcerer, who could bring the moon from heaven. Alluded to by Horace. (Epodes, v.)

"Your ancient conjurers were wont To make her [the moon] from her sphere dismount And to their incantations boost."

Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 3.

Canister. The head (pugilistic term). "To mill his canister" is to break his head. A "canister cap" is a covering for the head, whether hat or cap. A "canister" is a small coffer or box, and the head is the "canister" or coffer of man's brains.

Canon. The brier or dog-rose.

"Put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose. And plant this thorn, this canker, Hollaichoke."

Shakespeare: 1 Henry iv., 1. 3.

Canneas. The place where Hannibal defeated the Romans under L. Emilius Paulus. Any fatal battle that is the turning point of a great general's prosperity is called his Canneas. Thus, we say, "Moscov was the Canneas of Napoleon Bonaparte."

Cannel Coal. A corruption of candle coal, so called from the bright flame, unmixed with smoke, which it yields in combustion.

Cannibal. A word applied to those who eat human flesh. The usual derivation is Caribbe, corrupted into Canibbee, supposed to be man-eaters. Some of the tribes of these islands have no r.

"The natives live in great fear of the cannibals (i.e. Caribbe, or people of Carib)."—Columbus.

Cannon (in billiards). A corruption of carrom, which is short for carombole. A cannon is when the player's ball strikes the adversary’s ball in such a way as to glance off and strike a second ball.

Canoe (2 sy1.). A boat. (Spanish, canoa, a canoe; Dutch, canoe; German, kahn, a boat; Old French, canoe, a ship, and canot, a boat; Latin, canna, a hollow stem or reed; our canoe, can = a jug; cannon, canal, etc.)

Canon. The canons used to be those persons who resided in the buildings contiguous to the cathedral, employed either in the daily service, or in the education of the choristers. The word is Greek, and means a measuring rod, the beam of a balance; then, a roll or register containing the names of the clergy who are licensed to officiate in a cathedral church.

Canon. A divine or ecclesiastical law.

"Or that the Everlasting had not said
His canon gains but slumbering:"—Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 2.

Canon Law. A collection of ecclesiastical laws which serve as the rule of church government. (See below.)

Canonical. Canon is a Greek word, and means the index of a balance, hence a rule or law. (See above.)

The sacred canon means the accepted books of Holy Scripture, which contain the inspired laws of salvation and morality; also called The Canonicai Books.

Canonical Dress. The costume worn by the clergy according to the direction of the canon. Archdeacon’s, deans, and bishops wear canonical hats.

Canonical Epistles. The seven catholic epistles, i.e. one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. The epistles of Paul were addressed to specific churches or to individuals.

"The second and third epistles of John are certainly not catholic. One is to a specific lady and her children; and the other is to Gaius. If the word "canonical" in this phrase means appointed to be read in church, then the epistles of Paul are canonical. In fact there are only five canonical epistles.

Canonical Hours. The times within which the sacred offices may be performed. In the Roman Catholic Church they are seven—viz. matins, prime, tierce, sext, none, vespers, and compline. Prime, tierce, sext, and none are the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day, counting from six in the morning. Compline is a corruption of completeo rium (that which completes the services of the day). The reason why there are seven canonical hours is that David says, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (Psalm cxix. 164).

7 In England the phrase means the time of the day within which persons can be legally married, i.e. from eight in the morning to three p.m.

Canonical Obedience. The obedience due by the inferior clergy to the superior clergy set over them. Even bishops owe canonical obedience to the archbishop of the same province.

Canonical Punishments are those punishments which the Church is authorised to inflict.

Canonicals.

The ponce on the gown of an M.D., designed for carrying drugs.

The cofl of a serjeant-at-law, designed for concealing the toasure.

The lamb-skin on a B.A. hood, designed in imitation of the toga cuurda of the Romans.

The strings of an Oxford undergraduate, to show the wearer is still in leading strings. At Cambridge, however, the strings are the mark of a graduate who has won his ribbons.

The tippet on a barrister’s gown, meant for a wallet to carry briefs in.

The proctors’ and pro-proctors’ tippet, for papers—a sort of sabretache.

Canopic Vases. Used by the Egyptian priests for the viscera of bodies embalmed, four vases being provided for each body. So called from Canopus, in Egypt, where they were first used.

Canopus. The Egyptian god of water. The Chaldeans worshipped fire, and sent all the other gods a challenge, which was accepted by a priest of Canopus. The Chaldeans lighted a vast fire round the god Canopus, when the Egyptian deity spouted out torrents of water and quenched the fire, thereby obtaining the triumph of water over fire.

Canopy properly means a gnat cur- tain. Herodotus tells us (ii. 96) that the fishermen of the Nile used to lift their nets on a pole, and form thereby a rude sort of tent under which they slept securely, as gnats will not pass through the meshes of a net. Subsequently the tester of a bed was so called, and lastly the canopy borne over kings. (Greek, κινον, a gnat; κουνανος, a gnat-curtain; Latin, conponem, a gnat-curtain.)

Canossa. Canossa, in the duchy of Modena, is where (in the winter of 1076-7) Kaiser Heinrich IV. went to humble himself before Pope Gregory VII. (Hildebrand.)
Has the Czar gone to Canossa? Is he about to eat humble pie?

When, in November, 1817, the Czar went to Berlin to visit the Emperor of Germany, the Standard asked in a leader, "Has the Czar gone to Canossa?"

Cant. A whining manner of speech; class phraseology, especially of a religious nature (Latin, canto, to sing, whence chant). It is often derived from a proper name. We are told that Alexander and Andrew Cant maintained that all those who refused the "Covenant" ought to be excommunicated, and that those were cursed who made use of the prayer-book. These same Cants, in their grace before meat, used to "pray for all those who suffered persecution for their religious opinions." (Mercurius Publicus, No. ix. 1661.)

The proper name cannot have given us the noun and verb, as they were in familiar use certainly in the time of Ben Jonson, signifying "professional slang," and "to use professional slang."

"The doctor here,
When he discourses of dissection,
Of rena canes and of rena porta . . .
What does he do but cant? Or if he run
To his judicial astrology,
And trot out the trice, the quartile, and the nactus.
Does he not cant?"
Ben Jonson (1572-1637); Andrew Cant died 1664.

Cantabrian Surge. The Bay of Biscay. So called from the Cantabri who dwelt about the Biscayan shore. Sue tonius tells us that a thunderbolt fell in the Cantabrian Lake (Spain) "in which twelve axes were found." (Galba, viii.)

"She her thundering army leads
To Calpe (Gibraltar) . . . or the rough Cantabrian Surge."
Cantàte Sunday. Fourth Sunday after Easter. So called from the first word of the introit of the mass: "Sing to the Lord." Similarly "Lecture Sunday" (the fourth after Lent) is so called from the first word of the mass.

Canteen means properly a wine-cellar. Then a refreshment-house in a barrack for the use of the soldiers. Then a vessel, holding about three pints, for the use of soldiers on the march. (Italian, canta, a cellar.)

Canterbury. Canterbury is the higher reck, but Winchester the better manger. Canterbury is the higher see in rank, but Winchester the one which produces the most money. This was the reply of William Edington, Bishop of Winchester, when offered the archbishopric of Canterbury (1365). Now Canterbury is £15,000 a year, and Winchester £6,600.

Canterbury Tales. Chaucer supposed that he was in company with a party of pilgrims going to Canterbury to pay their devotions at the shrine of Thomas Becket. The party assembled at an inn in Southwark, called the Tabard, and there agreed to tell one tale each, both in going and returning. He who told the best tale was to be treated with a supper on the homeward journey. The work is incomplete, and we have none of the tales told on the way home.

A Canterbury Tale. A cock-and-bull story; a romance. So called from Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.

Canting Crew (The). Beggars, bawds, and thieves, who use what is called the canting lingo.

Canvas means cloth made of hemp. To canvas a subject is to strain it through a hemp strainer, to sift it; and to canvass a borough is to sift the votes. (Latin, cannabinae, hemp.)

Canvas City (A). A military encampment.

"The Grand Master assembed, and they proceeded accordingly, . . . avoiding the most inhabited parts of the canvas city."—Sir W. Scott: The Tullamore, chap. x.

"In 1631, during the gold rush, a town of tents, known as Canvas Town, rose into being on the St. Kilda Road, Melbourne. Several thousand inhabitants lived in this temporary settlement, which was laid out in streets and lanes for several months."—Citation of the World; Melbourne.

Ca'ora. A river, on the banks of which are a people whose heads grow beneath their shoulders. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouths in the middle of their breasts. (Hakluyt: Voyages, 1598.) Raleigh, in his Description of Guiana, gives a similar account of a race of men. (See BLEMMYES.)

"The Anthropophagi and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders."—Shakespeare: Othello, 1, 3.

Cap.
Black cap. (See page 140, Black Cap.)
Caper cap. A square cap or mortar-board. (French, quartier.)
College cap. A treacher like the caps worn at the English Universities by students and bachelors of art, doctors of divinity, etc.
Fool's cap. A cylindrical cap with feather and bells, such as licensed Fools used to wear.
Forked cap. A bishop's mitre. For the paper so called, see Forked Cap.

"A cap of black silk velvet, after the John Knox fashion."—Edinburgh University Calendar.

Monmouth cap (A). (See Monmouth.)

Cap and bells. The insignia of a professional fool or jester.

A feather in one's cap. An achievement to be proud of; something creditable.

Square cap. A trenched or "mortar-board," like the University cap.

Statute cap. A woollen cap ordered by statute to be worn on holidays by all citizens for the benefit of the woollen trade. To a similar end, persons were obliged to be buried at death in flannel.

"Well, better wits have worn plain statute caps."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour Lost, v. 2.

Trencher cap, or mortar-board. A cap with a square board, generally covered with black cloth.

I must put on my considering cap. I must think about the matter before I give a final answer. The allusion is to a conjurer's cap.

If the cap fits, wear it. If the remark applies to you, apply it to yourself. Hats and caps differ very slightly in size and appearance, but everyone knows his own when he puts it on.

Setting her cap at him. Trying to catch him for a sweetheart or a husband. The lady puts on the most becoming of her caps, to attract the attention and admiration of the favoured gentleman.

To gain the cap. To obtain a bow from another out of respect.

"Such vain is the cap of him that makes them thee, but keeps his book uncrossed."—Shakespeare: Cymbeline, viii. 3.

To pull caps. To quarrel like two women, who pull each other's caps.

Your cap is all on one side. The French have the phrase Mettre son bonnet de travers, meaning "to be in an ill-humour." M. Hilaire le Gai explains it thus: "La plupart des tapageurs de profession portent ordinairement le chapeau sur l'oreille." It is quite certain that workmen, when they are bothered, push their cap on one side of the head, generally over the right ear, because the right hand is occupied.

Cap (the verb).

I cap to that, i.e. assent to it. The allusion is to a custom observed in France amongst the judges in deliberation. Those who assent to the opinion stated by any of the bench signify it by lifting their toque from their heads.

To cap. To excel.

"Well, that caps the globe."—C. Borne: Jana Eira.

Cap Verses (T). Having the metre fixed and the last letter of the previous line given, to add a verse beginning with the given letter (of the same metre or not, according to prearrangement) thus:

English.

The way was long, the wind was cold (D).

Dogs with their tongues their wounds do heal (D).

Like words concealed in northern air (B).

Regions Caesar never knew (W).

With all a poet's ecstasy (Y).

You may admire my awkward pace, etc. etc.

Latin.

Nil picta timidus navita pappibus (B).

Sunt quos curriculo pulvere Olympum (M).

Myrrnae pavibus naevi sequere mare (E).

Est qui nec vetera pocula Maxenti (1)

Illum, si propri condit horreo (O).

O, et presidium, etc. (as long as you please).

It would make a Christmas game to cap proper names: as Plato, Otway, Young, Goldsmith, etc., or to cap proverbs, as: "Rome was not built in a day"; "Ye are the salt of the earth"; "Hungry is the best sauce"; "Example is better than precept"; "Time and tide wait for no man"; etc.

Cap and Bells. Wearing the cap and bells. Said of a person who is the butt of the company, or one who excites laughter at his own expense. The reference is to licensed jesters formerly attached to noblemen's establishments. Their headgear was a cap with bells.

"One is bound to speak the truth . . . whether he mourns the cap and bells or a shrewd hat (like a bishop)."—Thackeray.

Cap and Feather Days. The time of childhood.

"Here I was got into the scenes of my cap-and-feather days."—Cobbett.

Cap and Gown. The full academical costume of a university student, tutor, or master, worn at lectures, examinations, and after "hall" (dinner).

"Is it a cap and gown affair?"—C. Bode: Verdant Green.

Cap in Hand. Submissively. To wait on a man cap in hand is to wait on him like a servant, ready to do his bidding.

Cap of Fools (The). The chief or foremost fool; one that exceeds all others in folly.

"Thou art the cap of all the fools alive."—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, vi. 3.

Cap of Liberty. When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small red cloth cap, called pileus, was placed on his head. As soon as this was done, he was termed libertinus (a freedman), and his name was registered in the city.
Cap

Cap of Maintenance. A cap of dignity ancienly belonging to the rank of duke; the fur cap of the Lord Mayor of London, worn on days of state; a cap carried before the British sovereigns at their coronation. Maintenance here means defence.

Cap of Time. They wear themselves in the cap of time. Use more ceremony, says Parolles, for these lords do "wear themselves in the cap of time," i.e. these lords are the favourites and jewels worn in the cap of the time being, and have the greatest influence. In the cap of time being, they are the very jewels, and most honoured. (Shakespeare: All's Well, etc., ii. 1.)

Cap-acquaintance (A.), now called a bowing acquaintance. One just sufficiently known to bow to.

Cap-money. Money collected in a cap or hat; hence an improvised collection.

Cap-a-pie. The general etymology is the French cap à pied, but the French phrase is de pied en cap.

"Armed at all points exactly cap-a-pie," Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 2.
"I am courier, cape-a-pie." Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii. 2.

? We are told that cap à pied is Old French, but it would be desirable to give a quotation from some old French author to verify this assertion. I have hunted in vain for the purpose. Again, is pie Old French for pied? This is not a usual change. The usual change would be pied into pie. The Latin might be De capite ad pedem.

Capfull of Wind. Olaus Magnus tells us that Eric, King of Sweden, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soever he turned his cap the wind would blow, and for this he was called Windy Cap. The Laplanders drove a profitable trade in selling winds; but, even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie, of Pomo'ns (Orkney Islands), helped out her living by selling favourable winds to mariners for the small sum of sixpence. (See Mont St. Michel.)

Cape. Spirit of the Cape. (See page 14, col. 1, Adamastor.)

Cape of Storms. (See Storms.)

Cape Court. A speculation in stocks of such magnitude as to affect the money market. Cape Court is the name of the place in London where transactions in stocks are carried on.

Caper. The weather is so foul not even a caper would venture out. A Manx proverb. A caper is a fisherman of Cape Clear in Ireland, who will venture out in almost any weather.

Caper Merchant. A dancing-master who cuts "capers." (See Cut Capers.)

Capet (Cap-pay). Hugues, the founder of the French monarchy, was surnamed Cap'etian (clothed with a capot or monk's hood), because he always wore a clerical costume as abbot of St. Martin de Tours. This was considered the family name of the kings of France; hence, Louis XVI. was arraigned before the National Convention under the name of Louis Capet.

Capital. Money or money's worth available for production.

"His capital is continually going from him [the merchant] in some shape, and returning to him in another."—Adam Smith: Wealth of Nations, vol. i. book ii. chap. i. p. 370.

Active capital. Ready money or property readily convertible into it.

Circulating capital. Wages, or raw material. This sort of capital is not available a second time for the same purpose.

Fixed capital. Land, buildings, and machinery, which are only gradually consumed.

Political capital is something employed to serve a political purpose. Thus, the Whigs make political capital out of the errors of the Tories, and vice versa.

"He tried to make capital out of his rival's discomfiture."—The Times.

Capitals. To speak in capitals. To emphasise certain words with great stress. Certain nouns spelt with a capital letter are meant to be emphatic and distinctive.

Capitale Cens. The lowest rank of Roman citizens; so called because they were counted simply by the poll, as they had no taxable property.

Capitulars. The laws of the first two dynasties of France were so called, because they were divided into chapters. (French, capitulaire.)

Capon. Called a fish out of the coop by those friars who wished to evade the Friday fast by eating chickens instead of fish. (See Yarmouth.)

Capon (A). A castrated cock.
- A Crail's capon. A dried haddock.
- A Severn capon. A sole.
- A Yarmouth capon. A red herring.

We also sometimes hear of a Glasgow capon, a salt herring.

Capon (A). A love-letter. In French, poulet means not only a chicken but also a love-letter, or a sheet of note-paper. Thus Henri IV., consulting with Sully about his marriage, says: "My niece of Guise would please me best, though report says maliciously that she loves poulets in paper better than in a fracase.

"Boyet...break up this capon [i.e. open this love-letter]."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, 1.1.

Capricorn. Called by Thomson, in his Winter, "the centaur archer." Anciently, the winter solstice occurred on the entry of the sun into Capricorn; but the stars, having advanced a whole sign to the east, the winter solstice now falls at the sun's entrance into Sagittarius (the centaur archer), so that the poet is strictly right, though we vulgarly retain the ancient classical manner of speaking. Capricornus is the tenth, or, strictly speaking, the eleventh sign of the zodiac. (Dec. 21-Jan. 20.)

"According to classic mythology, Capricorn was Pan, who, from fear of the great Typhon, changed himself into a goat, and was made by Jupiter one of the signs of the zodiac.

Captain. Capitano del Popolo, i.e. Garibaldi (1807-1882).
- The Great Captain (el gran capitano).
- Gonzalvo de Cordova (1453-1515.)
- Manuel Conme'inus of Treb'izond (1120, 1143-1180).

Captain Caul's Tail. The commander-in-chief of the mummers of Plough Monday.

Captain Copperthorne's Crew. All masters and no men.

Captain Podd. A showman. So called from "Captain" Podd, a famous puppet-showman in the time of Ben Jonson.

Captain Stiff. To come Captain Stiff over one. To treat one with cold formality.

"I shouldn't quite come Captain Stiff over him."—St. Thernod's Captains. (French, capitonne.)

"I know I love in vain, strive against hope; Yet in this captnus and interminable siege I still pour in the waters of my love."—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well, 1.3.

Capua. Cappa corrupted Hannibal. Luxury and self-indulgence will ruin anyone. Hannibal was everywhere victorious over the Romans till he took up his winter quarters at Capua, the most luxurious city of Italy. When he left Capua his star began to wane, and, ere long, Carthage was in ruins and himself an exile.

"Capua was the Canna of Hannibal. As the battle of Cannae was most disastrous to the Roman army, so was the luxury of Capua to Hannibal's army. We have a modern adaptation to this proverb: "Moscow was the Austerlitz of Napoleon;""

Capuchin. A friar of the order of St. Francis, of the new rule of 1528; so called from their "cap'uce" or pointed cowl.

Capulet. A noble house in Verona, the rival of that of Montague (3 syl.); Juliet is of the former, and Romeo of the latter. Lady Capulet is the heu-ideal of a proud Italian matron of the fifteenth century. The expression so familiar, "the tomb of all the Capulets," is from Burke. (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.)

Caput Mortuum. Latin for head of the dead, used by the old chemists to designate the residuum of chemicals, when all their volatile matters had escaped. Anything from which all that rendered it valuable has been taken away. Thus, a learned scholar paralysed is a mere caput mortuum of his former self. The French Directory, towards its close, was a mere caput mortuum of a governing body.

Caqueux. A sort of gipsy race in Brittany, similar to the Cagots of Gascony, and Colliberts of Poitou.

Carabas. He is a Marquis of Carabas. A fossil nobleman, of unbounded pretensions and vanity, who would fain restore the slavish foolery of the reign Caracalla of Louis XIV; one with Fortunata's purse, which was never empty. The character is taken from Perrault's tale of Puss in Boots.

"Prêtres que nous vengons Levez la dine et pargasse;"
Et toi, personne animal,
Porte encore le latz fœdul . . .
Chapéau bas ! Chapéau bas !
Garde au marquis de Carabas !"

Hévénaor, 1616.

Caracalla [long-sault]. Aurelius Antoninus was so called because he adopted the Gaulish caracalla in preference to the Roman toga. It was a large, close-fitting, hooded mantle, reaching to the heels, and slit up before and behind to the waist. Aurelius was himself born in Gaul, called Caracal in Osian. (See Curtmantle.)

Caracel (pron. Kar-yeh-che). Founder of the eclectic school in Italy. Luis and his two cousins Augustin and Annibale founded the school called Incarnamia's (progressive), which had for its chief principle the strict observance of nature. Luis (1554-1619), Augustin (1558-1601), Annibale (1560-1609).

The Caracci of France. Jean Jouvenet, who was paralysed on the right side, and painted with his left hand. (1647-1707.)

The Annibale Caracci of the Eclectic School. Bernardino Campi, the Italian, is so called by Lanzi (1522-1590).

Caraoke or Carack. A ship of great bulk, constructed to carry heavy freights. (Spanish, caraca.)

"The rich-laden carack bound to distant shores."
Pollock: Course of Time, book vii. line 90.

Carad'oe. A Knight of the Round Table, noted for being the husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear "the mantle of matrimonial fidelity." Also in history, the British chief whom the Romans called Caractacus.

Caraitos. A religious sect among the Jews, who rigidly adhered to the words and letters of Scripture, regardless of metaphor, etc. Of course, they rejected the rabbinical interpretations and the Cab'ala. The word is derived from Caraim, equivalent to scripturarii (textualists). Pronounce Carry-tev.

Caran D'Aché. The pseudonym of M. Emanuel Polié, the French caricaturist.

Carat of Gold. So called from the carat bean, or seed of the locust tree, formerly employed in weighing gold and silver. Hence the expressions "22 carats fine," "18 carats fine," etc., meaning that out of 24 parts, 22 or 18 are gold, and the rest alloy.

"Here's the note.
How much your chain weighs to the utmost care."
Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

Caraway. Latin, carum, from Caria in Asia Minor, whence the seeds were imported.

"Nay, you shall see my orchard, where in an arbour we will eat a last year's pippin of my own grafting, with a dish of caraways."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 3 (Justice Shallows to Falstaff).

Carbineer or Carabineer. Properly a skirmisher or light horseman, from the Arabic carbine. A carbine is the light musket used by cavalry soldiers.

"He . . . left the Rhinegrave, with his company of mounted carbineers, to guard the passes."—Bodley: Dutch Republic (vol. i. part i. ch. 111. p. 176).

Carbonada. A chopp; minced meat. Strictly speaking, a carbonado is a piece of meat cut crosswise for the gridiron. (Latin, carbo, a coal.)

"If he do come in my way, so; if he do not—if I come in his willingly, let him make a carbonado of me!"—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 2.

Carbonari means charcoal-burners, a name assumed by a secret political society in Italy (organised 1808-1814). Their place of muster they called a "hut, its inside, "the place for selling charcoal," and the outside, the "forest." Their political opponents they called "wolves." Their object was to convert the kingdom of Naples into a republic. In the singular number, Carbonaro. (See Charbonnerie.)

Carbuncle of Ward Hill (The). A mysterious carbuncle visible enough to those who stand at the foot of the hill in May, June or July; but never beheld by anyone who has succeeded in reaching the hill top.

"I have distinguished, among the dark rocks, that wonderful carbuncle, which gleams reddish,
as a furnace to them who view it from beneath;
but has ever become invisible to him whose daring foot has sealed the prey, and from which it darts

* * *

Dr. Wallace thinks it is water trickling from a rock, and reddened by the sun.

Carcanet. A small chain of jewels for the neck. (French, carcan, an iron collar.)

"Like captain jewels in a carcanet."
Shakespeare: Sonnets.

Carcase. The shell of a house before the floors are laid and walls plastered; the skeleton of a ship, a wreck, etc. The body of a dead animal, so called from the Latin cora-casea (lifeless flesh). (French, carcase.)

"The Goodwins I think they call the place; it very dangerous flat and fatal, where the carcasses of many a tall ship lie buried."—Shakespeare:
Merchant of Venice, iii. 1.

Carcasses. Shells with three fuseholes. They are projected from mortars (q.e.), howitzers (q.v.), and guns. They will burn furiously for eight or ten minutes, do not burst like shells, but the flames, rushing from the three holes, set on fire everything within their influence.

"Charlestown, ... having been fired by a carcass from Copp's Hill, sent up dense columns of smoke."—Leaving: United States.

Card.

That's the card. The right thing; the ticket. The reference is to tickets of admission, cards of the races, and programmes.

"As is about the card."—Mugwau: London Labour, etc.

A queer card. An eccentric person, "indifferent honest." A difficult lead in cards to play to.

A knowing card. A sharp fellow, next door to a sharper. The allusion is to card-sharpers and their tricks.

...Whose great aim it was to be considered a knowing card."—Dickens: Sketches, etc.

A great card. A big wig; the boss of the season; a person of note. A big card.

A leading card. A star actor. A person leads from his strongest suit.

A loose card. A worthless fellow who lives on the loose.

...A house card is a card of no value, and, consequently, the properest to throw away."—Hoyle: Games, etc.

A sure card. A person one can fully depend on; a person sure to command success. A project to be certainly depended on. As a winning card in one's hand.

He is the card of our house. The man of mark, the most distingué. Osric tells Hamlet that Laertes is "the card and calendar of gentry" (v. 2). The card is a card of a compass, containing all its points. Laertes is the card of gentry, in whom may be seen all its points. We also say "a queer card," meaning an odd fish.

That was my best trump card. My best chance. The allusion is to love, whist, and other games played with cards.

To play one's best card. To do that which one hopes is most likely to secure success.

To speak by the card. To speak by the book, be as precise as a map or book. A merchant's expression. The card is the document in writing containing the agreements made between a merchant and the captain of a vessel. Sometimes the owner binds himself, ship, tackle, and furniture for due performance, and the captain is bound to deliver the cargo committed to him in good condition. To speak by the card is to speak according to the indentures or written instructions. In some cases the reference is to the card of a mariner's compass.

"Law ... is the card to guide the world by."—Hooker: Ecc. Pol., part ii, sec. 2.

"We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us."—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, v. 1.

Cards.

It is said that there never was a good hand of cards containing four clubs. Such a hand is called "The Devil's Four-poster."

Lieuten, a German lunatic, bet that he would succeed in turning up a pack of cards in a certain order stated in a written agreement. He turned and turned the cards ten hours a day for twenty years; and repeated the operation 4,245,228 times, when at last he succeeded.

In Spain, spades used to be calledcolumbine; clubs, rabbits; diamonds, pinks; and hearts, roses. The present name for spades is espadas (swords); of clubs, bastos (cudgels); of diamonds, diamans (square pieces of money used for paying wages); of hearts, copas (chalices).

The French for spades is pique (pike-men or soldiers); for clubs, trèfle (clover, or husbandmen); of diamonds, carreaux (building tiles, or artisans); of hearts, charoe (choir-men, or ecclesiastics).

The English spades is the French form of a pike, and the Spanish name; the clubs is the French trefoil, and the Spanish name; the hearts is a corruption of charue into cour. (See Vierge.)

Court cards. So called because of their heraldic devices. The king of clubs originally represented the arms of the Pope; of spades, the King of France; of diamonds, the King of Spain; and of hearts, the King of England. The French kings in cards are called David (spades), Alexander (clubs), Cesar (diamonds), and Charles (hearts)—representing the Jewish, Greek, Roman, and Frankish empires. The queens or dames are Argine—i.e. Juno (hearts), Judith (clubs), Rachel (diamonds), and Pallas (spades)—representing royalty, fortitude, piety, and wisdom. They were likenesses of Marie d'Anjou, the queen of Charles VII.; Isabeau, the queen-mother; Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress; and Joan d'Arc, the dame of spades, or war.

He felt that he held the cards in his own hands. That he had the whip-end of the stick; that he had the upper hand, and could do as he liked. The allusion is to games played with cards, such as whist. He played his cards well. He acted judiciously and skilfully, like a whist-player who plays his hand with judgment. To play one's cards badly is to manage a project unskilfully.

The cards are in my hands. I hold the disposal of events which will secure success. The allusion is obvious.

"The Viteill house at Arezzo; the Orsini irri tating the French; the war of Naples imminent; -the cards are in my hands."—Cesare Borgia, XAI.

On the cards. Likely to happen, projected, and talked about as likely to occur. On the programme or card of the races; on the "agenda."

To count on one's cards. To anticipate success under the circumstances. The allusion is to holding in one's hand cards likely to win.

To go in with good cards. To have good patronage; to have excellent grounds for expecting success.

To throw up the cards. To give up as a bad job; to acknowledge you have no hope of success. In some games of cards, as loo, a player has the liberty of saying whether he will play or not, and if one's hand is hopelessly bad he throws up his cards and sits out till the next deal.

Cardinal Numbers. Such numbers as 1, 2, 3, etc. 1st, 2nd, 3rd, etc., are ordinal numbers.

Cardinal Points of the Compass. Due north, west, east, and south. So called because they are the points on which the intermediate ones, such as N.E., N.W., N.N.E., etc., hinge or hang. (Latin, cardo, a hinge.)

Cardinal Signs [of the Zodiac]. The two equinoctial and the two solstitial signs, Aries and Libra, Cancer and Capricornus.

Cardinal Virtues. Justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, on which all other virtues hang or depend.

Cardinal Winds. Those that blow due East, West, North, and South.

Cardinals. Hinges. (Latin, cardo.) The election of the Pope "hinges" on the voice of the sacred college, and on the Pope the doctrines of the Church depend; so that the cardinals are in fact the hinges on which the Christian Church turns. There may be six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons, who constitute the Pope's council, and who elect the Pope when a vacancy occurs.

Cardinal's Red Hat. Some assert that Innocent IV. made the cardinals wear a red hat "in token of their being ready to lay down their life for the gospel."

Carduel or Kartel. Cardiale. The place where Merlin prepared the Round Table.

Care-cloth (The). The fine linen cloth laid over the newly-married in the Catholic Church. (Anglo-Saxon, ear, large, as ear weald (a big wound), ear soth (a great sorrow), etc.)

Care killed the Cat. It is said that "a cat has nine lives," yet care would wear them all out.

Care Sunday (the fifth Sunday in Lent). Professor Skeat tells us (Notes and Queries, Oct. 28th, 1893), that "care" means trouble, suffering; and that Care-Sunday means Passion-Sunday. In Old High German we have Kar-wochen and Kar-friday. The Latin cura sometimes meant "sorrow, grief, trouble," as "Curam et angorem ammi Carême (2 syl.). Lent; a corruption of quadragesima.

Car-goose (a) or Gargoose. The crested diver, belonging to the genus Colymbus. (Anglo-Saxon, gar and ges.)

Caricatures mean "sketches over-drawn." (Italian, caricati're, from caricare, to load or burden.)

Carillon, in France, are chimes or tunes played on bells; but in England the suites of bells that play the tunes. Our word carol approaches the French meaning nearer than our own. The best chimes in the world are those in Les Halles, at Bruges.

Carina. Women hired by the Romans to weep at funerals; so called from Caria, whence most of them came.

Carle or Carling Sunday [Palm Sunday]. The octave preceding Palm Sunday; so called because the special food of the day was carling—i.e. peas fried in butter. The custom is a continuation of the pagan bean-feast. The fifth Sunday in Lent.

Carlovingian Dynasty. So called from Carolus or Charles Martel,
Carluévica. A Panama hat, made of the Carluévica palmate; so called in compliment to Carlos IV. of Spain, whose second name was Ludovic.

Carmaniole. (3 syl.). A red Republican song and dance in the first French revolution; so called from Carnag'nole, in Piedmont, the great nest of the Savoyards, noted for street music and dancing. The refrain of "Madame Veto," the Carnag'nole song, is "Dansons la Carnag'nole--rions le son du canon!" The word was subsequently applied to other revolutionary songs, such as Ca ira, the Marseillaise, the Chant du Depart. Besides the songs, the word is applied to the dress worn by the Jacobins, consisting of a blouse, red cap, and tri-coloured girdle; to the wearer of this dress or any violent revolutionist; to the speeches in favour of the execution of Louis XVI., called by M. Barrière des Carnag'noles; and, lastly, to the dance performed by the mob round the guillotine, or down the streets of Paris.

Carmelites. (3 syl.). An order of mendicant friars of Mount Carmel, the monastery of which is named Elias, from Elijah the prophet, who on Mount Carmel told Ahab that rain was at hand. Also called White Friars, from their white cloaks.

Carmihan. The phantom ship on which the Kobold of the Baltic sits when he appears to doomed vessels.

Carminative. A charm medicine. Magic and charms were at one time the chief "medicines," and the fact is perpetuated by the word carminative, among others. Carminatives are given to relieve flatulence. (Latin, carmin, a charm.)

Carmine. (2 syl). The dye made from the carmine or kermes insect, whence also crimson, through the Italian cremisiino.

Carnation. "Flesh-colour." (Latin, caro; genitive, carnio, flesh.)

Carney. To whoole, to keep cur-essing.

Carnival. The season immediately preceding Lent; shrove-tide. Duengge gives the word carne-iva. (Modern Italian, carnevale; Spanish and French, carnaval.)

Carpet. The magic carpet of Tangu. A carpet to all appearances worthless, but if anyone sat thereon, it would transport him instantaneously to the place he wished to go. So called because it came from Tangu, in Persia. It is sometimes termed Prince Houassin's carpet, because it came...
Carpet-bag into his hands, and he made use of it. (Arabian Nights: Prince Ahmed.) (See below.)

Solomon's carpet. The Eastern writers say that Solomon had a green silk carpet, on which his throne was placed when he travelled. This carpet was large enough for all his forces to stand upon; the men and women stood on his right hand, and the spirits on his left. When all were arranged in order, Solomon told the wind where he wished to go, and the carpet, with all its contents, rose in the air and alighted at the place indicated. In order to screen the party from the sun, the birds of the air with outspread wings formed a canopy over the whole party. (Sale: Koran.) (See above.)

Such and such a question is on the carpet. The French sur le tapis (on the table-cloth) — i.e. before the house, under consideration. The question has been laid on the table-cloth of the house, and is now under debate.

Carpet-bag Adventurer (A). A passing adventurer, who happens to be on the road with his travelling or carpet-bag.

Carpet-bag Government. The government of more adventurers. In America, a state in the South reorganised by "carpet-baggers," i.e. Northern political adventurers, who sought a career in the Southern States after the Civil War of 1865. [It may be noted that in America members of Congress and the State legislatures almost invariably reside in the district which they represent.]

Carpet Knight. One dubbed at Court by favour, not having won his sword by military service in the field. Mayors, lawyers, and other civilians knighted as they knelt on a carpet before their sovereign. "Knights of the Carpet," "Knights of the Green Cloth," "Knights of Carpeyry."

"The subordinate commands fell to young patricians, carpet-knights, who went on campaign with their families and slaves." — Frøde: Caesar, chap. 10, p. 81.

Carpeor'tians. Gnostics; so called from Carpeortés, who flourished in the middle of the second century. They maintained that the world was made by angels—that only the soul of Christ ascended into heaven,—and that the body will have no resurrection.

Carriage Company. Persons who keep their private carriage.

"Seeing a great deal of carriage company." — Thackeray.

Carriages. Things carried, luggage.

"And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem." — Acts xxvi. 12.

Car'sonades (3 syl.). Short, light iron guns. As they have no trunnions they differ in this respect from guns and howitzers (q.v.). They were invented in 1779 by Mr. Gascoigne, director of the Carron foundry, in Scotland, whence the name. Carronades are fastened to their carriages by a loop underneath, and are chiefly used in the arming of ships, to enable them to throw heavy shot at close quarters, without overloading the decks with heavy guns. On shore they are used as howitzers.

Carry Arms! Hold your gun in the right hand, the barrel nearly perpendicular, and resting against the hollow of the shoulder, the thumb and forefinger embracing the guard. (A military command.) (See Carry Swords.)

Carry Coals. (See Coals.)

Carry Everything before One (To). To be beyond competition; to carry off all the prizes. A military phrase. Similarly, a high wind carries everything before it.

Carry Fire in one Hand and Water in the other (To). To say one thing and mean another; to flatter, to deceive; to lull suspicion in order the better to work mischief.

Carry One's Point (To). To succeed in one's aim. Candidates in Rome were balloted for, and the votes were marked on a tablet by points. Hence, unum punctum ferre meant "to be carried num. cons.," or to gain every vote; and "to carry one's point" is to carry off the points at which one aimed.

Carry Out (To) or Carry through. To continue a project to its completion.

Carry out one's Bat (To). A cricketer is said to carry out his bat when he is not "out" at the close of the game.

Carry Swords! Hold the drawn sword vertically, the blade against the shoulder. (A military command.) (See above, Carry Arms.)

Carry the Day (To). To win the contest; to carry off the honours of the day. In Latin, victoriam reportare.
Carthaginian Faith. Treachery.
(See Punica Fides.)

Carthusians. Founded, in 1086, by St. Bruno, of Cologne, who, with six companions, retired to the solitude of La Chartreuse, near Grenoble, in Vienne.

Cartoons. Designs drawn on cartouche (pasteboard), like those of Raffaello, formerly at Hampton Court, but now at Kensington Museum. They were bought by Charles I., and are seven in number: "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes," "Feed my Lambs," "The Beautiful Gate of the Temple," "Death of Ananias," "El'ymas the Sorcerer," "Paul at Lystra," and "Paul on the Mars Hill."

"They were designs for tapestries to be worked in Flanders."—Julia H. De Forest: Short History of Art, p. 246.

Cart'ridge Paper was originally manufactured for soldiers' cartridges. The word is a corruption of cartouche, from carto (paper).

Caryatid or Caryatid. Figures of women in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Caryatids, in Arcadia, sided with the Persians in the battle of Thermopylae; in consequence of which the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxitèles, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of these women, instead of columns. (See page 72, col. 2, ATLANTES; page 208, col. 2, CARNAPHERE.)

Caryatidic Order or Caryatidic Order. Architecture in which Caryatids are introduced to support the entablature.

Casabianca was the name of the captain of the French man-of-war, L'Orient. At the battle of Aboukir, having first secured the safety of his crew, he blew up his ship, to prevent it falling into the hands of the English. His little son, refusing to leave him, perished with his father. Mrs. Hemans has made a ballad, Casabianca, on this subject, modifying the incident. The French poets Lebrun and Chénier have also celebrated the occurrence.

Casca. A blunt-witted Roman, one of the conspirators against Julius Cæsar. (Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar.)

Case (To). To skin an animal. In the Cookery by Mrs. Glasse is the direction, "Take your hare when it is cased, ... and make a pudding ..." The witticism, "First catch your hare," may possibly have been suggested by this.
direction, but it is not in the Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy.

Case-hardened. Impenetrable to all sense of honour or shame. The allusion is to iron toughened by carbonising the surface in contact with charcoal in a case or closed box. It is done by heat.

Cashier (2 syl.). To dismiss an officer from the army, to discard from society. (French, casser, to break; Italian, casare, to blot out; Ger. kanüren.)

"The ruling rhyme, who needs to be cashiered, Construes, as he is listed, to be feared." Swift: Epistle to Mr. Gay, line 137.

Cassino. Originally, a little cave or room near a theatre, where persons might retire, after the play was over, for dancing or music.

Casket Homer. Alexander the Great's edition, with Aristotle's corrections. After the battle of Arbela a golden casket, studded with jewels, was found in the tent of Darius. Alexander, being asked to what purpose it should be applied, made answer, "There is but one production in the world worthy of so costly a depository," and placed therein his edition of Homer, which received from this circumstance the term of Casket Homer.

Caspar. A huntsman who sold himself to Zamiel, the Black Huntsman. The night before the expiration of his lease of life he bargained for three years' respite on condition of bringing Max into the power of the evil one. Zamiel replied, "To-morrow either he or you." On the day appointed for the trial-shot, Caspar places himself in a tree. Max is told by the prince to aim at a dove. The dove flies to the tree where Caspar is concealed. Max shoots at the dove, but kills Caspar, and Zamiel comes to carry off his victim. (Weber's Opera of Der Freischutz.)

Cassandra. Daughter of Priam, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whom she had offended, brought it to pass that no one believed her predictions. (Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida.)

"Those who foresee and predict the downfall, meet with the fate of Cassandra." The Times.

Cassation. The court of cassation, in France, is the court which can reverse (or quash) the judgment of other courts.

Case. Inhabitants of what is now Cassio hundred, Hertfordshire, referred to by Cassar in his Commentaries.

Cassivelain. Great-uncle to Cymbeline. He granted Caesar a yearly tribute of £3,000. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Cassio (in Shakespeare's Othello). Michael Cassio was a Florentine, and Othello's lieutenant. Iago made him drunk, and then set on Roderic to quarrel with him. Cassio wounded Roderic, and a brawl ensued, which offended Othello. Othello suspended Cassio, but Iago induced Desdemona to plead for his restoration. This interest in Cassio, being regarded by the Moor as a confirmation of Desdemona's illicit love, hinted at broadly by Iago, provoked the jealousy of Othello. After the death of the Moor, Cassio was appointed governor of Cyprus.

Cassiopeia [the lady in the chair]. The chief stars of this constellation form the outline of a chair. The lady referred to is the wife of Cepheus (2 syl.), King of Ethiopia. She boasted that the beauty of her daughter Andromeda surpassed that of the sea-nymphs. The sea-nymphs complained to the sea god of this affront, and Andromeda, to appease their wrath, was chained to a rock to be devoured by sea-monsters. Perseus (2 syl.) delivered her, and made her his wife. The vain mother was taken to heaven out of the way, and placed among the stars.

"That starred Ethiopian queen that strove To set her beauty's praise above The sea-nymphs and their powers off'ro..." Milton: II Penitencia.

N.B.—"Her beauty's praise" means that of her beautiful daughter. Andromeda was her mother's "beauty."

Cassiterides (5 syl.). The tin islands, generally supposed to be the Scilly Islands and Cornwall; but probably the isles in Vigo Bay are meant. It is said that the Veneti procured tin from Cornwall, and carried it to the Isles of Vigo Bay, but kept as a profound secret the place from which they obtained it. The Phoenicians were the chief customers of the Veneti.

Cast About (To). To deliberate, to consider, as, "I am casting about me how I am to meet the expenses." A sporting phrase. Dogs, when they have lost scent, "cast for it," i.e. spread out and search in different directions to recover it.

Cast Accounts (To). To balance or keep accounts. To cast up a line of figures is to add them together and set down the sum they produce. To cast or throw the value of one figure into another till the whole number is totalled.
Cast Anchor (Thb). To throw out the anchor in order to bring the vessel to a standstill. (Latin, anchoram jactare.)

Cast Aside (Thb). To reject as worthless.

Cast Down. Dejected. (Latin, dejectus.)

Cast a Sheep's Eye at One (Thb). To look askance or sideways at one; to look wantonly at one.

Cast beyond the Moon. To form wild conjectures. One of Heywood's proverbs. At one time the moon was supposed to influence the weather, to affect the ingathering of fruits, to rule the time of sowing, reaping, and slaughtering cattle, etc.

"I take of things impossible, and cast beyond the moon."—Ascham.

Cast in One's Lot (Thb). To share the good or bad fortune of another.

Cast into One's Teeth (Thb). To throw a reproach at one. The allusion is to knocking one's teeth out by stones.

"All my faults observe, set in a note book, learned and com'd by rote, to cast into my teeth."—Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar.

Cast of the Eye (A). A squint. One meaning of the word cast is to twist or warp. Thus, a fabric is said to "cast" when it warps; and seamen speak of "casting," or turning the head of a ship on the tack it is to sail. We also speak of a "casting" or turning vote.

"My goodes have eene caste [twisted] on one side."—Ascham: Toxophilus.

Cast Pearls before Swine (Thb). If pearls are cast to swine, the swine would only trample them under foot.

Casting Vote. The vote of the presiding officer when the votes of the assembly are equal. This final vote casts, turns, or determines the question.

Castagnette (Captain). A hero noted for having his stomach replaced by Dagenettes by a leather one. His career is ended by a bomb, which blows him into fragments. An extravaganza from the French of Manuel.

Cast'aly. A fountain of Parnassus sacred to the Muses. Its waters had the power of inspiring with the gift of poetry those who drank of them.

"The drooping Muses [Sir Industry]

Brought to another Cast'aly,

Where Isis many a famous nursing breed'd,

Or where old Cam soft joces over the les

In peevish mood."

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, II. 51.

"Isis" means the University of Oxford, and "Cam" the University of Cambridge, so called from the respective rivers on which they stand.

Castle (1 syll.), race. The Portuguese casta. In Sanskrit the word used for the same purpose is varna (colour). The four Hindu castes are Brahmins (the sacred order), Shatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaisy'a (husbandmen and merchants), Sudra (agricultural labourers and mechanics). The first issued from the mouth of Brahma, the second from his arms, the third from his thighs, and the fourth from his feet. Below these come thirty-six inferior classes, to whom the Vedas are sealed, and who are held cursed in this world and without hope in the next. The Jews seem to have entertained the same notion respecting the common people, and hence the Sanhedrins say to the officers, "This people, who know not the law, are cursed." (John vii. 49.)

To lose caste. To lose position in society. To get degraded from one caste to an inferior one.

Castle Builder (A). One who entertains sanguine hopes. One who builds air-castles which have no existence except in a dreamy imagination. (See below.)

Castle in the Air. A splendid edifice, but one which has no existence. In fairy tales we often have these castles built at a word, and vanishing as soon, like that built for Aladdin by the Genius of the Lamp. These air-castles are called by the French Châteaux d'Espagne, because Spain has no châteaux. We also find the expression Châteaux en Asie for a similar reason. (See Châteaux.)

Castle of Bungay (A). "Were I in my castle of Bungay

Upon the river of Waveney,

I would be safe for the King of Crockery." Attributed to Lord Bigod of Bungay. The lines are in Camden's Britannia (edit. 1607). The events referred to in the ballad belong to the reign of Stephen or Henry II. (See Bar-sur-Aube, page 100, col. 1.)

Castle of Indolence. In the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner of the castle was an enchanter, who deprived all who entered his domains of their energy and free-will. (Thomson: Castle of Indolence.)

Castle Terabul (or "Terrible") in Arthurian legends stood in Launceston. It had a steep keep environed with a triple wall. Sometimes called Dunheved Castle. It was within ten miles of Tintagel.

Castor. A hat. Castor is the Latin for a beaver, and beaver means a hat made of the beaver's skin.

"Tom Trot Took his new castor from his head."

Cas'ter and Po'llux. What we call comazans. Electric flames, sometimes seen in stormy weather playing about the masts of ships. If only one flame showed itself, the Romans called it Helen, and said that it portended that the worst of the storm was yet to come; but two or more luminous flames they called Castor and Pollux, and said that they boded the termination of the storm.

But when the wind of Ledda blew
Their fire-jumps on our vessel's head,
The storm-winds cease, the troubled spray
Falls from the rocks, clouds flee away,
And on the bound of the deep
In peace the angry billows sleep.

(Castor and Pollux, cited by Horace: Odes xii. 27-32.)

Castor's Horse. Cyllaros, Virgil ascribes him to Pollux. (Geor., iii.)

(Castor's Horse.)

Cau's (3 syl.) One who resolves rams conscientia (cases of conscience).

Casus Belli (Latin). A ground for war; an occurrence warranting international hostilities.

Cat. Called a "familiar," from the mediæval superstition that Satan's favourite form was a black cat. Hence "witches" were said to have a cat as their familiar.

Cat. A symbol of liberty. The Roman goddess of Liberty was represented as holding a cup in one hand, a broken sceptre in the other, and with a cat lying at her feet. No animal is so great an enemy to all constraint as a cat.

Cat. Held in veneration by the Egyptians under the name of Zeharis. This deity is represented with a human body and a cat's head. Diodorus tells us that whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was by the Egyptians punished by death. According to Egyptian tradition, Diana assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the giants.

The London Review says the Egyptians worshipped the cat as a symbol of the moon, not only because it is more active after sunset, but from the dilation and contraction of its pupil, symbolical of the waxing and waning of the night-goddess.

(Hung me in a bottle like a cat. (Much Ado about Nothing, i. 1.) In olden times a cat was for sport enclosed in a bag or leather bottle, and hung to the branch of a tree, as a mark for bowmen to shoot at. Steevens tells us of another sport: "A cat was placed in a soot bag, and hung on a line; the players had to beat out the bottom of the bag without getting bemuddled, and he who succeeded in so doing was allowed to hunt the cat afterwards.

Some... are mad if they behold a cat. (Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.) Henri III. of France swooned if he caught sight of a cat, and Napoleon I. showed a morbid horror of the same; so did one of the Ferdinands, Emperor of Germany. (See Antipathy, page 53; Pig.)

Cat-call. A kind of whistle used at theatres by the audience to express displeasure or impatience. A hideous noise like the call or wail of a cat.

"I was very much surprised with the great resort of cat-calls... to see so many persons of quality of both sexes assembled together in a kind of cat-calling." — Addison, Spectator, No. 311.

Cat-eyed. Able to see in the dark. Cat's eye is an opalescent mineral gum.

Cat Jumps (The). See how the cat jumps, "which way the wind blows": which of two alternatives is likely to be the successful one before you give any opinion of its merit or adhesion to it, either moral or otherwise. The allusion is to the game called tip-cat. Before you strike, you must observe which way the "cat" has jumped up.

? We are told that our forefathers had a cruel sport, which consisted in placing a cat in a tree as a mark to shoot at. A wily sportsman would, of course, wait to see which way it jumped before he shot at her. This sport of sport was very like that of hangong two cats by their tails over a rope. (See page 221, Kilkeney Cat.)

"He soon saw which way the cat did jump,
And his company he offered jump."

The Dog's new Man (See Universal Souvenir, 1925.)

Cat Stane. Battle stone. A monolith in Scotland (sometimes wrongly called a Druidical stone). The Norwegian term, batua stein, means the same thing. (Celtic, catch, battle.)

Cat and Dog. To live a cat and dog life. To be always quarrelling and quarrelling, as a cat and dog, whose aversion to each other is intense.

"There will be jealousy, and a cat-and-dog life over yonder worse than ever." — Carlyle: Frederick the Great (vol. ii. book iv. p. 346.)

It is raining cats and dogs. Very heavily. We sometimes say, "It is Cat and Fiddle, a public-house sign, is a corruption of Caton le fiddle, meaning Caton, Governor of Calais.

Cat and Kittens. A public-house sign, alluding to the pewter-pots so called. Stealing these pots is termed "Cat and kitten sneaking." We still call a large kettle a kitchen, and speak of a soldier's kit. (Saxon, oytel, a pot, pan, or vessel generally.)

Cat and Tortoise, or Roar and Sow. Names given to the testudo.

Cat has nine Lives (A). (See under Nine.)

Cat i' the Adage (The). The adage referred to is, the cat loves fish, but does not like to wet her paws.

"Letting 't dare not 'wait upon 't would,'
Like the poor cat i' the adage.
Shakespeare: Macbeth, i. 7.

Cat may look at a King (A). An insolent remark of insubordination, meaning, "I am as good as you"; or "Are you too mighty to be spoken to or looked at?"
"You may wear stars and ribbons, and I may be dressed in huddled grey, but a man's a man for a that."

Cat-o'-nine-tails. A whip, first with three, then with six, and lastly with nine lashes, used for punishing offenders, and briefly called a cat. Lilburn was scourged, in 1637, with a whip having only three lashes, but there were twenty knots in each tail, and, as he received a lash every three paces between the fleet and Old Palace yard, Cook says that 60,000 stripes were inflicted. Titus Oates was scourged, in the reign of James II., with a cat having six lashes, and, between Newgate and Tyburn, received as many as 17,000 lashes. The cat-o'-nine-tails once used in the British army and navy is no longer employed there, but garotters and some other offenders are still scourged. Probably the punishment was first used on board ship, where ropes would be handy, and several ropes are called cats, as "cat-harpings," for bracing the shrouds; "cat-falls," which pass over the cat-head and communicate with the cat-block, etc. The French martinet (g.v.) had twelve leather thongs.

Cat Proverbs.

A cat has nine lives. A cat is more tenacious of life than other animals, because it generally lights upon its feet without injury, the foot and toes being padded so as to break the fall. (See Nine.)

"Tyb. What wouldst thou have with me?
Mar. Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives." Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 1.

All cats love fish. (See previous column, Cat i' the Adage.)

Before the cat can lick her ear—i.e., before the Greek kalends. Never. No cat can lick her ear. (See Never.)

Care killed the cat. (See page 216, 2, Care.)

In the dark all cats are gray. All persons are undistinguished till they have made a name.

Not room to swing a cat. Swinging cats as a mark for sportsmen was at one time a favourite amusement. There were several varieties of this diversion. Sometimes two cats were swung by their tails over a rope. Sometimes a cat was swung to the bough of a tree in a bag or sack. Sometimes it was enclosed in a leather bottle.

Sick as a cat. Cats are very subject to vomiting. Hence the vomit of a drunkard is called "a cat," and the act of discarding it is called "shooting the cat."

Let the cat out of the bag. To disclose a secret. It was formerly a trick among country folk to substitute a cat for a sucking-pig, and bring it in a bag to market. If any greenhorn chose to buy a "pig in a poke" without examination, all very well; but if he opened the sack, "he let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed.

"She let the cat out of her bag of verse,
She almost proposed to her hero in rhyme."—George Meredith: The Euphonia, iii.

To bell the cat. (See page 119, Bell.)
To turn cat-in-pun. To turn traitor, to be a turncoat. The phrase seems to be the French tournier rôle en, prime (to turn sides in trouble). I do not think it refers to turning pancakes.

"When George in pudding-time came over
And moderate men looked big, sir,
I turned a cat-in-pun other time,
And so became a Whig, sir."

Vicer of Brag.

"Bacon says, "There is a cunning which we in England call the turning of the cat in the pun; which is, when that which a man says to another, he says it as if another had said it to him."

Touch not a cat but a glove. Here "but" is used in its original meaning of "beaut," i.e., without. (For another example of "but" meaning without, see Amos iii. 7.) The words are the motto of Mackintosh, whose crest is "cat-a-mountain salient guardian proper"; supporters, two cats proper. The whole is a pun on the word Catti, the Teutonic settlers of Catiaeness, i.e. Catti-ness, and mean, "Touch not the clan Cattan or Mountain Cat without a gleave." The same words are the adopted motto of Grant of Ballindalloch, and are explained by the second motto, ensé et

In French: On ne prend pas vol chat sans monnaies.

What can you have of a cat but her skin? The thing is useless for any purpose but one. In former times the cat's fur was used for trimming cloaks and coats, but the flesh is utterly useless.

Who ate the cat? A gentleman who had his larder frequently assailed by barges, had a cat cooked and placed there as a decoy. It was taken like the other foods, and became a standing jest against these larder pilferers.

A Cheshire cat. He grows like a Cheshire cat. Cheese was formerly sold in Cheshire moulded like a cat. The allusion is to the grinning cheese-cat, but is applied to persons who show their teeth and gums when they laugh. (See Alice in Wonderland.)

A Kilkenny cat. The story is that, during the rebellion of Ireland, Kilkenny was garrisoned by a troop of Hessian soldiers, who amused themselves in barracks by tying two cats together by their tails and throwing them across a clothes-line to fight. The officers, hearing of this, resolved to put a stop to the practice. The look-out man, enjoying the sport, did not observe the officer on duty approaching the barracks; but one of the troopers, more quick-sighted, seizing a sword, cut the two tails, and the cats made their escape. When the officer inquired the meaning of the two bleeding tails, he was coolly told that two cats had been fighting and had devoured each other all but the tails.

Whatever the true story, it is certain that the municipalities of Kilkenny and Iriatown contended so stoutly about their respective boundaries and rights to the end of the seventeenth century, that they mutually impoverished each other, leaving little else than "two tails" behind.

Whittington's cat. A cat is a ship formed on the Norwegian model, having a narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist. It is strongly built, and used in the coal trade. Harrison speaks of it as a "cat" or "catch." According to tradition, Sir Richard Whittington made his money by trading in coals, which he conveyed in his "cat" from Newcastle to London. The black faces of his coal-heavers gave rise to the tale about the Moors. In confirmation of this suggestion, it may be added that Whittington was Lord Mayor in 1397, and coal was first made an article of trade from Newcastle to London in 1381.

Cat's Cradle. A child's play, with a piece of twine. Corrupt for cratch-cradle or manger cradle, in which the infant Saviour was laid. Cratch is the French creche (a rack or manger), and to the present hour the racks which stand in fields for cattle to eat from are called cratchers.

Cat's Foot. To live under the cat's foot. To be under petitient government; to be hempecked. A mouse under the paw of a cat lives but by sufferance and at the cat's pleasure.

Cat's Melody (The). Squalling. "The children were playing the cat's melody to keep their mother in countenance."—W. B. Yates, Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 236.

Cat's Paw. To be made a cat's paw of, i.e. the tool of another, the medium of doing another's dirty work. The allusion is to the fable of the monkey who wanted to get from the fire some roasted chestnuts, and took the paw of the cat to get them from the hot ashes. "I had no intention of becoming a cat's paw to draw European chestnuts out of the fire."—Conn. Rodgers.

At sea, light air during a calm causing a ripple on the water, and indicating a storm, is called by sailors a cat's purr, and seamen affirm that the frolics of a cat indicate a gale. These are relics of a superstition that cats are witches or demons in disguise.

Cat's Sleep. A sham sleep, like that of a cat watching a mouse.

Cats.
Mistress Tofts, the singer, left legacies at death to twenty cats.

"Not Noble mourned more for fourteen brats,
Nor Mistress Tofts, to leave her twenty cats.
Peter Farndar: Old Bishop.

Catacomb. A subterranean place for the burial of the dead. The Persians have a city they call Cumb or Comn, full of mausoleums and the sepultures of the Persian saints. (Greek, kata-kumbá, a hollow place underground.) (See Koom.)

"The most awful idea connected with the catacombs is their interminable extent, and the possibility of going astray in the labyrinth of darkness."—Hawthorne: Marble Faun, ill.
Cataian (3 syl.). A native of Cathay or China; outlandish, a foreigner generally, a liar.

"I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Catalogue Raisonné (French). A catalogue of books arranged under subjects.

Catamaran. A scraggy old woman, a vixen; so called by a play on the first syllable. It properly means a raft consisting of three sticks, lashed together with ropes: used on the coasts of Coromandel and Madras.

"No, you old catamaran, though you pretend you never read novels. . . ."—Thackeray: Love the llidown, chap. 1.

Cataphygians. Christian heretics, who arose in the second century; so called because the first lived in Phrygia. They followed the errors of Montanus.

Catarrh. A cold in the head. The word means a down-running; from the Greek katarrheo (to flow down).

Catastrophe (4 syl.). A turning upside down. The termination of a drama is always a "turning upside down" of the beginning of the plot. (Greek, kata-strepho.)

Catch. To lie upon the catch. To lie in wait.

"Quid me captas?"

"They sent certain of the Pharisees . . . to catch Him in His words."—Mark xii. Here the Greek word is apostheo, to take by hunting. They were to lie upon the catch till they found occasion against Him.

You'll catch it. You'll get severely punished. Here "it" stands for the indefinite punishment, such as a whipping, a scolding, or other unpleasant consequence.

Catch a Crab (7d). In rowing, is to be struck with the handle of one's oar; to fall backwards. This occurs when the rower leaves his oar too long in the water before repeating the stroke. In Italian granchio is a crab, and pagliar ut granchio is to "catch a crab," or a Tartar.

Catch a Tartar. The biter bit. Grose says an Irish soldier in the Imperial service, in a battle against the Turks, shouted to his comrades that he had caught a Tartar. "Bring him along, then," said his mate. "But he won't come," cried Paddy. "Then come along yourself," said his comrade. "Arrah!"

replied Paddy, "I wish I could, but he won't let me."

"We are like the man who boasted of having caught a Tartar, when the fact was that the Tartar had caught him."—Cautions for the Times.

Catch as Catch can. Get by hook or crook all you can.

"All must catch that catch can."—Johnson: Rambler, No. 47.

Catch Me at It! Most certainly I shall never do what you say.

"Catch me going to London!" exclaimed Vixen."—Miss Braddon: Vixen.

Catch the Speaker's Eye (7d). To find the eye of the Speaker fixed on you; to be observed by the Speaker. In the House of Commons the member on whom the eye of the Speaker is fixed has the privilege of addressing the House.

"He succeeded in catching the Speaker's eye."—A. Trollope.

Catch Out (7d). In cricket, is to catch the ball of a batsman, whereby the striker is ruled out, that is, must relinquish his bat.

Catch your Hare (First). It is generally believed that "Mrs. Glasse," in her Cookery Book, gave this direction; but the exact words are, "Take your hare when it is cased, and make a pudding, . . . etc." To "case" means to take off the skin. Thus, in All's Well that Ends Well, iii. 6, we have these words, "We'll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him." Scatch also means to skin, and this word gave rise to the misquoted catch. Though catch and case both mean to skin, yet the word used in the book referred to case, not scatch. Mrs. Glasse was the pen-name of Dr. John Hill (1716-1775), author of The Cookery Book. (See CASE.)

Bracton, however (book iv. tit. i. chap. xxi. sec. 4), has these words: "Vulgariter dicitur, quod primo oporiter eriurum capere, et postea (cum captus fuerit) illum excriari."

The Welsh word cach = ordure, dung, and to cach (cach) would be to clean and gut the hare.

Catch-Club. A member of the Catch-club. A hum-bailliff, a tipstaff, a constable. The pun is obvious.

Catchpenny. A worthless article puffed off to catch the pennies of those who are foolish enough to buy them.

Catchpole. A constable; a law officer whose business it was to apprehend criminals. Pole or poll means head, person; and the word means one who catches persons by the poll or neck. This was done by means of an instrument something like a shepherd’s crook.

"Cacchepoles, from catch and pole, because these officers lay hold of a man’s neck."—Wiclif: New Testament (Acts xvi., Glossary).

Catch Weights, in racing, means without restrictions as to weight.

Catch-word. A popular cry, a word or a phrase adopted by any party for political or other purposes. "Three acres and a cow," "A living wage," are examples.

Catch-word. The first word on any page of a book or manuscript which is printed or written at the foot of the preceding page. In the early days of printing the catch-word was generally used, but for the last two hundred years the practice has been gradually dying out. Its purpose was, among other things, to enable the reader to avoid an awkward pause when turning over a leaf. The first book so printed was a Tacitus, by John de Spira, 1469.

Catch-word. In theatrical parlance, is the last word or so of the previous speaker, which is the cue of the person who follows.

Catechumen [kat’y-kw’men]. One taught by word of mouth (Greek, kate-chou’menos). Those about to be baptised in the early Church were first taught by word of mouth, and then catechised on their religious faith and duties.

Cater-cousin. An intimate friend; a remote kinsman. (French, quatre-cousin, a fourth cousin).

"His master and he, saying your worship’s reverence, are scarce cater-cousins."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

Caterpillars. Soldiers. In 1745 a soldier, quartered at Derby, was desired by the landlord to call on him whenever he passed that way, for, added Boniface, "I consider soldiers the pillars of the state." When the rebellion was put down, it so happened that the same regiment was quartered in Derby, and the soldier called on his old host, but was very coldly and somewhat uncivilly received. The soldier reminded Boniface of what he said at parting—"I consider soldiers the pillars of the state."

"Did I say so?" said mine host, "Well, I meant cater-pillars."

Caterwauling. The wawl or wrail of cats; the _er_ being either a plural, similar to "childer" (_children_), or a corrupted genitive.

"What a caterwauling do you keep here!"—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 3.

Catgut. A contracted form of cattle-gut, especially sheep. Another form is catling-gut, i.e. cattle-ing gut. In Gen. xxx. 40 we read that Jacob did separate "his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban’s cattle [i.e. sheep]." Again, in xxxi. 5, Jacob said, "God hath taken away the cattle [sheep and lambs] of your father, and given them to me:" and verse 43 he says, "These cattle [sheep and lambs] are my cattle."

½ Musical strings never were made from the gut of a cat.

Catgut Scraper (A). A fiddler.

Cathari. Novation heretics. The Waldenses were subsequently so called. (Ducange: vol. ii. p. 288, col. 2.)

Catharine. To braid St. Catharine’s tresses. To live a virgin.

"Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catharine's tresses."—Longfellow: Evangeline.

Catharine (Knights of St.), 1714. A Russian military order founded by Peter the Great after his naval victory of Aland, and so named in compliment to his wife Catharine.

Catharine of Russia. A butler. When Czar Peter wished to marry her, it was needful to make her of noble birth; so a private person was first converted into her brother, and then into a great lord by birth. Hence Catharine, being the sister of a "great lord," was made fit to be the wife of the Czar. (De Causa: Russia, chap. iv.)

Catharine Theot (1725-1795). A visionary born at Avranches, who gave herself out to be (like Joanna Southcott) the mother of God, and changed her name Theot into Theos (God). She preached in Paris in 1794, at the very time that the worship of the Supreme Being was instituted, and declared that Robespierre was the forerunner of the WORD. The Comité de la Sûreté Générale had her arrested, and she was guillotined. Catharine Theot was called by Dom Gerl "la mère de dieu," and Catharine called Robespierre "her well-beloved son and chief prophet."

Catharine Wheel (A). A sort of firework. (See below.)

Catharine Wheels. To turn Catharine Wheels. To turn head over heels.
on the hands. Boys in the streets, etc., often do so to catch a penny or so from trippers and others.

A Catharine-wheel window. A wheel-window, sometimes called a rose-window, with radiating divisions. St. Catharine was a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the Christian faith at a sacrificial feast appointed by the Emperor Maximinus, for which confession she was put to death by torture by means of a wheel like that of a chaff-cutter.

Catharine-wheel Politicians. Lovers of political changes.

Catharine-wheel Republics. "Republics," says Mr. Lowell, "always in revolution while the powder lasts."

Catharists. A sect of the Manicheans; so called from their professed purity of faith. (Greek, catharos, pure.) They maintained that matter is the source of all evil; that Christ had not a real body; that the human body is incapable of newness of life; and that the sacraments do not convey grace. (See Ducange: vol. ii. p. 239, col. 1.)

Cathay. China, or rather Tartary, the capital of which was Albrachca, according to Orlando Furioso. It was called Khita'i by the Tartars, and China was first entered by Europeans in the Middle Ages from the side of Tartary.

"Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay." —Tennyson: Locksley Hall.

Cathedral Molles (Latin). Luxurious women. Properly, soft chairs. The cathedral was a chair for women, like our ottoman; and Juvenal applies the soft chair used by women of dainty habits to the women who use them.

Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. Those which have never been monastic, but which have ab initio been governed by a dean and chapter, with the statutable dignities of precentor, chancellor, and treasurer.

Catharans or Caterans. Highland freebooters or marauders. (Lowland Scotch, catharain, peasantry.)

Catherine. (See Catharine.)

Catholic (The). "Catholicus," a title inherited by the King of Spain; as the monarch of England is entitled "Fidei Defensor," and the King of France was styled "Christianissimus." (See page 228, Catholic Majesty.)

Catholic Association (The), 1756. The first Catholic Association was formed for the purpose of obtaining relief from disabilities. In 1750 the association was re-established on a more representative basis, but it became moribund in 1763. Another association was organised in 1773, which fell under the control of Lord Kenmare; this society was broken up 1783. In 1793 a new society was formed on a still wider basis, and Wolfe Tone was elected secretary. In 1793 the Catholic Relief Bill received the Royal Assent.

In Ireland, 1823; suppressed 1825 (6 Geo. iv. c. 4); dissolved itself February, 1829. The association was first suggested by Daniel O'Connell at a dinner-party given by Mr. O'Mara at Glancullen, and on Monday, May 12th, the first meeting of the association was held in Dempsey's Rooms, Sackville Street. It became one of the most powerful popular movements ever organised. The objects were: (1) to forward petitions to Parliament; (2) to afford relief to Catholics assailed by Orange lodges; (3) to support a Liberal press both in Dublin and London; (4) to circulate cheap publications; (5) to aid the Irish Catholics of America; and (6) to aid English Catholics. Indirectly it undertook the repeal of the Union, and the redress of Irish grievances generally. Everyone who paid 1d. a month was a member. (See Catholic Emancipation.)

Catholic Church (The). The Church considered as a whole, as distinguished from parish churches. When the Western Church broke off from the Eastern, the Eastern Church called itself the Orthodox Church, and the Western Church adopted the term Catholic. At the Reformation the Western Church was called by the Reformers the Roman Catholic Church, and the British Established Church was called the "Protestant Church," the "Reformed National Church," or the "Anglo-Catholic Church." It is foolish and misleading to call the Anglican Church the Catholic Church, as at most it is only a branch thereof. No Protestant would think of calling himself a Catholic.

Catholic Emancipation Act (The), 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, April 13th, 1829, whereby Catholics were admitted to all corporate offices, and to an equal enjoyment of all municipal rights. The army and navy had been already opened to them. They were, however, excluded from the following offices: (1) Regent; (2) Chancellor of England or Ireland; (3) Viceroy of Ireland; (4) all offices connected with the Church, universities, and public schools; and (5) the disposal of Church patronage.

Catholic Epistles (The) of the New Testament are those Epistles not addressed to any particular church or individual. Conventionally they are seven—viz. 1 James, 2 Peter, 1 Jude, and 3 John; but 2 John is addressed to a "lady," and 3 John to Gaius, and, of course, are not Catholic Epistles either in matter or otherwise.

Catholic King (The) or His Catholic Majesty. A title given by the Pope to Ferdinand, King of Aragon (1452-1516), for expelling the Moors from Spain. This was about as unwise as the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV.

Catholic League (The), 1614. A confederacy of Catholics to counterbalance the Evangelic League (q.v.) of Bohemia. The two Leagues kept Germany in perpetual disturbance, and ultimately led to the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648).

Catholic Majesty, 759. A title given by Gregory III. to Alfonso I., King of Asturias.

Catholic Relief. (See Catholic Association.)

Catholic Rent (Thir), 1823. The subscription of 1d. per month towards the expenses of the Catholic Association (q.v.).

Catholic Roll (The). A document which each Roman Catholic was obliged to swear to on taking his seat as a Member of Parliament. It was abolished, and a single oath prescribed to all members by the 29, 30 Victoria, c. 10 (1866).

Catholic'con. A papace'a. (Greek, katholikon idiom, a universal remedy.)

"Meanwhile, permit me to recommend,
As the matter admits of no delay,
My wonderful catholicon."

Longfellow : The Golden Legend, 1.

Catholicos. The head of the Assyrian Nestorians. Now called the Patriarch of Armenia.

Catiline's Conspiracy. Lucius Sergius Catilina, b.c. 64, conspired with a large number of dissolute young nobles to plunder the Roman treasury, extirpate the Senate, and fire the capital. Cicero, who was consul, got full information of the plot, and delivered his first Oration against Catiline November 8th, 63, whereupon Catiline quitted Rome. Next day Cicero delivered his second Oration, and several of the conspirators were arrested. On December 4th Cicero made his third Oration, respecting what punishment should be accorded to the conspirators. And on December 5th, after his fourth Oration, sentence of death was passed. Catiline tried to escape into Gaul, but, being intercepted, he was slain fighting, b.c. 64.

Catilines and Cathed (The). Synonyma for conspirators who hope to mend their fortunes by rebellion.

"The intrigues of a few impoverished Catilines and Cathed."

Cath. In Pope's Moral Essays (Epist. i.), intended for Charles Dardene, a kind of Lucullus, who preferred "A rogue with venison to a rogue without."

Catkins. The inflorescence of hazel, birch, willow, and some other trees; so called from their resemblance to a cat's tail.

"See the yellow catkins cover
All the slender willows over."

Mary Howitt : Voice of Spring, stanza 2.

Cat-lap. Milk or weak tea, only fit for the cat to lap.

"A more accomplished old woman never drank cat-lap."—Sir W. Scott : Redgauntlet, chap. xii.

Cato. He is a Cato. A man of simple life, severe morals, self-denying habits, strict justice, brusque manners, blunt of speech, and of undoubted patriotism, like the Roman censor of that name.

Cato-Street Conspiracy. A scheme entertained by Arthur Thistlewood and his fellow-conspirators to overthrow the Government by assassinating the Cabinet Ministers. So called from Cato Street, where their meetings were held. (1820.)

The other names of these conspirators are Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, Ings, Monument, Tidd, and Wilson. All eight were sent to the Tower, March 3rd, 1820, by warrant of the Secretary of State.

Catsup or Ketchup. The Eastern kitch (soy sauce).

Catted. The anchor hung on the cathead, a piece of timber outside the ship to which the anchor is hung to keep it clear of the ship.

"The decks were all life and communion; the sailors on the forecastle singing; but cheerily then? as they called the anchor."—R. Matthey : Omo, xxxvi. p. 191.
Causa. Chief minister of the Zama-rim or ancient sovereign of India.

"Begin with high-plumed nobles, by the road
The first great minister of India stood,
His name 'tis Causa in India's tongue."

Osmoens : Lusiad, book viii.

Castum (As) [the strong]. A bow which fell into the hands of Mahomet when the property of the Jews of Modina was confiscated. In the first battle the prophet drew it with such force that it snapped in two.

Castwater. The estuary of the Plym (Plymouth). A corruption of chateau (chat-eau); as the castle at the mouth of the Plym used to be called.

Caucasians, according to Blumenbach's ethnological system, represent the European or highest type of the human race; so called from Cau'casus, the mountainous range. Whilst the professor was studying ethnology, he was supplied with a skull from these regions, which he considered the standard of the human type.

Causa. A meeting of citizens in America to agree upon what members they intend to support, and to concert measures for carrying out their political wishes. The word arose from the caulkers of Boston, who had a dispute with the British soldiers a little before the Revolution. Several citizens were killed, and meetings were held at the caulkers' house or call-house, to concert measures for redress of grievances.

"The whole Perkin affair is merely a cauca in disguise."—The Times.

"This day the caucas club meets . . . in the garret of Tom Dawes, the adjutant of the Boston regiment."—John Adams : Diary, vol. ii. p. 164, February, 1763.

Caudine Forks. A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the Valley of Arpia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls T. Veturius Calvius and Sp. Postumius fell into the hands of the Sammites, and were made to pass under the yoke.

"Hard as it was to abandon an enterprise so very dear to him . . . he did not hesitate to take the more prudent course of passing under the Caudine Forks of the Monroe doctrine, and leave Maximilian and the French landholders to their fate."—Standard, Nov. 17th, 1869.

Candle is any slopy mess, especially that sweet mixture given by nurses to gosiphe who call to see the baby during the first month. The word simply means something warm. (Latin, calidus; French, chandail; Italian, caldo.)

Candle (Mrs.). A curtain lecturer. The term is derived from a series of papers by Douglas Jerrold, which were published in Punch. These papers represent Job Candle as a patient sufferer of the curtain lectures of his nagging wife.

Caught Napping (To be). To suffer some disadvantage while off one's guard. Phaenons, hares, and other animals are sometimes surprised "napping." I have myself caught a cock-pheasant napping.

Caul. The membrane on the head of some new-born infants, supposed to be a charm against death by drowning.

To be born with a caul was with the Romans tantamount to our phrase, "To be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth," meaning "born to good luck."

M. François-Michel, in his Phiologica-Comparée, p. 83, 4, says: "Calle, espère de coiffuer, est synonyme de coiffé," and quotes the proverb, "Sle, Migerer! nous sommes nus coiffés." (La Comédie des Proverbes, act ii. 4.)

Cauld-Jed (The) of Hilton Hall. A house-spirit, who moved about the furniture during the night. Being resolved to banish him, the inmates left for him a green cloak and hood, before the kitchen-fire, which so delighted him that he never troubled the house any more; but sometimes he might be heard singing—

"Here's a cloak, and here's a hood,
The cauld-Jed of Hilton will do no more good."

Cauline (Sir) (2 syl.). A knight who lived in the palace of the King of Ireland, and "used to serve the wine." He fell in love with Christabelle, the king's daughter, who plighted her troth to him secretly, for fear of the king. The king discovered the lovers in a bower, and banished Sir Cauline. After a time an eldridge came, and demanded the lady in marriage. Sir Cauline slew the "Soldain," but died of the wounds received in the combat; and the fair Christabelle died of grief, having "burst her gentle heart in twayne." (Percy's Reliques, iv.)

Caurus or Cetus. The west-north-west wind, which blew from Caurus (Argestes).

"The ground by piercing Caurus seared."

Thomson : Catus of Insulana, ii. 7a.

Causa. The initiating cause; the primary cause.

Causa Causata. The cause which owes its existence to the "causa causans"; the secondary cause.
The vera causa is (a) the immediate predecessor of an effect; (b) a cause verifiable by independent evidence. (Mill.)

* In theology God is the cause causa, and creation the cause causata. The presence of the sun above the horizon is the vera causa of daylight, and his withdrawal below the horizon is the vera causa of night.

Cause (The). A mission; the object or project.

To make common cause. To abet the same object. Here "cause" is the legal term, meaning pro or con, as it may be, the cause or side of the question advocated.

Cause célèbre. Any famous law case.

Causes. Aristotelian causes are these four:

1. The Efficient Cause. That which immediately produces the effect.
2. The Material Cause. The matter on which (1) works.
3. The Formal Cause. The essence or "Form" (= group of attributes) introduced into the matter by the efficient cause.
4. The Final or Ultimate Cause. The purpose or end for which the thing exists or the causal change takes place. But God is called the ultimate Final Cause, since, according to Aristotle, all things tend, so far as they can, to realize some Divine attribute.

* God is also called The First Cause, or the Cause Causeless, beyond which even imagination cannot go.

Cautelous. Cautious, cunning, treacherous. (Latin, cautela; French, cautelous; Spanish, cauteloso).

Cauter (Al). The lake of Paradise, the waters of which are sweet as honey, cold as snow, and clear as crystal. He who once tastes thereof will never thirst again. (The Koran.)

Caution Money. A sum deposited before entering college, by way of security.

Cauter. (See Cauter.)

Cava. Cava's traitor sire. Cava or Florinda was the daughter of St. Julian. It was the violation of Cava by Roderick that brought about the war between the Goths and the Moors. St. Julian, to avenge his daughter, turned traitor to Roderick, and induced the Moors to invade Spain. King Roderick was slain at Xeres on the third day. (A.D. 711.)

Cavalerie à Pied. The Zouaves (pronounce zove) and Zephyrs of the French army are so called because of their fleetness and swiftness of foot.

Cavalerotre (3 syl.). A horseman: whence a knight, a gentleman. (Latin, caballus, a horse.)

* The Cavalier.

Eon de Beaumont, the French soldier;
Chevalier d'Eon. (1728-1810.)
Charles Breydel, the Flemish landscape painter. (1677-1744.)
Francesco Cairo (Cavaliere de Cairo), historian. (1598-1674.)
Jean le Clerc, le chevalier. (1587-1633.)
J. Battista Marini, Italian poet; Il cavaliere (1669-1656).
Andrew Michael Ramsay (1686-1743).

Cavaliere or Chevalier de St. George. James Francis Edward Stuart, called "the Pretender," or "the Old Pretender" (1688-1765).

The Young Cavalier or the Bonnie Chevalier. Edward, the "Young Pretender" (1720-1785).

Cavaliere Servant, in Italian ciesibo, and in Spanish cortejo. A gentleman that chaperones married ladies.

"Coach, servants, gondola, he goes to call.
And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl!"

* Byron: Beppe.*, n. xi.

Cavallers. Adherents of Charles I. Those of the opposing Parliament party were called Roundheads (q.v.).

Cavall. "King Arthur's hound of deepest mouth." (Idylls of the King; End.)

Cave-dwellers. (See page 157, col. 1, BOHEMIAN BRETHREN.)

Cave In. Shut up! have done! I'll cave in his head (break it). His fortune has caved in (has failed). The bank has caved in (come to a smash). The affair caved in (fell through). Common American expressions.

In the lead diggings, after a shaft has been sunk, the earth round the sides falls or cave in, unless properly boarded; and if the mine does not answer, no care is taken to prevent a caving in.

Cave ne literas Bellerophonis adferram. Take care that the letter you carry is not a warrant for your death. (See page 121, col. 1, BELLERophon.)

Cave of Achadh Aldai. A cairn in Ireland, so called from Aldai, the ancestor of the Tuatha de Danaan kings.

Cave of Adullam (The). (See page 17, col. 1, ADULLAMITES.)
Cave of Mammon. The abode of the god of wealth in Spenser's Faerie Queene, ii. 7.

Cav'eat (3 syl.).
To enter a cav'eat: To give legal notice that the opponent is not to proceed with the suit in hand until the party giving the notice has been heard; to give a warning or admonition.

Cav'eat Emptor. The buyer must be responsible for his own free act. Let the buyer keep his eyes open, for the bargain he agrees to is binding. In English law, Chief Justice Tindal modified this rule. He said if the buyer gives notice that he relies on the vendor's judgment, and the vendor warrants the article, then the vendor is bound to furnish an article "reasonable and fit for the purpose required."

Cavell or Cavel. A parcel or allotment of land measured by a cord or cable. (German, kabel, whence kaveln, to assign by lot.)

Cavendish Tobacco. An American brand of chewing or smoking tobacco, prepared for use by softening, sweetening with molasses, and pressing into plugs. Called "Cavendish" from the original manufacturer.

Cavi'are (3 syl.). Caviare to the general. Above the taste or comprehension of ordinary people. Caviare is a kind of pickle made from the roe of sturgeons, much esteemed in Muscovy. It is a dish for the great, but beyond the reach of the general public. (Hamlet, ii. 2.)

"All popular talk about lacustrine villages and flint implements... is caviare to the multitude."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

Cavo-ri'le'vo. "Relief," cut below the original surface, the highest parts of the figure being on a level with the surface. Also called Intaglio-rilevato (pronounce ca'h'-vo-rel-y'e'-vo).

Caxon. A worn-out wig; also a big cauliflower wig, worn out or not. It has been suggested that the word is from the proper name, but nothing whatever is known about such a person.

"People scarce could decide on his plan Which looked wise—The caxon or jowl."
—Peter Piper: The Portfolio.

C. D. i.e. Cetera desunt (Latin). The rest of the MS. is wanting.

Ce'an. The Cean poet. Simon'sides, of Ce'os.

"The Cean and the Tan muse."—Byron: Don Juan (The Poet's Song).

Ceca to Mecca (from). From one end of the world to the other; from pillar to post. It is a Spanish phrase meaning to roam about purposelessly. Ceca and Mecca are two places visited by Mohammedan pilgrims. (Compare: From Dam to Beerseba; and From Land's End to John o' Groats.)

"Let us return home," said Sancho, "no longer ramble about from Ceca to Mecca."—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I. iii. 4.

Cecil's (St.). A Roman lady who underwent martyrdom in the third century. She is the patron saint of the blind, being herself blind; she is also patroness of musicians, and "inventor of the organ."

"At length divine Cecilia came, In entrust of the vocal frame."
—Dryden: Alexander's Feast.

According to tradition, an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill, and used nightly to visit her. Her husband saw the heavenly visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom which he brought from Paradise. Dryden and Pope have written odes in her honour, and both speak of her charming an angel by her musical powers:

"He [Timoteus] raised a mortal to the skies."
—She (Cecilia) brought an angel down. —Dryden: Alexander's Feast.

Cecil's Fast. A dinner off fish. W. Cecil (Lord Burleigh) introduced a Bill to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days in order to restore the fish trade.

Ced, Ked, or Cerdwyn. The Arkite goddess or Ceres of the Britons.

"I was first modelled into the form of a pure man in the hall of Cerdwyn, who subjected me to penance."—Thelwall (Davie's Translation).

Cedar. Curzon says that Solomon cut down a cedar, and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethes'da used to stand. A few days before the crucifixion, this cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was employed as the upright of the Saviour's cross. (Monasteries of the Levant.) (See Coss.)

Cedilla. The mark (__), under a French sibilant c. This mark is the letter z, and the word is from the Italian zediglies ("zeticula," a little z. (Greek, stil; Spanish, ceda, with a diminutive.)

Cee'l't (St.) or St. Calixtus, whose day is the 14th of October, the day of the Battle of Hastings.

Brown Willis tells us there was a tablet once in Battle parish church with these words:

"This place of war is Battle called, because in battle here..."
Oeinture 232  Cenzo

Oeinture 232  Cenzo

Quite conquered and o'erthrown the English nation were.
This story happened to them upon St. Cecilia's day," etc.

Oeinture de la Reina. The octroi levied at Paris, which at one time was the queen's pin-money or private purse.

Celadon. The lover of Amelia, a "matchless beauty." Being overtaken by a storm, Amelia became alarmed, but Celadon, folding her in his arms, exclaimed, "'Tis safety to be near thee, sure, and thus to clasp perfection." As he spoke, a flash of lightning struck Amelia dead. (Thomson: The Seasons; Summer.)

Celadine, a shepherdess in love with Marina. Finding his suit too easily granted, he waxed cold and discarded the "matchless beauty." (W. Brough: Britannia's Pastoral ; 1613.)

Ceselian City (The). Heaven is so called by John Bunyan in his Pilgrim's Progress.

Ceselian Empire (The). China; so called because the first emperors were all celestial deities.

Celestians. Followers of Celestius, disciple of Pela'gius. St. Jerome calls him "a blockhead swollen with Scotch potage"—Scotch being, in this case, what we now call Irish.

Celia [beauvilliness]. Mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She lived in the hospice called Holiness. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. i. 10.)

Celia or Celia. A common poetical name for a lady or lady-love. Thus, Swift had an ode in which Sterphon describes Celia's dressing-room.

"Six hours, and who can do it less in,
By haggity Celia spent in dressing."

Celt. A piece of stone, ground artificially into a wedge-like shape, with a cutting edge. Used, before the employment of bronze and iron, for knives, hatchets, and chisels.

Ceils (The), or The Kelts. This family of nations includes the Irish, Erse, Manx, Welsh, Cornish, and Low Bretons. According to historic fable, Celtina was the daughter of Britannus. She had a son by Hercules, named Celtus, the progenitor of the Celts.

Cem'etery properly means a sleeping-place. The Jews used to speak of death as sleep. The Persians call their cemeteries "The Cities of the Silent." The Greeks thought it unlucky to pronounce the name of Death. (Greek, koinêtierion.)

Cen'bites (3 syl.). Monks. So called because they live in common. Hermits and anchorites are not cenobites, as they live alone. (Greek, koinebites.)

Cenoman'ai. The inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, referred to by Cesar in his Commentaries.

Cenotaphs. The most noted in ancient times—

&bepo to Delphi (l.Hesiod, i. 6.; v. 307.
ANDROMACH: syl. to Hector (Hesiod, i. 31; v. 302.
ARIST.' on to Rutilius (Anthologia, bk. ii. 23.
ARISTOTLE to Hermit and Eulabia (Dugdus Laertius.

The Athenians to the poet Euptychus.
CALLIMACUS to Sophilo, son of Dioclis (Epigram of Callimachus, 22.
CATULLUS to his brother (Epigram of Catullus, 160.
DIODO to Siechem (Justin, xviii. 6.
KOPOLIS and ARASTO to their son Theonius,
GERMAIN DR HUK to Horve, the Breton, in 1512.
OXENTON to Timocrates (Anthologia, 11. p. 305.
NOBLET to Thebanus and RHIJUS, in Germany, and to Alexandre Renier, the emir, in 1516. (Suniostas: Life of Claudius; and the Anthology.)
STATION to his father (The Syrus of Silanus, 1. Epictetus, 3.)
TIMAIHS to his son Teleutagiums.
XENOPHAGUS to Lysidice (Anthologia).

"A cenotaph Bireck, sever fistes, an emptie tomb or tablet to the memory of a person whose body is buried elsewhere. A mausoleum is an imposing monument enshrining the dead body itself.

Censorius at Sapiens. Cato Major was so called. (B.C. 234-149.)

Centaur (2 syl.). A huntsman. The Thessalian centaurs were half-horses, half-men. They were invited to a marriage feast, and, being intoxicated, behaved with great rudeness to the women. The Lap'ithae took the women's part, fell on the centaurs, and drove them out of the country.

"Purs that Thessalian centaurs never knew." Thomson: Autumn.

Cent-cyne. One of the upper ten; a person of high birth, a descendant of the race of kings. (Anglo-Saxon cyne, royal; cyne-don, a kingdom; also noble, renowned, chief.)

"His wife, by birth a Cent-cyne, went out as a day-servant." Geberian, Promise of Marriage, chap. 1.

Cento. Poetry made up of lines borrowed from established authors. Aeuso'niius has a nutial idyll composed from verses selected from Virgil. (Latin, cento, patchwork.)

"The best known are the Homero-centonnes (3 syl.), the Cento l'Virgiliano by Proba Falcione (4th century), and the Cento Nuptidias of Ausonius. Metallus made hymns out of the Odes of Horace by this sort of patchwork. Of modern centos, the Comédie des Comédiens, made up of extracts from Balzac, is pretty well known.

Central Sun. That body or point about which our whole system revolves. Mädler believed that point to be ετα in Taurus.

Centre. In the Legislative Assembly The Centre were the friends of order. In the Tienian rebellion, 1866, the chief movers were called Head Centres, and their subordinates Centres.

Centre of Gravity. That point on which a body acted on by gravity is balanced in all positions.

Centumviri. A court under whose jurisdiction the Romans placed all matters pertaining to testamentary inheritances.

Centurion. A Roman officer who had the command of 100 men. His badge was a vine-rod. (Latin, centum, a hundred.)

Century White. John White, the Nonconformist lawyer. So called from his chief publication, The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests, made and admitted into Benefices by the Prelates, etc. (1590-1645).

Cephalus and Procris. Made familiar to us by an allusion to them in the play of Pyramus and Thisbe, where they are miscalled Shafulus and Procrus. Cephalus was the husband of Procris, who, out of jealousy, deserted him. Cephalus went in search of her, and rested awhile under a tree. Procris, knowing of his whereabouts, crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him. Cephalus heard the noise, and thinking it to be made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew Procris. When the unhappy man discovered what he had done, he slew himself in anguish of spirit with the same javelin.

"Pyramus: Not Shafulus to Procrus was true, Thisbe: As Shafulus to Procrus, I to you."

Cepheus (2 syl.). One of the northern constellations, which takes its name from Cepheus, King of Ethiopia, husband of Cassiopeia and father of Andromeda.

Cepola. Derive of Cépola. Quips of law are so called from Bartholomew Cépola whose law-quirks for prolonging lawsuits have been frequently reprinted.

Céquial (3 syl.). A spirit who transported Torralba from ‘Valladolid’ to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. (Pellicer.)

Ceramium. The opal. So called by the ancients from a notion that it was a thunder-stone. (Latin, ceramium; Greek, keraunios.)

Cerberus. A grim, watchful keeper; house-keeper, guardian, etc. Cerberus, according to Roman mythology, is the three-headed dog that keeps the entrance of the infernal regions. Hercules dragged the monster to earth, and then let him go again. (See Sup.)

Orpheus (2 syl.) lulled Cerberus to sleep with his lyre; and the Sibyl who conducted Æneas through the Inferno, also threw the dog into a profound sleep with a cake seasoned with poppies and honey.

The origin of the fable of Cerberus is from the custom of the ancient Egyptians of guarding graves with dogs.

The exquisite cameo by Dioscórides, in the possession of the King of Prussia, and the painting of Hercules and Cerberus, in the Farnésé Gallery of Rome, are of world-wide renown.

Cerdonians. A sect of heretics, established by Cerdon of Syria, who lived in the time of Pope Hyginius, and maintained most of the errors of the Manichees.

Ceremonious (Thy). Peter IV. of Aragon. (1319, 1336-1387.)

Ceremony. When the Romans fled before Brennus, one Albinius, who was carrying his wife and children in a cart to a place of safety, overtook at Janiculum the Vestal virgin baking under their load, took them up and conveyed them to Cærus, in Etruria. Here they remained, and continued to perform their sacred rites, which were consequently called “Cærus-monía.” (Livy, v.)

Scaliger says the word comes from cærus = saeculum, Cærus monios = Creator; and Cæros (according to Varro) is by metathesis for cæros. Cæros, according to Scaliger, is also from cæros. By this etymology, “Ceremony” means sacred rites, or solemn acts in honour of the Creator. The great objection to this etymology is that Cicero, Tacitus, and other classic authors spell the word Cærus-monía and not Cærus-monía.

Master of the Ceremonies. An officer, first appointed by James I., to superintend the reception of ambassadors and strangers of rank, and to prescribe the formalities to be observed in levees and other grand public functions.

Ceres (2 syl.). Corn. Ceres was the Roman name of Mother-Earth, the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth.

"Darkrowning heaths grow bright with Ceres' smoke." Thomson: Castle of Indolence, I. 27.

Cerinthians. Disciples of Cerinthus, a heresiarch of the first century. They denied the divinity of Christ, but held that a certain virtue descended into Him at baptism, which filled Him with the Holy Ghost.

Cernulan Brother of Jove (The). Neptune. Here cernulan means green.

Cess. Measure, as ex cess, excessive. Out of all cess means excessively, i.e. ex (out of all) cess.

"Poor ladse, is wrung in the withers out of all cess."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., i. ii. 1.

Cess. A tax, contracted from assessment ("ess"); as a "chuch-cess.

In Ireland the word is used sometimes as a contraction of success, meaning luck, as "bad cess to you!"

Cestui que Vie is the person for whose life any lands or hereditaments may be held.

Cestui que vie, the person entitled to a use. Cestui que trust, the person for whose benefit a trust may be created.

Cestus, in Homer, is the girdle of Venus, of magical power to move to ardent love. In Jerusalem Delivered, Armida wore a similar cestus.

Cf. Latin, cussus = compare.

Chabouk. (See CHIBOUQUE, p. 245.)

Chabouk or Chabak. A long whip, or the application of whips and rods; a Persian and Chinese punishment. (Dubois.)

"Drak forward that fisker, and cut his rode into ratters on his luck with your chabouks."—Scott: The Sargan's Daughter, c. iv.

The criticism of the chabouk. The application of whips or rods (Persian). (Dubois.)

"If that monarch did not give the chabouk to Fere-mor, there would be an end to all legitimate government in Bactaria."—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh.

Chacun a son got. "Everyone has (a) his taste"; or, "Everyone to (a) his taste." The former is French, the latter is English-French. The phrase is much more common with us than it is in France, where we meet with the phrases—Chacun a sa chacunerie (everyone has his idiosyncrasy), and chacun a sa marotte (everyone has his hobby). In Latin sua aves nocturnas, "as the good-man said when he kissed his cow."

Chad-pennies. Whitsuntide offerings at St. Chad's cathedral, Lichfield, for keeping it in repair.

Chaff. An old bird is not to be caught with chaff. An experienced man, or one with his wits about him, is not to be deluded by humbug. The reference is to throwing chaff instead of bird-seed to allure birds. Hence—

You are chaffing me. Making fun of me. A singular custom used to exist in Notts and Leicestershire some half a century ago. When a husband ill-treated his wife, the villagers emptied a sack of chaff at his door, to intimate that "thraishing was done within," which some think to be the origin of the word.

"To chaff," meaning to banter, is a variant of chaff, to irritate.

Chair (The). The office of chief magistrate in a corporate town.

Below the chair. An alderman who has not yet served the mayoralty.

Passed the chair. One who has served the chief office of the corporation.

The word is also applied to the office of a professor, etc., as "The chair of poetry, in Oxford, is now vacant." The word is furthermore applied to the president of a committee or public meeting. Hence—

To take the chair. To become the chairman or president of a public meeting. The chairman is placed in a chair at the head of the table, or in some conspicuous place like the Speaker of the House of Commons, and his decision is absolutely final in all points of doubt. Usually the persons present nominate and elect their own chairman; but in some cases there is an ex officio chairman.

Chair. When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out "Chair," they mean that the chairman is not properly supported, and his words not obeyed as they ought to be. Another form of the same expression is, "Pray support the chair."

Groaning chair. The chair in which a woman is confined or sits afterwards to receive congratulations. Similarly "groaning cake" and "groaning cheese" are the cake and cheese which used to be provided in "Goose month."

For a nurse, the child to dandle, sugar, scoop, spurred pate, and candle.

A groaning chair, and eke a candle.

Poor Robin's Almanack, 1676.
Chair-days. Old age.

"I had long supposed that chair-days, the beautiful name for those days of old age . . . was of Shakespeare's own invention . . . but this is a mistake . . . the word is current in Launcelot and Thomas A Kempis: English Past and Present, v.

"In thy reverence and thy chair-days, thus To die in ruffian battle."

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, act v, 2.

Chair of St. Peter (The). The office of the Pope of Rome, said to be founded by St. Peter, the apostle; but St. Peter's Chair means the Catholic festival held in commemoration of the two episcopates founded by the apostle, one at Rome, and the other at Antioch (January 18th and February 22nd).

Chalcedony [kalcedony]. A precious stone, consisting of half-transparent quartz: so called from Chalco'don, in Asia Minor, where it was first found. In the same district are agate, carnelian, cat's-eye, chrysoprase, flint, hornstone, onyx, quartz, and sand.

? Albertus Magnus (book i. chap. 2) says: "It dispels illusions and all vain imaginations. If hung about the neck as a charm, it is a defence against enemies, and keeps the body healthful and vigorous.

Chalk.

"I'll chalk out your path for you—i.e. lay it down or plan it out as a carpenter or ship-builder plans out his work with a piece of chalk. I can walk a chalk as well as you. I am no more drunk than you are. The allusion is to the ordeal on board ship of trying men suspected of drunkenness. They were required to walk along a line chalked on the deck, without deviating to the right or left.

The tapster is undone by chalk, i.e. credit. The allusion is to scoring up credit on a tally with chalk. This was common enough early in the nineteenth century, when milk scores, bread scores, as well as beer scores were general.

Chalk it up. Put to his credit."—A good-humoured sarcasm, Chalk it up! is tantamount to saying, "What you have done so and so amounts to such a sum that I must make some more or less permanent record of it."

Chalk and Cheese. I know the difference between chalk and cheese. Between what is worthless and what is valuable, between a counterfeit and a real article. Of course, the resemblance of chalk to cheese has something to do with the saying, and the alliteration helps to popularise it.

"This Scotch scarecrow was no more to be compared to him than chalk was to cheese."—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock, 221t.

Cham (khain). The sovereign prince of Tartary, now written "khan."

"Fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard."

—Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 1.

The great Cham of Literature. Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784).
Chambre Ardente (French), "A lighted chamber" (A darkened court). Before the Revolution, certain offences in France were tried in a court from which daylight was excluded, and the only light admitted was by torches. These inquisitorial courts were devised by Cardinal Lorraine. The first was held in the reign of François I., for trying heretics. Brinvilliers and his associates were tried in a darkened court in 1680. Another was held in 1716, during the regency. When judges were ashamed to be seen, prisoners could not expect much leniency.

Chameleon. You are a chameleon, i.e. very changeable—shifting according to the opinions of others, as the chameleon changes its hue to that of contiguous objects.

"As the chameleon, who is known to have no colour of his own, but borrows from his neighbour's hue; his white or black, his green or blue."—Prior.

Pliny tells us that Democritus wrote a book on superstitions connected with the chameleon.

O est un cameleone. One who shifts his opinions according to circumstances; a vicar of Bray.

Tome cameleone is to change one's opinions as a chameleon changes its colour.

Champ de Manoeuvre (Itr.). The soldiers' exercise ground.

Champs de Mai. The same as the Champs de Mars (q.v.), transferred after 755 to the mouth of May. Napoleon I. revived these meetings during the "Hundred Days" (June 1st, 1815).

Champs de Mars. The March meetings held by Clovis and his immediate followers, sometimes as mere pageants for the amusement of the freedmen who came to offer homage to their lord, and pay their annual gifts; sometimes for business purposes, especially when the king wished to consult his warriors about some expedition.

Champak. An Indian tree (Michelia Champaca). The wood is sacred to Buddha, and the strongly-scented golden flowers are worn in the black hair of Indian women.

"The Champak odours fall."—Shelley: Lines to Indian Air.

Champerty (Latin, campi partitio, division of the land) is a bargain with some person who undertakes at his own cost to recover property on condition of receiving a share thereof if he succeeds.

"Champerty is treated as a worse offence; for by this a stranger supplies money to carry on a suit, on condition of sharing in the land or other property."—Prynne: Contraehentes (vol. II. part II. chap. 3, page 394.)

Champion and Several. A "champion" is a common, or land in allotments without enclosures. A "several" is a private farm, or land enclosed for individual use. A champion also means one who holds a champion.

"The champion differs from several much For want of partition, closer, and such."—Tasso: Fine Hundred Points, etc. (Intro.)

Champion of England. A person whose office it is to ride up Westminster Hall on a Coronation Day, and challenge any one who disputes the right of succession. The office was established by William the Conqueror, and was given to Marmion and his male descendants, with the manor of "broad Scrivelsby." De Ludlow received the office and manor through the female line; and in the reign of Richard II. Sir John Dymoke succeeded through the female line also. Since then the office has continued in the Dymoke family.

"These Lincoln lends the Conqueror gave, That England's glove they might convey To knight renowned amongst the laity— The famous hold of Fontaine;"—An Anglo-Norman Ballad modernized.

Chance. (See MAIN CHANCE.)

Chanoceel means a lattice-screen. In the Roman law courts the lawyers were cut off from the public by such a screen. (Latin, cancellis.)

Chancel of a church. That part of a church which contains the altar, and the seats set apart for the choir. It is generally raised a step or more above the floor of the nave.

Chancellor. A petty officer in the Roman law courts stationed at the chancel (q.v.) as usher of the court. In the Eastern Empire he was a secretary or notary, subsequently invested with judicial functions. The office was introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, and under the Norman kings the chancellor was made official secretary of all important legal documents. In France, the chancellor was the royal notary, president of the councils, and keeper of the Great Seal.

Chancellor of England (Thc). The Lord Chancellor, or the Lord High Chancellor. The highest judicial functionary of the nation, who ranks above all peers, except princes of the blood. and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He is "Keeper of the Great Seal," is called "Keeper of His (or Her) Majesty's Con-squence," and presides on the Woolsack in the House of Lords.

Chancery. The part of the Court occupied by the lawyers.

To get a man's head into chancery is to get it under your arm, where you can pummel it as long as you like, and he cannot get it free without great difficulty. The allusion is to the long and exhausting nature of a Chancery suit. If a man once gets his head there, the lawyers punish him to their heart's content.

"What can perform my mile in eight minutes, or a little less, I feel as if I had lost Tune's head in chancery."—Holmes: Antecredit, chap. v. p. 144.

Chaneph. The island of religious hypocrites, inhabited by sham saints, tellers of beads, mumblers of "Bee! Marion, and friars who lived by begging. (The word meant hypocrite in Hebrew.) (See Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 33, 64.)

Change. Ringing the changes. Repeating the same thing in different ways. The allusion is to bell-ringing.

* To know how many changes can be rung on a peal of bells, multiply the known preceding number by the next subsequent one, thus: 1 bell no change; 2 bells, 1 $ 2 = 2$ changes; 3 bells, 2 $ 3 = 6$ changes; 4 bells, 6 $ 4 = 24$ changes; 5 bells, 24 $ 5 = 120$ changes; 6 bells, 720 changes, etc.

Take your change out of that. Said to a person who insults you when you give him a quid pro quo, and tell him to take out the change. It is an allusion to shopping transactions, where you settle the price of the article, and put the surplus or change in your pocket.

Changeling (2 syl.). A peevish, sickly child. The notion used to be that the fairies took a healthy child, and left in its place one of their starveling elves which never did kindly.

"Oh, that it could be proved
That some bright-tinged fairy had exchanged
In cradle-clotes our children as they lay,
And called mine Perry, his Plantagenet,
Then would I have his Harle, and he mine."

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, i. 1.

Chant du Depart. After the Marseillaise, the most celebrated song of the first French Revolution. It was written by M. J. Chénier for a public festival, held June 11th, 1794, to commemorate the taking of the Bastille. The music is by Méhul. A mother, an old man, a child, a wife, a girl, and three warriors sing a verse in turn, and the sentiment of each is, "We give up our claims on the men of France for the good of the Republic." (See page 217, col. 1, CARMAGNOLE.)

"La republique nous appelle,
Marchons sans courir sans peur,
Un Français doit vivre pour elle,
Pour elle un Français doit mourir.

M. J. Chenier.
The Republic invites,
Let us conquer or fall;
For her Frenchmen live,
And die at her call.

Chantage. A subsidy paid to a journal. Certain journals will pronounce a company to be a "bubble one" unless the company advertises in its columns; and at gaming resorts will publish all the scandals and mishances connected with the place unless the proprietors subsidise them, or throw a sop to Cerberus. This subsidy is technically known as Chantage in France and Italy.

Chanticleer. The cock, in the tale of Reynard the Fox, and in Chaucer's Nounse Ypresse Tale. The word means
"shriil-singer." (French chanter-clair, to sing clairlv, i.e. distinctly.)

"My lungs began to crow like chanticleer."
Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Chaoiian Bird (The). The dove.
So called because it delivered the oracles of Chaos (Udofia).

"But the mild swallow none with toils infect,
And none the soft Chaoiian bird molest."
Ovid: Art of Love, III.

Chaoiiian Food. Acorns. So called from the oak trees of Chaoia or Do-don. Some think beech-meat is meant, and tell us that the bulls of the oracle were hung on beech-trees, not on oaks.
* The Greek word is φαγος: Latin, fagus. Hence Strabo, Φαγoς, φαγoς τη Πελαγος ἢπαντον ψαλι. (He to Dodona came, and the hallowed oak or beech [fagus], the seat of the Pelasgii.) Now, "fagus" means the food-tree, and both acorns and mast are food, so nothing determinate can be derived from going to the root of the word, and, as it is extremely doubtful where Dodona was, we get no light by referring to the locality. Our text says Chaoia (in Epirus), others place it in Thessaly.

Chaos (χαος). Confusion; that confused mass of elemental substances supposed to have existed before God reduced creation into order. The poet Hesiod is the first extant writer that speaks of it.

"Light, uncollected, through the chaos urged
Its infant way; nor order yet had drawn
His lovely train from out the dusky gloom."
Thomson: Autumn, 125-4.
Chap. A man, properly a merchant. A chap-man is a merchantman or tradesman. "If you want to buy, I'm your chap." A good chap-man or chap became in time a good fellow. Hence, A good sort of chap, A clever chap, etc. (Anglo-Saxon, cœp-man.)

? An awkward custom is an analogous phrase.

Chapeau or Chapel de Roses. C'est un petit mariage, car quand on demande ce qu'un père donne à une fille, et qu'on veut répondre qu'il donne peu, on dit qu'il lui donne un chapeau de roses. Les roses sont consacrées à Venus, aux Grâces, et à l'Amour. (Les Origines de quelques Coutumes Anciennes, 1672.)

N.B.—"Chapel" we now call a chaplet.

Chapeau-bras. A soft hat which can be folded and carried under the arm (bras, French for arm). Strictly speaking, it should be a three-cornered hat.

Chapel is the chest containing relics, or the shrine thereof (Latin, capella; French, chape, a cope). The kings of France in war carried St. Martin's cope into the field, and kept it in a tent as a talisman. The place in which the cope was kept was called the chappelle, and the keeper thereof the chaplain.

Chapel (A). Either a place subsidiary to the parish church, or a place of worship not connected with the State, as a Methodist Chapel, a Baptist Chapel, etc.

Chapel, in printers' parlance, meant his workshop. In the early days of printing, presses were set up in the chapels attached to abbeys, as those of Caxton in Westminster Abbey. (See Monte, Frier, etc.)

Chapel. The "census" of journeymen printers assembled to decide any point of common interest. The chairman is called the "father of the chapel."

To hold a chapel. To hold a printers' census.

Chapel-of-Ease. A place of worship for the use of parishioners residing at a distance from the parish church.

Chaperon. A lady's attendant and protector in public. So called from the Spanish hood worn by duennas. (English-French.) (See Tapiserie.)

To chaperone. To accompany a young unmarried lady in loco parentis, when she appears in public or in society.

Chapter. To the end of the chapter. From the beginning to the end of a proceeding. The allusion is to the custom of reading an entire chapter in the first and second lesson of the Church service. This is no longer a general rule in the Church of England.

Chapter and Verse. To give chapter and verse is to give the exact authority of a statement, as the name of the author, the title of the book, the date thereof, the chapter referred to, and any other particular which might render the reference easily discoverable.

Chapter of Accidents (A). Unforeseen events. To trust to the chapter of accidents is to trust that something unforeseen may turn up in your favour. The Roman laws were divided into books, and each book into chapters. The chapter of accidents is that under the head of accidents, and metaphorically, the sequence of unforeseen events.

Chapter of Possibilities (The). A may-be in the course of events.

Character. In character. In harmony with a person's actions, etc.

Out of character. Not in harmony with a person's actions, writings, profession, age, or status in society.

Character (A). An oddity. One who has a distinctive peculiarity of manner: Sam Weller is a character, so is Pickwick. And Sam Weller's conduct in the law-court was "in character," but had he betrayed his master it would have been "out of character."

Charbonnerie Democratique. A new Carbons'ri society, founded in Paris on the principles of Babeuf. The object of these Republicans was to make Paris the centre of all political movements. (See page 214, col. 2, Carbonari.)

Charge.

Curate in charge. A curate placed by a bishop in charge of a parish where there is no incumbent, or where the incumbent is suspended.

To charge oneself with. To take upon oneself the onus of a given task.

To give charge over. To set one in authority over.

"I gave my brother Hanani... charge over Jerusalem."—Nehemiah vii. 2.

To give in charge. To hand over a person to the charge of a policeman.

To have in charge. To have the care of something.

To take in charge. To "take up" a person given in charge; to take upon oneself the responsibility of something.
Charge (To). To make an attack or onset in battle. "To charge, with bayonets" is to rush on the enemy with levelled bayonets.

To return to the charge. To renew the attack.

Chargé d’Affaires. The proxy of an ambassador, or the diplomatic agent where none higher has been appointed.

Charole'sia. The lady-love of Theagenes in the exquisite erotic Greek romance called The Loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, by Heliodoros, Bishop of Trikka, in the fourth century.

Charing Cross. Not from chère reine, in honour of Eleanor, the dear wife of Edward I., but la chère reine (the Blessed Virgin). Hence, in the Close Roll, Richard II., part 1 (1382), we read that the custody of the falcons at Charryng, near Westminster, was granted to Simon Burley, who was to receive 12d. a day from the Wardrobe.

* A correspondent in Notes and Queries, Dec. 28th, 1889, p. 507, suggests the Anglo-Saxon cérven (to turn), alluding to the bend of the Thames.

"Queen Eleanor died at Harly, Nottinghamshire, and was buried at Westminster. In every town where the corpse rested the king caused a cross of cunning workmanship to be erected in remembrance of her. There were fourteen, some say fifteen, altogether. The three which remain are in capitals: Lincoln, Newark, Grantham, Leicester, Stamford, Geddington, Northampton, Stony-Affricton, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, Went-Cheaps (Cheapside), Charing, and Bishopsgate."—In front of the South Eastern Railway station (Strand) is a model, in the original dimensions, of the old cross, which was made of case stone, and was demolished in 1642.

Charlot. According to Greek mythology, the chariot was invented by Erichthonius to conceal his feet, which were those of a dragon.

"Seated in car, by him constructed first
To hide his hideous feet."—Plutarch.

Charlot of the Gods. So the Greeks called Sierra Leo-ne, in Africa, a ridge of mountains of great height. A sierra means a saw, and is applied to a ridge of peaked mountains.

"Her pearly forest, mingleing with the skies, Leona's rough steep behind us flies."—Camoesa: Lusiads, book 5.

Chariots or Cars. That of ADORPION was drawn by lions and wild boars.

BACCHUS by satyrs.
CERES (St: Li) by winged dragons.
CYBELE (St: Li) by lions.
Diana by stags.
JACO by peacocks.
PHOEBE by swans.
PLUTO by black horses.
THE SIX by seven horses (the seven days of the week).
VENUS by doves.

Charlemagne (in Rome) were classed under four factions, distinguished by their livers:—white, red, sky-blue, and green. Domitian added two more, viz. the golden and the purple.

Charities. Masks.

"Our ladies laugh at bare-faced truths when they have those muzzles on, which they call masks, and which were formerly much more properly called charity, because they cover a multitude of sins."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, v. 27.

Charity. Charity begins at home. "Let them learn first to show piety at home" (1 Tim. v. 4 and 5).

Cold as charity. Than which what's colder to him who gives and him who takes!

Charivari. The clatter made with pots and pans, whistling, bawling, hissing, and so on. Our concert of "narrow-bones and cleavers"; the German Katzenmusik, got up to salute with ridicule unequal marriages. Punch is our national Charivari, and clatters weekly against political and social wrong-sidedness.

Charlatan. The following etymology is suitable to a book of Phrase and Fable.

It is said that one Latan, a famous quack, used to go about Paris in a gorgeous car, in which he had a traveling dispensary. A man with a horn announced the approach of this magnate, and the delighted sightseers used to cry out, "Voila! le char de Latan." When I lived in Paris I often saw this gorgeous car; the horn-man had a drum also, and M. Latan, dressed in a long showy robe, wore sometimes a hat with feathers, sometimes a bruss helmet, and sometimes a showy cap. He was a tooth-extractor as well as dispenser.

Probably "Latan" was an assumed name, for charlatan is undoubtedly the Italian charlatano, a babbler or quack.

Charlemagne. His nine wives were Hamiltrude, a poor Frankish woman, who bore him several children; Desiderata, who was divorced; Hildegarde, Fastrade (daughter of Count Rodolph the Saxon), and Luifgarde the German, all three of whom died before him; Maltegarde; Gertrude the Saxon; Regina; and Adalinda.

Charlemagne's peers. (See Paladins.)

Charlemagne's sword. Le Joyeuse.

Faite Charlemagne. To carry off one's winnings without giving the adversaries "their revenge."

"Faite Charlemagne c'est se retirer du jeu avec tout son gain, se point donner de revanche. Charlemagne s'est, jusqu'à la fin toutes ses conquêtes et quita le jeu de la vie sans avoir rendu du fruit de ses victoires. Le joueur qui se retire les mains pleins, fait commère Charlemagne."—Gréco: Recreations, l. 165.
Charles. An ill-omened name for kings:

England: Charles I. was beheaded by his subjects.

Charles II. lived long in exile.

Charles Edward, the Young Pretender, died in poverty and disgrace in France.

France: Charles I., the Bald, marching to repel the invading Saracens, was foreseen by his followers, and died of poison at Briou.

Charles II., the Fat, reigned wretchedly, and died a beggingly dependent on the stinting bounty of the Archbishop of Metz.

Charles III., the Simple, died in the dungeon of Château Thierry.

Charles IV., the Fair, reigned six years, married thrice, but buried all his children except one daughter, who was forbidden by the Salic law to succeed to the crown.

Charles V. lived and died an idiot or madman.

Charles VIII. starved himself to death.

Charles IX. smashed his head against the lintel of a doorway in the Château Amboise, and died in agony.

Charles X. died at the age of twenty-four, harrowed in conscience for the part he had taken in the "Massacre of St. Bartholomew."

Charles X. spent a quarter of a century in exile, and when he succeeded to the throne, fled for his life and died in exile.

Charles le Téméraire, of Burgundy, lost his life at Nancy, where he was utterly defeated by the Swiss.

Charles II., the Lame, was in captivity at his father's death.

Charles III., his grandson, was assassinated. (See JANE.)

Charles I. Whon Bernini's bust of Charles I. was brought home, the King was sitting in the garden of Chelsea Palace. He ordered the bust to be uncovered, and at the moment a hawk with a bird in its beak flew by, and a drop of the blood fell on the throat of the bust. The bust was ultimately destroyed when the palace was burnt down.

Charles and the Oak. When Charles II. fled from the Parliamentary army, he took refuge in Boscobel House; but when he deemed it no longer safe to remain there, he concealed himself in an oak. Dr. Stukeley says that this tree "stood just by a horse-track passing through the wood, and the king, with Colonel Carlos, climbed into it by means of the hen-roost ladder. The family reached them victuals with a nutshell." (Itinerarium Christiæm, III. p. 57, 1724.)

Charles's Wain. The constellation called the Great Bear, which forms the outline of a wheelbarrow or rustic wagon. "Charles" is a corruption of the word Charles, the farmer's wagon. (Anglo-Saxon, ceorles wain.)

"Sometimes still further corrupted into 'King Charles's wain.'"

Charybdis [cərɪˈbɪdz]. A whirlpool on the coast of Sicily. Scylla and Charybdis are employed to signify two equal dangers. Thus Horace says an author trying to avoid Scylla, drifts into Charybdis, i.e. seeking to avoid one fault, falls into another. The tale is that Charybdis stole the oxen of Hercules, was killed by lightning, and changed into the gulf.

"Thus when I shun Scylla, your father, I fall into Charybdis, your mother." — Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iii. 5.

Chase (Æ). A small deer-forest held, for the most part, by a private individual, and protected only by common law. Forests are royal prerogatives, protected by the "Forest Laws."
one side of a sheet. The type is first set up letter by letter in the “composing stick,” and is then transferred to the “galley,” where it appears in columns. It is next divided into pages, and then transferred to the chase, where it is held tight by quoins, or small bridges of wood. The word is French, chatter (a frame); our common. (See STICK.)

Chasidim and Zadikim. After the Babylonian captivity the Jews were divided into two groups—those who accepted and those who rejected the Persian innovation. The former were called pietists (chasidim), and the latter uprights (zadikim).

Chasseurs de Vincennes (French). The Duke of Orleans’ rifle corps; so called because they were garrisoned at Vincennes. (1835.)

Chat. Nid d’une souris dans l’orillle d’un chat. A mare’s nest. This French phrase is the translation of a line in Wynkyn de Worde’s Answering Questions, printed in English in 1511. Demand : What is that that never was and never will be? Response : A mouse’s nest in a cat’s ear. (See Mare’s Nest.)

Chat de Beaugency (L.). Keeping the word of promise to the ear, but breaking it to the sense. The legend is this: An architect was employed to construct a bridge over the Loire, opposite Beaugency, but not being able to accomplish it, made a league with the devil to give his sable majesty the first living being which crossed the bridge. The devil supposed it would be the architect himself, but when the bridge was finished the man threw a cat forward, and it ran over the bridge like a wild thing. The devil was furious, but a bargain’s a bargain, and the “cat of Beaugency” became a proverb.

Châteaux en Espagne. [Castle in Spain.] A castle in the air; something that exists only in the imagination. In Spain there are no châteaux. (See CASTLE.)

Château. Many wines are named after the manor on which the grapes are grown: as Château Lafitte, Château La Tour, Château Margaux, Château Rose (and Bordeaux), Château Yquem (a white Bordeaux), etc.

Chat’telins’. A fashionable coffeehouse in the reign of Charles II.

Chat. Their servant coming to bring me to Chattlehouse, a house in Covent Garden, or Che’s house, to Covent Garden, and there with music and company, mightily merry till tea at night. The Duke of Monmouth and a great many ladies were at Chatelin’s, and I left them there. — Pepys: Diary, April 22nd, 1668.

Chatterbox. A talkative person. The Germans have Pfländermensch (chatterbox). Shakespeare speaks of the clack-dish. “His use was to put a ducat in her clack-dish” (Measure for Measure, iii. 2)—i.e., the box or dish used by beggars for collecting alms, which the holder clatters to attract attention. We find also chatter-basket in old writers, referring to the child’s rattle.

Chatterhouse. To go through the chatterhouse. Between the legs of one or more boys, set apart like an inverted A, who strike, with their hands or caps, the victim as he creeps through. Hall-iwell (Archaic Dict.) gives chat, a small twig, and chatter, to bruise; also chattleocks, refuse wood left in making faggots. Probably, the boys used little twigs or sticks instead of caps or hands. And to go through chatterhouse means to get a trouncing or tunding. The pun between chatterhouse and charterhouse is obvious.

Chatterpie. Same as chatterbox. The pie means the magpie. (Mag. to chatter.) (See Hall-iwell.)

Chauvin. A blind idolator of Napoleon the Great. The name is taken from Les Misérable, by Bayard and Dumnavor, but was popularised in Charet’s Converst Chauvin. Chauvinism. A blind idolatry of Napoleon the Great. Now it means a blind and pugnacious patriotism: a warlike spirit.

Chaw-bacon (A). An uncouth rustic, supposed to eat no meat but bacon.

Chewy. Heu self knew a most respectable day-labourer, who had saved up enough money to keep himself in old age, who told me he never saw or touched any meat in his cottage but bacon, except once a year, and that was on club-day (1790). He never ate rabbit, game, chicken, or duck.

Chewed up. Done for, utterly discomfited, demolished. (American.)

Che sa’a, sa’a. What shall be will be. The motto of the Russells (Bedford).

“Whatever doth call ye this, Che sa’a, sa’a?”—Keat. (Author’s translation), II. 1.

Cheap as a Saradin. A Roman phrase referring to the great crowds of Sardinian prisoners brought to Rome by Tiberius Gracchus, and offered for sale at almost any price.

Cheap Jack. Jack, the chap-man. Not cheap, meaning low-priced, but cheap meaning merchant, as in "chapman," "cheapside," etc. Jack is a term applied to inferior persons, etc. (Saxon, ceapa, a merchant; escapian, to buy; ceapman, a tradesman. (See Jack.)

Cheapeade Bargain (4). A very weak pun, meaning that the article was bought cheap or under its market value.

Cheater (2 syl.) originally meant an Escheator or officer of the king's exchequer appointed to receive due and taxes. The present use of the word shows how these officers were wont to fleece the people. (See Catchpole.)

Compare with escheator the New Testament word "Publicans," or collectors of the Roman tax in Judea, etc.

Cheek. Called also stone-cheek, kisvna (a sepulchral monument or cromlech).

"We find a rude cheek or flat stone of an oval form, about three yards in length, five feet over where broadest, and ten or twelve inches thick." —Camden.

Checkmate, in the game of chess, means placing your adversary's king in such a position that he can neither cover nor move out of check. Figuratively, "to checkmate" means to foil or outwit another; checkmated, outmanouevred. "Mate" (Arabic, mat, dead; Spanish, matar, to kill). The German schach means both chess and check, and the Italian scacco means the squares of the chess-board; but schach-matt and scacco-matto = check-mate. The French échec is a "stoppage," whence donner or faire échec et mat, to make a stoppage (check) and dead; the Spanish, sacar de matar, means the check of death (final check).

"If we go to Arabic for "mate," why not go there for "check" also? And "sheik mat" = the king dead, would be consistent and exact. (See Chess.)

Cheek. None of your cheek. None of your insolence. "None of your jaw" means none of your nagging or word irritation.

"We say a man is very cheeky, meaning that he is saucy and presumptuous. To give cheek. To be insolent. "Give me none of your cheek."

To have the cheek. To have the face or assurance. "He hadn't the cheek to ask for more."

"On account of his having so much cheek"—Dickens: Bleak House.

Cheek (7b). To be saucy. "You must cheek him well," i.e. confront him with fearless impudence; face him out.

Check by Jowl. In intimate con-fabulation; tête-à-tête. Check is the Anglo-Saxon ceaca, ceac-ben, cheek-bone; and jowl is the Anglo-Saxon cecele (the jaw); Irish, gial.

"I'll go with thee, check by jowl."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 2.

Cheese. Tusser says that a cheese, to be perfect, should not be like (1) Gehazi, i.e. dead white, like a leper; (2) not like Lot's wife, all salt; (3) not like Argus, full of eyes; (4) not like Tom Piper, "hoven and puffed," like the cheeks of a Piper; (5) not like Cripin, leathery; (6) not like Lazarus, poor; (7) not like Esau, hairy; (8) not like Mary Magdalen, full of whey or mauldin; (9) not like the Gentiles, full of maggots or gentils; and (10) not like a bishop, made of burnt milk. (Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.)

A cheese which has no resemblance to these ten defects is "quite the cheese."

Breath and cheese. Food generally, but of a frugal nature. "Come and take your bread and cheese with me this evening."

A green cheese. An unripe cheese.

The moon made of green cheese. A slight resemblance, but not in the least likely. "You will persuade him to believe that the moon is made of green cheese." (See above.)

"Tis an old rat that won't eat cheese. It must be a wondrously toothless man that is inaccessible to flattery; he must be very old indeed who can abandon his favourite indulgence; only a very cunning rat knows that cheese is a mere bait.

Cheese. Something choicest (Anglo-Saxon, cros-an, to choose; German, kiesan; French, choisir). Tusser says, "To choose whether she wold him marry or no."

"Now thou mightest choose How thou cousetst [conversest] to come, now thou Knowist all my names."—P. Ploughman's Vision.

It is not the cheese. Not the right thing; not what I should choose.

He is quite the cheese or just the cheese —i.e. quite the thing. By a double refinement we get the slang varieties, That's prime Stilton, or double Gloucester—i.e. slap bang up.

Cheeseparer (4). A skinflint; a man of small savings; economy carried Cherry

Chèn (French). Hoary, grey-headed. This word is much used in Paris to signify good, delicate, exquisite in flavour, delicious, de bon goût. It was originally applied to wine which is improved by age. Thus we hear commonly in Paris the expression, “Voûte du vin qui est bien chèn” (mellow with age). Sometimes gris (grey with age) is substituted, as “Nous en boirens tant de ce bon vin gris” (Le Tresor des Chansons Nouvelles, p. 79). The word, however, is by no means limited to wine, but is applied to well-nigh everything worthy of commendation. We even hear Chèn Reuix, good morning; and Chèn sorgue, good night. “Reuix,” of course, means “sunshine,” and “sorgue” is an old French word for evening or brown. “Chènnument” = à merveille.

Chequers. A public-house sign. In England without doubt the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henrys, was invested with the power of licensing vintners and publicans, may have helped to popularise this sign, which indicated that the house was duly licensed; but the sign has been found on houses in exhumed Pompeii, and probably referred to some game, like our draughts, which might be indulged in on the premises. Possibly in some cases certain public-houses were at one time used for the payment of doles, etc., and a chequer-board was provided for the purpose. In such cases the sign indicated the house where the parish authorities met for that and other purposes.

Chèronean [ch=k]. The Chèronoan Sage. Plutarch, who was born at Chèrono’s, in Boetia (46-120).

“This phrase, Ο Χερονεαν σαγος, is thine.”

Beotia: Μουστρελ.

Cherry. The whole tree or not a cherry on it. “Ait Chear and nullus.” All in all or none at all.

“This Hospitalier seems to be one of those magistical knives who must hate the whole tree, or they’ll not have a cherry on it.”

To make two bites of a cherry. To divide something too small to be worth dividing.

Cherry Fairs. Now called tea-gardens. Nothing to do with cherries; it is chery fairs—i.e. gay or recreation fairs. A “cheering” is a merry-making. Halliwell tells us that “Cherry (or rather chery) fairs are still held in Worcestershire.” Gower says of this Cheeseparing. A useless economy. The French say, “Une économie de boute de chandelles.” The allusion is to the well-known tale of a man who chose one of three sisters for wife by the way they pured their cheese. (See above.)

Cheese-Toaster (A). A sword; also called a “toasting-fork.” “Come! out with your toaster.” In Latin carneus means a dart, a spit used in roasting, or a toasting fork. Thus we have “pugnax sicuro venena Sabello” (Eui. vii. 663), and in Eui. i. 210, etc., we read that the men prepared their supper, after slaying the beasts, “pars in frativa secent, cerebusque tremulta firmat.” In the former example carneus is used for an instrument of war, and in the latter for a toasting-fork or spit.

Cheesewring (Lynton, Devon). A mass of eight stones, towering to the height of thirty-two feet; so called because it looks like a gigantic cheese-press. This is probably a natural work, the effect of some convulsion. The Kilmarnock Rocks and part of Hugh Lloyd’s Pulpit, present somewhat similar piles of stone.

Chef d’Oeuvre. A masterpiece. (French.) (Pronounce sha deuhr.)

Chemistry [kémiistry] is from the Arabic kimia, whence al-kimia (the occult art), from kaunai (to conceal).

Inorganic chemistry is that branch of chemistry which is limited to metallic and non-metallic substances, which are not organised bodies.

Organic chemistry is devoted to organised bodies and their elements.

Chemos or Chemosh [Këmosh]. War-god of the Moabites; god of lust.

“Next, Chemos, the obscene dread of Moab’s sons. From Aroer to Nebo, and the wild Of southwest Abarim.”

Chennapppa. The city of Chennappa. So Madras is called by the natives.
world. "Alle is but a cherey-fayre," a phrase frequently met with.

"This life, my son, is but a cherey-fayre."—Morgan's Bedri (quoted by Halliwell).

Cherry Trees and the Cuckoo. The cherry tree is strangely mixed up with the cuckoo in many cuckoo stories, because of the tradition that the cuckoo must eat three good meals of cherries before he is allowed to cease singing.

"Cuckoo, cuckoo, cherry-tree,
Good bird, balder, tell to me,
How many years I am to see.

The answer is made by the cuckoo repeating its cry the prophetic number of times.

Cherubins. The 11th Hussars are so called, by a bad pun, because their trousers are of a cherry colour.

Cherry and Fair-Star. Cherry was the son of a king's brother and Brunetia; Fair-star was the daughter of the king and Blondina, the two fathers being brothers, and the two mothers sisters. They were cast on the sea adrift, but were found and brought up by a corsair and his wife. Ultimately they are told of their birth by a green bird, and marry each other. This tale is imitated from The Sisters who Enraged their Younger Sister, in Arabian Nights.

N.B.—The name is from the French cher (dear), and is about equal to "deary" or "dear one." It is quite wrong to spell it with a double r. (Contesse d'Aulny: Fairy Tales.)

Cheshire is the Latin castra-shire, called by the Romans Devana castra (the camp town of Deva, or Dee-mouth).

Chess. Called by the Hindus shetra: aha (the four arms) i.e. the four members of the army—viz. elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers; called by the ancient Persians shetriang. The Arabs, who have neither c nor g, called it shettr, which modern Persians corrupted into sawt, whence the Italian scacchi, German schach, French échec, our chess. (See page 242, CHECKMATE.)

Chesterfield, landed by Thomson in his Winter is the fourth earl, author of Chesterfield's Letters to His Son (1694-1773).

Chesterfield House (London) was built by Isaac Ware for Philip, fourth earl of Chesterfield. (See above.)

Chesnut. A stale joke. In The Broken Sword, an old melodrama by William Dillon, Captain Xavier is forever telling the same jokes with variations. He was telling about one of his exploits, connected with a cork-tree, when Pablo corrects him, "A chestnut-tree you mean, captain." "Bah! (replied the captain) I say a cork-tree." "A chestnut-tree," insists Pablo. "I must know better than you (said the captain); it was a cork-tree, I say." "A chestnut (persisted Pablo). I have heard you tell the joke twenty-seven times, and I am sure it was a chestnut."

Chesterfield. This is an illustration of the enduring vitality of the 'chestnut?' joke. (See Notes and Queries.)

Chestnut Sunday. Rogation Sunday, or the Sunday before Ascension Day.

Cheval (French, a cheval). Troops are arranged à cheval when they command two roads, as Wellington's army at Waterloo, which, being at the apex of two roads, commanded that between Charleroi and Brussels, as well as that to Mons.

"The Western Powers will assuredly never permit Russia to place herself again a cheval between the Ottoman Empire and France."—The Times.

Cheval de Bataille (His). His strong argument. (See Notes and Queries, May 22nd, 1886, p. 410.)

Chevalier d'Industrie. A man who lives by his wits and calls himself a gentleman.

"Benencher de la ville, chevalier de l'ordre de l'Industrie, qui va chercher quelques bien nids, quelque femme qui lui faise un fortune."—Gondomar, ou l'Homme Prodigieux (1713).

Chevaux de Frise (French). Horses of Friesland. A beam filled with spikes to keep off horses; so called from its use in the siege of Groningen, Friesland, in 1594. A somewhat similar engine had been used before, but was not called by the same name. In German it is "a Spanish horsemaw" (ein Spanischer Reiter).

Cheveril. He has a cheveril conscience. One that will easily stretch-hke cheveril or kid leather.

"Oh here's a wit of cheveril, that stretches from an inch narrow to an eel broad."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

"Your soft cheveril conscience would receive,
If you might please to stretch it."

Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 3.

Chevy Chase. There had long been a rivalry between the families of Percy and Douglas, which showed itself by Incessant raids into each other's territory. Percy of Northumberland one day vowed he would hunt for three days in the Scottish border, without descending to ask leave of Earl Douglas. The Scotch turned said in his anger, "Tell this vaunter he shall find one day more than sufficient." The ballad called "Chervy Chase" mixes up this hunt with the battle of Otterburn, which, Dr. Percy justly observes, was a very different event." (Chaucer, "Chevauchie"), a military expedition on horseback."

To louder strains he raised his voice, to tell What woful wars in 'Chevy Chase' betell, When Percy drove the deer with hound and horn. Wars to be wept by children yet unborn." — Guy: Pastoral VI.

Chiabreresco (Italian). Poetry formed on the Greek model; so called from Gabriel Chiabrera, a name the "Pindar of Italy" (1552-1637).

Chiaroscuro [pronounce ke-adv-ro-skew-ro]. A style of painting now called "black and white."

"Chiaroscuro,
, is the art of representing light and shadow in shadow and light, so that the parts represented in shadow shall have the clearness and warmth of those in light; and those in light, the depth and softness of those in shadow." — Chambers: Encyclopedia, 11. p. 171.

Chibis_boes. The musician; the harmony of nature personified. He teaches the birds to sing and the brooks to warble as they flow. "All the many sounds of nature borrow sweetness from his singing."

"Very dear to Hiawatha
Was the gentle Chibisbos.
For his gentleness he loved him,
And the magic of his singing."

Loungell: Hiawatha, I.

Chibouque (A). A smoking-pipe with a long tube, used in the East (Turkish).

Chic. Fashionable; comme il faut; the mode. This is an archaic French word in vogue in the seventeenth century. It really is the Spanish chico, little, also a little boy, and chien, a little girl or darling. Similarly, thee in Scotch is a loving term of admiration rude pride. (Chic is an abbreviation of the German geschick, apt, clever.)

"J'aime de motz de l'art, je mot en manche hic; J'esperre avec le tems que j'entendras la chie."

Les d'argan de Du Lorsen, XII. p. 87.

Avoir la chic. To have the knack of doing the thing smartly Chicard and chicaneur — elegant, de grand style, are very common expressions with artists.

Chicovache (3 syl). French for the "sorry cow," a monster that lived only on good women—all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce. The old English romancers invented another monster, which they called Bicorn, as fat as the other was lean; but, luckily, he had for food "good and enduring husbands," of which there is no lack. (See Bicorne.)

"O noble wvvs, full of high prudent,
Let me but live one of your tongs table:
No let no clerk have cause of dispraise
To write or you a story of such marvel.
As of Guinevas, pacient and kynte,
Lest Chichivache you swolve in his entrails."

The French chiche-face means "thin-face." Lydigate wrote a poem entitled "Byorney and Chichovache."

Chick-a-biddy (A). A child's name for a young chicken, and a mother's word of endearment to her young child. "Biddly" is merely the call of a child, bid-bid-bid-bid, to a chicken.

"Do you, sweet Rob? Do you truly, chick-a-biddy?" — Dickens: Dombey and Son.

Chicken (plural chickens). It is quite a mistake to suppose "chickens" to be a double plural. The Anglo-Saxon is cieon, plural cieon._ We have a few plural forms in -en, as ox-en, brack-en, children, brethren, hosen, and eyen; but of these children and brethren are not the most ancient forms. "Chick" is a mere contraction of chicken.

The old plural forms of "child" are childe-er, dialectic child-er; children in a later form. The old plural forms of "brother" are brethren, brother, brethren; later forms are brethren and brethren (now brothers).

Children and chicken must always be pickin'. Are always hungry and ready to eat food.

To count your chickens ere they are hatched (Hudibras). To anticipate profits before they come. One of Aesop's fables describes a market woman saying she would get so much for her eggs, with the money she would buy a goose; the goose in time would bring her so much, with which she would buy a cow, and so on; but in her excitement she kicked over her basket, and all her eggs were broken. The Latins said, "Don't sing your song of triumph before you have won the victory" (ante victoriain can'ter triumphum). "Don't crow till you are out of the wood." has a similar meaning. (See page 36, col. 2, Alnaschar's Dream.)

Curves like chickens come home to roost. (See under Curses.)

Mother Carey's chickens. (See Mother Carey.)

She's no chicken. Not young. The young child as well as the young fowl is called a chicken or chick.
Children of St. Nicholas (The). So the Piedmontese call the ladybird, or little red beetle with spots of black, called by the Russians "God's little cow," and by the Germans, "God's little horse" sent as a messenger of love.

Chieln-hearted. Cowardly. Young fowls are remarkably timid, and run to the wing of the hen upon the slightest cause of alarm.

Chien. Entre chien et loup. Dusk, between daylight and lamp-light; owlight.

"The best time to talk of difficult things is entre chien et loup, as the Guernsey folk say."—Mrs. Edwards: A Guernsey Girl, chap. xi.

Chien de Jean de Nivelle (Le), which never came when it was called. Jean de Nivelle was the eldest son of Jean II. de Montmorency, born about 1423. He espoused the cause of the Duke of Burgundy against the orders of Louis XI. and the wish of his father, who disinherited him. Bouillet says: Jean de Nivelle était devenu en France à cause du refus qu'il fit de répondre à l'appel de son roi un objet de haine et de mépris; et le peuple lui donna le surnom injurieux de chien, de là le proverbe.

"C'est le chien de Jean de Nivelle Qui s'en fait toujours quand on l'appelle.

The Italians call this Arrilotto's dog.

Child, at one time, meant a female infant, and was the correlative of boy.

"Mercy on 't! A baby, a very pretty baby. A boy or a child, I wonder?"—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, in. 2.

Child of God (A), in the Anglican and Catholic Church, means one who has been baptised; others consider the phrase to mean one converted by special grace and adopted into the holy family of God’s Church.

"In my baptism, wherein I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven."—Church Catechism.

Child of the Cord. So the defendant was called by the judges of the vehmggericht in Westphalia, because everyone condemned by the tribunal was hanged to the branch of a tree.

Child, as Childe Harold, Childe of Eldechilde Waters, Childe Roland, Childe Tristan, Childe Arthur, etc. In all these cases the word "Childe" is a title of honour, like the infante and infanta of Spain. In the times of chivalry, the noble youths who were candidates for knighthood were, during their time of probation, called infants, valets, damoyets, and bacheliers. Child or infant was the term given only to the most noble. (In Anglo-Saxon, the same word [cynht] means both a child and a knight.)

Childe Harold. A man sated of the world, who roams from place to place to flee from himself. The "childe" is, in fact, Lord Byron himself, who was only twenty-one when he began, and twenty-eight when he finished the poem. In canto i. (1809), he visited Portugal and Spain; in canto ii. (1810), Turkey in Europe; in canto iii. (1816), Belgium and Switzerland; and in canto iv. (1817), Venice, Rome, and Florence.

Children. The children in the wood. The master of Wayland Hall, Norfolk, on his deathbed left a little son, three years old, and a still younger daughter, named Jane, to the care of his wife’s brother. The boy was to have £300 a year when he came of age, and the girl £500 as a wedding portion; but, if the children died previously, the uncle was to inherit. After twelve months had elapsed, the uncle hired two ruffians to murder the two babes. As they went along one of the ruffians relented, and killed his fellow; then, putting down the children in a wood, left them. The poor babes gathered blackberries to allay their hunger, but died during the night, and "Robin Redbreast" covered them over with strawberry leaves. All things went ill with the cruel uncle; his sons died, his barns were fired, his cattle died, and he himself perished in gaol. After the lapse of seven years, the ruffian was taken up for highway robbery, and confessed the whole affair. (Ferry: Recites, iii. ii. 18.)

"Then said he song: The Children in the Wood. (Ah! treacherous uncle, stained with infant blood?) How blackberries they pinched in deserts wild, And fearles at the glittering faulchion smiled; Their little corpse the robin-redbreast found, And strewn with pious sighs the leaves around."—Gay: Pastoral I.

Children. Three hundred and sixty-five at a birth. It is said that the Countess of Henneberg accused a beggar of adultery because she carried twins, whereupon the beggar prayed that the countess might carry as many children as there are days in the year. According to the legend, this happened on Good Friday, 1276. All the males were named John, and all the females Elizabeth. The countess was forty-two at the time.

Children as plural of "child." (See under Chicken, page 245, col. 2.)
Chilenos. People of Chili.
Chilian. A native of Chili, pertaining to Chili, etc.
Chil'iesta [ki'iesta]. Another word for Millevarians; those who believe that Christ will return to this earth and reign a thousand years in the midst of His saints. (Greek, chilia, a thousand.)

Chillingham Cattle. A breed of cattle (Bos taurus) in the park of the Earl of Tankerville, supposed to be the last remnant of the wild oxen of Britain.

Chillon. Prisoner of Chillon. François de Bonnivard, of Lunes. Lord Byron makes him one of six brothers, all of whom suffered as martyrs. The father and two sons died on the battlefield; one was burnt at the stake; three were incarcerated in the dungeon of Chillon near the lake of Geneva; of these, two died, and François was set at liberty by "the Bearmaid." Byron says that Bonnivard has left traces of his footsteps in the pavement of the dungeon. He was put in prison for "republican principles" by the Duke-Bishop of Savoy. (1496-1570.)

Chilmear' and Balbec. Two cities built by the Genii, acting under the orders of Jan ben Jan, who governed the world long before the time of Adam. Chilmear, or the "Forty Pillars," is Persepolis. These two cities were built as lurking places for the Genii to hide in.

Chiltern Hundreds (The). There are three, viz. Stoke, Desborough, and Benenham (or Burnham). At one time the Chiltern Hills, between Bedford and Hertford, etc., were covered with beech trees which formed shelter for robbers; so a steward was appointed by the Crown to put down these marauders and protect the inhabitants of the neighbourhood from depredations. The necessity of such watch and ward has long since ceased, but the office remains; and, since 1750, when Member of Parliament wishes to vacate his seat, one way of doing so is by applying for the stewardship of the three Chiltern Hundreds. The application being granted, the Member is advanced to an office under the Crown, and his seat in the House is ex officio vacated. Immediately the Member has effectually his object, he resigns his office again. The gift is in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was refused to a Member for Reading in 1842.

Chintz or Jink. Money; so called because it chinks or jingles in the purse. Thus, if a person is asked if he has money, he rattles that which he has in his purse or pocket.

Chintz means spotted. The cotton goods originally manufactured in the East. (Persian, chinz, spotted, stained; Hindu, chint, plur. chintas; Sanscrit, chitra, variegated.)
Chios (K'ës). The man of Chios. Homer, who lived at Chios, near the Ægean Sea. Seven cities claim to be his place of birth—

"Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athens."—Perry.

Chip or Chips.

A carpenter is known by his chips. A man is known to be a carpenter by the chips in his workshop, so that the profession or taste of other men may be known by their manners or mode of speech. There is a broadcloth slang as well as a corduroy slang; a military, naval, school, and university slang.

Such carpenters, such chips. As the workman, so his work will be.

Brother Chip. Properly a brother carpenter, but in its extended meaning applied to anyone of the same vocation as ourselves. (En nostre fuscæ; Petronius.)

The ship's carpenter is, at sea, commonly addressed as "chips."

Saratoga chips. Potatoes sliced thin while raw, and fried crisp. Sometimes called chipped potatoes.

Chip of the Old Block (4). A son or child of the same stuff as his father. The chip is the same wood as the block. Burke applied the words to W. Pitt.

Chiron [Ki'ron]. The centaur who taught Achilles music, medicine, and hunting. Jupiter placed him in heaven among the stars, where he is called Sagittarius (the Archer).

Chiron, according to Dante, has watch over the lake of boiling blood, in the seventh circle of hell.

Chirping Cup or Glass. A merry-making glass or cup of liquor. Wine that maketh glad the heart of man, or makes him sing for joy.

"A chirping cup is my mirth's song,
And my vaster bell is my bowl: ding dong."

Chisel. I chiselled him means, I cheated him, or cut him out of something.

Chitty-faced. Baby-faced, lean. A chit is a child or sprout. Both chit and chitty-faced are terms of contempt.

(Anglo-Saxon, cith, a twig, etc.)

Chivalry.

The paladins of Charlemagne were all scattered by the battle of Roncesvalles.

The champions of Did’erick were all assassinated at the instigation of Chriemhil’dal, the bride of Exzel, King of the Huns.

The Knights of the Round Table were all extirpated by the fatal battle of Camlan.

Chivalry. The six following clauses may be considered almost as axioms of the Arthurian romances—:

1. There was no braver or more noble king than Arthur.
2. No fairer or more faithless wife than Guin’iver.
3. No truer pair of lovers than Tristan and Isolt (or Tristram and Ysilde).
4. No knight more faithful than Sir Kaye.
5. None so brave and amorous as Sir Laun’celot.
6. None so virtuous as Sir Gal’ahad.

The flower of Chivalry. William Douglas, Lord of Liddesdale. (Fourteenth century.)

Chivy. A chase in the school game of "Prisoners’ Base" or "Prison Bars." Probably a gipsy word. One boy sets a chivy, by leaving his bar, when one of the opposite side chases him, and if he succeeds in touching him before he reaches "home," the boy touched becomes a prisoner.

Chivy or Chivvy. Slang for the face. Much slang is due to rhyme, and when the rhyme is a compound word the rhyming part is sometimes dropped and the other part remains. Thus Chivy [Chevy]-chase rhymes with "face," by dropping "chase." Chivy remains, and becomes the accepted slang word. Similarly, daisies = boots, thus: daisy-roots will rhyme with "boots," and by dropping "roots," the rhyme, daisy remains. By the same process sky is the slang for pocket, the compound word which gave birth to it being "sky-rocket." "Christmas" the slang for a railway guard, as "Ask the Christmas," is, of course, from the rhyme "Christmas-curd"; and "raspberry" the slang for heart, is from the rhyme "raspberry-tart."

"Then came a knock at the Story's door, Which made my raspberry tart."

Other examples given under their proper heads.

Chleo (Klo’ve). The shepherdess beloved by Daphnis in the pastoral romance of Longus, entitled Daphnis and Chleo. St. Pierre’s tale of Paul and Virginia is founded on the exquisite romance of Longus.

* Prior calls Mrs. Centlivre "Cleo."

Chloe, in Pope’s Moral Essays (epist. ii.), Lady Suffolk, mistress of George II.

"Content to dwell in decencies for ever."
Choereses. [K'rees]. The lover of Callirrhoe, in Chariton's Greek romance, called the Loves of Choereses and Callirrhoe. (Eighth century.)

Choice Spirit (A) or "Choice Spirit of the Age," a gallant of the day, being one who delights to exaggerate the whims of fashion.

Hobson's Choice. (See Hobson.)

Choke. May this piece of bread choke me, if what I say is not true. In ancient times a person accused of robbery had a piece of barley bread, on which the mass had been said, given him to swallow. He put it in his mouth uttering the words given above, and if he could swallow it without being choked, he was pronounced innocent. Tradition ascribes the death of the Earl Godwin to choking with a piece of bread, after this solemn appeal. (See CORNS.)

Choke-pear. An argument to which there is no answer. Robbers in Holland at one time made use of a piece of iron in the shape of a pear, which they forced into the mouth of their victim. On turning a key, a number of springs thrust forth points of iron in all directions, so that the instrument of torture could never be taken out except by means of the key.

Choker (A). A neckcloth. A white choker is a white neckcloth or necktie, worn in full dress, and generally by waiters and clergymen. Of course, the verb to choker has supplied the word.

Chop and Chops. Chop and change (To). To barter by the rule of thumb. Boys "chop" one article for another (Anglo-Saxon, cip-an, or cep-an, to sell or barter).

A mutton chop is from the French coup-on, to cut off. A piece chopped off. The wind chops about. Shifts from point to point suddenly. This is cip-an, to barter or change hands. (See above To CHOP AND CHANGE.)

"How the House of Lords and House of Commons chopp'd round."—Tom Brown's Schooldays.

Chop-fallen. Crest-fallen; down in the mouth. (See next column, Chops.)

Chop-House (A). An eating-house where chops and steaks are served.

"John Bull, I'd have a chop-house at the very gates of paradise."—Washington Irving: vol. i. chap. vi. p. 61.

A Chinese custom-house is called a Chop-house (Hindu, chop, a stamp).

Chop Logic (To). To bandy words; to altercation. Lord Bacon says, "Let not the council chop with the judge." (See CHOP AND CHANGE.)

"How now, how now, chop logik! What is this? Proud! and 'I thank you,' and 'I thank you not.'
And yet not proud."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5.

Chops. The face, is allied to the Latin caput, the head; Greek κεφαλή, Anglo-Saxon ceolf, the snout; in the plural, the cheeks. We talk of a "pig's chop."

The Latin cap-ut gives us the word choy, a fellow or man; and its alliance with chop gives us the term "chopped hands," etc. Everyone knows the answer given to the girl who complained of chopped lips: "My dear, you should not let the chops come near your lips."

Down in the chops—i.e., down in the mouth; in a melancholy state; with the mouth drawn down. (Anglo-Saxon, ceolf, the snout or jaw; Icelandic, kippr.)

Chops of the Channel. The short broken motion of the waves, experienced in crossing the English Channel; also the place where such motion occurs.

Chopine (2 syl.), or Chopin. A high-heeled shoe. The Venetian ladies used to wear "high-heeled shoes like stilts." Hamlet says of the actress, "Your ladyship is nearer to heaven, than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine" (act ii. s. 2). (Spanish, chapin, a high cork shoe.)

Chorale. [Ko'ræ]. A sect of heretics, who, among other errors, persisted in keeping the Sunday a fast.

Choriambic Metre. Horace gives us a great variety, but the main feature in all is the prevalence of the choriambus (— — — —). specimen translations of two of these metres are subjoined:

(1) Horace, 1 Odes, xvii.

When you, with an approving smile,
Praise those delicate arms, I dy, of Telephus,
Ah me, I hope you stir up my labs!
Heart-sick, that for a boy you should forsake me thus.

Chouans (2 syl.). French insurgents of the Royalist party during the Revolution. Jean Cottereau was their leader, nicknamed chouan (owl), because he was accustomed to warn his companions of danger by imitating the screech of an owl. Cotterneau was followed by George Cadoudal.

? It is an error to suppose Chouan to be a proper name.

Choughs Protected. (See page 137, col. 1, Birds, etc.)

Choune (1 syl.). To cheat out of something. Gifford says the interpreter of the Turkish embassy in England is called chiuns, and in 1609 this chaimus contrived to defraud his government of £4,000, an enormous sum at that period. From the notoriety of the swindle the word chiuns or to choune was adopted.

"He is no chiuns."

*Ninian Jones: Aitkenhead, i. 1 (1610)."

Chriem-bid's or Chriem-hild. A woman of unrivalled beauty, sister of Gunther, and beloved by Siegfried, the two chief heroes of the Nibelungenlied. Siegfried gives her a talisman taken from Gunther's lady-love, and Gunther, in a fit of jealousy, induces Hagen to murder his brother-in-law. Chriemhild in revenge murders Ezzel, King of the Huns; invites the Nibelungs to the wedding feast; and there they are all put to the sword, except Hagen and Gunther, who are taken prisoners, and put to death by the bride. (See KRIEM-HILD.)

Chris-cross Row (row to rhyme with low). The alphabet in a hornbook, which had a cross at the beginning and end.

"Philosopher is all the go, And science quite the fashion; Our grandsons learnt the Chris-cross Row, L–d, how their daughters dangle." (Anon. in the Egelet.)

Chrisom or Chriasm signifies properly "the white cloth set by the minister at baptism on the head of the newly anointed with chrisom"—i.e. a composition of oil and balm. In the Form of Private Baptism is this direction: "Then the minister shall put the white vesture, commonly called the chrisome, upon the child." The child thus baptized is called a chrisom or chrisom child. If it dies within the month, it is shrouded in the vesture; and hence, in the bills of mortality, even to the year 1726, infants that died within the month were termed chrisoms. *(The cloth is so called because it was anointed. Greek, chrisma, verb chrio, to anoint.)*

"A' made a finer end and went away as it had been any chrisom child." *(Shakespeare: Henry V, ii. 3.)

Christabel (Kris'tabel). The heroine of Coleridge's fragmentary poem of that name.

Christabelle (Kris'tabel). Daughter of a "bonnie king" in Ireland. She fell in love with Sir Cauline (q. v.).

Christendom (Kris'-en-dum) generally means all Christian countries; but Shakespeare uses it for baptism, or "Christian citizenship." Thus, in King John, the young prince says:

"By my christendom: So I were out of prison and kept sheep, I should be merry as the day is long." (Act iv. sc. 1.)

Christian (ch = k). The hero of John Bunyan's allegory called The Pilgrim's Progress. He fies from the "City of Destruction," and journeys to the "Celestial City." He starts with a heavy burden on his back, but it falls off when he stands at the foot of the cross. Christian. A follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch (Acts xi. 26).

Most Christian Doctor. John Chardile de Gerson (1363-1429).

Most Christian King. The style of the King of France. (1469.)

Pepin le Bref was so styled by Pope Stephen III. (714-768.)

Charles lo Chauve was so styled by the council of Savonnieres (823, 840-877.)

Louis XI. was so styled by Pope Paul II. (1423, 1461-1483.)

Since which time (1469) it was universally adopted in the French monarchy.

"And thus, O happy, with gaudy trophies plumed, Most Christian king, Also in vain assumed..." (Camus: Lorent, book v.)

Founder of Christian Eloquence. Louis Bordalone, the French preacher (1632-1704).

Christian Traditions, connected with natural objects.

1. Birds, Beasts, and Fishes.

   The Ass: Cross on the back. (See Ass.)

   Bunting. (See Yellow-Hammer.)

   "The Crossbill has nothing to do with the Christian cross; the bird is so called, because its mandibles cross each other."

   Haddock: The finger-marks on the Haddock and John Dory. (See Haddock, etc.)

   Ichthus, a fish. (See Ichthus.)

   Pike's Head (q. v.)

   Pigeons or Doves: The Russians are averse to pigeons as a food, because the Holy Ghost assumed the form of a dove at the baptism of Jesus. (Sporting Magazine, January, 1825, p. 307.)

Chronicle Small Beer (70). To note down events of no importance whatsoever.

"He was a wight, if ever such wight were."
"To suckle fools and chronicle small beer."
—Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1

Chronicle on Chronies.
Florence, a monk of Worcester, the earliest of our English chroniclers. It begins from Creation, and goes down to 1119, in which year the author died; but it was continued by another hand to 1141. Printed in 4to at London, 1592. Its chief value consists in its serving as a key to the Saxon chronicle.

Chronicon-noton-thelogoos [ch = k]. A burlesque pomposo in Henry Carey's farce, so called. Anyone who delivers an inflated address.

"Aldhonorathepheaphorma, where left you Chroniconnotonthelogoos?"—H. Carey.

Chrysalis [ch = k]. The form which caterpillars assume before they are converted into butterflies or moths. The chrysalis is also called an aurelia, from the Latin aurum, gold. The external covering of some species has a metallic, golden hue, but others are green, red, black, etc. (Greek, chrusos, gold.)

* The plural is either chrysalides or chrysalides (4 syll.).

Chryseor [ch = k]. Sir Aragall's sword, "that all other swords excelled."
—Spenser: Faerie Queene. (See Sword.)

Chrysippus. Nisi Chrysippus frisnet, Portionen non esset, Chrysippus of Soli was a disciple of Zeno the Stoic, and Cleanthes his successor. He did for the Stoics what St. Paul did for Christianity—that is, he explained the system, showed by plausible reasoning its truth, and how it was based on a solid foundation. Stoicism was founded by Zeno, it is true; but if Chrysippus had not advocated it, the system would never have taken root.

Chubb (Thomas). A deistical writer who wrote upon miracles in the first half of the eighteenth century.

"He heard of Blount, of Mandeville, and Chubb."—Crabbé: Borough.

Chuck Full. Probably a corruption of chock full or choke full—i.e. full enough to choke one.

"Aye was holding some grand market; streets and lan had been chokefull during the sunny hours."—Carlyle, in Beside Jane W. Carlyle, vol. 4, letter lxxxvii. p. 273.

Chukwa. The tortoise at the South Pole on which the earth is said to rest.

Church. A cron, a familiar companion, properly a bedfellow; a corruption either of chambermate or conrade.

"To have a good chum is one of the pleasantest parts of a voyage."—Northcote: Merchant Veneale, chap. xii. p. 164.

Chum in with (70). To be on friendly terms with. (See above)

Church. The etymology of this word is generally assumed to be from the Greek, Kuriou oikos (house of God); but this is most improbable, as the word existed in all the Celtic dialects long before the introduction of Greek. No doubt the word means a "circle." The places of worship among the German and Celtic nations were always circular. (Welsh, cwrch; French, cirque; Scotch, cirk; Greek, kirkos, etc.) Compare Anglo-Saxon circe, a church, with circul, a circle.

High, Low, and Broad Church. Dr. South says, "The High Church are those who think highly of the Church and lowly of themselves; the Low Church, those who think lowly of the Church and highly of themselves" (this may be epigrammatic, but the latter half is not true). Broad Church are those who think the Church is broad enough for all religious parties, and their own views of religion are chiefly of a moral nature, their doctrinal views being so rounded and elastic that they can come into collision with no one.

"By the "High Church" now are meant those who follow the "Oxford Movement"; the "Low Church" party call themselves the "Evangelical" Church party.

The Church of Latter-day Saints. The Mormons.

The Anglican Church. That branch of the Protestant Church which, at the Reformation, was adopted in England. It disavowed the authority of the Pope, and rejected certain dogmas and rules of the Roman Church.

* Since 1532 generally called the "Established Church," because established by Act of Parliament.

The Catholic Church. The Western Church called itself so when it separated from the Eastern Church. It is also called the Roman Catholic Church, to distinguish it from the Anglican Church or Anglican Catholic Church, a branch of the Western Church.

The Established Church. The State Church, which, in England, is Episcopalian and in Scotland Presbyterian.
Before the Reformation it was, in both countries, “Catholic;” before the introduction of Christianity it was Pagan, and before that Druidism. In Turkey it is Mohammedanism; in Russia the Greek Church; in China, India, etc., other systems of religion.

To go into the Church. To take holy orders, or become an "ordained" clergyman.

Church-goer (A). One who regularly attends the parish church.

Church Invisible (The). Those who are known to God alone as His sons and daughters by adoption and grace. (See Church Visible.)

Church Militant. The Church on earth means the whole body of believers, who are said to be "waging the war of faith" against "the world, the flesh, and the devil." It is therefore militant, or in warfare. (See Church Triumphant.)

Church Porch (The) was used in ancient times for settling money transactions, paying dowries, rents, and purchases of estates. Consequently, it was furnished with benches on both sides. Hence, Lord Stourton sent to invite the Hartgills to meet him in the porch of Kilmington church to receive the £2,000 awarded them by the Star Chamber. (Lord de Ros: Tower of London.)

Church Triumphant (The). Those who are dead and gone to their rest. Having fought the fight and triumped, they belong to the Church triumphant in heaven. (See Church Militant.)

Church Visible (The). All ostensibly Christians; all who profess to be Christians; all who have been baptised and admitted into Church Communion. (See Church Invisible.)

Churched. Baptized.

To church a woman is to read the appointed service when a woman comes to church to return thanks to God for her "safe deliverance" and restored health.

Churchwarden (A). A long clay pipe, such as churchwardens used to smoke some half a century ago when they met together in the parish tavern, after they had made up their accounts in the vestry, or been elected to office at the Easter meeting.

"Thirty years have enabled those [tin-foil pipes] to destroy short clays, ruin meerschaum, and even do much mischief to the venerable 'churchwarden.'"—Notes and Queries, April 25th, 1855, p. 52.

Churchyard Cough (A). A consumptive cough indicating the near approach of death.

Chuzzlewit (Martin). The hero of Dickens's novel so called. Jonas Chuzzlewit is a type of mean tyranny and sordid greed.

Chyndowax. A chief Druid, whose tomb, with a Greek inscription, was discovered near Dijon in 1598.

Ci-devant (French). Former, of times gone by. As Ci-devant governor—i.e. once a governor, but no longer so. Ci-devant philosophers means philosophers of former days.

"The application of mistresses put her in mind of her ci-devant abasement."—Jane Porter: Thaddeus of Wartmore, chap. xvi.

Cicerc. So called from the Latin, cicer (a wart or vetch). Plutarch says "a flat excrescence on the tip of his nose gave him this name." His real name was (Tullius) Tully.

La Bouche de Ciceron. Philippe Pot, prime minister of Louis XI. (1428-1494.)

The Cicer of France. Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663-1742.)

The Cicer of Germany. Johann III., elector of Brandenburg. (1455-1499.)

The Cicer of the British Senate. George Canning (1770-1827.)

The British Cicer. William Pitt, Earl of Chatham (1708-17, 8.)

The German Cicer. Johann Sturm, printer and scholar. (1507-1589.)

Cicerone (4 syl.). A guide to point out objects of interest to strangers. So called in the same way as Paul was called by the men of Lystra "Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker" (Acts xiv. 12). Ciceron was the speaker of speakers at Rome; and certainly, in a party of "sight-seers, the guide is "the chief speaker." It is no compliment to the great orator to call the glib patterer of a show-place a Ciceron: but we must not throw stones at our Italian neighbours, as we have conferred similar honour on our great epic poet in changing "Grub Street" into "Milton Street."

* Pronounce chich-er-ohn.

"Every glib and loquacious hireling who shows wonders about their pleasure-galleries, palaces, and ruins, is called (in Italy) a cicerone or a ciceroni."—Tranck: On the Study of Words, lecture iv. p. 88.

7 In England, generally called "a guide."
Cielisbeo [che-chiz-bee'-o]. A danger about women; the professed gallant of a married woman. Also the knot of silk or ribbon which is attached to fans, walking-sticks, umbrellas, etc. Cicisbeism, the practice of dangling about women.

Cleántus or Cyllénius. Mercury. So called from mount Cyllén, in Pelleponnesus, where he was born.

Cicuta. In Latin cicáta means the length of a reed up to the knot, such as the internodes made into a Pan-pipe. Hence Virgil (Ec. ii. 36) describes a Pan-pipe as "septem comparta cicátis fistula." It is called Cow-bane, because cows not unfrequently eat it, but are killed by it. It is one of the most poisonous of plants, and some think it made the fatal draught given to Socrates.

"Arum cictan in monte seminat, sic cicuta vinum."—Pind. xiv. 7.
"Quae poterunt inquiram satis expurgare cicuta."—Horace: &eck. ii. 23.

Cid. Arabic for lord. Don Roderigo Laynez, Ruy Diaz (son of Diaz), Count of Bivar. He was called "mio cid el campedador," my lord the champion (1025-1099). Corruption of Said.

The Cid's horse. Babieca. (3 or 4 syl.). (See Horse.)

The Cid's sword. Cola'da. The sword taken by the Cid Roderigo from King Bucar was called Tizyina. (See Sword.)

The Portuguese Cid. Nunez Alva'rez Pereira, general diplomatist. (1360-1431.)

Cid Hamet Benengeli. The supposititious author of Don Quixote's Adventures.

Cigogne. (French). A stork. Conte de la cigogne. An old wife's tale; silly title-tattle. "On conte des choses merveilleuses de la cigogne" (wonderful stories are told of the stork). This, no doubt, refers to the numerous Swedish legends of the stork, one of which is that its very name is derived from a stork flying round the cross of Christ, crying, "Styrka! Styrka!" (strengthen, strengthen, or bear up), and as the stork has no voice at all, the legend certainly is a "Conte de la cigogne," or old wife's fable.

"J'apprèhends qu'on ne croie que tout ce que j'ai rapporté jusqu'ici ne passe pour des rimes de la cigogne, on de ma mere l'ore."—Le Roman Hougojoin. 1718.

Cili'res. (See Horse.)

Cimmerian Bosporus. The strait of Kaffa.

Cimmerian Darkness. Homer (possibly from some story as to the Arctic night) supposes the Cimmerians to dwell in a land "beyond the ocean-stream," where the sun never shone. (Odys., xi. 14.)

"In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell."—Millen: L'Allegro.

Cinchoa or Quinine. So named from the wife of the Condi del Chinchon, viscount of Peru, whence the bark was first sent to Europe in 1640. Linnaeus erroneously named it Cinchoa for Chinchon. (See Peruvian Bark.)

Cincinnati, the Roman, was ploughing his field, when he was saluted as Dictator. After he had conquered the Volsci and delivered his country from danger, he laid down his office and returned to his plough.

"And Cincinnati, awed from the plough."—Thomson: Winter, 122.

Cindersl'a [little cinder girl]. Heroine of a fairy tale. She is the drudge of the house, dirty with housework, while her elder sisters go to fine halls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is discovered by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own.

The glass slipper is a mistranslation of pantoufle en var (a fur slipper), not en verre. (R. C. Ivraught: Contes de Fees.)

Cinque Cento. An epithet applied to art between 1500-1600; called in France Renaissance, and in England Elizabethan. It was the revival of the classical or antique, but is generally understood as a derogatory term, implying debased or inferior art. The great schools of art closed with 1500. The "immortal five" great painters were all born in the previous century: viz. Leonardo da Vinci, born 1452; Michel Angleo, 1474: Titian, 1477; Raphael, 1480; and Correggio, 1494. Cinque Cento is the Italian for 500, omitting the thousand—mi cinque cento.

Cinque Ports (The). Originally the five seaports: Hastings, Sandwich, Dover, Romney, and Hythe. Subsequently Winchelsea and Rye were added.

Cinter (A). The framing erected between piers to hold up the stones of an arch during the making thereof.

"Certain crude beliefs may be useful in the infancy of a nation, but when the intelligence is fully developed, the center is thrown down and truth stands unsupported."—E. D. Fawcett.
Cipher. Dr. Whewell’s riddle is—

“A headless man had a letter (a) to write,
He who read it (spelt) had lost his sight.
The dumb repeated it (spelt) word for word,
And deaf was the man who listened and heard (spelt).”

Circe (2 syl.). A sorceress. She lived in the island of Eea. When Ulysses landed there, Circe turned his companions into swine, but Ulysses resisted this metamorphosis by virtue of a herb called moly, given him by Mercury.

“When knows not Circe,
The daughter of the Sun, whose charmed cup
Whoever tasted lost his upright shape.
And downward fell into a grumbling swine?”
Milton: Comus, 50–53.

Circle of Uldea. A white rainbow or luminous ring sometimes seen in Alpine regions opposite the sun in foggy weather.

Circuit. The journey made through the counties of Great Britain by the judges twice a year. There are six circuits in England, two in Wales, and three in Scotland. Those in England are called the Home, Norfolk, Midland, Oxford, Western, and Northern; those of Wales, the North and South circuits; and those of Scotland, the Southern, Western, and Northern.

Circumbendibus (A). It took a circumambulation, i.e., he went round about and round about before coming to the point.

“Partaking of what scholars call the periphrastic and ambiguous, and the vulgar the circumbendibus.”—Sir W. Scott: Waverley, chap. xiv.

Circumcellians. A sect of the African Donatists in the fourth century; so called because they rambled from town to town to redress grievances, forgive debts, marry slaves, and set themselves up as the oracles of right and wrong. (Latin, circum-celio, to beat about.)

Circumcised Brethren (in Juda-bras). They were Prynne, Bertie or Burton, and Bastwick, who lost their ears and had their noses slit for lampooning Henrietta Maria and the bishops.

Circumlocution Office. A term applied in ridicule to our public offices, because each person tries to shuffle off every act to some one else; and before anything is done it has to pass through so many departments, that every fly is crushed on a wheel. The term was invented by Charles Dickens, and appears in Little Dorrit.

Cirro-Scot or Church Scot. An ecclesiastical due, paid chiefly in corn, in the reign of Canute, etc., on St. Martin’s Day.

Cist (Greek κιστῆς, Latin cista). A chest or box. Generally used as a coffer for the remains of the dead. The Greek and Roman cist was a deep cylindrical basket made of wickerwork, like a lady’s work-basket. The basket into which voters cast their tablets was called a “cist;” but the mystic cist used in the rites of Ceres was latterly made of bronze.

Cist Urn (A). An urn for the ashes of those buried in cists.

Cistercians. A religious order, so called from the monastery of Cistercium, near Dijon, in France. The abbey of Cistercium or Citeaux was founded by Robert, abbot of Molème, in Burgundy, at the close of the eleventh century.

Citadel (A). A strong fort, constructed either within the place fortified, or on the most inaccessible spot of its general outline; to give refuge for the garrison, that it may prolong the defence after the place has fallen, or to hold out for the best terms of capitulation. Citadels generally command the interior of the place, and are useful, therefore, for overawing a population which might otherwise strive to shorten a siege. (French, citadelle; Italian, citadella, a little city.)

Cities.
City of Refuge. Moses, at the command of God, set apart three cities on the east of Jordan, and Joshua added three others on the west, whether any person might flee for refuge who had killed a human creature inadvertently. The three on the east of Jordan were Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan; the three on the west were Hebron, Shechem, and Kadesh. (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 1–8.)

The Cities of the Plain. Sodom and Gomorrah.

“Aram dwelt in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelt in the blame of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom”—Gen. xiii. 12.

The Seven Cities. Egypt, Jerusalem, Babylon, Athens, Rome, Constantinople, and either London for commerce, or Paris for beauty. (See Pentapolis.)

Citizen King (Thev). Louis Philippe of France. So called because he was elected king by the citizens of Paris. (Born 1773, reigned 1830–1848, died 1850.)

City (A), strictly speaking is a large town with a corporation and cathedral; but any large town is so called in ordinary speech. In the Bible it means a town having walls and gates.

"The eldest son of the first man (Cain) built a city (Gen. iv. 17)—not, of course, a Nineveh or a Babylon, but still a city."—Bruce, Notes on Genesis, chap. i. p. 10.

City College (Th.). Newgate. The wit is now a thing of the past.

City of Bells (Th.). Strasburg.

"He was a Strasburgener, and in that city of bells had been a medical practitioner."—Mayne Reid: The Neapolitan, chap. xxi.

City of David (Th.). Jerusalem.

So called in compliment to King David. (2 Sam. v. 7, 9.)

City of Destruction (Th.). This world, or rather, the world of the unconverted. Bunyan makes Christian flee from the "City of Destruction" and journey to the "Celestial City," by which he alludes to the "walk of a Christian" from conversion to death.

City of God (Th.). The church or whole body of believers; the kingdom of Jesus Christ, in contradistinction to the city of the World, called by John Bunyan the City of Destruction. The phrase is that of St. Augustine; one of his chief works bearing that title, or rather De Civitate Dei.

City of Lanterns (Th.). A suppositional city in Lucian’s Vera Historia, situated somewhere beyond the zodiac. (See LANERN-LAND.

City of Palaces (Th.). Agrippa, in the reign of Augustus, converted Rome from "a city of brick huts to one of marble palaces." (Cf. Suetonius.)

Calcutta is called the "City of Palaces." Modern Paris well deserves the compliment of being so called.

City of Refuge (Th.). Medina, in Arabia, where Mahomet took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca. He entered the city, not as a fugitive, but in triumph, A.D. 622. (See under CITIES OF REFUGE, page 255.)

City of St. Michael (Th.). Dumfries, of which city St. Michael is the patron saint.

City of Saints. Montreal, in Canada, is so named because all the streets are named after saints.

"Mr. Geo. Martin... and he came from Montreal a city of saints, where all the streets were named after saints."—Scolar Thought, September 10th, 1891.

City of the Great King (Th.)—i.e. Jerusalem. (Psa. lxi. 2; Matt. v. 35.)

City of the Seven Hills (Th.). Rome, built on seven hills (Urbs septimcolit). The hills are the Aventine, Caelian, Capitoine, Esquiline, Palatine, QuIRinal, and Viminale.

The AVENTINE HILL was given to the people. It was deemed unlucky, because here Remus was slain. It was also called "Collis Diana," from the Temple of Diana which stood there.

The CAILIAN HILL was given to Castus Bibenna, the Tuscan, who came to the help of the Romans in the Sabine war.

The CAPITOLINE HILL, or "Mons Turpeius," also called "Mons Saturni," on which stood the great castle or capitol of Rome. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

The Esquiline Hill was given by Augustus to Menons, who built thereon a magnificent mansion.

The PALATINE HILL was the largest of the seven. Here Romulus held his court, whence the word "palace" (palatium). The QuIRINAL HILL was where the Quirites or Quirins settled. It was also called "Caelinum," from two marble statues of a horse, one of which was the work of Phidias, the other of Praxiteles.

The VIMINALE HILL was so called from the number of vines (vines or vines) which grew there. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Viminalis.

City of the Sun (Th.). A romance by Campanella, similar to the Republic of Plato, l’opinio of Sir Thomas More, and Atlantis of Lord Bacon (1568-1635).

City of the Violet Crown. Athens is so called by Aristophanes (loptdriopot—see Equites, 1323 and 1329; and Acharnians, 637). Macaulay refers to Athens as the "violet-crowned city." Ion (a violet) was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes; and Greece, in Asia Minor, was called Ionia. Athens was the city of "Ion crowned its king" or "of the Violet crowned." Similarly Paris is the "city of lilies"—i.e. fleur-de-lis or Louis-flowers.

I do not think that Athens was called loptdriopot from the purple hue which Hymentus assumed in the evening sky.

Civic Crown. (See under CROWN.)

Civil List. Now applied to expenses voted annually by Parliament to pay the personal expenses of the Sovereign, the household expenses, and the pensions awarded by Royal bounty; but before the reign of William III. it embraced all the heads of public expenditure, except those of the army and navy.

Civil Magistrate (A). A civic or municipal magistrate, as distinguished from ecclesiastical authority.

Civil Service Estimates (Th.). C.S.E. The annual Parliamentary grant to cover the expenses of the diplomatic services, the post-office and telegraphs, the grant for national education, the collection of the revenue, and other expenses neither pertaining to the Sovereign, the army, nor the navy.

Civil War. War between citizens (civile). In English history the term is applied to the war between Charles I. and his Parliament; but the War of the Red and White Roses was a civil war. In America the War of Secession (1861-1865) was a civil war.

Civis Romanus sum. This angle plea sufficed to arrest arbitrary condonation, bonds, and scourging. Hence, when the centurion commanded Paul "to be examined by scourging," he virtually pleaded "Civis Romanus sum;" and asked, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a Roman citizen, and uncondemned?" (1) No Roman citizen could be condemned unheard; (2) by the Valerian Law he could not be bound; (3) by the Sempronian Law it was forbidden to scourge him, or to beat him with rods. (See also Acts xvi. 37, etc.)

Civitas Salis. A political and philosophical romance by Thomas Campanella (1598-1639), born at Stillo, or Stilo, in Italy. This romance is a kind of Utopia, formed on the model of Plato's Republic. His society is a sort of convent-life established on the principles of a theocratic communism.

Clabber Napper's Hole. Near Gravesend; said to be named after a free-booter; but more likely the Celtic Cad-ber Parcer (water-town lower camp).

Clack Dish. A dish or basin with a movable lid. Some two or three centuries ago beggars used to proclaim their want by clacking the lid of a wooden dish.

'Can you think I get my living by a bell and clack-dish?' "'Ah! How's that?" "Why, begging, sir." 'Family of Love' (1698).

Claff. An Egyptian head-dress with long lappets pendent on the shoulders, as in the statue of Amenophis III.

Clak-to-haryah. At Fort Vancouver the medium of intercourse is a mixture of Canadian-French, English, Indian, and Chinese. An Englishman goes by the name of Kint-shosh, a corruption of King George; an American is called Boston; and the ordinary salutation is clak-to-haryah. This is explained by the fact that the Indians, frequently hearing a trader named Clark addressed by his companions, "Clark, how are you?" imagined this to be the correct English form of salutation. (Taylor: Words and Places.)

Clam. (See Clouse as a Clam.)

Clan-na-Gael (The). An Irish Fenian organisation founded in Philadelphia in 1870, and known in secret as the "United Brotherhood:" its avowed object being to secure the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain, and the complete severance of all political connection between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland." (See Dynamite Saturday.)

Clap-trap. Something introduced to win applause; something really worthless, but sure to take with the groundlings. A trap to catch applause.

Clapper. A plank bridge over a stream; a ferry-gate. A roofing-board is called a clap-board.

"A little low and lonesome shed,
With a roof of clap-boards overhead."

After Dryden: "Letters' Christmas Eve.

Probably a corruption of clath-board, a covering board, from Anglo-Saxon, clath, a covering, whence our clothes.

Boards for making casks are also called "clap-boards."

Clapper-claw. To jangle and claw each other about. (Dutch and German, klappen, to strike, clatter.)

"Now they are clapper-clawing one another:
I'll go look on." Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, v. 4.

"A clapper-claw is a back-scratcher.

Clapper-dudgeons. Abram-men (q.v.). The clapper is the tongue of a bell, and in cunt language the human "tongue." Dudgeon is a slang word for a beggar.

Clapping the Prayer Books, or stamping the feet, in the Roman Catholic Church, on Good Friday, is designed to signify the abandonment of our Saviour by His disciples. This is done when twelve of the thirteen burning candles are put out. The noise comes from within the choir.

Claque; Claqueurs. Applause by clapping the hands; persons paid for doing so. M. Sauton, in 1820, established in Paris an office to ensure the success of dramatic pieces. He was the first to organise the Parisian claque. The manager sends an order to his office for any number of claqueurs, sometimes for
The class is divided into commissaries, those who commit the pieces to memory and are noisy in pointing out its merits; rieurs, who laugh at the puns and jokes; pleureurs, chiefly women, who are to hold their pocket-handkerchiefs to their eyes at the moving parts; chatouilleurs, who are to keep the audience in good humour; and bisures, who are to cry (bis) encore. The Romans had their Laudiceni (q.v.).

Clare (St.). A religious order of women, the second that St. Francis instituted. It was founded in 1213, and took its name from its first abbes.

Clarenceux King-of-Arms. One of the two provincial heralds, with jurisdiction over the southern provinces. The name was taken in honour of the Duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. The herald of the northern provinces is called Norroy King-of-Arms.

* Garter-King-of-Arms, also "Principal King-of-Arms," has to attend on Knights of the Garter, and arrange whatever is required in connection with these knights. There is a Bath King-of-Arms, not a member of the college, to attend on Knights of the Bath.

Clarendon. The Constitutions of Clarendon. Laws made by a general council of nobles and prelates, held at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, in 1164, to check the power of the Church, and restrain the prerogatives of ecclesiastics. These famous ordinances, sixteen in number, define the limits of the patronage and jurisdiction of the Pope in these realms.

Clarendon Type. The black letters which head these articles are so called.

Claret. The wine so called does not receive its name from its colour, but the colour so called receives its name from the wine. The word means clarified wine (vinum clarum). What we call hippocras was called claremum, made of wine and honey clarified.

Claret. Blood. To break one's claret. To give one a bloody nose; so called from the claret colour.

Claret Cup. A drink made of claret, brandy, lemon, borage, sugar, ice, and carbonated water.

Claret Jug (One's). One's nose. (See above, CLARET.)

To tap one's claret jug. To give one a bloody nose. "Tap" is meant for a pun—to broach and to knock.

Classic Races (The). The five chief horse-races in England, viz. the 2,000 and 1,000 guineas races for two-year-olds, run at Newmarket, the Derby for fillies and colts, the Oaks for fillies only, and the St. Leger.

Classica. The best authors. The Romans were divided by Servius into six classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicus; all the rest were said to be infra classem. From this the best authors were termed classici auctores (classical authors), i.e. authors of the best or first class. The high esteem in which Greek and Latin were held at the revival of letters obtained for these authors the name of classic, emphatically; and when other first-rate works are intended some distinctive name is added, as the English, French, Spanish, etc., classics.

Claude Lorraine (i.e. of Lorraine). This incorrect form is generally used in English for the name of Claude le Lorrain, or Claude Gelee, the French landscape painter, born at the Château de Champaign, in Lorraine. (1600-1682.)

The Scotch Claude. Thomas of Duddingston (near Edinburgh).

Clues (Santa). (See SANTA CLAUS.)

Clause. Letter-clause, a close letter, sealed with the royal signet or privy-seal; in opposition to letters-patent, which are left open, the seal being attached simply as a legal form. ("Clause," Latin clausa, shut, closed. "Patent," Latin patens, open.)

Clause Rolls (Rotuli clausi). Close Rolls. (See CLOSE ROLLS.)

"Clause Rolls contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs. These Rolls are preserved in the Tower."—JACOB: Law Dictionary.

Clavie. Burning of the Clavie on New-year's eve (old style) in the village of Burgehead, on the southern shore of the Moray Firth. The clavie is a sort of bonfire made of caisks split up. One of the caisks is split into two parts of different sizes, and an important item of the ceremony is to join these parts together with a huge nail made for the purpose. Whence the name clavis (Latin), a nail. Chambers, who in his Book of Days (vol. ii. p. 789) minutely describes the ceremony, suggests that it is a relic of Druid worship, but it seems to me to be connected with the Roman ceremony observed on the 13th September, and called the clavis annalis. The two divisions of the cask, I think, symbolise the old and the new year, which are joined together by a nail. The two parts are unequal, because the part of the new year joined on to the old is very small in comparison.

Clavileno. The wooden horse on which Don Quixote got astride, in order to disenchant the Infanta Antomomasia and her husband, who were shut up in the tomb of Queen Magun'cia, of Candaya. It was the very horse on which Peter of Provence carried off the fair Magulino; it was constructed by Merlin, and was governed by a wooden pin in the forehead. (The word means Wooden Peg.) (Don Quixote, part ii. book 3, chaps. 4, 5.) (See Cambuscans.)

Claw means the foot of an animal armed with claws; a hand. To claw is to lay one's hands upon things. It also means to tickle with the hand; hence to please or flatter, puff or praise. (Anglo-Saxon, clawn, a claw, with the verb clawian, to claw.)

Claw me and I will claw thee, means, "praise me, and I will praise you," or, scratch my back, and I will do the same for you.

"Laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour."—Shakespeare; Much Ado, etc., iv. 3.

Claw-barks. Flatterers. Bishop Jewel speaks of "the Pope's claw-barks." (See above, and Clapperclaws.)

Claymore or Claymore (2 syl.) is the Celtic sciaf (a bent sword), (Gaelic claidheamh (a sword), and mor (great). (See Morley.)

I've told thee how the Samhrons fell Beneath the broad claymores.

A Story: Execution of Montrose, stanza 2.

Clean. Free from blame or fault.

"Ye are clean, but not all."—John viii. 16.

Bill. To show a clean bill of health. (See page 135, col. 1, Bill of Health.)

Breast. To make a clean breast or Make a clean breast of. To make a full and unreserved confession.

Hands. To have clean hands. To be quite clean of some stated evil. Hence "clean-handed."

To keep the hands clean. Not to be involved in wrong-doing.

Heart. To have a clean heart. A righteous spirit.

"Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me."—Psalm l. 10.

Heels. To show a clean pair of heels. To make one's escape, to run away. Here "clean" means free from obstruction.

"The Maroons were runaway slaves who had shown their tyrants a clean pair of heels."

Life. To live a clean life. Blameless and undefiled.

Tongue. A clean tongue. Not abusive, not profane, not foul.

Clean (2d) To clean away. Scrub on, go on cleaning, etc.

To clean down. To sweep down, to swell down.

To clean out. To purify, to make tidy. Also, to win another's money till his pocket is quite empty.

To clean up. To wash up, to put in order.

* Clean, used adverbially, means entirely, wholly; as, "you have grown clean out of knowledge," i.e. wholly beyond recognition.

Clean and Unclean Animals. Pythagoras taught the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul, but that it never entered into those animals which it is lawful to eat. Hence those animals which were lawful food for man were those into which the human soul never entered; but those into which the human soul entered were unclean or not fit for human food. This notion existed long before the time of Pythagoras, who learnt it in Egypt.

In the Old Testament, those animals which chew the cud and part the hoof were clean, and might be eaten. Hares and rabbits could not be eaten because (although they chew the cud) they do not part the hoof. Pigs and camels were unclean, because (although they part the hoof) they do not chew the cud. Birds of prey were accounted uncinn. Fish with fins and scales were accounted fit food for man. (Lev. xi.)

Cleaned Out. Impoverished of everything. De Quincey says that Richard Bentley, after his lawsuit with Dr. Colbatch, "must have been pretty well cleaned out."

Clear (verb).

Clear away. Remove.

Clear off! Away with you! Take away.

Clear out. Empty out, make tidy. (See below, Clear out for Guam.)

Clear up. Become fine after rain or cloudiness; to make manifest; to elucidate what was obscure.

To clear an examination paper. To floor it, or answer every question set.

To clear the air. To remove the clouds, mists, and impurities.

To clear the dishes. To empty them of their contents.
To clear the room. To remove from it every thing or person not required.

To clear the table. To remove what has been placed on it.

Clear the Court. Remove all strangers, or persons not officially concerned in the suit.

Clear the Decks. Prepare for action by removing everything not required.

"Clear" used adverbially means wholly, entirely; as, "He is gone clear away," "Clear out of sight."

Clear (the adjective).

A clear head.—A mind that can understand clearly anything which it grasps.

A clear statement. A straightforward and intelligible statement.

A clear style (of writing). A lucid method of expressing one's thoughts.

Clear as Crystal. Clear as Mud.

(See SIMILES.)

Clear-coat. A mixture of size, alum, and whitening, for sizing walls. To cover over whatever might show through the coat of colour or paper to be put on it, also to make them stick or adhere more firmly.

Clear Day (A). A bright day, an entire day, as, "The bonds must be left three clear days for examination," to examine them before the interest is paid.

Clear Grit (Thc). The real thing, as "champagne is . . . if it be but the clear grit" (Anglo-Saxon, gryt, bolted flour).

A man of grit, or clear grit, is one of decision, from whom all doubt or vacillation has been bolted out, as husks from fine flour.

Clear out for Guam (Th). The ship is bound for no specific place. In the height of the gold fever, ships were chartered to carry passengers to Australia without having return cargoes secured for them. They were, therefore, obliged to leave Melbourne in ballast, and to sail in search of homeward freights. The Custom House regulations required, however, that, on clearing outwards, some port should be named; and it became the habit of captains to name "Guam" (a small island of the Ladrones group) as the hypothetical destination. Hence, "to clear out for Guam" came to mean, clear out for just anywhere—we are bound for whatever coast we may choose to venture upon. (See Notes and Queries, April 18th, 1885, p. 314.)

Cleared out. I am quite cleared out. I have spent all my money; I have not a farthing left. In French, Je suis Angl. (See FRENCH LEAVE.) Cleared out means, my purse or pocket is cleared out of money.

Clearing House. A building in Lombard Street, set apart, since 1775, for interchanging bankers' cheques and bills. Each bank sends to it daily all the bills and cheques not drawn on its own firm; these are sorted and distributed to their respective houses, and the balance is settled by transfer tickets. The origin of this establishment was a post at the corner of Birchin Lane and Lombard Street, where banking clerks met and exchanged memoranda.

Railway lines have also their "Clearing Houses" for settling the "tickets" of the different lines.

A "clearing banker" is a banker who has the entrée of the clearing house.

"London has become the clearing-house of the whole world, the place where international debts are exchanged against each other. And something like a million-pound-worth of cheques and bills pass that clearing yearly."—A. C. Perry: Elements of Political Economy, p. 363.

Cleave. Either to stick to or to part from. A man "shall cleave to his wife" (Matt. xix. 5). As one that "cleaveth wood" (Psalm cxli. 7). The former is the Anglo-Saxon clif-an, to stick to, and the latter is claif-an, to split.

Cle'lia. A vain, frivolous female butterfly, with a smattering of everything. In youth she coquetted; and, when youth was passed, tried sundry ways of earning a living, but always without success. It is a character in Crabbe's Borough.

Cle'lie. A character in Madam Scudéri's romance so called. This novel is a type of the buckram formality of Louis XIV. It is full of high-flown compliments, theatrical poses, and cut-and-dry sentiments.

Clement (N.). Patron saint of tanners, being himself a tanner. His symbol is a pot, because November the 23rd, St. Clement's Day, is the day on which the early Danes used to go about begging for ale.

Clementina (The Lady): In love with Sir Charles Grandison, who marries Harriet Biron. (Richardson: Sir Charles Grandison.)
Clench and Clench. To clench is to grasp firmly, as, "He clench'd my arm firmly," "He clench'd his nerves bravely to endure the pain." (Anglo-Saxon, clencan, to hold fast.)

To clench is to make fast, to turn the point of a nail in order to make it fast. Hence, to clinch an argument. (Dutch, klinken, to rivet. Whence "clinker-built," said of a ship whose planks overlap each other, and are riveted together.)

"I gave him a clencher (should be "clinker"). I nailed him fast."

Cleom'brotos (4 syl.) A philosopher who so admired Plato's Phaedon that he jumped into the sea in order to exchange this life for a better. He was called Ambrose ('ta (of Ambrose),) from the place of his birth in Epirus, "He who enjoys Plato's elysium, leaped into the sea," Cleom'broro's, Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 671-3.

Cleon. The personification of glory in Spenser's Faerie Queen.

Cleopatra was introduced to Julius Caesar by Apollodorus in a bale of rich Syrian rugs. When the bale was unbound, there was discovered the fairest and wittiest girl of all the earth, and Caesar became her captive slave.

Cleopatra and her Pearl. It is said that Cleopatra made a banquet for Antony, the costliness of which excited his astonishment; and, when Antony expressed his surprise, Cleopatra took a pearl ear-drop, which she dissolved in a strong acid, and drank to the health of the Roman triumvir, saying, "My draught to Antony shall far exceed it." There are two difficulties in this anecdote—the first is, that vinegar would not dissolve a pearl; and the next is, that any stronger acid would be wholly unfit to drink. Probably the solution is this: the pearl was sold to some merchant, whose name was synonymous with a strong acid, and the money given to Antony as a present by the fond queen. The pearl melted, and Cleopatra drank to the health of Antony as she handed him the money. (See "Gresham" in Reader's Handbook.)

Clergy. The men of God's lot or inheritance. In St. Peter's first epistle (ch. v. 3) the Church is called "God's heritage" or lot. In the Old Testament the tribe of Levi is called the "lot or heritage of the Lord." (Greek, λαός; Latin, clerus and clericius; whence Norman clere and clerke; French, clergé.) Benefit of clergy. (See BENEFIT.)

Clergyman. The dislike of sailors to clergymen on board ship arises from an association with the history of Jonah. Sailors call them a little cargo, or kithlish cargo, meaning dangerous. Probably the disastrous voyage of St. Paul confirmed the prejudice.

Clerical Titles.

(1) Cleric. As in ancient times the clergymen was about the only person who could write and read, the word clerical, as used in "clerical error," came to signify an orthographical error. As the respondent in church was able to read, he received the name of clerk, and the assistants in writing, etc., are so termed in business. (Latin, clerus, a clergymen.)

(2) Curate. One who has the cure of souls. As the cure of the parish used to be virtually entrusted to the clerical stipendiary, the word curate was appropriated to this assistant.

(3) Rector. One who has the parsonage and great tithes. The man who rules or guides the parish. (Latin, "a ruler").

(4) Vicar. One who does the "duty" of a parish for the person who receives the tithes. (Latin, vicarius, a deputy.)

(5) Incumbent and Perpetual Vicar are now termed Vicars. (See PERSONS.)

"The French curé equals our vicar, and their vicar our curate."}

Clerical Vestments.

(1) White. Emblem of purity, worn on all feasts, saints' days, and sacramental occasions.

(2) Red. The colour of blood and of fire, worn on the days of martyrs, and on Whit-Sunday, when the Holy Ghost came down like tongues of fire.

(3) Green. Worn only on days which are neither feasts nor fasts.

(4) Purple. The colour of mourning, worn on Advent Sundays, in Lent, and on Ember days.

(5) Black. Worn on Good Friday, and when masses are said for the dead.

Clarinond. Niece of the Green Knight (g.t.), bride of Valentine the brave, and sister of Ferragus the giant. (Valentine and Orson.)

Clerk. A scholar. Hence, beau-clere. (See above, CLERICAL TITLES.)

"All the clerks, I mean the learned ones, in Christian kingdoms, have their free voices." Shakespeare: Henry VIII, I. 2.
St. Nicholas's Clerks. Thieves. An equivocate on the word Nick.

"I think there came prancing down the hill a couple of St. Nicholas's clerks."—Cowley: Match at Midnight, 1632.

Clerk-ale and Church-ale. Mr. Douce says the word "ale" is used in such composite words as bride-ale, clerk-ale, church-ale, lamb-ale, Midsummer-ale, Scot-ale, Whitsun-ale, etc., for revel or feast, ale being the chief liquor given.

"The multitude call Church-ale Sunday their reveling day, which day is spent in merriment, bearing . . . dicing, . . . and drunkenness."—W. Keate (1370).

Clerkenwell (London) means the Clerks'-well, where the parish clerks of London used to assemble yearly to play some sacred piece.

Clerkly. Cleverly; like a scholar.

"I thank you, gentle servant: tis very clerkly done."—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, III. i.

Client. In Roman history meant a plebeian under the patronage of a patron. The client performed certain services, and the patron protected the life and interests of the client. The word is now a legal one, meaning a person who employs the services of a legal adviser to protect his interests.

Clifford (Paul). A highwayman, reformed by the power of love, in Sir L. Bulwer Lytton's novel so called.

Climacteric. It was once believed that 7 and 9, with their multiples, were critical points in life; and 63, which is produced by multiplying 7 and 9 together, was termed the Grand Climacteric, which few persons named in outliving.

"There are two years, the seventh and the ninth, that commonly bring great changes in a man's life, and great dangers; wherefore 63, that contains both these numbers multiplied together, care not without hopes of danger."—Levites Levites.

Climacteric Years are seventh and ninth, with their multiples by the odd numbers 3, 5, 7, 9—viz. 7, 9, 21, 27, 35, 45, 49, 63, and 81, over which astrologers supposed Saturn, the malevolent planet, presided. Hippocrates recognizes these periods. (See Nine.)

Climax means a staur (Greek), applied to the last of a gradation of arguments, each of which is stronger than the preceding. The last of a gradation of words of a similar character is also called a climax. The point of highest development.

"A high climax of his career . . . he was driven down."—Chittenden: Recollections of Lincoln, chap. xiv. p. 454.

Climb. On the climb. Under the hope of promotion. Thomas Becket, after he became Cardinal-archbishop of Canterbury, was at the top of the tree, and no further promotion was in the power of the king to bestow. Being no longer on the climb, he could set the king at defiance, and did so.

Clinch. To bend the point of a nail after it is driven home. The word is sometimes written clench, from the French clenchte, the lift of a latch. (German, klinke; Dutch, klinken, to rivet.) (See page 261, col. 1, CLINCH.)

That was a clincher. That argument was not to be gainsaid; that remark drove the matter home, and fixed it "as a nail in a sure place."

A lie is called a clincher from the tale about two swaggerers, one of whom said, "I drove a nail right through the moon." "Yes," said the other, "I remember it well, for I went to the other side and clinched it." The French say, Je lui ai bien rive son clou (I have clinched his nail for him).

Clinker (Humphrey). Hero of Smollett's novel so called. The general scheme of Oliver Twist resembles it. Humphrey is a workhouse boy, put out apprentice; but being afterwards reduced to great want, he attracts the notice of Mr. Bramble, who takes him into his service. He turns out to be Bramble's natural son, and falls in love with Winifred Jenkins, Miss Bramble's maid.

Clio was one of the nine Muses, the inventress of historical and heroic poetry.

Choo. Addison is so called because his papers in the Spectator are signed by one of the four letters in this word, probably the initial letters of Chelsea, London, Islington, Office. (See NOTA-RICA.)

"See Professor Morley's "Introduction to the Spectator," on the subject.

Clipper. A fast-sailing ship.

"We shall have to catch the Aurora, and she has a name for being a clipper."—A. C. Lycly: The Sign of Four, chap. x.

She's a clipper. Said of a stylish or beautiful woman. A first-class craft.

Clipping Pace (a). Very fast. A clipper is a fast-sailing vessel.

"Leaving Bosun Head, we scudded on at a clipping pace, and the slight yielded so much to the breeze that Bury said we must reap the mainmail."—W. S. Trench: Reminiscences of Irish Life, chap. 1.

Cliquet (of Punch celebrity). A nickname of Frederick William IV. of Prussia; so called from his fondness for champagne (1796, 1840-1861).

Cloacina. Goddess of sewers. (Latin, cloaca, a sewer.)

"Then Cloacina, goddess of the tide,
Whose smithy streams beneath the city glide,
Indulged the modest flame; the town she roved,
A mortal scavenger she saw, she loved."

Guy : Trivia, ii.

Cloak and Sword Plays. Modern comedy, played in the ordinary costume of modern life. The phrase was adopted by Caderon, who lived in Spain while gentlemen were accustomed to wear cloaks and swords. For tragedy the men actors were either heraldic or dramatico-historic dresses. In England actors in tragedy and old comedy wore the costume of Charles II.'s period, till quite recently.

Cloak. So church bells were once called. (German, glöcke; French, cloche; Medieval Latin, cloca.)

"Weel sikere [surer] was his crowning in his logge Than is a clok [bell] or ablay ordrygge."

Chaucer : The Sone Prentice Tale (1350-60).

Cloak. The tale about St. Paul's clock striking thirteen is given in Walcott's Memorials of Westminster, and refers to John Hatfield, who died 1770, aged 102. He was a soldier in the reign of William III., and was brought before a court-martial for falling asleep on duty upon Windsor Terrace. In proof of his innocence he asserted that he heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen, which statement was confirmed by several witnesses.

Clothoppper. A farmer, who hops or walks amongst the clods. The cavalry call the infantry clothoppers, because they have to walk instead of riding horseback.

Clog Almanac. A primitive almanac or calendar, originally made of a "clog," or log of wood, with four faces or parallelograms; the sharp edge of each face or side was divided by notches into three months, every week being marked by a big notch. The face left of the notched edge contained the saints' days, the festivals, the phases of the moon, and so on in Runic characters, whence the "clog" was also called a Runic staff. These curiosities are not uncommon, and specimens may be seen in the British Museum, the Bodleian (Oxford), the Ashmolean Museum, St. John's (Cambridge), the Chesterham Library (Manchester), and other places both at home and abroad.

Clotster. He retired into a cloister, a monastery. Almost all monasteries have a cloister or covered walk, which generally occupied three sides of a quadrangle.

Clootie. Auld Clootie. Old Nick. The Scotch call a cloven hoof a cloot, so that Auld Clootie is Old Cloven-foot.

Cloridane (in Orlando Furioso). A humble Moorish youth, who joins Medoro in seeking the body of King Dardinello to bury it. Medoro being wounded, Cloridano rushed madly into the ranks of the enemy and was slain.

Clorinda (in Jerusalem Delivered). A female knight who came from Persia to oppose the Crusaders, and was appointed by Al'adine leader of all the Pagan forces. Tancred fell in love with her; but not knowing her in a night attack, slew her after a most dreadful combat. Before she died she received Christian baptism at the hands of Tancred, who mourned her death with great sorrow of heart. (Book xii.)

Sena'pus of Ethiopia (a Christian) was her father; but her being born white alarmed her mother, who changed her babe for a black child. Arsetis, the eunuch, was entrusted with the infant Clorinda, and as he was going through a forest he saw a tiger, dropped the child, and sought safety in a tree. The tiger took the babe and suckled it, after which Arsetis left Ethiopia with the child for Egypt.

Close as a Clam. A clam is a bivalve mollusca, which burrows in sand or mud. It is about the size of a florin, and may be eaten raw or fried like an oyster. Clams are gathered only when the tide is out. When the tide is in they are safe from molestation, hence the saying "Happy as a clam at high tide." ( Anglo-Saxon, clam, mud; verb cloeuen, to glue; German, klammen, close.)

Close Rolls are mandates, letters, and writs of a private nature, addressed, in the Sovereign's name, to individuals, and folded or closed and sealed on the outside with the Great Seal.

? Patent Rolls are left open, with the seal hanging from the bottom.

Close-time for Game. (See Sporting Seasons.)

Closh (Mynherry). A Dutch Jack-tar. Closh is corrupt form of Claus, a contraction of Nicholas, a name as common with the Dutch as Jack is with the English people.

Clooten. A vindictive lout who wore his dagger in his mouth. He fell in love with Imogen, but his love was not reciprocated. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Cloth (The). The clergy; the clerical office; there was an "having respect for the cloth." Formerly the clergy used to wear a distinguishing costume, made of grey or black cloth.

Clotharius or Clothaire (in Jerusalem Delivered). At the death of Hugo he takes the load of the Franks, but is shot by Clorinda (q.v.) with an arrow (book xii). After his death, his troops sneak away and leave the Christian army (book xiii).

Clothe, in Classic mythology. One of the Three Fates. She presided over birth, and drew from her distaff the thread of life; Atropos presided over death and cut the thread of life; and Lachesis spun the fate of life between birth and death. (Greek, klotho, to draw thread from a distaff.)

"A prince dashed a wound with Cloth-o-sanguis and evil-wounds"—Curtius. (This is an erroneous allusion. It was Atropos who cut the thread.)

Cloud, Clouds. He is in the clouds. In dreamland; entertaining visionary notions; having no distinct idea about the matter in question.

He is under a cloud. Under suspicion, in disrepute.

To blow a cloud is to smoke a cigar or pipe.

Cloud. A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes. A white spot is called a star, and an elongated star is a blaze. (See Blaze.)

"Arrippe. He [Antony] has a cloud on his face.

Knoduirbne. He was the worse for that were he a horse."—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 2.

Cloud (St.). Patron saint of nail-smiths, by a play upon the French word clou, a nail.

Clouded Cane (A). A malacca cane clouded or mottled from age and use. These canes were very fashionable in the first quarter of the present century.

Cloven Foot. To show the cloven foot, i.e. to show a knavish intention; a base motive. The allusion is to Satan, represented with the legs and feet of a goat; and, however he might disguise himself, he could never conceal his cloven feet. (See Bag o' Nails, Goat.)

... and the cloven foot peeps out in some letters written by him at the period."—St. James's Magazine.

Clover. He's in clover. In luck, in prosperous circumstances, in a good situation. The allusion is to cattle feeding in clover fields.

Clowns. The three most celebrated are Joseph Grimaldi (1779-1837), the French Carlin (1713-1783), and Richard Tarlton, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, who acted at the gallery inn called the Belle Sauvage.

"To sit with Tarlton on an alehouse sign."—Bishop Hall: Satires.

Club. A society of persons who club together, or form themselves into a knot or lump.

The word was originally applied to persons bound together by a vow. (German, gelübde.) (See Cards, 4 clubs.)

"[then] was the era of chivalry, ... ; for bodies of men uniting themselves by a sacred vow, gelübde, which word and thing have passed over to us in a singularly dwindled condition, 'club' we call it; and the vow, ... does not rank very high."—Curtius: Frederick the Great, vol. 1, p. 111.

Club-bearer (The). Periphetis, the robber of Argolis, is so called because he murdered his victims with an iron club.

Club-land. That part of the West End of London where the principal clubs are situated; the members of such clubs.

Club-law. The law of might or compulsion through fear of chastisement. Do it or get a hiding.

Clue. I have not yet got the clue: to give a clue, i.e. a hint. A clue is a ball of thread (Ang.-Saxon, cleowen). The only mode of finding the way out of the Cretan labyrinth was by a skein of thread, which, being laid along the proper route, indicated the right path.

Clumsy (Norwegian, klump, a lump; Swedish, klumma, bemummed; Icelandic, kluma). Piers Plowman has "thou klumpast for cold," and Wiclif has "Our houdis ben acumpised." Halliwell gives us clumpish = awkward, and clump = lazy.

Clu'reicaune (3 syl.). An elf of evil disposition who usually appears as a wrinkled old man, and has knowledge of hid treasures. (Irish mythology.)

 Clydesdale Horses. Scotch draught-horses, not equal to Shire-horses in size, but of great endurance. (See Shire-horses.)

Clym of the Clough, with Adam Bell and William of Cloudesly, were noted outlaws, whose skill in archery rendered them as famous in the north of England as Robin Hood and Little John in the midland counties. Their place of resort was in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle. N.B. — Englewood means firewood. Clym of the Clough means Clement of the Cliff.

Clytie (3 syl.). A water-nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into a sunflower, which, traditionally, still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Cnoph. The name under which the Egyptians adore the Creator of the world.

Cnidian Venus (The). The exquisite statue of Venus or Aphrodite by Praxitelles, placed in the temple of Venus, at Cnidus.

Co. A contraction of company; as Smith and Co.

Coach (A). A private tutor. The term is a pun on getting on fast. To get on fast you have a coach; you cannot get on fast without a private tutor — vero, a private tutor is the coach you take in order that you may get on quickly. (University slang.)

"The books .... are expensive, and often a further expense is entailed by the necessity of securing a coach." —Stedman: Oxford, chap. x. p. 188.

To dine in the coach. In the captain's private room. The coach or couch of a ship is a small apartment near the stern, the floor being formed of the aftermost part of the quarter-deck, and the roof by the poop.

A slow coach. A dull, unprogressive person, somewhat fossilised.

"What a dull, old-fashioned chap thou art, but thou art always a slow-coach." —Mrs. Gaskell: Cobbett Marsh (Br. 55).

Coach-and-four (or Coach-and-six). It is said one may drive a coach-and-four through an Act of Parliament, i.e. lawyers can always find for their clients some loophole of escape.

"It is easy to drive a coach-and-four through walls, and settlements, and legal things." —R. B. Hoggard.

"[Rice] was often heard to say .... that he would drive a coach and six horses through the Act of Settlement." —Woolwood.

Coach Away. Get on a little faster. Your coach drags; drive on faster.

Coached Up. Taught by a private tutor for examination. "Well coached up," well crammed or taught.

Coal. Hot as a coal. The expression has an obvious allusion.

To post the coal or cole. To pay or put down the cash. Coal = money has been in use in the sporting world for very many years. Buxton, in 1863, used the phrase "post the coal," and since then it has been in frequent use. Probably rhyming slang: "Coal," an imperfect rhyme of goal = gold. (See page 248, Carry, and page 266, Coaling.)

"It would not suit me to write, so en if they offered, to post the cole." —Hood.

Coal Brandy. Burnt brandy. The ancient way to set brandy on fire was to drop in it a live or red-hot coal.

Coal.

To blow the coals. To fan dissensions, to excite smouldering animosity into open hostility, as dull coals are blown into a blaze by a pair of bellows. To carry coals. To be put upon. "Gregory, o' my word, we'll not carry coals" —i.e. submit to be "put upon." (Roméo and Juliet, i. 1). So in Every Man out of his Humour, "Here comes one that will carry coals, ergo, will hold my dog." The allusion is to the dirty, laborious occupation of coal-carriers. Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says, "Of these (i.e. scullions, etc.), the most forlorn wretches were selected to carry coals to the kitchen, halls, etc." (See page 141, col. 1, Blackguard.)

To carry coals to Newcastle. To do what is superfluous. As Newcastle is the great coal-field, it would be quite superfluous to carry coals thither. The French say, "Porter de l'eau à la rivière" (to carry water to the river). There are numerous Latin equivalents: as, "To carry wood to the forests;" "Ponta Alcinoo dava" (See Alcinoo); "Noctuae Athenae ferre" (See Noctua); "Covorum in Cæleinam ferre" (See Covorum).

To haul over the coals. To bring to task for shortcomings; to scold. At one time the Jews were "bled" whenever they quibled a man's wanted money; and one very common torture, if they resisted, was to haul them over the coals of a slow fire, to give them a "roasting." (See Irenæus, where Front-de-Bouc threatens to haul Isaac over the coals.)

Coals of Fire. To heap coals of fire on the head of a foe. To melt down his animosity by deeds of kindness.

"If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat; and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink: for thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head." —Prov. xxi. 21, 22.
Coaling, in theatrical slang, means telling phrases and speeches, as, "My part is full of coaling lines."
Coal being money, means profit, whence coaling. (See p. 265, To post the coal . . .)

Coalition Government. A Government formed by various parties by a mutual surrender of principles. The administration of Lord North and Charles Fox, 1783, was a coalition, but it fell to pieces in a few months. That of Lord Salisbury with the old Whig party headed by Lord Hartington was a coalition (1886-1892).

Coast Clear. Is the coast clear? The coast is clear. There is no likelihood of interference. None of the coastguards are about.

Coast Men of Attica. The merchant class who lived along the coastlands (Par'is).

Coasting Lead (A). A sounding lead used in shallow water.

Coasting Trade. Trade between ports of the same country carried on by coasting vessels.

Coasting Waiter. An officer of Customs in the Port of London, whose duty it was to visit and make a return of coasting vessels trading from one part of the kingdom to another, and which (from the nature of their cargo) were not required to report or make entry at the Custom House. These vessels were liable to the payment of certain small dues, which it was the duty of the Coasting Waiter to exact. He was also expected to search the cargo, that no contraband goods were illicitly on board. Like Tide Waiters, these Coasting Waiters were abolished in the latter half of the nineteenth century, and their duties have since been performed by the Examining Officer. Their salary was about £40 a year.

Coat.
Cut your coat according to your cloth. Curtail your expenses to the amount of your income; live within your means. Si non possis quod velit, velit id quod possis.

"Year is my coat, but wearer is my skin. " Tu mea est, velo propriae est."
"Ego proximus mehi."
To baste one's coat. To dust his jacket; to beat him.
To wear the king's coat. To be a soldier.
Turning one's coat for luck. It was an ancient superstition that this was a charm against evil spirits. (See Turncoat.)

"William found a means for our deliverance: 'Turn your cloaks!' Quoth he, 'for Puck is busy in these cakes.'" Bishop Corbett: Her Bewitch.

Coat of Arms. A surecoat worn by knights over their armour, decorated with devices by which heralds described the wearer. Hence the heraldic device of a family. Coat-armor was invented in the Crusading expeditions, to distinguish the various noble warriors when wrapped in complete steel, and it was introduced into England by Richard Lion-heart.

Coat of many Colours (Gen. xxvii. 3). Harmer, in his Observations (vol. ii. p. 386), informs us that "many colours", in this connection does not mean striped, flowered, embroidered, or "printed" with several colours, but having "divers pieces of different colours sewed together" in patchwork. The Hebrew word is passegem. In 2 Sam. xiii. 18 we are told that king's daughters wore a garment of many colours or divers picres. Dr. Adam Clarke says that similar garments "are worn by persons of distinction in Persia, India, and some parts of China to the present day." The great offence was this: Jacob was a sheik, and by giving Joseph a "prince's robe" he virtually announced him his heir. (See Divers Colours.)

Coats, Hosen, and Hats (Dan. iii. 21). These were not articles of dress, but badges of office. It will be collected that Shadrach and his two companions had recently been set over provinces of Babylon; and Nebuchadnezzar degraded them by insisting on their wearing their insignia of office. The word cap would be better than "hat," their caps of office; and sandals would be better than "hosen." Coats or cloaks have always designated office. "Hosen" means what the Romans called calceus patirens, which wore sandalled up to the calf of the leg. Every Latin scholar knows that calceus mutare means to "become a senator."

Cob (A). Between a pony and a horse in size, from thirteen to nearly fifteen hands high. The word means big, stout. The original meaning is a tuft or head, hence eminent, large, powerful. The "cob of the county" is the great boss thereof. A rich cob is a plutocrat. Hence also a male, as a cob-swan.

* Riding horses run between fifteen and sixteen hands in height, and carriage Cobalt. From the German Kobold (a gnome). The demon of mines. This metal was so called by miners, because it was long thought to be useless and troublesome. It was consequently attributed to the ill offices of the mine demon.

Cobbler. A drink made of wine (sherry), sugar, lemon, and ice. It is sipped up through a straw. (See Cobbler’s Punch.)

“The wonderful invention, sir. . . . is called cobbler—Sherry cobbler, when you name it long; cobbler when you name it short.”—Dickens:

Cobpler. Let not the cobbler overset his last (Ne scutor ultra crepidam). Let no one presume to interfere in matters of which he is ignorant. The tale goes that a cobbler detected a fault in the shoe-latchet of one of Apelles’ paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler, thinking himself very wise, next ventured to criticise the legs; but Apelles answered, “Keep to your trade”—you understand about shoes, but not about painting.

Cobpler Poet (The). Hans Sachs of Nuremberg, prince of the mastersingers of Germany (1494-1571).

Cobbler’s Punch. Gin and water, with a little treacle and vinegar.

Cobbler’s Toast. School-boys’ bread and butter; toasted on the dry side and eaten hot.

Cofham referred to by Thomson in his Autumn, was Sir Richard Temple, created Lord Cobham in 1714.

Cobnut. A nut with a tuft. (Welsh, cob or cop, a tuft; German, kopf, the head.)

Coburgia. A corded or ribbed cotton cloth made in Coburg (Saxony), or in imitation thereof. Chiefly used for ladies’ dresses.

Cobweb. Cob, Teutonic for “spider,” Dutch, spinneweb; Saxon, atter-cop (poisonous spider); Chaldee, kopi (spider’s web).

Cock. Mahomet found in the first heaven a cock of such enormous size that its crest touched the second heaven. The crowing of this celestial bird arouses every living creature from sleep except man. The Moslem doctors say that Allah lends a willing ear to him who reads the Koran, to him who prays for pardon, and to the cock whose chant is divine melody. When this cock ceases to crow, the day of judgment will be at hand.

Cock. Dedicated to Apollo, the sun-god, because it gives notice of the rising of the sun. It was dedicated to Mercury, because it summons men to business by its crowing. And to Esculapius, because “early to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy.”

A cock at church spires is to remind men not to deny their Lord as Peter did, but when the cock crew he “went out and wept bitterly.” Peter Le Neve affirms that a cock was the warlike ensign of the Goths, and therefore used in Gothic churches for ornament.

Every cock crows on its own dunghill, or Ilka cock crows on his own midden. It is easy to brag of your deeds in your own castle when safe from danger and not likely to be put to the proof.

Latin: Gallus in suoosterquillinio plurnimum potest.

French: Chien sur son fumier est hardi.

Spanish: Cada Galla canta en su muladar.

Nourish a cock, but offer it not in sacrifice. This is the eighteenth Symbolic Saying in the Protreptics of Iamblichus. The cock was sacred to Minerva, and also to the Sun and Moon, and it would be impious to offer a sacrilegious offering to the gods. What is already consecrated to God cannot be employed in sacrifice.

That cock won’t fight. That dodge wouldn’t answer; that tale won’t wash. Of course, the allusion is to fighting cocks. A bet is made on a favourite cock, but when pitted he refuses to fight.

To cry cock. To claim the victory; to assert oneself to be the superior. As a cock of the walk is the chief or ruler of the whole walk, so to cry cock is to claim this cockslip.

Cook and Bottle. A public house sign, probably meaning that draught and bottled ale may be had on the premises. If so, the word “cock” would mean the tap.

Cock and Bull Story. A corruption of a concocted and bully story. The catch-pennies hawked at the streets are still called cocks—i.e. concocted things. Bully is the Danish bullen (exaggerated), our bull-rush (an exaggerated rush), bullfrog, etc.

Another etymology may be suggested:
Cock and Pie

The idol Nergal was the most common idol of the ancient Phœcians, Indians, and Persians, and Nergal means a dung-hill cock. The Egyptian bull is equally notorious under the name of Ostis. A cock-and-bull story may therefore mean a myth, in reference to the mythological fables of Nergal and Ostis.

The French equivalents are faire un coq à l'âne and un contredans mère l'oise (a mother goose tale).

Cock and Pie (By). We meet with cock's bones, cock's wounds, cock's mother, cock's body, cock's passion, etc., where we can have no doubt that the word is a minced oath, and stands for the sacred name which shall never be taken in vain. The Pie is the table or rule in the old Roman offices, showing how to find out the service for each day, called by the Greeks πιναξ (an index). The latter part of the oath is equivalent to "the Mass book."

"By cock and pe, sir, you shall not away to-night." Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., act vi. 1.

Cock and Pie (as a public-house sign) is probably "The Cock and Magpie."

Cock of Hay (.d) or a haycock. A small heap of hay thrown up temporarily. (German, hacke, a heap of hay; Norwegian, kok, a heap.)

Cock of the North. The Duke of Gordon. So called on a monument erected to his honour at Fochabers, in Aberdeenshire. (Died 1836.)

Cock of the Walk. The dominant bully or master spirit. The place where barn-door fowls are fed is called the walk; and if there is more than one cock they will fight for the supremacy of this domain.

Cock-a-hoop or Cock-a-hoop. To sit cock-a-hoop. Boastful, defiant, like a game-cock with his horipe or crest erect; eagerly expectant. (French, cog a kippé.)

"And having routed a whole troop,
With victory was cock-a-hoop." Butler: Hudibras, 1. 3.

Cock apease. Set off as fast as you can run. A cock is a tap through which liquor runs. "To cock" is to walk lightly or nimblly.

"If storms be nigh then cock appease," says Tussler (1774).

Cookboat or Cockle Boat. A small boat made of a wicker frame, and covered with leather or oil-cloth. The Welsh fishers used to carry them on their backs. (Welsh, cucl, a boat; French, coche, a passage boat; Irish, coca; Italian, coca; Norwegian, kog, a cockboat.)

Cock-crow. The Hebrews divided the night into four watches: 1, The "beginning of the watches" or "even" (Lam. ii. 19); 2, "The middle watch" or "midnight" (Judg. vii. 19); 3, "The cock-crowing;" 4, "The morning watch" or "dawning" (Exod. xiv. 24).

"Ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning."—Mark xiii. 35.

The Romans divided the night into sixteen parts, each one hour and a-half, beginning at midnight. The third of these divisions (3 a.m.) they called gallaecinum, the time when cocks begin to crow; the next was continuinum, when they ceased to crow; and fifth was diluculunm, dawn.

Probably the Romans sounded the hour on a trumpet (bugle) three times, and if so it would explain the diversity of the Gospels: "Before the cock crow" (John xiii. 38, Luke xxii. 34, and Matt. xxvi. 34); but "Before the cock crow twice" (Mark xiv. 30)—that is, before the "bugle" has finished sounding.

Apparitions vanish at cock crow. This is a Christian superstitio, the cock being the watch-bird placed on church spires, and therefore sacred.

"The morning cock crew loud,
And at the sound it [the Ghost] shrunk in haste away,
And vanished from our sight." Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1. 2.

Cock-eye. A squint. Cock-eyed, having a squint; cross-eyed. (Irish and Gaelic, caog, a squint; "caogshuil," squint-eyed.)

Cock-fighting was introduced into Britain by the Romans. It was a favourite sport both with the Greeks and with the Romans.

That beats cock-fighting. That is most improbable and extraordinary. The allusion is to the extravagant tales told of fighting-cocks.

"He can only relieve his feelings by the frequent repetition, "Well, that beats cock-fighting!"—W. Thackeray.

To live like fighting-cocks. To live in luxury. Before game-cocks are pitted they are fed plentifully on the very best food.

Cock-horse. To ride-a-cock-horse. To sit astride a person's foot or knee while he dances or tosses it up and down.

Cock Lane Ghost. A tale of terror without truth; an imaginary tale of Cockade. The men-servants of the military wear a small black cockade on their hat, the Hanoverian badge. The Stuart cockade was white. At the battle of Sherra-Muir, in the reign of George I., the English soldiers wore a black rosette in their hats. In the song of Sherra-Muir the English soldiers are called "the red-coat lad wi' black cockades." (French, coearde; German, kokarde.)

In the British Army and Navy the cockade, since the Hanoverian accession, has been black.

AUSTRIAN cockade is black and yellow.

All sentry boxes and boundary posts are so painted. Ein schwarzes-gelber was the nickname of an Austrian Imperialist in 1848.

BAYARIA, light blue and white are the royal colours.

BELGIUM, black, yellow, and red.

FRANCE (regal), the royal colour was white.

HANOVER, the cockade was black.

Black enters into all the German cockades.

FRANCE, black and white are the royal colours.

RUSIA, green and white are the royal colours.

To mount the cockade. To become a soldier. From time immemorial the partisans of different leaders have adopted some emblem to show their party; in 1767 an authoritative regulation determined that every French soldier should wear a white cockade, and in 1782 the badge was restricted to the military. The phrase given above is common both to England and France.

Cockaigne (Land of). An imaginary land of idleness and luxury. The subject of a burlesque, probably the earliest specimen of English poetry which we possess." London is generally so called, but Boileau applies the phrase to Paris. (See page 370, col. 2, Cockney.)

Allied to the German, kuchen, a cake.

Scotland is called the "land of cakes"; there is the old French word coquigny, abundance. Compare Latin coquina, to cook, coquinaria, coquina, etc.

Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets (1. 85-86), has printed at length an old French poem called "The Land of Cockaigne" (thirteenth century), where "the houses were made of barley sugar and cakes, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods for nothing."

Cockatrice (3 syl.). A monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a dragon, and head of a cock. So called because it was said to be produced from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent. According to legend, the very look of this monster would cause instant death. In consequence of the crest with which the head is crowned, the creature is called a basilisk, from the Greek, basiliskos (a little king). Isaiah says, “The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice den” (xi. 6), to signify that the most noxious animal should not hurt the most feebie of God's creatures.
Cocked Hat

Figuratively, it means an insidious, treacherous person bent on mischief.

“...They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrice.”—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, III, 4.

Cocked Hat (A). A hat with the brim turned, like that of a bishop, dean, etc. It is also applied to the chapeau brus, and the military full-dress hat, pointed before and behind, and rising to a point at the crown, the chapeau à cornu. “Cook” in this phrase means to turn; cocked, turned up.

Knocked into a cocked hat. In the game of nine-pins, three pins were set up in the form of a triangle, and when all the pins except these three were knocked down, the set was technically said to be “knocked into a cocked hat.” Hence, utterly out of all shape or plumb. A somewhat similar phrase is “Knocked into the middle of next week.”

Cocked-hat Club (The). A club of the Society of Antiquaries. A cocked hat was always placed before the president when the club met.

There was another club so called in which the members, during club sitting, wore cocked hats.

Cocker. According to Cocker. All right, according to Cocker. According to established rules, according to what is correct. Edward Cocker (1631-1677) published an arithmetic which ran through sixty editions. The phrase, “According to Cocker,” was popularised by Murphy in his farce called The Apprentice.

Cookie or Cooky. Bumptious, overbearing, conceited, and dogmatical; like a little bantam cock.

Cockle Hat. A pilgrim's hat. Wurth, in his Journal, explains that the chief places of devotion were beyond sea, or on the coasts, pilgrims used to put cockle-shells upon their hats, to indicate that they were pilgrims. Cockles are symbols of St. James, patron saint of Spain. Cockle—scallop, as in heraldry.

“...And how shall I your true love know
From many another one?
Oh, by his cockle hat and staff,
And by his sandal shoon.”

Beaumont and Fletcher: The Trick of Orders Gray.

Cockle Shells. Favourite tokens worn by pilgrims in their hats. The polished side of the shell was scratched with some rude drawing of the “blessed Virgin,” the Crucifixion, or some other subject connected with the pilgrimage. Being blessed by the priest, they were considered amulets against spiritual foes, and might be used as drinking vessels.

Cookies. To cry cookies. To be hanged; from the gurgling noise made in strangulation.

Cockles of the Heart. “To warm the cockles of one's heart,” said of good wine. (Latin, cockele curdis, the ventricles of the heart.)

“Flora quendam recta hisce exterioribus in dextrum ventriculum proxime subjacentem oblique descensus ascendentes in basil cordis terminali, et quae nulli suscipere licet sed rochieram setis apta referunt.”—Lover: Tractatus de Cordi, p. 25. (1605.)

Cockledemoy (A). An amusing rogue, a sort of Tyll Eulenspiegel. A character in Marston’s comedy of The Dutch Courtesan. He cheats Mrs. Mulligrub, a vintner’s wife, of a goblet and salmon.

Cockney. One born within sound of Bow-bells, London; one possessing London peculiarities of speech, etc.; one wholly ignorant of country sports, country life, farm animals, plants, and so on.

Camden says the Thames was once called “the Cockney.”

The word has been spelt Cockey, Cockney, Cockneye, Cocknell, etc. “Cocknell” would be a little cock. “Puerus delicis matris nutritus,” Anglice, a kokney, a pampered child. “Nais” means a nestling, as fonton niais, and if this is the last syllable of “Cockney,” it confirms the idea that the word means an infant ghy.

Wedgwood suggests cocker (to fondle), and says a cockerney or cockney is one pampered by city indulgence, in contraversion to rustic hardening by outdoor work. (Dutch, kokkeler, to pamper; French, coqueliner, to dangle.)

Chambers in his Journal derives the word from a French poem of the thirteenth century, called The Land of Cocagne, where the houses were made of barley-sugar and cakes, the streets paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods without requiring money in payment. The French, at a very early period, called the English noix-viandes (beef and pudding men).

"Cry to it, uncle, as the cockney did to the eels, when she put them into the paste alive."—Shakespeare: Lear, ii. 4.

The king of cockneys. A master of the revels chosen by students of Lincoln's Inn on CHILDERS Day (Dec. 28th).

Cockney School. Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats; so called by Lockhart. (1817.)

"If it may be permitted to have the honour of christening it, it may be henceforth referred to by the designation of the 'Cockney School.'"—E. Blackwood's Magazine, Oct. 1817.

Cockpit of Europe. Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more European battles than any other country; for example, Oudenarde, Ramillies, Fontenoy, Fleurus, Jemmapes, Ligny, Quatre Bras, Waterloo.

Cockshy (J). A free fling or "shy" at something. The allusion is to the once popular Shrove-Tuesday sport of shying or casting stones or sticks at cocks. This sport is now superseded by pigeon-shooting, which is thought to be more aristocratic! but can hardly be deemed more humane.

Cockswain, or COCKSWAIN [cock' u]. The swain or servant of the cock or boat, together with its crew. (Anglo-Saxon, swan or servant, a youth or servant, and cock, a boat.) (See COCKBOAT.)

Cocktail. The New York World, 1891, tells us that this is an Aztec word, and that "the liquor was discovered by a Toltec noble, who sent it to the king by the hand of his daughter Xochiti. The king fell in love with the maiden, drank the liquor, and called them xoc-tl, a name perpetuated by the word cocktail.

7 Cocktail is an iced drink made of spirits mixed with bitters, sugar, and some aromatic flavouring. Champagne cocktail is champagne flavoured with Angostura bitters; soda cocktail is soda-water, sugar, and bitters.

"Did ye ever try a brandy cocktail, Cornel?"—Thackeray: The Newcomes,ulin.

COQUEGRUES. At the coming of the COQUEGRUES. That good time coming, when every mystery shall be cleared up.

"That is one of the seven things," said the fairy Bedonebyhymind, "I am forbidden to tell till the coming of the 'Coquegrues.'"—C. Kingsley: The Water Babies, chap. vi.

COQUETTE [kö-k'yt]. One of the five rivers of hell. The word means the "river of lamentation." The unburied were doomed to wander about its banks for 100 years. (Greek, kokte, to weep.)

"Coquet, named of lamentation loud Heard on the restless stream."—Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 378.

Coddas. Codgers. Thackeray says, "The Cistercian lads call the poor brethren of the Charterhouse codas," adding, "but I know not wherefore." (Turkish, kadih, an old man or woman.) We say "Well, old boy," without referring to age.

"I say, do you know any of the old coddas...? Colonel Newcome is going to be a codd."—Nineteenth Century, October, 1863, p. 599.

Coddle (2 syll.). Triumph. A term in the game of Ombre. When one of the two opponents of Ombre has more tricks than Ombre, he is said to have won Coddle, and takes all the stake that Ombre played for. Thus Belinda is said, in the Rape of the Lock, to have been "between the jaws of ruin and Codille." She wins with the "king of hearts," and she wins coddle.

Codlin's Your Friend, Not Short. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop, chap. xix.). Codlin had a shrewd suspicion that little Nell and her grandfather had absconded, and that a reward would be offered for their discovery. So he tried to bespeak the goodwill of the little girl in the hope of making something of it.

"None of the speakers has much to say in actual hostility to Lord Salisbury's speech, but they all harp upon the theory that Codlin is the friend, not Short."—Newspaper paragraph, Oct. 18th, 1865.

Coehorns (2 syll.). Small howitzers of about 43 inches calibre; so called from Baron van COE' Horn of Holland.

Coenobites or COENOBITES (3 syll.). Monks who live in common, in contradistinction to the hermits or anchorites. (Greek, koinobiosis.)

COUR de LION. Richard I. of England; so called from the prodigies of personal valour performed by him in the Holy Land. (1157, 1189-1199.)

Louis VIII. of France, more frequently called LE LION. (1187, 1223-1226.)

Boleslaus I. of Poland, also called "The Intrepid." (960, 992-1025.)

Coffee. The Turkish word is Koubi, Kauve or Kauvey.

Gloria is coffee with a small glass of brandy in lieu of milk; all the following have more and more l'eau de vie; and the last is the "stirrup-cup."

Coffin. A raised crust, like the lid of a basket. Hence Shakespeare speaks of a "custard coffin" (Taming of the Shrew, iv. 3). (Greek, koph'inos, a basket.) (See MAHOMER'S COFFIN.)

"Of the past a coffin will I rear," Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, v. 2.

Coggeshall. A Coggeshall job. The saying is, that the Coggeshall folk wanted to divert the current of a stream, and fixed hurdles in the bed of it for the purpose. Another tale is that a mad dog bit a wheelbarrow, and the people, fearing it would go mad, chained it up in a shed. (See GOTHAM.)

Cogito, ergo sum. Descartes' axiom. This is a petitio principii. "I think" can only prove this: that "I think." And he might just as well infer from it the existence of thought as the existence of X. He is asked to prove the latter, and immediately assumes that it exists and does something, and then infers that it exists because it does something. Suppose I were asked to prove the existence of ice, and were to say, ice is cold, therefore there is such a thing as ice. Manifestly I first assume there is such a thing as ice, then ascribe to it an attribute, and then argue back that this attribute is the outcome of ice. This is not proof, but simply arguing in a circle.

Cohens (Stock Exchange term). The Turkish '69 loan, floated by the firm of that name.

Coif (1 syl.). The coif of the old serjeant-at-law was a relic of his ecclesiastical character. The original serjeants-at-law were clerical lawyers, and the coif is the representation of the tonsure.

Serjeants of the Coif. Serjeants-at-law (now abolished). (See above.)

Coiffé. Il est né coiffé. He is born with a silver spoon in his mouth; born to fortune. (See page 229, col. 2, Cault.)

"Quelques enfants viennent au monde avec une pellicule... que l'on appelle du nom de coiffé; et que l'on croit être une marque de bonheur. C'est le don de l'Proverbe du Nil... il est né coiffé." (Traité des Superstitions, 1617.)

Coiffer to Sainte Catherine. To remain an old maid. "St. Catherine is the patronne des filles à marier et des vieilles filles. Ce sont ces dernières qui restent ordinairement pour soigner les chapelles consacrées à la sainte, et qui sont chargées de sa toilette." (Héraire de Gai : Encyclopédie des Proverbes Français.)

"Il croit peut-être que je le regrette, que, de densuspoir je vais coiffer St. Catherine. Ah! ah! mais non! mal ax soyez mes maire."—Le Mascotte (an opera).

Coin. Paid in his own coin. Tit for tat. "Par pari referre."

Coin Money (7b). To make money with rapidity and ease.

"For the last four years... I literally coined money."—J. Kemble: Residence in Georgia.

Coins.

British. Iron rings were used for money by the ancient Britons, and Segonax, a petty king under Cassivellan, is the first whose head was impressed on the coin. Gold, silver, and copper coins were struck by Cunobelin.

The Romans introduced their own coins into the island.

The oldest Anglo-Saxon coin was the sceatta (pl. sceattas), sixth century. In the reign of Ethelbert, King of Kent, money accounts were kept in pounds, manceus, shillings, and pence. One of the last being equal to about 3 pence of our money. 5 pence = one silling; 30 shillings one mance or muncus, and 40 one pound. Manceus were in gold and silver also.

The Normans introduced pence with a cross so deeply impressed that the coin could be broken either into two or four parts, hence the terms half-pence and fourthings.

The Angel, a gold coin (7s. 6d.), was introduced by Edward IV., and had a figure of Michael slaying the dragon.

The Halfpenny first came into use in the reign of James VI. of Scotland. (French, bas-hillon, base coin.)

The Carolus (20s.) was a gold coin of the reign of Charles I.

The Crown (5s.) was first issued in 1553. Crowns and half-crowns are still in common circulation.

English Dollars (4s. 6d.) were introduced in 1798.

Florins, a gold coin (5s.), were issued by Edward III.; but the silver florin (2s.) in 1849.

The Guinea (a gold coin = 21s.) was first issued in 1717; but a gold coin so-called, of the value of 30s., was issued in 1673, reduced in 1696 to 22s.

Our Sovereign was first issued in 1816, but there were coins so called in the reigns of Henry L (worth 22s.), Edward VI. (from 24s. to 30s.).

Shillings of the present value date from 1663; pence made of bronze in Cold Pudding settles Love by giving the pains of indigestion, colic, etc.

Cold Shoulder. To show or give one the cold shoulder is to assume a distant manner towards a person, to indicate that you wish to cut his acquaintance. The reference is to a cold shoulder of mutton served to a stranger at dinner; there is not much of it, and even what is left is but moderate fare.

Cold Steel. The persuasion of cold steel is persuasion enforced at the point of the sword or bayonet.

Cold Water Ordeal. An ancient method of testing the guilt or innocence of the common sort of people. The accused, being tied under the arms, was thrown into a river. If he sank to the bottom, he was held to be guiltless, but if he floated, the water rejected him, because of his guilt.

Cold Without. An elliptical expression, meaning spirits mixed with cold water without sugar.

Coldbrand. (See Colbrande.)

Coldstream Guards. One of the three regiments of Foot Guards. It was originally under the command of Colonel Monk (1650-1660), and in January, 1699, marched under him from Coldstream in Berwickshire with the object of bringing back Charles II. to the throne.

Cold = money. (See Coal.)

Cole (King). A legendary British king, described as "a merry old soul" fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his "fiddlers three." (Ky. Coll., i.)

Colemira (3 syl.). A poetical name for a cook; being, of course, compounded of coal and mirr.

"I said, 'Come, let us to the show;"
Where will you be? I have no show to show"

Cold-chisel (A.). A chisel of tempered steel for cutting cold metal.

Cold Drawn Oil. Castor oil, obtained by pressure in the cold.

Cold Pigeon (A.). A message sent in place of a love-letter. The love-letter would have been a polet (q.v.). A pigeon is called a dove-tart, and dove is symbolical of love. Pyramus says of Thisbe, "What, dead, my dove?" A verbal message is "cold comfort" to a lover looking out for a letter.

Colin Clout. A name which Spenser assumes in The Shepherd's Calendar, and in the pastoral entitled Colin Clout's Come Home Again, which represents his return from a visit to Sir Walter Raleigh, "the Shepherd of the Ocean."

Colin Tampon. The nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull is of an Englishman, Brother Jonathan of a North American, and Monsieur Crapaud of a Frenchman.
Collapse

Collapse. The scheme collapsed. Came to nothing. An inflated balloon is said to collapse when the gas has escaped and the sides fall together, or pucker into wrinkles. As a collapsed balloon will not mount, a collapsed scheme will not go off. (Latin, colliopbus, to fall or sink together.)

Collar.
Against the collar. Somewhat fatiguing. When a horse travels up-hill the collar distresses his neck, so foot-travellers often find the last mile or so "against the collar," or distressing. Authors of long books often find the last few pages wearisome and against the grain.

In collar. In harness. The allusion is to a horse's collar, which is put on when about to go to work.

Out of collar. Out of work, out of place. (See above.)

To slip the collar. To escape from restraint; to draw back from a task begun.

To work up to the collar. To work tooth and nail; not to shirk the work in hand. A horse that lets his collar lie loose on his neck without bearing on it does not draw the vehicle at all, but leaves another to do the real work.

"As regarded himself, the path lay plain. He must work up to the collar, hot and hard, leaving himself no time to feel the parts that were galled and wrung."—Mrs. Edgeworth: A Garton Girl, chap. 11.

Collar (verb). To collar one. To seize by the collar; to prig; to appropriate without leave.

To collar the cole or coal. To prig the money. (See Coal.)

Collar-day. (A.) In royal levees, means that attendants are to wear all their insignia and decorations, such as medals, stars, ribbons, and orders. This is done on grand occasions by order of the Crown. The Queen's Collar-day is when she wears the Order of the Garter.

Collar of Arsinœ (4 syl.) or Collar of Aiglesés, given by her to her husband Alcmen, was a fatal gift; so was the collar and veil of Ephiphyle, wife of Amphiarus. (See Fatal Gifts.)

Collar of SS. A decoration restricted to the Lord Chief Justices of the Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Lord Mayor of London, the Kings-of-Arms, the Heralds, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Sergeant Trumpeter. (Cussen's Heraldry.) (See SS.)

College.

Collectivism. Collectivism is the opposite of Individualism. In the latter system, everyone is to be his own master, and everything is to be free and in common. In the former system, government is to be the sole employer, the sole landlord, and the sole paymaster. Private property is to be abolished, competition to be stamped out; everyone must work for his living, and the State must find the work. Bellamy's novel of Looking Backward will give a pretty fair notion of what is meant by Collectivism. (See Individualists.)

College (New). Newgate prison. "To take one's final degree at New College" is to be hanged. "King's College" is King's Bench Prison, now called Queen's College. Prisoners are "collegiates." College is the Latin collegium, and has a very wide range, as, College of the Apostles, College of Physicians, College of Surgeons, Heralds' College, College of Justice, etc.; and on the Continent we have College of Foreign Affairs, College of War, College of Cardinals, etc.

College Colours.

Cambridge Boat Crews, light blue.

- Caius, light blue and black.
- Catherine's, blue and white.
- Christ's, common blue.
- Clare, black and golden yellow.

Colours (America) in football matches, boating, etc.

- Addison, Bismarck brown and purple.
- A'lephany, aedoe blue and old gold.
Colophon. The end of a book. Colophon was a city of Io‘nia, the inhabitants of which were such excellent horsemen that they would turn the scale of battle to the side on which they fought; hence, the Greek phrase, To add a colophonian, means "to put a finishing stroke to any matter." (Strabo.) In the early times of printing, the statement containing the date, place, printer, and edition was given at the end of the book, and was called the colophon. Now called the "imprint."

"The volume was uninjured ... from title-page to colophon."—Scott: The Antiquary.

Coloquintida or Colocynth. Bitter-apple or colocynth. (Greek, kolokynthis.)

"The food that to him now is Lucas, is locusts, shall be to him shortly as bitter as coloquintida."—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Coloquintida (St.). Charles I. was so called. He was bitter as gall to the Levellers.

Colorado (U.S. America). A Spanish word meaning red, referring to the red hue of the water of the river.

Colossal. Gigantic. As a colossal scheme. (See below.)

Colossus or Colosso (Latin, colossus). A giant. The Rhodian Colossus was a gigantic statue of brass, 120 feet high, executed by Charis. It is said that ships could pass full sail under the legs of this statue, but the notion of a striding statue rose in the sixteenth century, and is due to Blaise de Vigenère, who was the first to give the chef d’œuvre of Charis this impossible position. The Comte de Caylus has demonstrated that the Apollo of Rhodes was never planted

Collywobbles. The gripes, usually accompanied with sundry noises in the stomach. These noises are called the "borbarigmanus." (The wobbling caused by a slight colic.)

Cologne. The three kings of Cologne. The three magi, called Gaspar, Melchior, and Baltashar. They are called by other names, but those given are the most generally accepted.

Col’ron. One of the rabble leaders in Hudibras was Noel Perry, or Ned Perry, an ostler, who loved bear-baiting, but was a very straight-laced Puritan of low morals.

College Port. The worst species of red wine that can be manufactured and palmed off upon young men at college. (See Windows' Port.)"We all know what college port is like."—The Times.

Col’liberts. A sort of gipsy race in Poitou, Maine, and Anjou, similar to the Capsols of Gascouy and the Cagouez of Brittany. In feudal times a colibert was a serf partly free, but bound to certain services. (Latini, col-libertus, a fellow freedman.)

Colluthians. A religious sect which rose in the fourth century; so called from Colluthos of Alexandria, their founder.

Colly my Cow. A corruption of Calainos, the most ancient of Spanish ballads. Calainos the Moor asked a damsels to wife, who said the price of winning her should be the heads of the three paladins of Charlemagne, named Rinaldo, Roland, and Olivier. Calainos went to Paris and challenged the paladins. First Sir Baldwin, the youngest knight, accepted the challenge and was overthrown; then his uncle Roland went against the Moor and smote him.

Collyridians. A sect of Arabian Christians, chiefly women, which first appeared in 373. They worshipped the Virgin Mary, and made offerings to her in a twisted cake, called a collyris. (Greek, kollura, a little cake.)

Virgin Mary, and made offerings to her in a twisted cake, called a collyris. (Greek, kollura, a little cake.)
at the mouth of the Rhodian port, that it was not a striding statue, and that ships never passed under it. Neither Strabo nor Pliny makes mention of any of these things, though both describe the gigantic statue minutely. Philo (the architect of Byzantium, third century) has a treatise on the seven wonders of the world, and says that the Colossus stood on a block of white marble, and Lucius Ampelius, in a similar treatise, says it stood on a car. Tertullian says:

"So, near proud Rhodes, across the raging flood, Stupendous form! the vast Colossus stood, While at one foot the thronging galleys rode, A whole hour's sail's space reached the further side.

Betwixt his brazen thighs, in loose array, Ten thousand streamers on the hollow bay."—On the Prospect of Peace.

"He doth besride the narrow world Like a Colossus." Shakespeare; Julius Caesar, i, 2.

The twin Colossi of Amenophis III., on the banks of the Nile, near Thebes, are seated. The statue of Liberty, New York, is colossal.

Colour. (See Rank.)

Colour, Colours. A man of colour.

A negro, or, more strictly speaking, one with negro blood. (See Colours.)

"There are three great classes: (1) the pure whites; (2) the people of colour; (3) negroes and mulattoes."—Edwards: St. Domingo, i.

Colours.

(1) Black:

In blazonry, sable, signifying prudence, wisdom, and constancy.

In art, signifying evil, falsehood, and error.

As a mortuary colour, signifying grief, despair, and death. (In the Catholic Church violace may be substituted for black.)

In metals it is represented by lead.

In precious stones it is represented by the diamond.

In planets it stands for Saturn.

In heraldry it is engraved by perpendicular and horizontal lines crossing each other at right angles.

(2) Blue:

In blazonry, azure, signifying chastity, loyalty, fidelity.

In art, (as an angel's robe) it signifies fidelity and faith.

In art (as the robe of the Virgin Mary) it signifies modesty.

In the Catholic Church it signifies humility and exultation.

As a mortuary colour, it signifies eternity. (Applied to death, immortality. Applied to man.)

In metals it is represented by tin.

In precious stones it is represented by sapphire.

In planets it stands for Jupiter.

In heraldry it is engraved by horizontal lines.

(3) Green:

In blazonry, vert, signifying love, joy, abundance.

In art, signifying hope, joy, youth, spring (among the Greeks the Months of March and April signifies victory).

In church ornaments, signifying God's bounty, mirth, gladness, the resurrection.

In metals it is represented by copper.

In precious stones it is represented by the emerald.

In planets it stands for Venus.

A mortal colour and it means caution, go slowly.

In heraldry it is engraved by lines slanting from right to left.

(5) Red:

In blazonry, gules; blood-red is called sangue. The former signifies magnumity, and the latter, force.

In metals it is represented by iron (the metal of war).

In precious stones it is represented by the ruby.

In planets it stands for Mars.

In heraldry it is engraved by perpendicular lines.

(6) White:

In blazonry, argent; signifying purity, truth, innocence.

In art, priests, Magi, and Druids are arrayed in white. Jesus after the resurrection should be draped in white.

As a mortuary colour it signifies hope.

In metals it is represented by silver.

In precious stones it is represented by the pearl.

In planets it stands for Diana or the Moon.

In heraldry it is engraved by shields left white.

(7) Yellow:

In blazonry or signifying faith, constancy, wisdom, glory.

In modern art or signifying jealousy, inconstancy, inconsistency. In France the colour of triters used to be daubed with yellow. In some countries Jews were obliged to dress in yellow. In Spain the executioner is dressed in red and yellow.

In Christian art Judas is arrayed in yellow; but St. Peter is also arrayed in golden yellow.

In metals it is represented by gold.

In precious stones it is represented by the topaz.

In planets it stands for Apollo or the Sun.

In heraldry it is engraved by dots.

Colours for Church Decoration.

White, for festivals of our Lord, for Easter, and for all saints except martyrs.

Red, for martyrs, for Ash Wednesday, the last three days of Holy Week, and Whit Sunday.

Blue, for all week-days after Trinity Sunday.

Green or Green, differently, for ordinary Sundays.

Violet, Brown, or Grey, for Advent and Lent.

Black, for Good Friday.

Colours of the University Boats, etc. (See College Colours.)

Colours.

Accidental colours. Those colours seen on a white ground after looking for some time at a bright-coloured object, like the sun.

Complementary colours. Colours which, in combination, produce white light.

"The colour transmitted is always complementary to the one reflected."—Huyghens: Optics, xii.

Fundamental colours. The seven colours of the spectrum: violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red.

On red, yellow, blue, also called primary or simple colours.

Secondary colours. Those which result from the mixture of two or more primary or simple colours.

Colours. He was with the colours. In active military service.

Colts-tooth

“Colt’s-tooth” is a term used to describe a visual disorder, specifically facial dysfunction, in which the facial muscles are affected. It is characterized by the inability of the muscles to properly control the movement of the face, leading to a range of symptoms that can include facial weakness, drooping of the mouth, or difficulty in forming certain expressions. The term is derived from the Latin word "coltus," meaning "noble horse," and "tooth," referring to the severity of the condition. It is often associated with the term "colt’s tooth" in heraldry, where a colt’s tooth is a heraldic charge consisting of a small, pointed tooth, often used in armory when a horse is depicted with only part of its head visible. However, the distinction between the term as it relates to visual disorders and heraldry is important to note, as the heraldic charge is a decorative element and not a medical term.

Colour-blindness. Incapacity of discerning one colour from another. The term was introduced by Sir David Brewster. It is of three sorts: (1) inability to discern any colours, so that everything is either black or white, shade or light; (2) inability to distinguish between primary colours, as red, blue, and yellow; or secondary colours, as green, purple, and orange; and (3) inability to distinguish between such composite colours as browns, greys, and neutral tints. Except in this one respect, the colour-blind may have excellent vision.

Colour Sergeant. A sergeant who carries or has charge of the regimental colours.

Colour (verb). To colour up, to turn red in the face; to blush.

Coloured Frontispiece by Phiz (A). A blush.

Colporteur. A hawker or pedlar; so called because he carries his basket or pack round his neck. The term is more especially applied to hawkers of religious books. (Latin, columna, the neck; porto, to carry.)

Colt. (A). A piece of knotted rope eighteen inches long for the special benefit of ship boys; a cat-o’-nine-tails.

 looked alive there, lads, or as sure as my name is Sam Wain I’ll give the colt to the last man on deck.”—J. Grant: Dick Rodney, chap. vii.

Colt (A). A barrister who attends a sergeant-at-law at his induction.

“T accompanied the newly-made Chief Baron as his colt.”—Steele.

Then Mr. Bailey, his colt, delivered his ring to the Lord Chancellor.”—Wynn.

Colt (To). To befool, to gull. (Italian, colto, cheated, befuddled.)

Colt-pixy (A). A pixy, puck, or fairy. To colt-pixy is to take what belongs to the pixies, and is specially applied to the gleaning of apples after the crop has been gathered in; these apples were the privilege of the pixies, and to colt-pixy is to deprive the pixies of their perquisites.

Colt’s Revolver. A fire-arm which, by means of revolving barrels, can be fired several times without intermission. This instrument was patented by Colonel Samuel Colt, U.S., in 1835.

Colt’s-tooth. The love of youthful pleasure. Chaucer uses the word “coltish” for skittish.” Horses have at three years old the colt’s tooth. The allusion is to the colt’s teeth of animals, a period.

The second Columbus. Cyrus West Field was so called by John Bright when he completed the Atlantic Cable. Born at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1819.

Column.
The Alexandrine Column. Made of granite; in memory of the Emperor Alexander.

The Column of Antoninus. At Rome; made of marble, 176 feet high; in memory of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Like that of Trajan, this column is covered externally with spiral bas-reliefs representing the wars carried on by the emperor.

Sixtus V. caused the original statue of this column to be supplanted by a figure of St. Paul. (See Trajan's Column.)

The Column of Arcadius. At Constantinople; made of marble.

Column at Boulogne. To commemorate the camp of Boulogne. This formidable array was intended for the invasion of England. England also girded herself for battle, and here the matter ended. The Column perpetuates the memory of this threat.

The Duke of York's Column, in London, at the top of the steps leading into St. James's Park. Erected in 1830-1833 in memory of Frederick, Duke of York, second son of George III., who died in 1827. It is of the Tuscan order, was designed by R. Wyatt, and is made of Aberdeen granite. On the summit is a statue of the duke by Sir R. Westmacott.

The Column of July. 1832, Paris; made of bronze, and erected on the spot where the Bastille stood, to commemorate the revolution of July, 1830, when Charles X. abdicated. It is surrounded with a statue of Liberty standing on one foot.

London's Column. (See Monument.) Nelson's Column. In Trafalgar Square, London; was erected in 1843. The four lions, by Landseer, were added in 1847. The order of the Column is Corinthian, and the material Devonshire granite. The reliefs are (north side) the battle of the Nile, where Nelson was wounded; (south side) Nelson's death at the battle of Trafalgar; (east side) the bombardment of Copenhagen; and (west side) the battle of St. Vincent. The column is surmounted by a statue of Nelson by E. H. Baily.

Column of the Pare Vendôme. Paris, 1806-1810; made of bronze, and erected in honour of Napoleon I. The spiral outside represents in bas-relief the battles of Napoleon I., ending with Austerlitz in 1805. It is a facsimile of Trajan's Column.

In 1871 the statue of Napoleon, which surmounted this column, was hurled to the ground by the Communists, but in 1874 a statue of Liberty was substituted for the original one.

Pompey's Column. In Egypt; made of marble.

Trajan's Column. At Rome; made of marble, A.D. 114, by Apollodorus. It is 132 feet in height, and has inside a spiral staircase of 185 steps, and 40 windows to let in light. It was surmounted by a statue of the Emperor Trajan, but Sixtus V. supplanted the original statue by that of St. Peter. The spiral outside represents in bas-reliefs the battles of the emperor.

Columns of Hercules. Two large pyramidal columns set up by the Phoenicians as lighthouses and landmarks, dedicated, one to Hercules (the sun), and the other to Astarté (the moon).

By the Greeks and Romans the two pyramidal mountains at the Straits of Gibraltar (Calpe and Abyla), the former in Europe and the latter in Africa, were termed the Tulars of Hercules.

Coma Berenices (4 syl.). (See Berenice.)

Com'azants. Called St. Elmo fires by the French, Castor and Pollux by the Romans. A celestial light seen occasionally to play round mast-heads, etc.
Comb

(Latin, comas, hair.) Virgil makes good use of this phenomenon while Äneas is hesitating whether to leave burning Troy or not:

"Eace levis sammo de vertice visus fuit
Fundera lumen apex, tracutae innixia mo-
Lambebat samoa combas, et circum tempora jaceat
Nobis, pandebat notum, crinemque fragran-
- tum
- Excitare, et sanctos restinuere fontibus ignes."

When old Anchises interferes, and a falling star is interpreted to mean that Jupiter will lead them forth securely. (Äneas, ii. 682, etc.)

Comb.

A crabtree comb. A cudgel applied to the head. To smooth your hair with a crabtree comb, is to give the head a knock with a stick.

* Reynard's wonderful comb.* This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He said it was made of the Pan'thora's bone, the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always cheerful and merry. (Reynard the Fox, chap. ii.)

To comb one's head. To humiliate a person, or to give him a "set down."

"I'll carry you with me to my country box and keep you out of harm's way, till I find you a wife who will comb your head for you."—Bulwer-Lytton: What will he do with it? iv. 16.

To comb your nodule with a three-legged stool (Taming of the Shrew, i. 1) is to beat you about the head with a stool. Many stools, such as those used by milkmaids, are still made with three legs; and these handy weapons seem to have been used at one time pretty freely, especially by angry women.

To cut one's comb. To take down a person's conceit. In allusion to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

To set up one's comb is to be cockish and vainglorious.

Comb the Cat (Tb). To run your fingers through the lashes of a cat's o' nine-tails to disentangle them.

Come and take Them. The reply of Leon'idas, King of Sparta, to the messengers sent by Xerxes to Thermopylae. Xerxes said, "Go, and tell those madmen to deliver up their arms," Leonidas replied, "Go, and tell Xerxes to come and take them."

Come Ather (pron. ah-thér) means, when addressed to horses, "come hither"—i.e. to the left, the side on which the teamman walks. (See Wo'ish.)

Come Down a Peg. Humiliated; lowered in dignity, tone, demands, etc.

"Well, he has come down a peg or two, and he don't like it."—Huggard.

A come down. Loss of prestige or position.

"Now I'm your worship's washerwoman." The dignitary coloured, and said that this was rather a come down."—As you.

Come Down upon One (Tb). To reproach, to punish severely, to make a peremptory demand.

Come Home. Return to your house; to touch one's feelings or interest.

"No poetry was ever more human than Chaucer's; none other came more generally by means to its readers."—Green: Short History of the English People, chap. iv.

Come it. Has he come it? Has he lent the money? Has he been to your request? Has he come over to your side? Also, "Out with it!"

Come it Strong. Lay it on thick; to exaggerate or overdo. (See DRAW; IT MILD.)

Come Lightly. Lightly come, lightly go. There is a somewhat similar Latin proverb, male parta, male dilabantur.

Come Of. What's to come of it? What's to come of him? A contracted form of become. To come of [a good stock] is to be descended from [a good family].

Come Off (Tb). To occur, to take place. (Anglo-Saxon, of-cumman = Latin, pro-cedo, to proceed.)

To come off with honours is to proceed to the end successfully.

Come On! A challenge to fight with fists.

Come Out. Said of a young lady after she has been introduced at Court, or has entered into society as a "grown-up" person. She "comes out into society."

Come Over One (Tb). To wheedle one to do or give something. (Anglo-Saxon, of-cumman, to overcome.) To come over one is in reality to conquer or get your own way.

Come Round. (See COMING, etc.).

Come Short (Tb). Not to be sufficient. "To come short of" means to miss or fail of attaining.

Come That, as. Can you come that? I can't come that. Here, "come" means to arrive at, to accomplish.

Come the Religious Dodge (Tb) means to ask or seek some favour under pretence of a religious motive. Hero "come" means to come and introduce. (See DODGE.)
Come to. Amount to, to obtain possession. "It will not come to much."

Come to Grief (To). To fail, to prove a failure, as, "the undertaking (or company) came to grief," i.e. to a grievous end.

Come to Hand (It has). Been received. "Come into my hand." In Latin, ad manus (adversus) pervertere.
"Your letter came to hand yesterday."—A. Trollope.

Come to Pass (To). To happen, to befall, to come about.
"What thou hast spoken is come to pass."—Jer. xxxii. 24.
"it came to pass (ἐγένετο) in those days that there went out a decree."—Luke ii. 1.

Come to an End. To terminate. The allusion is to travelling, when the traveller has come to the end of his journey.

Come to the Hammer. To be sold by auction.

Come to the Heath. To tip. A pun taken from the place called Tip-tree Heath, in Essex. Our forefathers, and the French too, delighted in these sort of puns. A great source of slang. (See Chivy.)

Come to the Point. Speak out plainly what you want; do not beat about the bush, but state at once what you wish to say. The point is the gist or girt of a thing. Circumlocution is wandering round the point with words; to come to the point is to omit all needless speech, and bring all the straggling rays to a focus or point.

Come to the Scratch. (See Scratch.)

Come to the Worst. If the worst come to the worst; even if the very worst occurs.

Come Under (To). To fall under; to be classed under.

Come Up. Marry, come up! (See Marry.) "To come up to" means to equal, to obtain the same number of marks, to amount to the same quantity.

Come Upon the Parish (To). To live in the workhouse; to be supported by the parish.

Come Yorkshire over One (To). To bamboozle one, to overreach one. Yorkshire has always been proverbial for shrewdness and sharp practice. "It's Yorkshire too" means, I am 'cut' as you are, and am not to be taken in.

Comedy means a village-song (Greek, κομικός), referring to the village merrymakings, in which comic songs still take a conspicuous place. The Greeks had certain festive processions of great licentiousness, held in honour of Dionysos, in the suburbs of their cities, and termed κοίμοι or village-revels. On these occasions an ode was generally sung, and this ode was the foundation of Greek comedy. (See Tragedy.)

The Father of comedy. Aristophanes, the Athenian (B.C. 444-380).

Comes (2 syl.). A Latin military title, now called count on the continent of Europe, but earl in England from the Saxon earldoman (alderman), Danish earle. The wife of an earl is called countess.

Comet Wine. A term of praise to signify wine of superior quality. A notion prevails that the grapes in comet years are better in flavour than in other years, either because the weather is warmer and ripens them better, or because the comets themselves exercise some chemical influence on them. Thus, wine of the years 1811, 1826, 1839, 1846, 1852, 1856, 1861, etc., have a reputation.

"The old gentleman yet nurses some few bottles of the famous comet year (i.e. 1811), emphatically called comet wine."—The Times.

Coming Round. He is coming round. Recovering from sickness; recovering from a fit of the sulks; returning to friendship. Death is the end of life, and therefore recovering from "sickness nigh unto death" is coming back to health, or coming round the corner.

Command Night. In theatrical parlance, a night on which a certain play is performed by command of some person of authority or influence.

Commandment. The eleventh commandment. Thou shalt not be found out.
"After all, that Eleventh Commandment is the only one that is vitally important to keep in these days."—B. H. Baxter: Verses of the Prince’s, 11. 32.

The ten commandments. The ten fingers or nails. (Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., I. 3.)

Comme il faut (French, pronounce cum fle f, as it should be; quite proper: quite according to etiquette or rule.

Commendam. A living in commendam is a living held by a bishop till an incumbent is appointed. When a clergyman accepts a bishopric he loses all his previous prebend; but in order that these livings may not be uncared for, they are commended by the Crown to the care of the new bishop till they can be properly transferred. Abolished in 1836.

Commendation Ninepence. A bent silver ninepence, supposed to be lucky, and commonly used in the seventeenth century as a love-token, the giver or sender using these words, "From my love, to my love." Sometimes the coin was broken, and each kept a part.

"Like commendation ninepence, crooked,
With 'To and from my love,' it looked."—Butler: Hudibras, l. 1.

"Filbert: As this divides, thus are we born in twain.
Kitty: And as this meets, thus may we meet again."

Guy: What d'ye Call It?

Commis-voyageur (A). A commercial traveller.

Committee. A committee of the whole house, in Parliamentary language, is when the Speaker leaves the chair and all the members form a committee, where anyone may speak once or more than once. In such cases the chair is occupied by the chairman of committees, elected with each new Parliament.

A standing committee, in Parliamentary language, is a committee which continues to the end of the current session. To this committee are referred all questions which fall within the scope of their appointment.

Committing Falsehood. Swindling.
The Earl of Rosebery pointed out that the expression "committing falsehood" in Scotch law was synonymous with what in England was called swindling (April 25th, 1885).

Commodity of Brown Paper (A). Rubbish served as make-weight; worthless stock; goods palmed off on the inexperienced. In most auctions the buyer of a lot has a fair share of the commodity of brown paper. Rubbish given to supplement a loan.

"Here's young Master Rashi! he's in for a commodity of brown paper and old ginger, nine score and sixteen pounds [i.e. £12, a part of the advance being old ginger and brown paper]."—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

Commodore. A corruption of "commander" (French, commandeur; Spanish, comendador). A naval officer in temporary command of a squadron or division of a fleet. He has the pay of a rear-admiral.

Common Pleas. Civil actions at law brought by one subject against another—not by the Crown against a subject. The Court of Common Pleas is for the trial of civil [not capital] offences. In 1876 this court was abolished, and in 1880 it was represented by the Common Pleas Division and merged in the King's [or Queen's] Bench Division.

Common Sense does not mean that good sense which is common, or commonly needed in the ordinary affairs of life, but the sense which is common to all the five, or the point where the five senses meet, supposed to be the seat of the soul, where it judges what is presented by the senses, and decides the mode of action. (See Seven Senses.)

Commoner. The Great Commoner.

1. Sir John Barnard, who, in 1737, proposed to reduce the interest of the national debt from 4 per cent. to 3 per cent., any creditor being at liberty to receive his principal in full if he preferred it. Mr. Goschen (1889-90) reduced the 3 per cents. to 2½.

2. William Pitt, the statesman (1759-1806).

Commons. To put one on short commons. To stint him, to give him scanty meals. In the University of Cambridge the food provided for each student at breakfast is called his commons; hence food in general or meals.

To come into commons. To enter a society in which the members have a common or general dinner table.

Commons in Gross—that is, at large. These are commons granted to individuals and their heirs by deed, or claimed by prescription as by a parson or corporation.

Commonwealths (Idéal). "Utopia" by Sir Thomas More, "The New Atlantis" by Lord Bacon, "The City of the Sun" by Campanella, etc.

 Companion Ladder. The ladder leading from the poop to the main deck. The "companion way" is the staircase to the cabin. (Dana: Seaman's Manual.)

 Companions of Jehu. The Chouans were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task and that appointed to Jehu, on being set over the kingdom of Israel. Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house, and all the priests of Baal. The Chouans were to cut off all who assassinated Louis XVI., and see that his brother (Jehu) was placed on the throne.

Comparisons are Odorous. So says Dogberry. (Much Ado About Nothing, iii. 5.)

"We own your verses are melodious,
 But then comparisons are odious."—Shakespeare. (Sonnet 106.)

Complementary Colours. (See Colours.)

Complexion literally means "what embraces or contains," and the idea implies that the colour of the skin corresponds to the habit of body, and the habit of body answers to the element which predominates. If fire predominates, the person is bilious or full of bile; if air, he is sanguine or full of blood; if earth, the body is melancholic or full of black bile; if water, it is phlegmatic or full of phlegm. The first is hot and dry, the second hot and moist, the third cold and dry, and the last moist and cold like water.

"Tis ill, the different civil complexions are [i.e. dispositions]—Dryden.
"Creants through mere complexion lie."—Pope: Hymn of Belliniasus.

Compline (2 syl.). The last service of the day in the Roman Catholic Church. First appointed by the abbot Benedict in the sixth century. The word is a corruption of complec'tium.

In ecclesiastical Latin resperinus, from vespas, means evening service, and compleinus is formed on the same model.

Compostella. A corruption of Giacomo-postolo (James the Apostle). So called after his relics were transferred thither from Iria Flavia (El Padron) on the borders of Galicia, in the ninth century. Leo III. transferred the see of Iria Flavia to Compostella. (Somewhere between 810 and 816.)

Compte rendu. The account already sent; the account of particulars delivered; a report of proceedings.

Com'rade (2 syl.). The name of Fortunio's fairy horse. It ate but once a week; knew the past, present, and future; and spake with the voice of a man. (Grimm's Goblins: Fortunio.) (See Horses.

Com'rades (2 syl.). Those who sleep in the same bed-chamber. It is a Spanish military term derived from the custom of dividing soldiers into chambers. The proper spelling is camerades, men of the same camera (chamber).

Comus. God of revelry. Milton represents him as a male Circe. (Greek, kouros, carousel.)

"This nymph [Circe], that gazed upon his [Bacchus'] clustering locks,... Had by him, ere he parted thence, a son, Much like his father, but his mother more, Whom therefore she brought up, and Comus named."—Milton: Comus, 64-66.

Comus. The elder brother in this domestic drama is meant for Lord Viscount Brackley, eldest son of John, Earl of Bridgewater, president of Wales. The younger brother is Mr. Thomas Egerton. The lady is Lady Alice Egerton. (Milton.)

Comus's Court. A social gathering formerly held at the Half-Moon Tavern in Cheapside, London.

Con Amo're (Italian). With heart and soul; as, "He did it con amo're"—i.e., lovingly, with delight, and therefore in good earnest.

Con Commodo (Italian). At a convenient rate. A musical term.

Con Spirito (Italian). With quickness and vivacity. A musical term.

Conan. The Thersitès of "Fingal;" brave even to rashness.

Blow for blow or claw for claw, as Conan said. Conan made a vow never to take a blow without returning it; when he descended into the infernal regions, the arch-fiend gave him a cuff, which Conan instantly returned, saying "Claw for claw."

"...Blow for blow,' as Conan said to the devil."—Scott: Waverley, Chap. xxii.

Concert Pitch. The degree of sharpness or flatness adopted by a number of musicians acting in concert, that all the instruments may be in accord. Generally, a particular note is selected for the standard, as A or C; this note is put into the proper pitch, and all other notes are regulated by it.

Concerto (Italian). A composition intended to display the powers of some particular instrument, with orchestral accompaniments.

Con'dierge (3 syl.). French. The door-keeper of a public or private "hotel," or house divided into flats, or of a prison.

Concliergerie. (French.) The office or room of a concierge or porter's lodge; a state prison. During the Revolution it was the prison where the chief victims were confined prior to execution.
Conclave (2 syl.). A set of rooms, all of which are entered by one common key (Latin, con cla'tis). The word is applied to the little deal cells erected in some large apartment for the cardinals who meet to choose a new Pope, because the long gallery of the Vatican between the cells and the windows of the palace is common ground to all the conclavists. The assembly itself is, by a figure of speech, also called a conclave.

Conclamatio, amongst the ancient Romans, was similar to the Irish howl over the dead; and, as in Ireland, women led the funeral cortège, weeping ostentatiously and gesticulating. "One not howled over" (corpus nonatum conclamata'tum) meant one at the point of death; and "one howled for" was one given up for dead or really deceased. Virgil tells us that the ululation was a Pharnician custom; and therefore he makes the palace ring with howls when Dido burnt herself to death.

"Lamentis, geminisque, et larmibus ululata, / Texa fremitur."

Conclamatum est. He is dead past all hope. The sense of hearing is generally the last to fail in the hour of death, hence the Romans were accustomed to call on the deceased three times by name, and if no indication of hearing was shown death was considered certain. Conclamatum est, he has been called and shows no sign.

Concord is Strength. The wise saw of Periander, "tyrant" of Corinth (B.C. 665-585).

Concordat. An agreement made between a ruler and the Pope relative to the collation of benefices. As the Concordat of 1801 between Napoleon Bonaparte and Pope Pius VII.; the Concordat of 1516 between François I. and Pope Leo X. to abolish the "pragmatic sanction;" and the Germanic Concordat of 1448 between Frederick III. and Pope Nicholas V.

Consign. Latin, condignus (well worthy); as condign punishment—i.e. punishment well deserved.

"In thy consign praise."
Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, 1. 2.

Condottierì. Leaders of military adventurers in the fifteenth century. The most noted of these brigand leaders in Italy were Guarinì, Lando, Francesco of Cargmagnola, and Francesco Sforza. Giaùcomo Sforza, the son of Francesco, married the daughter of the Duke of Milan, and succeeded his father-in-law. The singular is Condottière (5 syl.).

Confederate States. The eleven States which revolted from the Union in the late American Civil War (1861-1865)—viz. Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisianà, Arkan'sas, Mississippi, and Floridà and Texas.

Confederation of the Rhine. Sixteen German provinces in 1806 dissolved their connection with Germany, and allied themselves with France. At the downfall of Napoleon in 1814 this confederation melted away of itself.

Confession. John of Nepomuc, canon of Prague, suffered death rather than violate the seal of confession. The Emperor Wenzel ordered him to be thrown off a bridge into the Moldau, because he refused to reveal the confession of the emperor. He was canonised as St. John Nepomucen.

Confiscate (3 syl.). To forfeit to the public treasury. (Latin, con fisca, with the tribute money.)

"If thou dost shed one drop of Christian blood, Thy lands and goods are, by the laws of Venice, Confiscate to the State of Venice."
Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Confusion Worse Confounded. Disorder made worse than before.

"With rain upon rain, rout on rout, Confusion worse confounded."
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. line 900.

Congé. "To give a person his congé" is to dismiss him from your service. "To take one's congé" is to give notice to friends of your departure. This is done by leaving a card at the friend's house with the letters P.P.C. (pour prendre congé) inscribed on the left-hand corner. (French, donner congé and donner à son congé.)

Congé d'Elire (Norman-French, leave to elect). A royal warrant given to the dean and chapter of a diocese to elect the person nominated by the Crown to their vacant see.

Congleton Bears. The men of Congleton. It is said that the Congleton parish clerk sold the church Bible to buy a bear.

Congregationalists. Those Protestant Dissenters who maintain that each congregation is an independent community, and has a right to make its own laws and choose its own minister. They rose in the time of Queen Eliza-beth.

Conceivability, 284

Conceivability. (1806.) So called from Sir William Congreve, eldest son of Lieut.-Colonel Sir William Congreve (1772-1828).

Congreeves, A predecessor of Lucifer matches. The splints were first dipped in sulphur, and then tipped with the chlorate of potash paste, in which gun was substituted for sugar, and there was added a small quantity of sulphide of antimony. The match was ignited by being drawn through a fold of sandpaper with pressure. These matches, being dangerous, were prohibited in France and Germany. (See Pyromatens; Lucifer.)

Conjugal. What pertains to conjugal (yoke-fellows). In ancient times a yoke (jugum) was put on a man and woman by way of marriage ceremony, and the two were said to be yoked together by marriage.

Conjuring Cap. I must put on my conjuring cap—i.e., your question requires deliberate thought, and I must reflect on it. (F. X. IV., King of Sweden, was a great admirer of magic, and had an "enchanted cap" made, either to keep his head warm or for mystification. He pretended to have power over the elements; and when a storm arose, his subjects used to say "The king has got on his conjuring cap.""

Connecticut, U.S. America, is the Indian Quin-neh-tak-gut, meaning "land of the long tidal river."

Connubials de Mulchire fact Apollon. Love turned a blacksmith into a great artist. Said of Quentin Matsys, the blacksmith of Antwerp, who was in love with an artist's daughter. The father scorned the alliance, and said he should not be accepted unless he made himself a worthy artist. This did Matsys and won his bride. The sentence may be seen still on the monument of Quentin Matsys outside Antwerp cathedral.

Conqueror. The Conqueror.
Alexander the Great. The conqueror of the world. (a.c. 356, 336-323.)
Alfonso of Portugal. (1094, 1137-1185.)
Aurungzabe the Great. Alcunår. The most powerful of the great Moguls. (1618, 1659-1707.)
James I. of Aragon, (1206, 1213-1276.)
Othman or Osman I. Founder of the Turkish power. (1259, 1299-1326.)
Francisco Pizarro, Conquistador, So called because he conquered Peru. (1476-1541.)
William, Duke of Normandy. So called because he obtained England by conquest. (1027, 1066-1087.)

Conqueror's Nose (A). A prominent straight nose, rising at the bridge. Charlemagne had such a nose, so had Henry the Fowler (Heinrich I. of Germany); Rudolf I. of Germany: Fried-rich I. of Hohenzollern, famous for reducing to order his unruly barons by blowing up their castles (1382-1440); our own "Iron Duke;" Bismarck, the iron Chancellor of Prussia; etc.

Conquest (The). The accession of William I. to the crown of England. So called because his right depended on his conquest of Harold, the reigning king. (1066.)

Conrad (Lord). Afterwards called Lara, the corsair. A proud, ascetic, but successful captain. Hearing that the Sultan Seyd was about to attack the pirates, Conrad assumed the disguise of a dervish and entered the palace, while his crew set fire to the sultan's fleet. The trick being discovered, Conrad was taken prisoner, but was released by Guinare, the sultan's favourite concubine, whom he had rescued from the flaming palace. Guinare escaped with the corsair to the Pirates' Isle, and when Conrad found Medora dead, he left the island, and no one knew whither he went. The rest of his adventures are recorded under his new name of Lara. (Byron: The Corsair.)

Conscience.
Have you the conscience to [demand such a price]. Can your conscience allow you to [demand such a price]. Conscience is the secret monitor within man which accuses or excuses him, as he does what he thinks to be wrong or right.

In all conscience. As, "And enough too, in all conscience." Meaning that the demand made is as much as conscience would tolerate without accusing the person of actual dishonesty: to the verge of that fine line which separates honesty from dishonesty.

My conscience! An oath. I swear by my conscience.

Court of Conscience. Established for the recovery of small debts in London and other trading places. These courts have been superseded by county courts.

"Why should not Conscience have vacation, As well as other courts of the land?"
Butler: Hudibras, II. 2.

Conscience Money. Money paid anonymously to Government by persons who have defrauded the revenue. Their conscience being uneasy, they send the deficit to the Treasury, and the sum is advertised in the Gazette.

Conscript Fathers. In Latin, Patres Conscripti. The Roman senate, Romulus instituted a senate consisting of a hundred elders, called Patres (Fathers). After the Sabines joined the State, another hundred were added. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king, added a third hundred, called Patres Minores Centum. When Tarquiniius Superbus, the seventh and last king of Rome, was banished, several of the senate followed him, and the vacancies were filled up by Junius Brutus, the first consul. The new members were enrolled in the senatorial register, and called Conscripti; the entire body was then addressed as Patres [etc] Conscripti or Patres, Conscripti.

Consenters Del. The twelve chief Roman deities—Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Mercury, and Vulcan. Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceris, Diana, and Venus. Ennius puts them into two hexameter verses:

"Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceris, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Juno, Neptune, Vulcanus, Apollo,"

"Called "consentes," says Varro,

Consenting Stars. Stars forming configurations for good or evil. In Judges v, 20 we read that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," i.e. formed unlucky or malignant configurations.

". . . Scourge the bad revolving stars
That have consented unto Henry's death."—Shakespeare; King John, i, 1.

Conservative (4 syl). A medium Tory—one who wishes to preserve the union of Church and State, and not radically to alter the constitution. The word was first used in this sense in 1839, in the January number of the Quarterly Review—"We have always been conscientiously attached to what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative party." (p. 276).

Canning, ten years previously, had used the word in a speech delivered at Liverpool in March, 1826. In Lord Salisbury's Ministry those Whigs and Radicals who joined the Conservatives were called "Liberal Unionists" because they objected to give Ireland a separate parliament (1883).

Consistory (A). An ecclesiastical court. In Rome it consists of the cardinals, presided over by the Pope. In England it is a diocesan court, presided over by the chancellor of the diocese.

Consolidated Fund (The). In 1757 an Act was passed for consolidating the nine loans bearing different interests, into one common loan bearing an interest of three per cent. In 1890 this interest was reduced to two and three-quarter per cent.; and in 1903 will be still further reduced to two and a-half per cent. This fund is pledged for the payment of the interest of the national debt, the civil list, the salaries of the judges, ambassadors, and other high officials, etc.

Consols. A contraction of Consolidated Fund. (See above.)

Consort is properly, one whose lot is cast in with another. As the Queen does not lose by marriage her separate existence, like other women, her husband is called a consort, because he consorts with the Queen, but does not share her sovereignty.

"What thou be our consort?"
Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv, 1.

Conspirators. Members of a commercial ring or corner. (See Corner, Trusts.) These merchants "conspire" to fix the price of articles, and make the public bleed ad libitum. In criminal law it means persons who league together to do something unlawful.

Constable (Latin, comis-stabili) means "Master of the Horse." The constable of England and France was at one time a military officer of state, next in rank to the crown.

To overrun or outrun the constable. To get into debt; spend more than one's income; to talk about what you do not understand. (See below.)

"Quoth Hudlins, Friend Ralph, thou hast outrun the constable at last;
Constable

For thou hast fallen on a new dispute, as sensible as untrue.

"Butler: Hudibras, 1. 3.

Who’s to pay the constable? Who is to pay the score?

The constable arrests debtors, and, of course, represents the creditor; wherefore, to overrun the constable is to overrun your credit account. To pay the constable is to give him the money due, to prevent an arrest.

Constable de Bourbon. Charles, Duc de Bourbon, a powerful enemy of François I. He was killed while heading the assault on Rome. (1527.)

Constantine Tolman (Cornwall). A vast egg-like stone, thirty-three feet in length, eighteen in width, and fourteen in thickness, placed on the points of two natural rocks, so that a man may creep under it. The stone upheved 750 tons.

Constantine’s Cross. In Latin, vinces in hoc; in English, By this conquer. It is said that Constantine, on his march to Rome, saw a luminous cross in the sky, in the shape and with the motto here given. In the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra a vision appeared to him in his sleep, commanding him to inscribe the cross and the motto on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice of the vision, and prevailed. The monogram is XPiEToE (Christ). (See Gibbon: Decline and Fall, chap. xix. n.)

This may be called a standing miracle in legendary history; for, besides Andrew’s cross, and the Dannebrog or red cross of Denmark (q.v.), we have the cross which appeared to Don Alonzo before the battle of Orique in 1139, when the Moors were totally routed with incredible slaughter. As Alonzo was drawing up his men, the figure of a cross appeared in the eastern sky, and Christ, suspended on the cross, promised the Christian king a complete victory. This legend is commemorated by the device assumed by Alonzo, in a field argent five escutcheons azure, in the form of a cross, each escutcheon being charged with five bezants, in memory of the five wounds of Christ. (See Lapidarium.)

Constituent Assembly. The first of the national assemblies of the French Revolution; so called because it took an oath never to separate till it had given to France a constitution. (1788-1791.)

Constituents. Those who constitute or elect members of Parliament. (Latin, constituo, to place or elect, etc.)

Constitutions of Clar’endon. (See Clarendon.)

Apostolic Constitutions. A “Catholic” code of both doctrine and discipline collected by Clemens Románum. The word “Apostolic,” as in the “Apostles’ Creed,” does not mean made by the Apostles, but what the “Church” considered to be in accordance with apostolic teaching.

Construe. To translate. To translate into English means to set an English word in the place of a foreign word, and to put the whole sentence in good grammatical order. (Latin, construere, to construct.)

Consuleo (4 syll.). The impersonation of moral purity in the midst of temptations. The heroine of George Sand’s (Mad. Dudevant’s) novel of the same name.

Contango. The sum paid by a speculator on a “bull account” (i.e. a speculation on the rise in the price of certain stock), to defer completing the bargain till the next settling day. (See Backwardation.)

Contemple (3 syll.). To inspect or watch the temple. The augur among the Romans, having taken his stand on the Capitoline Hill, marked out with his wand the space in the heavens he intended to consult. This space he called the templum. Having divided his templum into two parts from top to bottom, he watched to see what would occur; the watching of the templum was called contemplating.

Contempt of Court. Refusing to conform to the rules of the law courts. Consequential contempt is that which tends to obstruct the business or lower the dignity of the court by direction. Direct contempt is an open insult or resistance to the judge or others officially employed in the court.

Contenement. A word used in Magna Charta, meaning the lands and chattels connected with a tenement; also whatever betis the social position of a person, as the arms of a gentleman, the merchandise of a trader, the plough and wagons of a peasant, etc.

"In every case the contenement (a word expressing of clauses necessary to each man's station) was exempted from seizure."—Ballaln: Middle Ages, part ii. chap. viii. p. 342.

Contentment is true Riches. The wise saw of Democritos, the laughing philosopher. (B.C. 509-400.)

"Content is wealth, the riches of the mind; And happy he who can such riches find."—Dryden: Wife of Bath's Tale.

Contests of Warburg (The), sometimes called The Battle of the Minstrels. An annual contest held in Warburg, in Saxe Weimar, for a prize given by Hermann, Margrave of Thuringia, for the best poem. About 150 specimens of these poems are still extant, by far the best being those of Walter of Vogelweide, in Thuringia (1164-1230). The poem called The Contest of Warburg is by Wolfram, a minnesinger. It records the contest of the two great German schools of poetry in the thirteenth century—the Thuringian and the Suabian. Henry of Vogel-weide and Henry of Ofterdingen represent these two schools.

Continence of a Scipio. It is said that a beautiful princess fell into the hands of Scipio Africa'rus, and he refused to see her, lest he should be tempted to forget his principles. The same is said of Cyrus (see PANTHIRA), of Anson (see THERESA), and of Alexander.

Continental System. A name given to Napoleon's plan for shutting out Great Britain from all commerce with the continent of Europe. He forbade under pain of war any nation of Europe to receive British exports, or to send imports to any of the British dominions. It began Nov. 21st, 1806.

Contin'gent (A). The quota of troops furnished by each of several contracting powers, according to agreement. The word properly means the number which falls to the lot of each; hence we call a fortuitous event a contingency.

Contrabonos Mores (Latin). Not in accordance with good manners; not commensal fault (v.r.).

Contratempo (French). A mischance, something inopportune. Literally, "out of time."

Conventicle means a "little convent," and was originally applied to a cabal of monks against the election of a proposed abbot. It now means a religious meeting of dissenters. (Latin, conventus, an assembly, with a diminutive.) (See CHAPEL.)

Conversation Sharp. Richard Sharp, F.R.S., the critic. (1750-1833.)

Convey. A polite term for steal. Thieves are, by a similar euphemism, called conveyers. (Latin, con-veho, to carry away.)

"Convey, the wise it call. Steal! fool! a face for the phrase."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 3.

Conveyers. Thieves. (See above.)

"Bolliogbroth. 'Go, some of you, convey him to the Tower.'
Rich. II. 'O, good! "Convey," Conyeers are ye are of them, That rise thus mildly by a true king's fall.'"—Shakespeare: Richard II., iv. 4.

Conway Cabal (The), 1777. A faction organised to place General Gates at the head of the American army. He conquered Burgoyne, October, 1777, at Saratoga, and hoped to supplant Washington. The Conway referred to is the town in New Brunswick, North America, where the cabal was formed.

General Gates was conquered in 1780 by Lord Cornwallis.

Conyger or Conigry. A warren for conies, a coyn-burrow.

Cooking and Billing. Like Philip and Mary on a shilling. The reference is to coins struck in the year 1555, in which Mary and her consort are placed face to face, and not cheek by jowl, the usual way.

"Still amorous, and fond, and willing,
Like Philip and Mary on a shilling."
—Hudibras, part ii. 1.

Cook your Goose. (See GOOSE.)

Cooked. The books have been cooked. The ledger and other trade books have been tampered with, in order to show a balance in favour of the bankrupt. The term was first used in reference to George Hudson, the railway king, under whose chairmanship the Eastern Counties Railway accounts were falsified. The allusion is to preparing meat for table.

Cooking. Terms belonging to cuisine applied to man under different circumstances: Sometimes he is well basted; he boils with rage, is baked with heat, and burns with love or jealousy. Sometimes he is buttered and well buttered; he is often cut up, devoured with a flame, and done brown. We dress his jacket for him; sometimes he is eaten up with care; sometimes he is fried. We cook his goose for him, and sometimes he makes a goose of himself. We make a hash of him, and at times he makes a hash of something else. He gets into hot water, and sometimes into a mess. It is made into mince-meat, makes mince-meat of his money, and is often in a pickle. We are often asked to toast him, sometimes he gets well roasted, is sometimes set on fire, put into a stew, or is in a new no one knows why. A "soft" is half-baked, one severely handled is well peppered, to falsify accounts is to salt them, wit is Attic salt, and an exag-gerated statement must be taken cum grano salis. A port young person in a sauce box, a shy lover is a snoon, a rich father has to fine out, and is sometimes dished of his money.

ii. Connected with foods and drinks.
A conceited man does not think small, beer (or small potatoes) of himself, and our mouth is called a potato-trap. A simpletone is a cake, a gudgeon, and a pigeon. Some are cool as a cucumber, others hot as a quail. A chubby child is a little dumpling. A man or woman may be a cheese or duck. A courtesan is called a muton, and a large coarse hand is a muton flat. A greedy person is a pig, a fat one is a sausage, and a shy one, if not a sheep, is certainly sheepish; while a Lubin casts sheep's eyes at his lady-love. A coward is chicken-hearted, a fat person is crummy, and a cross one is crufty, while an aristocrat belongs to the upper crust of society. A yeoman of the guards is a beef-eater, a soldier a red herring, a policeman a lobster, and a stingy, ill-tempered old man is a crab. A walking advertiser between two boards is a sunduich. An alderman in his chair is a turkey hung with sausages. Two persons resembling each other are like as two peas. A clut is a mere sprat, a delicate maiden a tit-bit, and a colorless countenance is called a whey-face. "How now? ... Where got ye that whey-face?"

Cooks. Athenaeus affirms that cooks were the first kings of the earth.
In the luxurious ages of ancient Greece Sicilian cooks were most esteemed, and received very high wages. Among them Trimalchio was very celebrated. It is said that he could cook the most common fish, and give it the flavour and look of the most highly esteemed.

In the palmy days of Rome a chief cook had £800 a year. Antony gave the cook who arranged his banquet for Cleopatra the present of a city.

Modern Cooks.
CARAFE. Called the "Regenerator of Cookery" (1784-1833).
FRANCAELLI (Charles Elmsy), who succeeded Ude at Crockford's. Afterwards he was appointed to the Royal household, and lastly to the Reform Club (1805-1876).
Soyer (Alexis), who died 1858. His epitaph is Soyer tranquilis.
Ude. The most learned of modern cooks, author of Science de la Cuisine. It was Ude who said, "A cook must be born a cook, he cannot be made." Another of his sayings is this: "Music, dancing, fencing, painting, and mechanics possess professors under the age of twenty years, but a commencement in cookery can never be attained under thirty years of age." Ude was chef to Louis XIV., then to Lord Sefton, then to the Duke of York, then to Crockford's Club. He left Lord Sefton's because on one occasion one of the guests added pepper to his soup.

Vatel. At a fête given by the great Condé to Louis XIV. at Cantilly the roi at the twenty-fifth table was wanting. Vatel being told of it exclaimed that he could not survive such a disgrace. Another messenger then announced that the lobsters for the tartob-sauce had not arrived, whereupon Vatel retired to his room and, leaning his sword against the wall, thrust himself through, and at the third attempt succeeded in killing himself (1671).

WEITZEN. Cook to George while Prince Regent.

Cool Card. You are a cool card (or pretty cool card). A person who coolly asks for something preposterous or outrageous. Card = character, hence a queer card, a rum card, etc. And "cool" in this connection means coolly impudent.

"Gifford says the phrase means a "cooling-card, or bolus"; but this is not likely, as a cool-card acts generally as an irritant. A person's card of address is given at the door, and represents the person himself, and this without doubt is the card referred to.

"You're a shoozy old card; and you can't be in love with this Lizzie."—Diaries: Our Stated Friends, book III., chap. I., p. 192.

Cool as a Cucumber. Perfectly composed; neither angry nor agitated in the least.

Cool Hundred (A) or Cool Thousand (or any other sum) means entire, or the whole of £100. Cool, in this case, Cool Tankard

means not influenced by hot-headed enthusiasm or exaggeration.

"I lost a cool hundred myself."—Mackenzie.

Cool Tankard (A) or Cool Cup. A drink made of wine and water, with lemon, sugar, and borage; sometimes also slices of cucumber.

Coon (A) means a racoon, a small American animal valued for its fur. It is about the size of a fox, and lodges in hollow trees.

A gone coon. A person in a terrible fix; one on the verge of ruin. The coon being hunted for its fur is a "gone coon" when it has no escape from its pursuers. It is said that Colonel Crockett was one day out racoon-shooting in North America, when he levelled his gun at a tree where an "old coon" was concealed. Knowing the colonel's prowess, it cried out, in the voice of a man, "Hallo, there! air you Colonel Crockett? for if you air, I'll jest come down, or I know I am a gone coon."

"Martin Scott, lieutenant-general of the United States, is said to have had a prior claim to this saying.

Cooper. Half stout and half porter. The term arises from the practice at breweries of allowing the cooper a daily portion of stout and porter. As they do not like to drink porter after stout, they mix the two together.

Cooper. A coop for wine bottles. The bottles lie in a slanting position in the coop, and may be transported in it from place to place. We find allusions to "six-bottle cooper" not unfrequently, i.e. coops or cases containing six bottles. Compare "hen-coops," "cooped up," etc. (Latin, cupre, a cask; our "cupper").

"(Enter water with a cooper of wine.)
Walter: Six bottles of wine for Corporal Todd.
O'Keefe: Be gone, All, lit. 4.

Cooper. Do you want a cooper? This question is asked of those who have an order to visit the wine-cellars of the London Docks. The "cooper" boxes the casks which gives the visitor different wines to taste.

Cooper's Hill. Near Runnymede and Egham. Both Denham and Pope have written in praise of this hill.

"If I can be to thee
A poet, thou Parmeus sit to me,"—Denham.

Coot. A silly old coot. Stupid as a coot. The coot is a small water-fowl.

But as a coot. The coot has a strong, straight, and somewhat conical bill, the base of which tends to push up the forehead, and there dilates, so as to form a remarkable naked patch.

Cop (A). A policeman.

Cop (A). A copperhead (q.v.).

Cop. To throw, as cop it here. The word properly means to beat or strike, as to cop a shuttlecock or ball with a bat. (Greek, cupo, to beat; but in Norfolk it means to "hull" or throw.

Cop (1b). To catch [a fever, etc.]. To "get copped" is to get caught by the police. (Latin, capere, to take, etc.)

A similar change of a into e is in caught (caught).

"They thought I was asleep; ye know, and the less as I'd copped 'em Jim; well, it come like a bit of a blow."

For I watched by the deathbed of him."

"Nineteenth Birthday (The Last Letter)."

"I shall eat this to-morrow," said the younger man. 'You'll be copped, then,' replied the other."—T. Trelle: Lady Belmar.

Copenhagen. The Duke of Wellington's horse, on which he rode in the Battle of Waterloo, "from four in the morning till twelve at night." It was a rich chestnut, 15 hands high. It was afterwards a pensioner in the paddocks of Stratfield Saye. It died quite blind, in 1835, at the age of twenty-seven, and was buried with military honours. (See Horse.)

Copernicanism. The doctrine that the earth moves round the sun, in opposition to the doctrine that the sun moves round the earth; so called after Nicholas Copernicus, the Prussian astronomer. (1473-1543.)

"Even Belamiris doth not by any means hold the compunction to be dishonest, ye Copernican; for, in his letter to F. Pasquinius, he says that thought he do not believe that any proof of the earth's motion can be adduced, yet, should such proof occur, he is quite prepared to change his views so to the meaning of the Scripture text—Nineteenth Century, May, 1868 (The Case of Galileo).

"Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Holy Congregation that that said book [of Copernicus] was expelled and it be corrected."

—Decree of the Holy Congregation of the Index, A.D. 1616. (Quoted in The Nineteenth Century, 1868.)

Copemmate (2 syl.). A companion. "Copemmate of ugly night" (Rup of Lucrere), a mate who copes with you.

Cophetua. An imaginary king of Africa, of great wealth, who "disdained all womankind." One day he saw a beggar-girl from his window, and fell in love with her. He asked her name; it was Penelope, called by Shakespeare Xenophon (Love's Labours Lost, iv, 1).
Copper

They lived together long and happily, and at death were universally lamented. (Percey's Reliques, book ii. 6.)

"King Copbusus loved the beaar-maid."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 1.

Copper (A). A policeman. Said to be related to the copper badge which Fernando Wood, of New York, appointed them to wear; but more likely a variant of "cop" (q.v.).

"There were cries of 'Coppers, Coppers!' in the yard, and then a violent struggle. . . . Whatever it was that was wanted had evidently secured and dragged off to gaol."—T. Forrester: Lady Deben, i.

Copper was by the ancient alchemists called Venus; gold, symbol of Apollo (the sun); silver, of Diana (the moon); iron, of Mars; quicksilver, of Mercury; tin, of Jupiter; and lead, of Saturn.

Copper. Give us a copper; I, piece of copper money. I have no coppers—no ha'pence.

Copper Captain (A). A Brummagem captain; a "General von Poffenburgh." Michael Perez is so called in Rule a Wife and have a Wife, by Beaumont and Fletcher.

"To this copper-captain was confided the command of the troops."—W. Irving.

Copper Nose. Oliver Cromwell; also called "Ruby Nose," "Nosey," and "Nose Almighty," no doubt from some scorbutic tendency which showed itself in a big red nose.

Copper-nosed Harry. Henry VIII. When Henry VIII. had spent all the money left him by his miserly father, he minted an inferior silver coin, in which the copper alloy soon showed itself on the more prominent parts, especially the nose of the face; and hence the people soon called the king "Old Copper-nose."

Copperheads. Secret foes. Copperheads are poisonous serpents of America that give no warning, like rattlesnakes, of their attack. In the great Civil War of the United States the term was applied by the Federalists to the peace party, supposed to be the covert friends of the Confederates.

Cop'ple. The hen killed by Reynard, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Coproynus. So Constantine V. was surnamed (718, 741-775). "Kopros" is the Greek for dung, and Constantine V. was called Coproynus: "Pare qu'il sait les fonts baptismaux lorsqu'on le baptisait."

Cop'ts. The Jacobite Christians of Egypt, who have for eleven centuries been in possession of the patriarchal chair of Alexandria. The word is probably derived from Coptos, the metropolis of the Thebaïd. These Christians conduct their worship in a dead language called "Coptic" (language of the Copts).

"The Copts of Egypt circumscribe, confess to their priests, and abstain from swine's flesh. They are Jacobites in their creed."—N. Oliva: Travels in Egypt (vol. i. chap. vii. p. 102).

Copus. A drink made of beer, wine, and spice heated together, and served in a "loving-cup." Dog-Latin for cupiellon Hippocratis (a cup of hippocras).

Copy. That's a mere copy of your countenance. Not your real wish or meaning, but merely one you choose to present to me.

Copyhold Estate. Land which a tenant holds [or rather, held] without any deed of transfer in his own possession. His only document is a copy of the roll made by the steward of the manor from the court-roll kept in the manor-house.

"The villain took an oath of fidelity to his lord for the cottage and land which he enjoyed from his bounty. . . . These tenements were suffered to descend to their children . . . and thus the tenure of copyhold was established."—Lindley: England (vol. ii. chap. i. p. 27, note.

Copyright. The law of copyright was made in 1814 (54 Geo. III. c. 165). It enacted that an author should possess a right in his work for life, or for twenty-eight years. If he died before the expiration of twenty-eight years, the residue of the right passed to the heirs.

By Talfourd's or Lord Mahon's Act (1842) the time was extended to forty-two years, and at least seven years after decease: for example, if the time expired exceeds seven years, the heirs enjoy the residue; if less, the heirs claim seven years.

In the first case ten copies of the work had to be given for public use; by Lord Mahon's Act the number was reduced to five: i.e. one to each of the following institutions, viz. the British Museum, the Bodleian (Oxford), the University library (Cambridge), the Advocates' library (Edinburgh), and the library of Trinity College (Dublin).

The six omitted are St. Andrew's and King's (Dublin).

Coq-à-l'âne. A cock-and-bull story; idle nonsense, as "Il fait toujours des coq-à-l'âne"—he is always doing silly things, or talking rubbish.
Il m'a répondu par un cog-d'Pâne—
His reply was nothing to the purpose.

Cordeliers, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Dr. Titus Oates (Numbers xxvi.). North describes him as a short man, extremely ugly: if his mouth is taken for the centre, his chin, forehead, and cheek-bones would fall in the circumference.

"Suck were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud;
Sure signs he neither choler was, nor proud;
His long chin proved his wit; his saint-like grace.
A church vermilion, and a Moses' face.
His memory, miraculously great,
Could make, exceeding man's belief, repeat."

Coral Beads. The Romans used to hang beads of red coral on the cradles and round the neck of infants, to "preserve and favour their health," and save them from "the falling sickness." It was considered by soothsayers as a charm against lightning, whirlwind, shipwreck, and fire. Paracelsus says it should be worn round the neck of children as a preservative "against fits, sorcery, charms, and poison." The coral balls are a Roman Catholic addition, the object being to frighten away evil spirits by their jingle.

"Coral is good to be hanged about the neck of children, to preserve them from the falling sickness. It has also some special sympathy with nature, for the best coral will turn pale and wan if the party that wears it be sick, and it comes to its former colour again as they recover."—Pliny: J ewel-House of Art and Nature.

Coral Master. A juggler. So called by the Spaniards. In ancient times the juggler, when he threw off his mantle, appeared in a tight scarlet or coral dress.

Coram Judice (Latin). Under consideration; still before the judge.

Cor'anach, or Corbonach. Lamentation for the dead, as practically practised in Ireland and Celtic Scotland. (Gaelic, comh ranaich, crying together.) Pennant says it was called by the Irish huidhlo.

Corbant. The rook, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (Latin, corvus; French, corbeau.) Heinrich von Altnar.

Corbeaux. Bearers, i.e. persons who carry the dead to the grave: mutes, etc. So called from the corbillards, or coqles d'eau, which went from Paris to Corbeil with the dead bodies of those who died in the 16th century of a fatal epidemic.

"'T'en vois un corbeau, qui va le tomber.
'J'ai lu quelque part que ce coqhe (the Corbillard) servit, sous Henri IV., a transporter des morts, victimes d'une epidemie de Paris a Corbeil. Le nom de Corbillard reste depuis aux voitures funebres,"—A. J. Bovarrard.

Coresca [Blind-heart]. Superstition is so named in Spenser's Faerie Queene. Abessa tried to make her understand that danger was at hand, but, being blind, she was dull of comprehension. At length she was induced to shut her door, and when Una knocked would give no answer. Then the lion broke down the door, and both entered. The meaning is that England, the lion, broke down the door of Superstition at the Reformation. Coresca means Romanian in England. (Book I. 3.)

Coreyrea' an Sedition (The), b.c. 479. Coreyra was a colony of Corinth, but in the year of the famous Battle of Platea revolted from the mother country and formed an alliance with the Athenians. The Corethians made war on the colony and took 1,000 prisoners; of these 250 were men of position, who promised as the price of liberty to bring back the Coreyreans to the mother country. This was the cause of the sedition. The 250 returned captives represented the oligarchical party; their opponents represented the democratic element. The latter prevailed, but it would be difficult to parallel the treachery and brutality of the whole affair. (Thucydides, Book IV. 46, 48.)

Cordelia. The youngest of Lear's three daughters, and the only one that loved him. (Shakespeare: King Lear;)

Cordelia's Gift. A "voice ever soft, gentle, and low; an excellent thing in woman," (Shakespeare: King Lear, v. 3.)

"It is her voice that he hears prevailing over the two [of] the rest of the company ... for she has not Cordelia's gift."—Mrs Broughton: Dr. Caud.

Cordeliers, i.e. "cord - weavers," 1215. A religious order of the Minor Brothers of St. Francis Assisi. They wore a large grey cloth vestment, girt about the loins with a rope or cord. It was one of the mendicant orders, not allowed to possess any property at all, even their daily food was a gift of charity. The Cordeliers distinguished themselves in philosophy and theology. Duns Scotus was one of their most distinguished members.

The tale is that in the reign of St. Louis these Minorites repulsed an army of infidels, and the king asked who those gens de cordeliers (corded people) were. From this they received their appellation.
Corinth.

The Corinth was an ancient city located on the Gulf of Corinth, on the Greek mainland, roughly 40 miles west of Athens. It was a significant center of trade and culture, especially during the Hellenistic period, when it was a major port and a cultural and artistic hub. The Corinthians were known for their hospitality and generosity, and the city was renowned for its beauty and its strategic position, which made it a key point in both trade and military campaigns.

Cordeliers. (The), 1790. A French political club in the Great Revolution. It held its meetings in the "Convent des Cordeliers," which was in the "Place de l’Ecole de Medicine." The Cordeliers were the rivals of the Jacobins, and numbered among its members Páris (the president), Danton, Marat, Camille Desmoulins, Hébert, Chaumette, Dufoyn of Villiers, Fabre d’Eglantine (a journalist), and others. The Club of the Cordeliers was far in advance of the Jacobins, being the first to demand the abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of a commonwealth instead. Its leaders were put to death between March 24th and April 5th, 1794.

This club was nicknamed "The Pandemonium," and Danton was called the "Archfeud." When Bailly, the mayor, locked them out of their hall in 1794, they met in the Tennis Court (Paris), and declared their name into the "Society of the Rights of Man"; but they are best known by their original appellation.

Cordon (The), in fortification, is the flat stone covering of the revetment (q.c.), to protect the masonry from the rain.

Cordon (Un grand). A member of the Legion d’Honneur. The cross is attached to a grand (broad) ribbon.

Cordon Bleu (Un) (French). A knight of the ancient order of the St. Esprit (Holy Ghost); so called because the decoration is suspended on a blue ribbon. It was at one time the highest order in the kingdom.

Un repas de cordon bleu. A well-cooked and well-appointed dinner. The commandant de Souvè, Comte d’Ollonne, and some others, who were cordon bleus (i.e., knights of St. Esprit), met together as a sort of club, and were noted for their excellent dinners. Hence, when anyone had dined well he said, "Bien, c’est un vrai repas de cordon bleu."

Une Cordon Bleu. A facetious compliment to a good female cook. The play is between cordon bleu, and the blue ribbons or strings of some favourite cook.

Cordon Noir (Un). A knight of the Order of St. Michael, distinguished by a black ribbon.

Cordon Rouge (Un) (French). A chevalier of the Order of St. Louis, the decoration being suspended on a red ribbon.

Corduroy. A cored fabric, originally made of silk, and worn by the kings of France in the chase. (French, cord du roy.)

Corduroy Road. A term applied to roads in the backwoods and swampy districts of the United States of America, formed of the halves of trees sawn in two longitudinally, and laid transversely across the track. A road thus made presents a ribbed appearance, like the cloth called corduroy.

"Look well to your seat, it’s like taking an airing on a corduroy road, and that out of repair."—Lowell: Fable for Critics, stanza 2.

Cordwainer. Not a twister of cord, but a worker in leather. Our word is the French cordouanier (a maker or worker of cordouan); the former a corruption of Cordwainer (a worker in Cordovan leather).

Cora (The). The dancing mania, which in 1800 appeared in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia. The usual manifestations were laughing, shouting, dancing, and convulsions. (Latin chorare, a dance where many dance simultaneously.)

Coriambo. The impersonation of sensual passion in Spenser’s Faerie Queene. (Book iv. 8.)

Corineus (3 syl.). A mythical hero in the suite of Brute, who conquered the giant Goomragot, for which achievement the whole western horn of England was allotted him. He called it Corin’ea, and the people Corineans, from his own name.

"In need of these great conquests by them got, Corineus had that produce unjust went To him assayed for his worthy lot, Which of his name and memorable gest, He called Cornwall."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii. 10.

Corinamua. A Greek poet before the time of Homer. He wrote in heroic verse the Siege of Troy, and it is said that Homer is considerably indebted to him. (Sidus.)

Corinth. Non enim homini contingit adire Corinthum (It falls not to every man’s lot to go to Corinth). Gallius, in his Norsic Attier, i. 8, says that Horace refers to Laus, a courtisan of Corinth, who sold her favours at so high a price that not everyone could afford to purchase them; but this most certainly is not the meaning that Horace intended. He says, "To please princes is no little praise, for it falls not to every man’s lot to go to Corinth." That is, it is as hard to please princes as it is to enter Corinth, situated between two seas, and hence called Bimaisus Corinthius. (I Odes, vii. line 2.)

Still, without doubt, the proverb was applied as Aulus Gallius says: "The courtisans of Corinth are not every man’s money." Demosthenes tells us... that Lais sold her favours for 10,000 [Attic] drachmes (about £300), and adds tanti non emo paritère. (Horace: I Epistles, xvii. line 36.)

Corinth. There is but one road that leads to Corinth. There is only one right way of doing anything. The Bible tells us that the way of evil is broad, because of its many tracks; but the way of life is narrow, because it has only one single footpath.

"All other ways are wrong, all other modes are false. Hence my difficulty!—the number and variety of the ways. For you know, 'There is but one road that leads to Corinth.' "—Peter: Marius the Epicurean, chap. 24.

Corinth's Pedagogue. Dionysios the younger, on being banished a second time from Syracuse, went to Corinth and became schoolmaster. He is called Dionysios the lyreman. Hence Lord Byron says of Napoleon—

"Corinth's pedagogue hath now Transferred his lyre-wood to thy brow."

Old to Napoleon, stanza xiv.

Corinthian (A). A licentious libertin. The immorality of Corinth was proverbial both in Greece and Rome. To Corinthianise is to indulge in licentious conduct. A gentleman sportsman who rides his own horses on the turf, or sails his own yacht.

A Corinthian. A member of the pugilistic club, Bond Street, London.

Corinthian Brass. A mixed metal made by a variety of metals melted at the conflagration of Corinth in B.C. 116, when the city was burnt to the ground by the consul Munnius. Vases and other ornaments were made by the Romans of this metal, of greater value than if they had been made of silver or gold.

The Hong-kee vases (1529) of China were made of a similar mixed metal when the imperial palace was burnt to the ground. These vessels are of priceless value.

"There are, it may be, Corinthian brasses, which was a mixture of all metals, but The brazen serpent."

Enron: Don Juan, vi. 56.

Corinthian Order. The most richly decorated of the five orders of Greek architecture. The shaft is fluted, and the capital adorned with acanthus leaves. (See Acanthus.)

Corinthian Tom. The sporting rake in Pierce Egan's Life in London. A "Corinthian" was the "fast man" of Shakespeare's period.

"I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian, a noble mettle, a good lad."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. 4.

Corinthian War (The), B.C. 395-387. A suicidal contention between the Corinthians and the Lacedemonians. The allies of Corinth were Athens, Thbes, and Argos. The only battle of note was that of Corinth won by the Lacedemonians. Both the contending parties, utterly exhausted, agreed to the arbitration of Artaxeres, and signed what is called The Peace of Antalkidas.

Not long after this destructive contest Eumamnidas and Pelopidas (Thucian generals) won the battle of Leptra (B.C. 371), from which defeat the Lacedemonians never recovered.

Corked. This wine is corked—i.e. tastes of the cork.

Corker or Calker. The nail in a horse's shoe to prevent slipping in frosty weather. (Latin, calze.)

Corking-pins. Pins at one time used by ladies to keep curls on the forehead fixed and in trim.

Cormoran. The Cornish giant who fell into a pit twenty feet deep, dug by Jack the Giant-killer, and filmed over with grass and gravel. The name means comorant or great eater. For this doughty achievement Jack received a belt from King Arthur, with this inscription—

"This is the valiant Cornish man
That slew the giant Cormoran, Jack the Giant-killer.

Corn... Horn. Up corn, down horn. When corn is high or dear, beef is down or cheap, because persons have less money to spend on meat.

Corn in Egypt (Threw's). There is abundance; there is a plentiful supply. Of course, the reference is to the Bible story of Joseph in Egypt.

Corn—Law Rhymer. Ebenezer Elliot, who wrote philippics against the corn laws (1781-1849).

"Is not the corn-law rhymier already a king?"—Carlyle.

Cornstalks. In Australia and the United States, youths of colonial birth are so called from being generally both taller and more slender than their parents.

Corns. To tread on one's corns. To irritate one's prejudices; to annoy another by disregard to his pet opinions or habits.

Cornage (2 syl.), horn-service. A kind of tenure in grand serjeanty. The service required was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived. "Cornage" was money paid instead of the old service.

Corneille de Boulevard. Guibert de Picrécourt (1773-1814).

Corneille d'Esop (Lt). Motley work. "C'est la corneille d'Esop."
The allusion is to the fable of the Jackdaw which decked itself with the plummage of the peacocks. The jackdaw not only lost its borrowed plumes, but got picked well-nigh to death by the angry peacocks.

Corner (A). The condition of the market with respect to a commodity which has been largely bought up, in order to create a virtual monopoly and enhance its market price; as a salt-corner, a corner in pork, etc. The idea is that the goods are piled and hidden in a corner out of sight.

"The price of bread rose like a rocket, and speculators wished to corner what little there was."—New York Weekly Times (June 15, 1861).

Corner. Driven into a corner. Placed where there is no escape; driven from all subterfuges and excuses.

Corner (The). Tattersall’s horse-stores and betting-rooms, Knightsbridge
Green. They were once at the corner of Hyde Park.

To make a corner. To combine in order to control the price of a given article, and thus secure enormous profits.
(See Corner.)

What have I done to deserve a corner?
To deserve punishment. The allusion is to setting naughty children in a corner by way of punishment.

"There’s nothing I have done yet, o’ my conscience."

Corner. Shakespeare: Henry VIII., il. 1.

Corner-stone (The). The chief cornerstone. A large stone laid at the base of a building to strengthen the two walls forming a right angle. These stones in some ancient buildings were as much as twenty feet long and eight feet thick.
Christ is called (in Eph. ii. 20) the chief corner-stone because He united the Jews and Gentiles into one family. Daughters are called corner-stones (Psalm cliv. 12) because, as wives and mothers, they unite together two families. In argument, the minor premise is the chief corner-stone.

Cornet. The scourge of horse.
William Pitt, first Earl of Chatham (1708-1778). His son William was “the pilot that weathered the storm” (meaning the French Revolution and Napoleon).

Cornette. Porter la cornette. To be domineered over by the woman of the house; to be a Jerry Sneak. The cornette is the mob-cap anciently worn by the women of France. Porter les culottes (to wear the breeches) is the same idea; only it shows who has the mastery, and not who is mastered. In the latter case it means the woman wears the dress of the man, and assumes his position in the house. Probably our expression about "wearing the horns" may be referred to the "cornette" rather than to the stag or deer.

Corngate (2 syl.). A term given in Wiltshire to the soil in the northwestern border, consisting of an irregular mass of loose gravel, sand, and limestone.

Cornish Hug. A hug to overthrow you. The Cornish men were famous wrestlers, and tried to throttle their antagonist with a particular grip or embrace called the Cornish hug.

Cornish Language was virtually extinct 150 years ago. Doll Peat-reath, the last person who could speak it, died, at the age of ninety-one, in 1777.
(Notes and Queries.)

Cornish Names.

"By Tre, Pol, and Pen,
You shall know the Cornishmen."

Thus, Tre [a town] gives Treffry, Tre-gong, Tregony, Tregothean, Trelawy, Tremayne, Treviannyon, Treveddow, Tre-withen, etc.
Pol [a head] gives Polkerris Point,
Polperro, Polwheel, etc.
Pen [a top] gives Penkevil, Penrice,
Penrose, Pentire, etc.

Cornish Wonder (The). John Opie, of Cornwall, the painter. (1761-1807).

Cornubian Shore (The). Cornwall, famous for its tin mines.

"...from the bleak Cornubian shore
Dispense the mineral treasure, which of old Saxon pilots sought."—Akenade: Hymn to the Neids.

Cornu-co'pia. (See Amalthea's Horn.)

Cornwall. (See Barry, Corinens.)

Cor'onach. (See Coranach.)

Coronation Chair consists of a stone so enclosed as to form a chair.
It was probably the stone on which the kings of Ireland were inaugurated on the hill of Tara. It was removed by Fergus, son of Eric, to Argyleshire, and thence by King Kenneth (in the ninth century) to Scone, where it was enclosed in a wooden chair. Edward I. transferred it to Westminster.

The monkish legend says that it was the very stone which formed "Jacob's pillow."

The tradition is, "Wherever this stone is found, there will reign some of the Scotch race of kings." (See Soone.)

Coroner means properly the crown-officer. In Saxon times it was his duty to collect the Crown revenues; next, to take charge of Crown pleas; but at present to uphold the paternal solicitude of the Crown by searching into all cases of sudden or suspicious death. (Vulgo, crown'r; Latin, corona, the crown.)

"But is this law?
As marry, it's crown'r's quest law"

Coronet. A crown inferior to the royal crown. A duke's coronet is adorned with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a marquis with strawberry leaves alternating with pearls; that of an earl has pearls elevated on stalks, alternating with leaves above the band; that of a viscount has a string of pearls above the band, but no leaves; that of a baron has only six pearls.

Coronilis. Daughter of a King of Pho'cis, changed by Ath'na into a crow. There was another Cor'nilis, loved by Apollo, and killed by him for infidelity.

Corporal Violet. (See Violet.)

Corporation. A large paunch. A municipal corporation is a body of men elected for the local government of a city or town.

Corps de Garde (French). The company of men appointed to watch in a guard-room; the guard-room.

Corps Diplomatique (French). A diplomatic body [of men].

Corps Legislatif (French). The lower house of the French legislature. The first assembly so called was when Napoleon I. substituted a corps legislatif and a tribunal for the two councils of the Directory, Dec. 21, 1799. The next was the corps legislatif and conseil d'etat of 1807. The third was the corps legislatif of 750 deputies of 1849. The legislative power under Napoleon III. was vested in the Emperor, the senate, and the corps legislatif. (1832.)

Corpsse Candle. The ignis fatuus is so called by the Welsh because it was supposed to bode death, and to show the road that the corpse would take. Also a large candle used at lich wakes—i.e. watching a corpse before interment. (German leiche, a corpse.)

Corpus Christi [body of Christ]. A festival of the Church, kept on the first Thursday after Trinity Sunday, in honour of the eucharist. There are colleges both at Cambridge and Oxford so named.

Corpus Delicti (Latini). The fundamental fact that a crime has really been committed; thus finding a murdered body is "corpus delicti" that a murder has been committed by someone.

Corpuscular Philosophy, promulgated by Robert Boyle. It accounts for all natural phenomena by the position and motion of corpuscles. (See Atomic Philosophy.)

Corrector. (See Alexander the Corrector.)

Correggio. The Correggio of sculptors. Jean Goujon, who was slain in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. (1510-1572.)

Corroborare. An Australian war-dance.

"He roared, stamped, and danced corroboree, like any black fellow."—Kinglsey: Water-Babies, chap. viii. p. 200.

Corregues. The sword of Sir Oruel in medieval romance. (See Sword.)

Corrugated Iron. Sheet iron coated with zinc. It is called corrugated or wrinkled because the sheet is made wavy by the rollers between which it is made to pass.

Corruptio bene. A sect of heretics of the sixth century, who maintained that Jesus Christ was corruptible.

Corruption of Blood. Loss of title and entailed estates in consequence of treason, by which a man's blood is attainted and his issue suffers.

Corseir means properly "one who gives chase." Applied to the pirates of the northern coast of Africa. (Italian corso, a chase; French corsaire; Latin corsus.)

Cors'ned means the "cursed mouthful." It was a piece of bread "consecrated for exorcism," and given to a person to swallow as a test of his guilt. The words of "consecration" were, "May this morsel cause convulsions and find no passage if the accused is guilty, but turn to wholesome nourishment if he is innocent." (Saxon, corse, curse; sned, mouthful.) (See Choke.)

Cortés (2 syl.). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means court officers.

Cortina. The skin of the serpent Pytho, which covered the tripod of the Pythoness when she delivered her oracles. "Tripodas cortina tegit" (Prudentius: Apophthegmata, 506); also the tripod itself, or the place where the oracle was delivered. (Virgil: Aenid, vi. 343.) "Neque te Phoebi cortina feletit."

Corythus (a raven). Janus Hunyady, Governor of Hungary, is so called from the raven on his shield.

There were two Romans so called—viz. Valerius Maximus Corythus Messala, and Valerius Messala Corythus.

Marcus Valerius was so called because, in a single combat with a gigantic Gaul during the Gallic war, a raven flew into the Gaul's face and so harassed him that he could neither defend himself nor attack his adversary.

Corybantic Religion. An expression applied by Prof. Huxley to the Salvation Army and its methods. The rowdy processions of the Salvation Army (especially in England, 1891), resembling the wild ravings of the ancient Corybants, or devotees of Bacchus, more than sober, religious functions, have given colour to the new word.

Corycian Cave (The), on Mount Parnassus; so called from the nymph Corycya. The Muses are sometimes called Corycides (4 syl.).

"The Immortal Muse
To your calm habitations, to the cave,
Corycian ... will guide his footsteps."—Athenaeus: Hymn to the Naiads.

Corycian Nymphs (The). The Muses. (See above.)

Corydon. A swain; a brainless, love-sick sponger. It is one of the shepherds in Virgil's eclogues.

Coryphæus (The) or "Coryphæus." The leader and speaker of the chorus in Greek dramas. In modern English it is used to designate the chief speaker and most active member of a board, company, or expedition.

Coryphæus of German Literature (The). Goethe, "prince of German poets" (1749-1812).

"The Polish poet called upon ... the great Coryphæus of German literature."—Notes and Queries, 27th April, 1878.

Coryphæus of Grammarians. Aristarchos of Samothrace. A coryphæus was the leader of the Greek chorus; hence the chief of a department in any of the sciences or fine arts. Aristarchos, in the second century B.C., was the chief or prince of grammarians. (Greek, koryphæus, leader.)

Coryphée. A ballet-dancer. (See preceding column.)

Coss (plu. Cossae). A theoretic speculation; a literary fancy; a whim of the brain (Indian).

Cosm'.iel (3 syl.). The genius of the world. He gave Theodidactus a boat of asbestos, in which he sailed to the sun and planets. (Kircher: Eratosthenic Journey to Heaven.

Cosmopolite (4 syl.). A citizen of the world. One who has no partiality to any one country as his abiding-place; one who looks on the whole world with "an equal eye." (Greek, cosmos-polites.)

Coss.et. A house pet. Applied to a pet lamb brought up in the house; any pet. (Anglo-Saxon, cot-seat, cottage-dweller; German, kössel.)

Costard. A clown in Love's Labour's Lost (Shakespeare), who apes the court wit of Queen Elizabeth's time, but misapplies and miscalls like Mrs. Malaprop or Master Dogberry.

Costard. A large apple, and, metaphorically, a man's head. (See Costermonger.)

"Take him over the costard with the hilt of thy sword."—Shakespeare: Richard III. 1. 4.

Costermonger. A seller of cabbages about the streets, properly an apple-seller (from costard, a sort of apple, and monger, "a trader"); Saxon, manigian, "to trade"); a word still retained in ironmonger, cheese-monger, fish-monger, news-monger, fell-monger, etc.

"Her father was an Irish costermonger."—B. Jonson: The Alchemist, v. 1.

Cote-hardi. A tight-fitting tunic buttoned down the front.

"He was clothed in a cote-hardi upon the eye of Almaine [Germany]."—Griffon de la Tour; Lamy.

Cotereaux (French). Cut-throats. The King of England, irritated at the rising in Brittany in the twelfth century, sent the Brabançons (q.r.) to ravage the lands of Raoul de Fougères. These cut-throats carried knives (couteaux) with them, whence their name.

Coterie (3 syl.). A French word, originally tantamount to our "guild," a society where each paid his quote—i.e., his quote-part or gild (short). The French word has departed from its original meaning, and is now applied to an exclusive set, more especially of ladies.

"All coteries ... it seems to me, have a tendency to change truth into affectation."—S. T. Coleridge: Charlotte Bronte (vol. ii. chap. xi. p 47.).
Cotillion (co-til-yon) means properly the "under-petticoat." The word was applied to a brisk dance by eight persons, in which the ladies held up their gowns and showed their under-petticoats. The dance of the present day is an elaborate one, with many added figures.

Cotswet. The lowest of bondsmen. So called from cot-scot (a cottage-dweller). These slaves were bound to work for their feudal lord. The word occurs frequently in Domesday Book.

Cotswold barley. You are as long a-coming as Cotswold barley. Cotswold, in Gloucestershire, is a very cold, bleak place on the wolds, exposed to the winds, and very backward in vegetation, but yet it yields a good late supply of barley.

Cotswold lion. A sheep for which Cotswold hills are famous. Pierce as a Cotswold lion (ironical).

Cotta, in Pope’s Moral Essays (Epistle 2). John Holles, fourth Earl of Clare, who married Margaret, daughter of Henry Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, and was created Duke of Newcastle in 1694 and died 1711.

Cottage Countess (The). Sarah Higgins, of Shropshire, daughter of a small farmer, in 1790 married Henry Cecil, Marquis of Exeter and Lord of Burleigh. The bridegroom was at the time living under the name of John Jones, separated from his wife, whose maiden name was Emma Vernon. She eloped with a clergyman, and subsequently to the second marriage "John Jones," the lord of Burleigh, obtained a divorce and an Act of Parliament to legitimise the children of his second wife. Sarah Higgins was seventeen at the time of her marriage, and "John Jones" was thirty. They were married by licence in the parish church of Bolas. Tennyson has a poem on the subject called The Lord of Burleigh, but historically it is not to be trusted.

Cottage Orné (A). (French). A cottage residence belonging to persons in good circumstances.

Cotyn. One of the three Hundred-handed giants, son of Heaven and Earth. His two brothers were Briareus [Bri-a-rhee] and Gyges or Gyis. (See HUNDRED-HANDED GIANTS.)

Cotton. To cotton to a person. To cling to one or take a fancy to a person. To stick to a person as cotton sticks to our clothes.

Cotton. A great cotton lord. A rich Manchester cotton manufacturer, a real lord in wealth, style of living, equipage, and tenantry.

Cottonian Library. In the British Museum. Collected by Sir R. Cotton, and added to by his son and grandson, after which it was invested in trustees for the use of the public.

Cottonopolis. Manchester, the great centre of cotton manufactures.

"His friends thought he would have preferred the busy life of Cottonopolis to the out-of-way county of Cornwall."—Newspaper paragraph, January, 1880.

Coty'tta. The Thracian goddess of immodesty, worshipped at Athens with nocturnal rites.

"Hail! goddess of nocturnal sport, Dark-ev'ned Coty'tta."—Milton: Comus, 129, 130.

Coucy. Enguerrand III., Sire de Coucy, has won fame by his arrogant motto:

"Roy je ne suis,
Ni Prince, ni comte, aussi,
Je suis Le Sire de Coucy."

Couleur de Rose (French). Highly coloured; too favourably considered; overdrawn with romantic embellishments, like objects viewed through glass tinted with rose pink.

Coulun. A British giant, pursued by Debon (one of the companions of Brute) till he came to a chasm 132 feet across, which he leaped; but slipping on the opposite side, he fell back into the chasm and was killed. (Spencer: "Faerie Queene." (See GIANTS.)

Councils. Ecumenical Councils. There are twenty-one recognised, nine Eastern and twelve Western.

The Nine Eastern: (1) Jerusalem; (2 and 8) Nice, 325, 787; (3, 6, 7, 9) Constantinople, 381, 553, 680, 869; (4) Ephesus, 431; (5) Chalcedon, 451.

The Twelve Western: (10, 11, 12, 13, 19) Lateran, 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, 1517; (14, 15) Synod of Lyon, 1245, 1274; (16) Synod of Vienne, in Dauphiné, 1311; (17) Constance, 1414; (18) Basil, 1431-1443; (20) Trent, 1545-1563; (21) Vatican, 1869.

Of these, the Church of England recognises only the first six, viz.:

2nd of Nice, against the Arians.
3rd of Constantinople, against "heretics."
4th of Ephesus, against the Nestorians and Pelagians.
4th of Chalcedon, when Athanasius was restored.
5th of Constantinople, against Origen.
6th of Constantinople, against the Monothelites (4 th).
Counsel. Keep your own counsel. Don't talk about what you intend to do. Keep your plans to yourself.

"Now, mind what I tell you, and keep your own counsel." — Boldwood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. vi.

Count Kin with One (To), is a Scotch expression meaning to compare one's pedigree with that of another.

Count not your Chickens . . .
(See Chickens.)

Count out the House (To). To declare the House of Commons adjourned because there are not forty members present. The Speaker has his attention called to the fact, and must himself count the number present. If he finds there are not forty members present, he declares the sitting over.

Count Upon (To). To rely with confidence on some one or some thing; to reckon on.

Countenance (To). To sanction; to support. Approval or disapproval is shown by the countenance. The Scripture speaks of "the light of God's countenance," i.e. the smile of approbation; and to "hide His face" (or countenance) is to manifest displeasure.

"General grant, neither at this time nor at any other, save the least countenance to the efforts . . . ." — Nicely and Hoy: Abraham Lincoln (vol. ii. chap. II. p. 21).

To keep in countenance. To encourage, or prevent one losing his countenance or feeling dismayed.

To keep one's countenance. To refrain from smiling or expressing one's thoughts by the face.

Out of countenance. Ashamed, confounded. With the countenance fallen or cast down.

To put one out of countenance is to make one ashamed or discouraged. To "discountenance" is to set your face against something done or pronounced.

Counter-caster. One who keeps accounts, or casts up accounts by counters. Thus, in The Winter's Tale, the Clown says, "Fifteen hundred shorn: what comes the wool to? I cannot do 't without counters." (Act iv. s. 3.)

"And what was he? Forsouth, a great arithmetician . . . And I . . . must be helped and called By debtor and creditor, this counter-caster." Shakespeare: Othello, i. 1.

Countercheck Quarrelsome (To). Sir, how dare you utter such a falsehood? Sir, you know that it is not true. This is the third remove from the lie direct; or rather, the lie direct in the third degree.

The Reproof Valiant, the Countercheck Quarrelsome, the Lie Circumstantial, and the Lie Direct are not clearly defined by Touchstone. That is not true; how dare you utter such a falsehood? If you say no, you are a liar; you lie, or are a liar, seem to fit the four degrees.

Counterforts, in permanent fortification. The sides of ditches strengthened interiorly by buttresses some fifteen or eighteen feet apart. (See REVETMENTS.)

Counter-jumper. A draper's assistant, who jumps over the counter to go from one part of the shop to another.

Counterpane. A corruption of countercpant, from the Latin cucititia (a wadded wrapper, a quilt). When the stitches were arranged in patterns it was called cucititia puncta, which in French became contre-pointe, corrupted into contre-pointe, counter-point, where point is pronounced "poyn," corrupted into "pane."

Counterscarp, in fortification, the side of a ditch next to the open country. The side next to the place fortified is the escarp.

Countess di Civillari (To). A bog, sewer, cesspool, into which falls thirteenth part of a city. Two wags promis Simón de Villa an introduction to the Countessdi Civillari, and tossed him, in his scarlet gown, into a ditch where farmers "emptied the Countess of Civillari for manuring their lands." Here the doctor floundered about half the night, and, having spoilt his robes, made the best of his way home, to be rated soundly by his wife. (Boccaccio: Decameron, Eighth day, ix.)

Country. To appeal to the country. To dissolve Parliament in order to ascertain the wish of the country by a new election of representatives. Father of his country. (See FATHER.)

Country-dance. A corruption of the French contre danse (a dance where the partners face each other).

Coup (call). He made a good coup. A good hit or haul. (French.)

Coup d'État (French) means a state stroke, and the term is applied to one of those bold measures taken by Government to prevent a supposed or actual danger; as when a large body of men are arrested suddenly for fear they should overturn the Government.

The famous coup d'État, by which Louis Napoleon became possessed of absolute Coup de Grâce. The finishing stroke. When criminals were tortured by the wheel or otherwise, the executioner gave him a coup de grâce, or blow on the head or breast, to put him out of his misery.

"The Turks dealt the coup de grâce to the Eastern empire."—Times.

The following is taken from a note (chap. xxx.) of Sir W. Scott's novel The Betrayed.

"This punishment [being broken on the wheel] consists in the executioner, with a bar of iron, breaking the shoulder-bones, arms, thighs, and legs—taking alternate sides. The punishment is concluded by a blow across the breast, called the coup de grâce, or blow of mercy, because it removes the sufferer from his agony. Mandrin, the celebrated smuggler, while in the act of being thus tortured, tells us that the sensibility of man never continues after the nervous system has been shattered by the first blow."

Coup de Main (French). A sudden stroke; a stratagem whereby something is effected suddenly. Sometimes called a coup only, as "The coup [the scheme] did not answer."

"London is not to be taken by a coup de main."

—Public Opinion.

Coup d'œil (French). A view; glance; prospect; effect of thing; in the mass.

These principles are presented at a single coup d'œil.

The coup d'œil was grand in the extreme.

Coup de Pied de l'Anse (kick from the ass's foot). A blow given to a vanquished or fallen man; a cowardly blow; an insult offered to one who has not the power of returning or avenging it. The allusion is to the fable of the sick lion kicked by the ass. (French.)

Coup de Soleil (French). A sun-stroke, any malady produced by exposure to the sun.

Coup de Théâtre. An unforeseen or unexpected turn in a drama to produce a sensational effect. In ordinary life, something planned for effect. Burke and his dagger was meant for a coup de théâtre, but it was turned into farce by a little ready wit. (See DAGGER-SCENE.)

Coup Manqué (A). A false stroke.

"Shoot dead, or don't aim at all but never make a coup manqué."—Quinto: Under Two Flags, chap. xx.

Coupons. A certificate of interest which is to be cut off [French, couper] from a bond and presented for payment. It bears on its face the date and amount of interest to be paid. If the coupons are exhausted before the principal is paid off, new ones are gratuitously supplied to the holder of the bond.

Most foreign state-bonds expire in a stated term of years; generally a portion being paid off annually at par. Suppose there are 1,000 bonds, and 10 are paid off annually, then in 100 years all are paid off and the obligation is cancelled.

Courage of One's Opinion. To have the courage of one's opinion means to utter, maintain, and act according to one's opinion, be the consequences what they may. The French use the same location. Martyrs may be said to have had the courage of their opinions.

Courland Weather. Very boisterous, ungenial weather, with high winds, driving snow and rain, like the weather of Courland, in Russia.

Course. Another course would have done it. A little more would have affected our purpose. It is said that the peasants of a Yorkshire village tried to wall in a cuckoo in order to enjoy an eternal spring. They built a wall round the bird, and the cuckoo just skimmed over it. "Ah!" said one of the peasants, "another curse would a' done it."

"There is a school of musicians in, connecting sundry short-cornings...with changes in manners, ending not in person to person, but only in another curse, and the wall is wall in the cuckoo."

—Nineteenth Century, December, 1852, p. 150.

Course. To keep on the course. To go straight; to do one's duty in that course [path] of life in which we are placed. The allusion is to racing horses.

"We are not the only horses that can't be kept on the course of a good horse in speed, too;"

—Bold's wood: Bold's under Arms, chap. VII.

Court originally meant a coop or sheepfold. It was on the Latium hills that the ancient Latins raised their corn or cohors, small enclosures with hurdles for sheep, etc. Subsequently, as many men as could be coopied or folded together were called a coop or cohort. The "corn" or cattle-yard being the nucleus of the farm, became the centre of a lot of farm cottages, then of a hamlet, town, fortified place, and lastly of a royal residence.

Court. A short cut, alley, or paved way between two main streets. (French, court, "short," as prendre un chemin court, "to take a short cut.")

Out of court. Not worth consideration; wholly to be discarded, as such and such an hypothesis is wholly out of court, and has been proved to be untenable. "No true bill."

Court Circular. Brief paragraphs supplied to certain daily papers by an officer (the Court Newman) specially appointed for the purpose. He announces the movements of the sovereign, the Prince of Wales, and the court generally; gives reports of the levees, drawing-rooms, state balls, royal concerts, meetings of the Cabinet ministers, deputations to ministers, and so on. George III., in 1803, introduced the custom to prevent misstatements on these subjects.

Court-cupboard. The buffet to hold flagons, cans, cups, and beakers. There are two in Stationers' Hall.

"Away with the joint-stands, remove the court-cupboard, look to the plate." — Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 5.

Court Fools. (See Fools.)

Court Holy Water. Fair speeches, which look like promises of favour, but end in nothing.

Court Plaster. The plaster of which the court ladies made their patches. These patches, worn on the face, were cut into the shape of crescents, stars, circles, diamonds, hearts, crosses; and some even went so far as to patch their face with a coach-and-four, a ship in full sail, a château, etc. This ridiculous fashion was in vogue in the reign of Charles I.; and in the reign of Anne was employed as the badge of political partisanship. (See PATCHES.)

"Your black patches you wear variously, Some cut like stars, some in half-moons, some lozenges." — Beaumont and Fletcher: Fair Brother, iii. 2.

Court of Love. A judicial court for deciding affairs of the heart, established in Provence during the palmy days of the Troubadours. The following is a case submitted to their judgment: A lady listened to one admirer, squeezed the hand of another, and touched with her toe the foot of a third. Query. Which of these three was the favoured suitor?

Court of Pie-powder. (See PIE-POUDRE.)

Court of the Gentiles (The). They are in the Court of the Gentiles. They are not wholly God’s people; they are not the elect, but have only a smattering of the truth. The "Court of the Israelites" in the Jewish temple was for Jewish men; the "Court of the Women" was for Jewish women; the "Court of the Gentiles" was for those who were not Jews.

"Oh, Chaddie, they are not in the Court of the Gentiles, and if we entered further, I doubt." — Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. viii.

Courte. Civility, politeness. It was at the courts of princes and great feudatories that minstrels and pages practised the refinements of the age in which they lived. The word originally meant the manners of the court.

Courte Titles. Titles assumed or granted by social custom, but not of any legal value. The court title of the eldest son of a duke is marquis; of a marquis is earl; of the eldest son of an earl is viscount. Younger sons of peers are by courtesy called lord or honourable, and the daughters are lady or honourable. These titles do not give the holders official rank to sit in the House of Lords. Even the Marquis of Lorne, the Queen’s son-in-law, is only a commondore (1894).

Cousin. Blackstone says that Henry IV., being related or allied to every earl in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged the connection in all public acts. The usage has descended to his successors, though the reason has long ago failed. (Commentaries, i. 398.)

Cousin. All peers above the rank of baron are officially addressed by the Crown as cousin.

A viscount or earl is "Our right trusty and well-beloved cousin."

A marquis is "Our right trusty and entirely-beloved cousin."

A duke is "Our right trusty and right-entirely-beloved cousin."

Cousin Betsy. A half-witted person, a "Bless of Bedlam" (q.t.).

"None may call Betsy's wounded him of a penny, or with less measure to a child of a cousin Betsy." — Mrs Gaskell.

Cousin-german. The children of brothers and sisters, first cousins; kinsfolk. (Latin, germa nus, a brother, one of the same stock.)

"There is three cousin-germans that has woven all the best of Reading, of Madeley, of Colonel, of horses and money." — Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 5.

Cousin Jack. So Cornishmen are called in the western counties.

Cousin Michael (or Michel). The Germans are so called. Michel, in Old German, means "pious," cousin Michel is meant to indicate a slow, heavy, simple, unrefined, course-feeding people.

Coûte que Coûte (French). Cost what it may, at any price, be the consequences what they may.

"His object is to serve his party coûte que coûte." — Standard.
Couvade (2 syl.). A man who takes the place of his wife when she is in child-bed. (See Reader’s Handbook, p. 217, col. 2.)

Cove (1 syl.). An individual: as a flash cove (a swell), a rum cove (a man whose position and character is not quite palatable), a gentry cove (a gentleman), a downy cove (a very knowing individual), etc. (Gipsy, cove, a thing; cove, that man; covi, that woman.)

Cov’enanter. A term applied, during the civil wars, to the Scotch Presbyterians, who united by “solemn league and covenant” to resist the encroachments of Charles I. on religious liberty.

Covent Garden. A corruption of Convent Garden; the garden and burial ground attached to the convent of Westminster, and turned into a fruit and flower market in the reign of Charles II. It now belongs to the Duke of Bedford.

Cov’entry. To send one to Coventry. To take no notice of him; to let him live and move and have his being with you, but pay no more heed to him than to the idle winds which you regard not. According to Messrs. Chambers (Cyclopaedia), the citizens of Coventry h.d at one time so great a dislike to soldiers that a woman seen speaking to one was instantly tabooed. No intercourse was ever allowed between the garrison and the town; hence, when a soldier was sent to Coventry, he was cut off from all social intercourse.

Hutton, in his History of Birmingham, gives a different version. He says that Coventry was a stronghold of the parliamentary party in the civil wars, and that all troublesome and refractory royalists were sent there for safe custody. The former explanation meets the general scope of the phrase the better. (See Boycott.)

Coventry Mysteries. Miracle plays acted at Coventry till 1591. They were published in 1841 for the Shakespeare Society.

Parliaments held at Coventry. Two parliaments have been held in this city, one in 1401, styled Parliamentium Inde torum; and the other in 1439, called Parliamentium Diabolicum.

Cover. To break cover. To start from the covert or temporary lair. The usual earth-holes of a fox being covered up the night before a hunt, the creature makes some gore-hush or other cover its temporary resting-place, and as soon as it quits it the hunt begins.

Covers were laid for . . . Dinner was provided for . . . A cover (convent) in French means knife, fork, spoon, and napkin. Hence, mettre le convent, to lay the cloth; and lever (or aller) le convent, to clear it away.

Covered Way, in fortification. (See Glacies.)

Covering the Face. No malefactor was allowed, in ancient Persia, to look upon a king. So, in Esther vii. 5, when Haman fell into disgrace, being seen on the queen’s diwan, “they instantly cover Haman’s face,” that he might not look on the face of Ahasuerus.

*In India a low caste man covers his mouth when speaking to one of high caste.

Cover’ley. Sir Roger de Coverley. A member of an hypothetical club in the Spectator, “who lived in Soho Square when he was in town.” Sir Roger is the type of an English squire in the reign of Queen Anne. He figures in thirty papers of the Spectator.

“Who can be insensible to his unpretending virtues and amiable weaknesses; his modesty, generosity, hospitality, and evenness within the respect of his neighbours, and the affection of his domestics?”—Holstii.

Covetous Man. A Tantalus (q.v.).

“In the full flood stands Tantalus, whose skin was washed over in vain, for even dry within.” He carouses at the stream with greedy lips—From his perished mouth the wanton current slips—Change but the name, this tale is the story: Then in a flood of molten wealth destitute, Which then cannot touch, but never taste.”—Cowper: Night, st. 1.

Cow. The cow that nourished Ymir with four streams of milk was called Audhumla. (Scandinavian mythology.) (See AUDHUMLA.)

Curd cows. (See under CURD.)

The whiter the cow, the surer is it to go to the altar. The richer the prey, the more likely is it to be seized.

“The system of improrations crew so rapidly that, in the course of three centuries, more than a third part of all the benefices in England became such, and those the richest, for the whiter the cow, the surer was it to go to the altar.”—Baint: Reformaition in England, p. 65.

Cow’s Tail. “Always behind, like a cow’s tail.”—Tunquum coda vitellii. (Petronius.)

The cow knows not the worth of her tail till she loses it, and is troubled with flies, which her tail brushed off.

“Why, then we rack the value.”—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, iv. 1.

Cow-lick. A tuft of hair on the human forehead, sometimes called a feather: it cannot be made to lie in the same direction as the rest of the hair by brushing, or even by pomatum. When cows lick their hides they make the hair stand on end.
Coward

"This term must have been adopted from a comparison with that part of a cow's hide where the hairs, having different directions, meet and form a projecting ridge, supposed to be occasioned by the animals licking themselves."—Brockett: Glossary of North-Country Words.

Coward (anciently written culvard) is either from the French, coward, originally written culvert, from culver (a pigeon), pigeon-livered being still a common expression for a coward; or else from the Latin, culvertere, to turn tail (Spanish, culbardo; Portuguese, coward; Italian, codardo; "a coward."); Latin, ruin, "a tail"). A beast cowardly in heraldry, is one drawn with its cove or tail between its legs. The allusion is to the practice of beasts, who sneak off in this manner when they are coward.

Cowper. Called "Author of The Task," from his principal poem. (1791-1800.)

Cowper Law, a corruption of Cusar, etc., is trying a man after execution. Similar expressions are Jedwood, Jeddart, and Jedburgh justice. Cowper justice had its rise from a in-bailie in Cowpar-Angus, before heritable jurisdictions were abolished. (See Lydford Law.)

"Cowper Law, as we say in Scotland—hang a man first, and then judge him."—Lord de Red: Tower of London.

Coxcomb. An empty-headed, vain person. The ancient licensed jesters were so called because they wore a cock's comb in their caps.

"Coxcombs, an ever empty race,
Are trumpets of their own disgrace."

Gay: Fables, s. ix.

"Let me hire him too; here's my coxcomb."

Shakespeare: King Lear, i. 4.

The Prince of Coxcomb. Charles Joseph, Prince de Ligne. (1535-1614.)

Richard II. of England is sometimes called the Coxcomb. (1366, 1377-1400.)

Henri III. of France was called le Mignon, which means pretty well the same thing. (1551, 1574-1589.)

Coxsackies (3 syl.). Followers of Mr. ["General"] Coxey, the United States who induced 50,000 labourers from sundry states "to march" to Washington to overawe the Government into giving employment to the unemployed. The word is now employed to express labour processions and masses organised to force concessions to workmen.

Coxswain. Kog is Norwegian for a cockboat; Welsh, cuch; Italian, cocca, etc.; and usain, Anglo-Saxon for a servant, superintendent, or bailiff. (See Cockboat.)

Coyne and Livery. Food and entertainment for soldiers, and forage for their horses, exacted by an army from the people whose lands they passed through, or from towns where they rested on their march.

Coystril, Coystril, or Kestrel. A degenerate hawk; hence, a paltry fellow. Holinshed says, "coaterels or bearers of the arms of barons or knights" (vol. i. p. 162); and again, "women, jackeys, and costerels are considered as the unwarlike attendants on an army" (vol. iii. 272). Each of the life-guards of Henry VIII. had an attendant, called a coystril or coystril. Some think the word is a corruption of costerel, which they derive from the Latin cotcrrellus (a peasant); but if not a corruption of kestril, I should derive it from costrel (a small wooden bottle used by labourers in harvest time).

"Vasa quaedam quae costrelli vocantur."—(Matthew Paris.)

"He's a coward and a coxcomb that will not drink to my niece."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, i. 3.

Coxen. To cheat. (Armorice, conpvyen; Russian, kownoi; Arabic, gauna; Ethiopic, chawen; our choose.)

To cozen him that would unjustly win."—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends ill, i. 2.

Crab (A). An ill-tempered fellow; sour as a crab-apple.

To catch a crab, in rowing. (See Catch a Crab.)

Crab-cart. The carapace of a crab. So called because it is used very commonly by children for a toy-cart.

Crack, as a crack un, a first-rate fellow; a crack hand at cards, a first-rate player; a crack article, an excellent one, i.e. an article cracked up or boasted about. This is the Latin crepo, to crack or boast about. Hence Lucretius ii. 1168, "crepas antiquum genus."

"Indeed, la ! tis a noble child; a crack medam."—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 3.

A rude crack. A good talker.

"To be a good crack... was essential to the trade of a 'purr body' of the more esteemed class."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary (Introduction).

In a crack. Instantly. In a snap of the fingers, crep'sin digitum (in a crack of the fingers). (French, creper.)

"Une allusion au bruit de l'ongle contre la dent que les Orientaux du moyen âge touchaient du Crack-brained. Eccentric; slightly mad. Another form is “A crack-skull.”

Crack a Bottle—i.e. drink one. The allusion is to the mischievous pranks of the drunken frolics of times gone by, when the bottles and glasses were broken during the bout. Miss Oldbuck says, in reference to the same custom, “We never were glass-breakers in this house, Mr. Love!” (Antiquary); meaning they were not bottle-crackers, or given to drunken orgies. (See Crast.)

“Dear Tom, this brown jug that now forms with

From which I now drink to sweet Nan of the

Was once Toby Pilgrim, a thirsty old soul

As o'er cracked a bottle, or fathomed a bowl.”

O’Keefe: Poor Soldier.

Crack a Crib (To). To break into a house as a thief. (See Crast.)

Crack Up a Person (To). To praise him highly. (See Crack.)

Cracked. Made a bankrupt. A play on “rupt,” which is from the Latin rumpa, to break.

Cracked Pipkins. Cracked pipkins are discovered by their sound. Ignorance is betrayed by speech.

“They bid you talk—my honest song

But you for ever hold your tongue;

Silence with some is wisdom most profound—

Cracked pipkins are discovered by the sound.”

Peter Fandor: Lord II. and his Motions.

Cracker. So called from the noise it makes when it goes off.

Cracknells (from the French craque t'un). A hard, brittle cake.

Cradle-land. The same as “a borough. English,” under which lands descend to the youngest son. By Gavelkind, land passes to all sons in equal proportions.

If the father has no son, then (in cradle-land tenures) the youngest daughter is sole heiress. If neither wife, son, nor daughter, the youngest brother inherits; if no brother, the youngest sister is heir: if neither brother nor yet sister, then the youngest next of kin.

Craft (A). A trade (Anglo-Saxon, craft). A craftsman is a mechanic. A handcraft is manual skill, i.e. mechanical skill. And techcraft is skill in medicine. (Anglo-Saxon hece-craft; lece, a doctor.)

Craft (A). A general term for a vessel employed in loading and unloading ships.

Small craft. Such vessels as schooners, sloops, cutters, and so on. A ship-builder was at one time the prince of craftsmen, and his vessels were work of craft emaphically.

Craft. Cunning, or skill in a bad sense. Hence Witchcraft, the art or cunning of a witch.

Crawmiller Castle. So called from Henry de Crawmiller, who built the castle in the twelfth century.

Craik’s of War. Cannons were so called in the reign of Edward III.

Cram. To tell what is not true. A crammer, an untruth. The allusion is to stuffing a person with useless rubbish.

Crane his Cocta (“cabbage boiled twice”). A subject hacked out. Juvenal says, “Hicculit miseris crane repetita magistri” (vii. 153), alluding to the Greek proverb “Dis kranbe thanatos.”

“Thus was there a disadvantage in taxing this Border district, for it had been already remarked by the author himself, as well as by others; and, unless presented under a new habit, was likely to afford ground to the objection of Crasbe his cocta.”—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (Introduction).

Crampo. Repetition. So called from a game which consists in some one setting a line which another is to rhyme to, but no one word of the first line must occur in the second.

Dumb crumm. Pantomime of a word in rhyme to a given word. Thus if “cat” is the given word, the pantomimists would act Rat, Pat, Hat, Mat, Pat, Rat, Sat, etc., till the word acted is guessed.

Crampart (King). The king who made a wooden horse which would travel 100 miles an hour. (Alkunnor: Reynard the Fox, 1498.)

Sweeter than Crampart’s horse. Quick as lightning; quick as thought. (See above.)

Cramp-ving. To sooar the cramp-

Roon means long-shanks. (Welsh, ar, “the shanks,” whence our gaiter and garter.) Gara is the long-shanked ird, contracted into g’ram, crane; hervon is another form of the same word.

Crank. An Abram man (g.s.). So called from the German krunk (sickly), whence cranky, “idiotic, foolish, full of whims,” and cranks (simulated sickness). These beggars were called cranks.
because they pretended madness and sickness to excite compassion.

Cranwocck. An Irish measure which, in the days of Edward II., contained either eight or sixteen pecks.

"Cranwoccks continenct xvj pecks. Cranwocck continent octo pecks."—Eccequer of Ireland (Rec.).

Crapaud or Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman; so called from the device of the ancient kings of France, "three toads erect, saluant." (Guillum's _Display of Heraldrie_, 1611.) Nostrad’amus, in the sixteenth century, called the French "crapauds."

Les anciens crapauds prenderont Sara (Nostrad’amus). Sara is the word Aras reversed, and when the French under Louis XIV. took Aras from the Spaniards, this verse was quoted as a prophecy.

Crace . . . Lawn. A saint in crane is twice a saint in lawn. (Popa: Ep. to Cobham, 1367.) Crane (a sort of bombazine, or alpaca) is the stuff of which cheap clerical gowns used to be made, and here means one of the lower clergy; "lawn" refers to the lawn sleeves of a bishop, and here means a prelate. A good curate is all very well, but the same goodness in a bishop is exalted as something noteworthy.

Cravat. A corruption of Crabit or Croit. It was introduced into France by some French officers on their return from Germany in 1636. The Croats, who guarded the Turkish frontiers of Austria, and acted as scouts on the flanks of the army, wore linen round their necks, tied in front, and the officers wore muslin or silk. When France organised a regiment on the model of the Croats, these linen neckcloths were imitated, and the regiment was called "The Royal Cravat."

The Bonny Cravat. A public-house sign at Woodchurch, Kent; a corruption of _La bonne corvée_. Woodchurch was noted for its smuggling proclivities, and the "Bonny Cravat" was a smuggler's hostelry.

_to wear a hempen cravat_. To be hanged.

Craven means "your mercy is craved." It was usual in former times to decide controversies by an appeal to battle. The combatants fought with batons, and if the accused could either kill his adversary or maintain the fight till sundown, he was acquitted. If he wished to call off, he cried out "Craven!" and was held infamous, while the defendant was advanced to honour. (Blackstone.)

Crawley. Crooked as Crawley (or) Crawley brook, a river in Bed fordshire. That part called the brook, which runs into the Ouse, is so crooked that a boat would have to go eighty miles in order to make a progress direct of eighteen. (Fuller: _Worthies_.)

Crayon (Geoffrey). The nom de plume under which Washington Irving published _The Sketch-Book_. (1820.)

Breaking Doors hang the Longest. "Un pot folé dure plus qu’un meuf." "Tout se qui brûle ne ché pas" (tumbles not). Delicate persons often outlive the more robust. Those who have some personal affliction, like the goat, often live longer than those who have no such vent.

Create. Make.

God created the heavens and the earth \(^{(Gen. 1.1)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.1)}\).

God made the firmament \(^{(Gen. 1.1)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.1)}\).

God made the sun and moon \(^{(Gen. 1.16)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.16)}\).

God created the great fishes of the sea \(^{(Gen. 1.21)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.21)}\).

God made the terrestrial animals \(^{(Gen. 1.25)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.25)}\).

God created man and made him "God-like" \(^{(Gen. 1.27)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.27)}\).

God said "Let us make man in our image" \(^{(Gen. 1.29)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.29)}\), and so God created man in His image \(^{(Gen. 1.27)}\)\(^{(Gen. 1.27)}\).

Chap. ii. 3. He rested from all the works which He had created and made.

Chap. ii. 4. He made the earth and the heavens; He also created them.

Chap. ii. 22. He made woman, but created man.

Most certainly create does not necessarily mean to make out of nothing, as fishes were "created" from water, and man was created from "earth."

Creature (The). Whisky or other spirits. A contracted form of "Creature-comfort."

"When he chanced to have taken an overdose of the creature."—Sir W. Scott: _Guy Mannering_, chap. xiv.

_A drop of the creature. A little whisky. The Irish call it "a drop of the crater."

Creature-comforts. Food and other things necessary for the comfort of the body. Man being supposed to consist of body and soul, the body is the creature, but the soul is the "vital spark of heavenly flame."

"Mr. Squeers had been seeking in creature-comforts [brandy and water] temporary forgetfulness of that unpleasant emotion."—Dickens: _Nicholas Nickleby_.

Credat Judæus or Credat Judæus Apella. Tell that to the Marines. That may do for Apella, but I don't believe a word of it. Who this Apella was, nobody knows. (_Horace: 1 Satires, v. line 100._)

"Ciceron mentions a person of this name in _Ad Atticum_ (12, cp. 19); but see Duceane._
Credence Table. The table near the altar on which the bread and wine are deposited before they are consecrated. In former times food was placed on a credence-table to be tasted previously to its being set before the guests. This was done to assure the guests that the meat was not poisoned. The Italian credenza're means to taste ments placed on the credenza. (Italian, la credenza, a shelf or buffet; Greek, kreas, food.)

Crédit Foncier (French). A company licensed to borrow money for city and other improvements connected with estates. A board of guardians may form such a company, and their security would be the parish rates. The money borrowed is repaid with instalments with interest. The word fonciere means "landed," as impôt foncier (land-tax), bien foncier (landed property), and so on.

Crédit Mobilier (French). A company licensed to take in hand all sorts of trading enterprises, such as railways, and to carry on the business of stock-jobbers. The word mobilier means personal property, general stock, as bien mobilier (personal chattels), mobilier vif et mort (live and dead stock).

Cre'kenpit. A fictitious river near Husterloe, according to the invention of Master Reynard, who calls on the Hare to attest the fact. (Reynard the Fox.)

Cremo'na. A stop, an corruption of the Italian cornone, which is the German krummhorn, an organ stop of eight feet pitch; so called from a wind-instrument made of wood, and bent outwards in a circular arc (krummhorn, crooked horn).

Cremo'nas. Violins of the greatest excellence; so called from Cremona, where for many years lived some makers of them who have gained a world-wide notoriety, such as Andrea Amati and Antonio his son, Anathius Stradivarius his pupil, and Giuseppe Guarnerius the pupil of Stradivarius. Cremona has long since lost its reputation for this manufacture.

"In silvis vita silvi; cana'ta jam morta's cana." A motto on a Cremo'na.

Cres'ole (2 syl.). A descendant of white people born in Mexico, South America, and the West Indies. (Spanish criado, a servant; diminutive criadillo, contracted into creole, creo.) (See Mulatto.)

Creole dialecta. The various jargons spoken by the West India slaves.

Crep'idad. Supra crep'idad. Talking about subjects above one's metier, meddled and muddling matters of which you know little or nothing. (See CRESNER.)

Cres'cent. Tradition says that "Philip, the father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set the workmen to undermine the walls, but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried; consequently the Byzantines erected a statue to Diana, and the crescent became the symbol of the state.

Another legend is that Othman, the Sultan, saw in a vision a crescent moon, which kept increasing till its horns extended from east to west, and he adopted the crescent of his dream for his standard, adding the motto, "Duce recte bat ornem.""

Cres'cent City (Thc). New Orleans, in Louisiana, U.S.

Cres'et. Cysectub pow'dere Virtus (Virtue thrives best in adversity). The allusion is to the palm-tree, which grows better when pressed by an incumbent weight.

Many plants grow the better for being pressed, as grass, which is wonderfully improved by being rolled frequently with a heavy roller, and by being trodden down by sheep.

Cressell'e (2 syl.). A wooden rattle used formerly in the Roman Church during Passion week, instead of bells, to give notice of Divine worship. Supposed to represent the rattling in the throat of Christ while hanging on the cross.

Cres'set. A beacon-light; properly "a little cross." So called because originally it was surmounted by a little cross. (French, croisette.)

Cress'ida, daughter of Calchas the Greek priest, was beloved by Troilus, one of the sons of Priam. They vowed eternal fidelity to each other, and as pledges of their vow Troilus gave the maiden a sleeve, and Cressid gave the Trojan prince a glove. Scarce had the vow been made when an exchange of prisoners was agreed to. Diomed gave up three Trojan princes, and was to receive Cressid in lieu thereof. Cressid vowed to remain constant, and Troilus swore to rescue her. She was led off to the Grecian's tent, and soon gave all her affections to Diomed—nay, even bade him wear the sleeve that Troilus had given her in token of his love.

"As false as water, wind, or sandy earth, As fox to lamb, as wolf to heifer's calf, Proud to the hind, or step-dame to her son; 'Yes,' let them say, to stick the heart of falsehood.

"As false as Creswold."

Shakespeare: "Trotlus and Cressida," iii. 2.

Cresswell (Madame). A woman of infamous character who bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. The Duke of Buckingham wrote the sermon, which was as follows: "All I shall say of her is this—she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well; for she was born at Brandy-well, married to Cresswell, lived at Clerkenwell, and died in Bride-well.

Cressy (Battle of). Won by Edward III. and the Black Prince over Philippe VI. of France, August 26, 1346.

"Cressy was lost by kickshaws and lamp meagre." Fenton: Prose, to Southern's Spartan Dams.

Crestfallen. Dispirited. The allusion is to fighting cocks, whose crest falls in defeat and rises rigid and of a deep red colour in victory.

"Shall I seem crest-fallen in my father's sight?" Shakespeare: Richard II., i. 1.

"Come to gorge, that's the word. I thee defy again, O hound of Crete." Shakespeare: Henry V., ii. 1.

The Infamy of Cretan. The Minotaur.

"There lay stretched The infamy of Cretan, deceased brood Of the feigned heroin."

Dante: Hell, xii. (Tayler's translation).

Cre'tions. Metellus, the Roman general, so was called because he conquered Crete (Canadia).

Cre'tinism. Mental imbecility accompanied by goitre. So called from the Cre'tins of the Alps. The word is a corruption of Christian (Cré'tien), because, being baptised, and only idiots, they were "washed from original sin," and incapable of actual sin. Similarly, idiots are called innocents. (French crè'tin, cré'tinism.)

Crex. White bulace. (Dutch, vriebek, cherry; Latin, corc'orum.)

Crib (A). Slang for a house or dwelling, as a "Stocking Crib" (i.e. a hosiery) a "Thimble Crib" (i.e. a silversmith's). Crib is an ox-stall, (Anglo-Saxon, crib, a stall, a bed, etc.)

"Where no men are, the crib is clean."—Prov. xiv. 4.

A child's crib is a child's bed. (See preceding column.)

Crib (B). A petty theft; a literal translation of some foreign work, stealthily employed to save trouble.

"We are glad to turn from the chorus of Zachylus, or the odes of Horace, confected in English verse by some petty scholar, to the original text, and the honest help of a schoolboy's crib."—Balzac's Shorter Stories: Prefatory Notice, p. 16.

Crib. To steal small articles. (Saxon, crybb; Irish, griob; our grab, grapple, grip, gripe, etc.)

Cricket.

The diminutive of the Anglo-Saxon crib, a staff or crutch. In the Bodleian library is a MS. (1444) picture of a monk bowling a ball to another monk, who is about to strike it with a crib. In the field are other monks. There are no wickets, but the batsman stands before a hole, and the art of the game was either to get the ball into the hole, or to catch it.

Perhaps the earliest mention of the word "cricket" is 1593. John Derrick, gent., tells us when he attended the "free school of Guldeforde, he and his fellowes did chune and play there at crickett and other plaies." It was a Wykehamist game in the days of Elizabeth.

A single stump was placed in the seventeenth century at each hole to point out the place to bowlers and fielders. In 1700 two stumps were used 24 inches apart and 12 inches high, with long bails atop.

A middle stump was added by the Hambledon Club in 1770, and the height of the stumps was raised to 22 inches.

In 1814 they were made 26 inches, and in 1817 they were reduced to 22 inches—present height. The length of run is 22 yards.

The first cricket club was Hambledon, which practically broke up in 1791, but existed in name till 1823.

Crite. A profane oath; a perverted form of the word Christ.

Crillon. Where went thou, Crillon? Crillon, surnamed the Bruer, in his old age went to church, and listened intently to the story of the Crucifixion. In the middle of the narrative he grew excited, and, unable to contain himself, cried out, "Qu' est-ce - tu, Crillon?" (What were you about, Crillon, to allow of such things as these?).

N.B. Louis de Bertron des Balbes de Crillon was one of the greatest captains. of the sixteenth century. Born in Provence 1541, died 1615.

Henri IV., after the battle of Arbqive (1569), wrote to Crimen the following letter: "Prouant, loe Crimen, neus ames envieux a me, et en moy eus parat. The first and last part of this letter have become proverbial.

Crimen esse Majestatis (Latin). High treason.

Crimp. A decoy; a man or woman that is on the look-out to decoy the unwary. It is more properly applied to an agent for supplying ships with sailors, but these agents are generally in league with public-houses and private lodging-houses of low character, into which they decoy the sailors and relieve them of their money under one pretence or another. (Welsh, crumpyion, to squeeze or pinch; Norwegian, kryppa, a sponge.)

Crimp of Death (†). A thief-catcher. A crimp is a decoy, especially of sailors and soldiers. (See above.)

"Here lie three crimps of death, knocked down by Fate, of justice the stomach blood-hounds keen." Peter Pendray: Epitaph on Two Moid, Stoivei, and Jedlin.

Crip'ple. A battered or bent sixpence; so called because it is hard to make it go.

Crip'plegate. St. Giles is the patron saint of cripples and beggars, and was himself a cripple. Churches dedicated to this saint are, therefore, in the suburbs of large towns, as St. Giles of London, Norwich, Cambridge, Salisbury, etc. Cripplegate, London, was so called before the Conquest from the number of cripples who resorted thither to beg. (Stowe.)

Cris-e-cross Row (Christ-cross row). The A B C horn-book, containing the alphabet and nine digits. The most ancient of these infant-school books had the letters arranged in the form of a Latin cross, with A at the top and Z at the bottom; but afterwards the letters were arranged in lines, and a + was placed at the beginning to remind the learner that "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

"Mortals never shall know

Cris-hip'a. An incarnate deity of perfect beauty. King Canza, being informed that a child of the family of Devaci would overthrow his throne, gave orders to destroy all the male infants that were born. When Crisrin was born, his brother conveyed him secretly to the house of a shepherd king; but Canza discovered his retreat, and sent the monster Kâksah to poison him. The tale says the infant child sucked the monster to death, and so escaped. As he grew up, his beauty was so divine that all the princesses of Hindustan fell in love with him, and even to the present hour he is the Apollo of India and the "idol of women." His images are always painted a deep azure colour. (Sir W. Jones.) (See RAMA.)

Crisis properly means the "ability to judge." Hippocrates said that all diseases had their periods, when the humours of the body ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. These tidal days he called critical days, and the tide itself a crisis, because it was on these days the physician could determine whether the disorder was taking a good or a bad turn. The seventh and all its multiples were critical days of a favourable character. (Greek, krino, to judge or determine.)

Crispin. A shoemaker. St. Crispin was a shoemaker, and was therefore chosen for the patron saint of the craft. It is said that two brothers, Crispin and Crispian, born in Rome, went to Soissons, in France (a.d. 303), to propagate the Christian religion, and maintained themselves wholly by making and mending shoes. Probably the tale is fabulous, for crepina is Greek for a shoe. Latin crepina, and St. Crispin or Crispod became Crepin and Crispin.

St. Crispin's Day. October 25th, the day of the battle of Agincourt. Shakespeare makes Crispin Crispian one person, and not two brothers. Hence Henry V. says to his soldiers—"And Crispin Crispin shall never go by . . .

But we in it shall be remembered." Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 3.

St. Crispin's holiday. Every Monday, with those who begin the working week on Tuesday: a no-work day with shoe-makers. (See CRISPIN.)

St. Crispin's lance. A shoemaker's awl. In French, "Lance de St. Crispin." Crispin is the patron saint of shoemakers. The French avant for a leather purse is crupe.

Criterion. A standard to judge by. (Greek, krino, to judge.)

Crit'ic. A judge; an arbiter. (Greek, krino, to judge.)
Crotic. A cautious, malignant critic is called a Zouilus (g.v).

"And what of this new book the whole world marvels at; a book about?" "Oh, it is out of all youth, and out of fashionable speech!"

Crook. "Excellent critic!"

And for the epic poem your lordship had me look at, upon taking the length, breadth, height, and depth of it, and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossut's (Bossut's), 'ts out, my lord, in every one of its dimensions." "Admirable connoisseur!"—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vol. iii. chap. xii.

The abbé Charles Bossut (1730-1814) was a noted mathematician and geometer.

Prince of critics. Aristarchos, of Byzantium, who compiled the rhapsoodies of Homer. (Second century B.C.)

Stop-watch critics.

"And how did Carrick speak the soliloquy last night?" "Oh, against all rules, in lord, most ungrammatically. between the substantives and the adjectives, which should agree together in number, case, gender, and person, he made a treble error; thus—stoppering as if the point wanted setting; and between the nominative case, which, 'for lordship knows, should govern the verb, he suspended his voice in the eulogism a dozen times, and three seconds and three-fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time.

"Admirable grammarian!" But in suspending his voice was the sense suspended likewise? Did no expression of anxiety or countenance fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrowly look?" "I looked only at the stop-watch, my lord." "Excellent observer!"—Sterne: Tristram Shandy, vol. iii. chap. xii.

Croaker (2 syll.). A raven, so called from its croak; one who takes a despising view of things. Goldsmith, in his Good-natured Man, has a character so named.

Croakumshire. Northumberland is so called from the peculiar croaking of the natives in speaking. This is especially observable in Newcastle and Morpeth, where the people are said to be born with a burr in their throats, which prevents their giving effect to the letter r.

Croc mitaine (-4). A fire-eater; one always ready to quarrel and fight. (See Croquetmaine.)

Crocodile (3 syll.). A symbol of deity among the Egyptians, because it is the only aquatic animal, says Plutarch, which has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen; so God sees all. Himself not being seen. To this he subsequently adds another reason, saying, "The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech." (De Iside et Osiride, vol. ii, p. 381.)

Achilles Tatius says, "The number of its teeth equals the number of days in a year." Another tradition is, that during the seven days held sacred to Apsis, the crocodile will harm no one.

Crocodile (King). A king who devours his people, or at least their substance. Browne, in his Travels, tells us that there is a king crocodile, as there is a queen bee. The king crocodile has no tail.

Crocodile's Tears. Hypocritical tears. The tale is, that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress, to allure travellers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while in the act of devouring it.

"As the mournful crocodile
With sorrow raises reluctant passengers."

Crocum in Ciliciam ferre. To carry coals to Newcastle. As Cilicia abounds with sulphur, to carry it there would be needless and extravagant expense. For similar phrases, see Alcinoe Romae. NOCTUAS AENIAS, COALS.

Crosus. Rich as Cyesus. Cressus, King of Lydia, was so rich and powerful that all the wise men of Greece were drawn to his court, and his name became proverbial for wealth. (n.c. 660-546.) (See Grues.)

Crom'ernacht. Chief idol of the Irish before the preaching of St. Patrick. It was a gold or silver image surrounded by twelve little brazen ones.

Cromlech. A large stone resting on two or more others, like a table. (Welsh, crom, bent; leuk, a flat stone.)

Weyland Smith's cave (Berkshire), Travesty stone (Cornwall), Kit's Coty House (Kent). Irby and Mangles saw twenty-seven structures just like these on the banks of the Jordan; at Pias Newydd (Anglesey) are two cromlechs; in Cornwall they are numerous; so are they in Wales; some few are found in Ireland, as the "killing-stone" in Louth. In Brittany, Denmark, Germany, and some other parts of Europe, cromlechs are to be found.

Cromwell in the part of "Tactus." (See Tactus.)

Crone, properly speaking, means a ewe whose teeth are worn out; but metaphorically it means any toothless old beldam. (Irish, cirona, old; allied to the Crook gerin, an old man.)

"Take up the bastard; take it up, I say; give's to thy crone."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii. 2.
Cronian Sea. The north polar sea. Pliny says, "A Thule unus dux navigatio nis mare concretum, a nonnullis chronum appellatur." (Natural History, iv. 16.)

"As when two polar winds blowing adverse Upon the Cronian sea.

Crook. A familiar friend. An old crook is an intimate of times gone by. Probably crook with the diminutive is for endearment, and equivalent to "dear old fellow," "dear old boy." (See Crook.)

Crook in the Lot. There is a crook in the lot of everyone. There is variation bound up in every person's lot of life, a skeleton in the cupboard of every house. A crook in a stick is a bend, a part where the stick does not run straight, hence a "shepherd's crook." When lots were drawn by bits of stick, it was desirable to get sticks which were smooth and straight; but it is very hard to find one without a crook, knot, or some other defect. Boston has a book entitled The Crook in the Lot.

Crooked as Crawley. (See Crawley.)

Crooked Sixpence (A). Said to bring luck. (See Money.)

Crooked Stick (A). A self-willed fellow who will neither lead nor drive, neither be led nor driven. (See Crook.)

Crop Up (or) Out. To rise out of, to appear at the surface. A mining term. Strata which rise to the surface are said to crop out. We also say, such and such a subject crops up from time to time—i.e. rises to the surface; such and such a thing crops out of what you were saying—i.e. is apropos thereof.

Cropper. He came a cropper. He fell head over heels. To get a cropper. To get a bad fall. "Neck and crop" means altogether, and to "come a cropper" is to come to the ground neck and crop.

Croquemilaine [croak-mit-lain], the bogie raised by fear. The romance so called, in three parts. The first relates the bloody tournament at Fransac, between the champions of the Moorish King Marsillus and the paladins of Charlemagne. The second is the Siege of Saragossa by Charlemagne. The third is the allegory of Fear-Fortress. The epilogue is the disaster at Roncesvalles. The author is M. l'Epine. There is an English version by Tom Hood, illustrated by Gustave Doré (1867). (See Fear-Fortress, Mitaine, etc.)

Croquet. A game played with a sort of handy stick. The crook was superseded by a kind of mallet. Du Cange gives "Croquet, croquetaire, croquet, hilton armi d'un croq, ou qui est recevahs" (vol. vii. p. 115). The art of the game is to strike your balls through very small hoops arranged in a given order.

Crore (A), in the East Indies, means a hundred lace of rupees, equal nominally, in round numbers, to a million sterling. (Pronounce cror, Hindustanee khor.)

Cross. The cross is said to have been made of four sorts of wood (palm, cedar, olive, and cypress), to signify the four quarters of the globe.

"Ligna croce salut, cedrus, pinea, oliva, cypria."

We are accustomed to consider the sign of the cross as wholly a Christian symbol, originating with the crucifixion of our Redeemer. This is quite erroneous. In ancient Carthago it was used for ornamental purposes. Runic crosses were set up by the Scandinavians as boundary marks, and were erected over the graves of kings and heroes. Cicero tells us (De Inventione, ii. 27, and 80, 81) that the augur's staff with which they marked out the heaven was a cross. The ancient Egyptians employed the same as a sacred symbol, and we see on Greek sculptures, etc., a cake with a cross; two such buns were discovered at Herculaneum.

It was a sacred symbol among the Aztecs long before the landing of Cortes. (Malagne.) In Cozumel it was an object of worship; in Tabasco it symbolised the god of rain; in Palenque (the Palmyra of America) it is sculptured on the walls with a child held up adoring it.

"The cross is not only a Christian symbol, it was also a Mexican symbol. It was one of the emblems of Quetzalcoatl, as lord of the four cardinal points, and the four winds that blow therefrom."—Fiske: Discovery of America, vol. ii. chap. viii. p. 250.

Cross (in heraldry). There are twelve crosses in heraldry, called (1) the ordinary cross; (2) the cross humette, or cupped; (3) the cross urde, or pointed; (4) the cross potent; (5) the cross crosslet; (6) the cross bottonné, or treillé; (7) the cross moline; (8) the cross potence; (9) the cross flory; (10) the cross paté; (11) the Maltese cross (or eight-pointed cross); (12) the cross clochée and flèché. Some heraldic writers enumerate 285 different kinds of crosses.
Cross (a mystic emblem) may be reduced to these four:

The Greek cross (+), found on Assyrian tablets, Egyptian and Persian monuments, and on Etruscan pottery.

The cross decussata (X), generally called St. Andrew's cross. Quite common in ancient sculpture.

The Latin cross (†), or "crux immissa." This symbol is also found on coins, monuments, and medals, long before the Christian era.

The tau cross (τ), or "crux commissa." Very ancient indeed, and supposed to be a phallic emblem.

The tau cross with a handle (†) is common to several Egyptian deities, as Isis, Osiris, etc.; and is the emblem of immortality and life generally.

Everyone must bear his own cross. His own burden or troubles. The allusion is to the law that the person condemned to be crucified was to carry his cross to the place of execution.

Get on the cross. Get into bad ways; not go straight.

"We had lines to think a fellow must grow up and act on the cross in spite of himself, and come to the gallows' foot at last, whether he likes it or not."—Brodrenew: Robbery Under Arms, chap. viii.

The judgment of the cross. An ordeal instituted in the reign of Charlemagne. The plaintiff and defendant were required to cross their arms upon their breast, and he who could hold out the longest gained the suit.

On the cross. Not "on the square," not straightforward. To get anything "on the cross" is to get it unfairly or surreptitiously.

See Rosicrucians.

Cross (†). Cross it off or out. Cancel it by running your pen across it. To cancel (q.r.) means to mark it with lattice lines.

Cross, ill-tempered, is the Anglo-Saxon cross.

"Azeon (against) him was he keen and cross."—Unwin Hands.

Cross Buns. (See Buns.)

Cross-grained. Patchy, ill-tempered, self-willed. Wood must be worked with the grain; when the grain crosses we get a knot or curling, which is hard to work uniform.

Cross-legged Knights indicate that the person so represented died in the Christian faith. As crusaders were supposed so to do, they were generally represented on their tombs with crossed legs.

"Sometimes the figure on the tomb of a knight has his legs crossed at the ankles, this meant that the knight went one crusade. If the legs are crossed at the knees, he went twice; if at the thighs he went three times."—Bitchfield: Our Village.

Cross Man (4). Not straightforward; ungainly; not honest.

"The storekeepers know who are their best customers, the square people or the cross-ones."—Boldrenew: Robbery Under Arms, chap. xiv.

Cross-patch. A disagreeable, ill-tempered person, male or female. Patch means a fool or gossip; so called from his parti-coloured or patched dress. A cross-patch is an ill-tempered fool or gossip. Patch, meaning "fellow," is common enough; half a dozen examples occur in Shakespeare, as a "scurril patch," a "soldier's patch," "What patch is made our porter?" "a crew of patchers," etc.

"Cross-patch, draw the latch, Sit by the fire and sup; Take a cup, and drink it up, Then call our neighbours in, old Nursery Rhyme.

Cross-roads. All (except suicides) who were excluded from holy rites were piously buried at the foot of the cross erected on the public road, as the place next in sanctity to consecrated ground. Suicides were ignominiously buried on the highway, with a stake driven through their body.

Cross and Ball, so universally marked on Egyptian figures, is a circle and the letter T. The circle signifies the eternal preserver of the world, and the T is the monogram of Thoth, the Egyptian Mercury, meaning wisdom.

The coronation orb is a sphere or ball surmounted by a cross, an emblem of empire introduced in representations of our Saviour. In this case the cross stands above the ball, to signify that the spiritual power is above the temporal.

Cross and Pile. Money; pitch and toss. Hilaire le Gai tells us that some of the ancient French coins had a cross, and others a column, on the reverse; the column was called a pile, from which comes our word "pillar," and the phrase "pile-driving." Seager says that some of the old French coins had a ship on the reverse, the arms of Paris, and that pile means "a ship," whence our word "pilot."

"A man may now justly throw up cross and pile for his opinions."—Locke: Human Understanding.

Cross or pile. Heads or tails. The French say pile on face. The "face" or Crown

Cross. As the crow flies. The shortest route between two given places. The crow flies straight to its point of destination. Called the beeline in America.

Crown. (See Raven.)
I must pluck a crow with you; I have a crown to pick with you. I am displeased with you, and must call you to account. I have a small complaint to make against you. In Howell's proverbs (1699) we find the following, "I have a goose to pluck with you," used in the same sense; and Chaucer has the phrase "Pull a fish," but means thereby to cheat or flinch. Children of distinction among the Greeks and Romans had birds for their amusement, and in their boisterous quarrels used to pluck or pull the feathers out of each other's pets. Tyrants, in his Captives, alludes to this, but instances it with a lowering. In hieroglyphics a crown symbolises contention, discord, strife.

"If a crow help us in, sirrah, we'll pluck a crow together." - Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iii. 1.
"If not, remember before we go,
That you and I must pull a crow." - Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 2.

Crow over One (To), is exult over a vanquished or abused person. The allusion is to cocks, who always crow when they have vanquished an adversary.

Crowbar. An iron with a crook, used for leverage. (Anglo-Saxon, crone.)
"Science is as far removed from brute force as this sword from a crowbar." - Blane-Lytton: Leila, book ii., chap. i. p. 33.

Crow or Crouth. A species of fiddle with six or more strings. The last named player on this instrument was John Morgan, who died 1720. (Welsh, erith.)
"O sweet consent, between a crowd and a Jon's harp!" - Litty.

Crowd'ero. One of the rabbler leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bearbaiting. The original of this character was one Jackson or Jehphon, a milliner, who lived in the New Exchange, Strand. He lost a leg in the service of the Roundheads, and was reduced to the necessity of fiddling from alcohole to alcohouse for his daily bread. The word means fiddler. (See above, Crowd.)

Crown. In heraldry nine crowns are recognised: The oriental, the triumphal or imperial, the diadem, the obisidential crown, the civic, the crown vallary, the mural crown, the naval, and the crown celestial.

The blockade crown (corona obsidionalis), presented by the Romans to the general who liberated a beleaguered army. This was made of grass and wild flowers gathered from the spot.

A camp crown was given by the Romans to him who first forced his way into the enemy's camp. It was made of gold, and decorated with palisades.

A civic crown was presented to him who preserved the life of a cius or Roman citizen in battle. This crown was made of oak leaves, and bore the inscription, H. O. C. S.—i.e. hostem occidit, cives servavit (as he slew a citizen saved).

A mural crown was given by the Romans to that man who first scaled the wall of a besieged town. It was made of gold and decorated with battle-marks.

A naval crown was by the Romans given to him who won a naval victory. It was made of gold, and decorated with the beaks of ships.

An olive crown was by the Romans given to those who distinguished themselves in battle in some way not specially mentioned in other clauses.

An ovation crown (corona ovatis) was by the Romans given to the general who vanquished pirates or any despised enemy. It was made of myrtle.

A triumphal crown was by the Romans given to the general who obtained a triumph. It was made of laurel or bay leaves. Sometimes a massive gold crown was given to a victorious general. (See LAUREL.)

The iron crown of Lombardy is the crown of the ancient Lombardic kings. It is now at Monza, in Italy. Henry of Luxemburg and succeeding kings were crowned with it. Napoleon I. put it on his head with his own hands. It is a thin fillet of iron, said to be, hammered from a nail of the true cross, covered with a gold circle, enamelled with jewels, etc.

Crown Glass is window glass blown into a crown or hollow globe. It is flattened before it is fit for use.

Crown Office (The). A department belonging to the Court of Queen's Bench. There are three Crown officers appointed by the Lord Chief Justice—viz. (1) Queen's Coroner and Attorney; (2) the Master; and (3) the Assistant Master. The offices are held during good behaviour.

Crown of the East—i.e. Antioch, capital of Syria, which consisted of four walled cities, encompassed by a common rampart, that "enrounded them like a coronet." It was also surnamed "the beautiful."

Crowns (worn by heathen deities):

APOLLO wore a crown of laurels.
BACCHUS, of grapes or ivy.
CERES, of olives of wheat.
CUPID, of roses.
CYBELE, of pine leaves.
FLORA, of flowers.
FOREST, of fir-shapes.
The GRACES, of olive-leaves.
HERCULES, of poplar-leaves.
HYACINTH, of roses.
JUNO, of aluce-leaves.
JUPITER, of oak-leaves.
The LARNS, of rosemary.
MERCURY, of ivy, olive-leaves, or mulberries.
MINERVA, of olive-leaves. The MUSES, of flowers.
MARS, of pine-leaves.
PLUTO, of cypress.
POMONA, of fruits.
SATURN, of vine-leaves.
VENUS, of myrtle or roses.

Crowners. Coroner—i.e. an officer of the Crown.

"The crowners hath set on her, and she is Christian burial."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. i.

Crown's Nest (The), in a Greenlander's galley, is a small room constructed of staves, something like an empty cask. It is fitted up with seats and other conveniences, and here the person on watch continues for two hours looking out for whales. The whale generally announces his approach by a "blowing," which may in favourable circumstances be heard several miles off.

Croya'sdo. The Great Croya'sdo. General Lord Fairfax. (Hudibras.)

Croz'ier or Cro'sier. An archbishop's staff terminates in a floriated cross, while a bishop's crook has a curved, bracken-like head. A bishop turns his crook outwards, to denote his wider authority; an abbot (whose crook is the same as a bishop's) carries it turned inwards, to show that his jurisdiction is limited to his own inmates. When walking with a bishop an abbot covers his crook with a veil hanging from the knob, to show that his authority is veiled in the presence of his superior.

Cruc'ial. A crucial test. A very severe and undeniable one. The allusion is to a fancy of Lord Bacon's, who said that two different diseases or sciences might run parallel for a time, but would ultimately cross each other: thus, the plague might for a time resemble other diseases, but when the bubo or boil appeared, the plague would assume its specific character. Hence the phrases instantia crucis (a crucial or unmistakable
Crused Port

(3) 1189-1193. Led by Richard Lion-heart. For knightly distinction. This was against Saladin or Salah-Eddin.

(4) 1202-1204. Led by Baldwin of Flanders and the dukes. To glorify the Venetians.

(5) 1217. Led by John of Brienne, titular King of Jerusalem. To suit his own purpose.

(6) 1228-1229. Led by Frederick II. As a result, Palestine was ceded to Frederick (Kaiser of Germany), who was crowned king of Jerusalem.

(7) 1248-1254 and (8) 1268-1270. To satisfy the religious scruples of Louis IX.

Crush. To crush a bottle—i.e. drink one. Cf. Milton’s crush the sweet poison. The idea is that of crushing the grapes. Shakespeare has also burst a bottle in the same sense (Induction of Taming the Shrew). (See Crack).

Come and crush a cup of wine.”

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, I. 2.

To crush a fly on a wheel. To crack a nut with a steam-hammer; to employ power far too valuable for the purpose to be accomplished. The wheel referred to is the rack. (See Break a Butterfly.)

Crush-room (The) of an opera or theatre. A room provided for ladies where they can wait till their carriages are called. Called crush because the room is not only crowded, but all crush towards the door, hoping each call will be that of their own carriage. “Mrs. X.’s carriage stops the way,” “Lord X.’s carriage,” etc.

Crusoe (4). A solitary man; the only inhabitant of a place. The tale of Defoe is well known, which describes Robinson Crusoe as cast on a desert island, where he employs the most admirable ingenuity in providing for his daily wants.

Whence creeping forth, to duty’s call he yields,
And scours the Crusoe of the lonely wilds.”

Bloomfield: Farmer’s Boy.

Crust. The upper crust (of society). The aristocracy; the upper ten-thousand.

Crusted Port. When port is first bottled its fermentation is not complete; in time it precipitates argol on the sides of the bottle, where it forms a crust. Crusted port, therefore, is port which has completed its fermentation.

* The “crust” is composed of argol, tartrate of lime, and colouring matter, thus making the wine more ethereal in quality and lighter in colour.

of the adjective bonus; and dom-of the noun dominus.

Crucial

Cruel (The). Pedro, King of Castile (1324, 1350-1369).

Pedro I. of Portugal; also called le

Justiceur (1320, 1357-1367).

CrueL (now Crewel) Garters. Garters made of worsted or yarn.

"Ha! ha! look, he wears cruel garters."

Shakespeare: King Lear, ii. 4.

"Wearing of silk, why art thou so cruel?"

Woman in a Weathercock (1622).

Crummy. That’s crummy, that’s jolly good. She’s a crummy woman, a fine handsome woman. Crummy means fat or fleshy. The crummy part of bread is the fleshy or main part. The opposite of “crusty” = ill-tempered.

Crump. “Don’t you wish you may get it, Mrs. Crump?” Grose says Mrs. Crump, a farmer’s wife, was invited to dine with Lady Coventry, who was very deaf. Mrs. Crump wanted some beer, but, awed by the purple and plush, said, in a half-whisper, “I wish I had some beer, now.” Mr. Flunkey, conscious that his mistress could not hear, replied in the same aside. “Don’t you wish you may get it?” At this the farmer’s wife rose from table and helped herself. Lady Coventry, of course, demanded the reason, and the anecdote soon became a standing joke.

Crusades (2 syl.). Holy wars in which the warriors wore a cross, and fought, nominally at least, for the honour of the cross. Each nation had its special colour, which, says Matthew Paris (i. 446), was red for France; white for England; green for Flanders; for Italy it was blue or azure; for Spain, gules; for Scotland, a St. Andrew’s cross; for the Knights Templars, red on white.

The seven Crusades.

(1) 1096-1100. Preached up by Peter the Hermit. Led by Godfrey of Bouillon, who took Jerusalem. As a result of this crusade, Geoffrey of Bouillon became the virtual king of Jerusalem.

(2) 1147-1149. At the instigation of St. Bernard. Led by Louis VII. and the Emperor Conrad. To secure the union of Europe.
Crusty. Ill-tempered, apt to take offence. This is formed from the old word cross, cross, peevish.

"Azezn (against) hem was he keen ane cross, And said, 'Goeth out my Pader horse.'"

Cruched Friar is the Latin cruciatus (crossed)—i.e., having a cross embroidered on their dress. They were of the Trinitarian order.

Crux (A). A knotty point, a difficulty. Instantia crucis means a crucial test, or the point where two similar diseases crossed and showed a special feature. It does not refer to the cross, an instrument of punishment; but to the crossing of two lines, called also a node or knot; hence a trouble or difficulty. What evil cross distresses you?—i.e., what difficulty, what trouble are you under?

Crux Ansata. The tau cross with a loop or handle at the top. (See Cross.)

Crux Decussata. A St. Andrew's cross.

"Crux decussata est in qua duo luna directa et equidistantia inter se obligantur, cujus formam referunt libri Euclidis et Plinius, ut aliis Isidore (Orig. i. 112.) 'in figura crucem et in numero decem demonstrat.' Have a nodo Andromeda vocatur, quot vsque crucis Pectoralis. —Gleick: De Cruce, book i. p. 2.

Crux Pectoralis. The cross which bishops of the Church of Rome suspend over their breast.

"Crucem cum proceloso luna vel cum reliquis Sanctorum ante pectora postare suspensam ad cultum, hoc est quasi veclum eunclium (or crux Pectoralis).—See Bocage, vol. ii. p. 102, col. 2, article EXCLAM.

Cry. Great cry and little wool. This is derived from the ancient mystery of David and Abigail, in which Nabul is represented as shearing his sheep, and the Devil, who is made to attend the churl, imitates the act by "shearing a hog." Originally, the proverb ran thus, "Great cry and little wool, as the Devil said when he sheared the hogs." N.B. —Butler alters the proverb into "All cry and no wool."

Cry of Animals (The). (See Animals.)

Cry (To). To cry over spilt milk. To fret about some loss which can never be repaired.

Cry Cave (To). To ask mercy; to throw up the sponge; to confess oneself beaten. (Latin, caveo.) (See Cave In.)

Cry Havoc! No quarter. In a tract entitled The Office of the Constable and Marshall in the Tyne of Werr (contained in the Black Book of the Admiralty), one of the chapters is, "The peyne of hym that crieth havock, and of them that followeth him." —"Item si quis inventus fuerit qui clamorem interceperit qui vocatur havock."

"Cry Havock, and let slip the dogs of war." —Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.

Cry Quits. (See Quits.)

Cry Vinegar (To). In French, Crier l'Agre. The shout of sportmen when a hare is caught. He cries "Vinegar!" he has caught the hare; metaphorically it means, he has won success. "C'éloint, dit le Duchet, la coutume en Languedoc, entre les chasseurs, de s'elécrer l'un à l'autre 'Vinaigre,' dès qu'ils avaient tiré un lièvre, parce que la vraie sauce de cet animal est le vinaigre."

Crier au Vinaigre has quite another meaning. It is the reproach to a landlord who serves his customers vinegar and wine. In a figurative sense it means Crier au Voleur.

Cry Wolf. (See Wolf.)

Crystal Hills. On the coast of the Caspian, near Badkul, is a mountain which sparkles like diamonds, from the sea-glass and crystals with which it abounds.

Crystal-line (3-syl.). The Crystalline sphere. According to Ptolemy, between the "primium mobile" and the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars comes the crystal-line sphere, which oscillates or has a shimmering motion that interferes with the regular motion of the stars. "They pass the planets seven, and pass the fixed."

And that crystalline sphere, whose balance won but the temeraion talked to.

—Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 4.

Cub. An ill-mannered lout. The cub of a bear is said to have no shape until its dam has licked it into form.

"A bear's a savage beast, of all Most ugly and unnatural: Whelped without form until the dam Has licked it into shape and frame." —Butler: Hudibras, i. 3.

Cuba. The Roman deity who kept guard over infants in their cribs and sent them to sleep. Verb cudo, to lie down in bed.

Cube. A fruitless cube. A truly good man; a regular brick. (See Brick.)

"O γ' ὀς ἀδήπης ἀνέσθης καὶ τετράγωνος ἄνω πέσον.—Aristotle: Nicomachean Ethics, i. 11, sec. 11.

Cucking-stool (The) or Choking-stool, for ducking scolds, is not connected with choke (to stiffen), but the French choger; hence the archaic verb cuck (to throw), and one still in use, chock.
Cuckold

The cuckoo-stool is the stool which is chucked or thrown into the water.

"Now, if one cuckoo-stool was for each soul, some towns, I fear, would not their numbers hold."—Poor Robin (1740).

Cuckold. (See Acteon.)

Cuckold King (The). Mark of Cornwall, whose wife Yseult intrigued with Sir Tristram, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

Cuckold's Point. A spot on the riverside near Deptford. So called from a tradition that King John made there successful love to a labourer's wife.

Cuckoo. A cuckold. The cuckoo occupies the nest and eats the eggs of other birds; and Dr. Johnson says "it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out 'Cuckoo,' which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned."—Green calls the cuckoo "the cuckold's quirister" (Quip for an Uplifted Courier, 1820). This is an instance of how words got in time perverted from their original meaning. The Romans used to call an adulterer a "cuckoo," as "

To cucllumus ex festivis reptilis" (Pla. lus.; Asinaria, v. 3), and the allusion was simple and correct; but Dr. Johnson's explanation will hardly satisfy anyone for the modern perversion of the word.

"The cuckoo, then, on every tree,
Mock'd married men; for thus sings he,— Cuckoo!"

Cuckoo (A). A watch or clock. The French have the same slang word cocoon for a watch or clock. Of course, the word is derived from the German cuckoo-clocks, which, instead of striking the hour, cry cuckoo.

Cuckoo Oats and Woodcock Hay. Cuckoo oats and woodcock hay make a farmer run away. If the spring is so backward that oats cannot be sown till the cuckoo is heard (i.e., April), or if the autumn is so wet that the aftermath of hay cannot be got in till woodcock shooting (middle of November), the farmer must be a great sufferer.

Cuckoo - Spit. "Frog - Spit," or "Froth-Spit." The spume which forms the nidus of an insect called the Ceaada Spumaria, or, more strictly speaking, the Cereops Spumaria (one of the three divisions of the Cidararum). This spume is found on lavender-bushes, rosemary, fly-catch, and some other plants. Like the cochineal, the cicaada Spumaria exudes a foam for its own warmth, and for protection during its transition state. The word "cuckoo" in this case means spring or cuckoo-time.

Cucumber Time. The dull season in the tailoring trade. The Germans call it Die saure Gurken Zeit (pickled gherkin time). Hence the expression Tailors are vegetarians, because they live on "cucumber" when without work, and on "cabbage" when in full employ. (Notes and Queries.) (See Gherkin.)

Cuddy. An ass; a dolt. A gipsy term, from the Persian gulada and the Hindustanee ghudda (an ass).

"Hast got thy breakfast, brother cuddy?"—D. Wengdr.

Cudgel One's Brains (To). To make a painful effort to remember or understand something. The idea is from taking a stick to beat a dull boy under the notion that dulness is the result of temper or inattention.

"Cudgel thy brains no more about it; for your dull ass will not mean his pace with beating."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Cudgels. To take up the cudgels. To maintain an argument or position. To fight, as with a cudgel, for one's own way.

"For some reason he did not feel as hot to take up the cudgels for Almira with his mother."—M. E. Wilkins: A Modern Dragon.

Cue (1 syll.). The tail of a sentence (French, queue), the catch-word which indicates when another actor is to speak; a hint; the state of a person's temper, as "So-and-so is in a good cue (or bad cue)."

"When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

To give the cue. To give the hint. (See above.)

Cuffy. A negro; both a generic word and proper name.

"Sambo and Cuffy expanded under every sky."—Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Cul bone? Who is benefited thereby? To whom is it a gain? The more usual meaning attached to the words is, What good will it do? For what good purpose? It was the question of Judge Cassius. (See Cicero: Pro Milone, 12, sec. 32.)

"Cato, that great and grave philosopher, did commonly demand, when any new project was proposed unto him, cui bono, what good will ensue in case the same is effected?"—Fulkers: Worthies (The Design, i.).

Cuirass. Sir Arthur's cuirass was "carved of one emerald, centred in a sun of silver rays, that lightened as he breathed.” (Tennyson: Elaine).

Cuisines or Cuisines (2 syl). Armour for the thighs. (French, cuisse, the thigh.)

“Soon o’er his thighs he placed the cuisines bright.” Jerusalem Delivered, book XI.

“His cuisines on his thighs, gallantly armed.” Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, iv. 1.

Cul de Sac (French). A blind alley, or alley blocked up at one end like a sack. Figuratively, an argument, etc., that leads to nothing.

Cúideasa. A religious order of Ireland and Scotland, said to have been founded in the sixth century by St. Columba. So called from the Gaelic cyle-dec (a house of cells) or ceilede (servants of God, cile, a servant). Giraldus Cambrensis, going to the Latin for its etymology, according to a custom unhappily not yet extinct, derives it from _colu-deus_ (to worship God).

Cullia. A very fine and strong broth, well strained, and much used for invalids. (French, cuills, from couler, to strain).

Cully. A top, a fool, a dupe. A contracted form of _culleion_, a despicable creature (Italian, cuiglione). Shakespeare uses the word two or three times, as “Away, base culleions!” (2 Henry VI, i. 3), and again in _Taming of the Shrew_, iv. 2 —“And makes a god of such a culleion.” (Compare GULL.)

“You base culleion, fou.” Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour, iii. 2.

Culminate (3 syl). Come to a crisis. The passage of a celestial body over the meridian at the upper transit is called its culmination. (Latin, culminem, the top.)

Culross Girdles. The thin plate of iron used in Scotland for the manufacture of oat cakes is called a “girdle,” for which Culross was long celebrated.

Culver. Pigeon. (Old English, _culver_, Latin, _columba_; hence culver-house, a dove-cote.)

Culverin properly means a serpent (Latin, _columbris_, the coluber), but is applied to a long, slender piece of artillery employed in the sixteenth century to carry balls to a great distance. Queen Elizabeth’s “Pocket Pistol” in Dover Castle is a culverin.

Culverkeys. The keys or flowers of the culver or columba, i.e. columbines. (Anglo-Saxon _culfre_, a dove.)

Cum Grano Salis. With its grain of salt; there is a grain of wheat in the bushel of chaff, and we must make the proper abatement.

Cum Hoc, Propter Hoc. Because two or more events occur consecutively or simultaneously, one is not necessarily the outcome of the other. Sequence of events is not always the result of cause and effect. The swallows come to England in the spring, but do not bring the spring.

“(Free trade and revival of trade) says Lord Penzance, came simultaneously, but, he adds, ‘there is no more dangerous form of reasoning than the cum hoc, propter hoc.”—Nineteenth Century, April, 1866.

Cumberland Poet (The). William Wordsworth, born at Cockermouth. (1770-1850.)

Cummar. A gammer, gudewife, old woman. A variety of gammer which is _grand'mere_ (our grandmother), as gaffer is _grand-père_ or grandfather. It occurs scores of times in Scott’s novels.

Cunctator [the delaying]. Quintus Fabius Maximus, the Roman general who baffled Hannibal by avoiding direct engagements, and wearing him out by marches, countermarches, and skirmishes from a distance. This was the policy by which Duguesclin forced the English to abandon their possessions in France in the reign of Charles V. (Le Sage). (See FABIAN.)

Cuneiform Letters. Letters like wedges (Latin, _cunea_, a wedge). These sort of letters occur in old Persian and Babylonian inscriptions. They are sometimes called _arrow-headed characters_, and those found at Babylon are called _nail-headed_. This species of writing is the most ancient of which we have any knowledge; and was first really deciphered by Grotefend in 1802.

Cunning Man or Woman. A fortune-teller, one who professes to discover stolen goods. (Anglo-Saxon, _cunnan_, to know.)

Cuno. The ranger, father of Agatha, in Weber’s opera of _Der Freischütz._

Cünnobelin’s Gold Mines. Caverns in the chalk beds of Little Thurrock, Essex; so called from the tradition that King Cünnobelin hid in them his gold. They are sometimes called Dane-holes, because they were used as lurking-places by the Norsemen.
Cunstance. A model of Resignation, daughter of the Emperor of Rome. The Sultan of Syria, in order to have her for his wife, denounced his religion and turned Christian; but the Sultan's mother murdered him, and turned Cunstance adrift on a raft. After a time the raft stranded on a rock near Northumberland, and the constable rescued Cunstance, and took her home, where she converted his wife, Hermegild. A young lord fell in love with her; but, his suit being rejected, he murdered Hermegild, and laid the charge of murder against Cunstance. King Ella adjudged the cause, and Cunstance being proved innocent, he married her. While Ella was in Scotland, Cunstance was confided with a boy, named Maurice; and Ella's mother, angry with Cunstance for the introduction of the Christian religion, put her on a raft adrift with her baby boy. They were accidentally found by a senator, and taken to Rome. Ella, having discovered that his mother had turned his wife and child adrift, put her to death, and went to Rome in pilgrimage to atone for his crime. Here he fell in with his wife and son. Maurice succeeded his grandfather as Emperor of Rome, and at the death of Ella, Cunstance returned to her native land. (Chaucer: The Man of Law's Tale.)

Cunbur. A bird worshipped by the ancient Peruvians. It is generally called the "condor," and by the Arabsians the "roc."

Cup. A deadly cup. Referring to the ancient practice of putting persons to death by poison, as Socrates was put to death by the Athenians.

"In the hand of the Lord there is a cup [a deadly cup], the dread thereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out and drink them."—Psalm xxxv. 8.

Let this cup pass from me. Let this trouble or affliction be taken away, that I may not be compelled to undergo it. The allusion is to the Jewish practice of assigning to guests a certain portion of wine—(as, indeed, was the custom in England at the close of the eighteenth century and the first quarter of the nineteenth. This cup is "full of the wine of God's fury," let me not be compelled to drink it.

Many a slip twixt the cup and the lip. (See ANGEUS.)

My [or his] cup runs over. My blessings overflow. Here cup signifies portion or blessing.

"My cup runneth over... goodness and mercy follow me all the days of my life"—Psalm xxxii. 5, 6.

We must drink the cup. We must bear the burden awarded to us, the sorrow which falls to our lot. The allusion is to the words of our Lord in the garden of Gethsemané (Matt. xxvi. 39; also xx. 22). One way of putting criminals to death in ancient times was by poison; Socrates had hemlock to drink. In allusion to this it is said that Jesus Christ tasted death for every man (Heb. ii. 9).

Cup, in the university of Cambridge, means a mixture of strong ale with water and a lemon, served up hot in a silver cup. Sometimes a roasted orange takes the place of a lemon. If wine is added, the cup is called bishop; if brandy is added, the beverage is called cardinal. (See Bishop.)

Cup Toaster. A juggler (French, joueur de gobelen). The old symbol for a juggler was a goblet. The phrase and symbol are derived from the practice of jugglers who toss in the air, twist on a stick, and play all sorts of tricks with goblets or cups.

Cup of Vows. The used at feasts to drink from cups of mead, and vow to perform some great deed worthy of the song of a skald. There were four cups: one to Odin, for victory; one to Frey, for a good year; one to Njord, for peace; and one to Bragi, for celebration of the dead in poetry.

Cups. He was in his cups. Intoxicated. (Latin, inter pocula, inter vina.) (Horace: 3 Odes, vi. 20.)

Cupar. He that will to Cupar go; Cupar. He that will have his own way, must have it even to his injury. The reference is to the Cistercian monastery, founded here by Malcolm IV.

Cupar Justice. Same as "Jedburgh Justice," hang first and try afterwards. Abingdon Law is another phrase. It is said that Major-General Brown, of Abingdon, in the Commonwealth, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them.

Cupboard Love. Love from interested motives. The allusion is to the love of children to some indulgent person who gives them something nice from her cupboard.

"Cupboard love is seldom true."—Poor Bobin.
Cupid. The god of love, and son of Venus. According to fable he wets with blood the grindstone on which he sharpens his arrows.

"Femina sed Cupido, Semper ardentes novos succincta;"
Horace: 2 Odes, viii. 14, 15.

"The best statues of this little god are "Cupid Sleeping," in Albano (Rome); "Cupid playing with a Swan," in the Capitol; "Cupid mounted on a Tiger," (Negroni); and "Cupid stringing his Bow," in the Louvre (Paris). Raphael's painting of Cupid is in the Farnesina (Rome).

Cupid and Psyche. An exquisite episode in the Golden Ass of Apuleius. It is an allegory representing the progress of the soul to perfection. Mrs. Tighe has a poem on the same subject; and Molière a drama entitled Psyche. (See Morris, Earthly Paradise [May].)

"Quipque sagittas promulat duo tela phaenest
Dh erumum operum; fugat huc, tunc illud amoreus.
Quod fuit auratum est, et cujusdi felicitarum,
Quod fuit obtusum est, et ipsius sub arundo plumbum.

Ovid: Teur of Apollo and Daphne.

"I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow;
By his best arrow with the golden head;
By that which klineth souls and provest love."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream.

Cupidon (Le jeune). Count d'Orsay was so called by Lord Byron (1789-1852). The Count's father was styled Le beau d'Orsay.

Cur. A fawning, mean-spirited fellow; a crop-tailed dog (Latin, curvis, crop-tailed; French, couv; our cur). According to forest laws, a man who had no right to the privilege of the chase was obliged to cut off the tail of his dog. Hence, a degenerate dog or man is called a cur.

"What would you have, you cur, that like nor pace nor war?"
Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 1.

Curate. (See Clerical Titles.)

Cure de Meudon—i.e. Rabelais, who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebend of St. Maur, and lastly cure of Meudon. (1483-1553.)

Curettes (3 syll). A mythical people of Crete, to whom the infant Zeus or Jupiter was entrusted by his mother Rhea. By clasping their shields they drowned the cries of the infant, to prevent its father (Cronos) from finding the place where the babe was hid.

Curfew Bell. The bell rung in the reigns of William I. and II. at sunset, to give notice to their subjects that they were to put out their fires and candles (French, couvre feu, cover-fire). The Klokans in Abo, even to the present day, traverse the towns crying the "go-to-bed time." Those abroad are told to "make haste home," and those at home to "put out their fires." Abolished, as a police regulation, by Henry I.

"The curfew tolls the knell of parting day."
Gray: Elegy.

Cermudgeon (3 syll). A grasping, miscreant. Dr. Johnson gives the derivation of this word thus, "cerw merchant, unknown correspondent." Dr. Ash, in his dictionary, says, "cov, an unknown; merchant, correspondent," a blunder only paralleled by the schoolboy translation of the Greek, me genwato, by μή (God) γενεάτω (forbid) (Lukx xx. 6).

Current. A corruption of Cornith, hence called by Juvenal Cornithiaca cura.

Current. The drift of the current is the rate per hour at which the current runs.

The setting of the current is that point of the compass towards which the waters of the current run.

Currente Calamo (Latin). Offluid; without premeditation; written off at once, without making a rough copy first.

Currex Bell. The son de plume of Charlotte Bronte.

Curry Favour. The French couvrir, to hunt after, to seek, as couvrir une charge, couvrir un bûcheron, to sue for a living; couvrir les tables, to go spumnging. Similarly, couvrir les favours, to sue for, court, or seek favours.

Cursus or Cuss. Not worth a curse. I don't care a curse (or cuss). Here "curse" is a corruption of curse or kerse. Similarly, the Latin mhit [nili- lum] is no hilm, not [worth] the black eye of a bean. Other phrases are "not a straw," "not a pin," "not a rap," "not a dam," "not a bit," "not a jot," "not a pin's point," "not a button." (Anglo-Saxon, cursor, cress; German, kirsch, a cherry.)

"Wisdom and wit have is not worth a kerse!"
Robert Langiances: P. in Flouchman.

Curse of Scotland. The nile of diamonds. The two most plausible suggestions are these: (1) The nine of diamonds in the game of Pope Joan is called the Pope, the Antichrist of the Scotch reformers. (2) In the game of comette, introduced by Queen Mary, it is the great winning card, and the game was the curse of Scotland because it was the ruin of so many families.

Other suggestions are these. (3) The word "curse" is a corruption of cross, and the nine of diamonds is so arranged as to form St. Andrew's Cross; but as the nine of hearts would do as well, this explanation must be abandoned. (4) Some say it was the card on which the "Butcher Duke" wrote his cruel order after the Battle of Culloden; but the term must have been in vogue at the period, as the ladies nicknamed Justice-Clerk Ormiston "The Nine of Diamonds" (1715). (5) Similarly, we must reject the suggestion that it refers to the arms of Dalrymple, Earl of Stair—viz. or, on a saltire azure, nine lozenges of the first. The earl was justly held in abhorrence for the massacre of Glencoe; so also was Colonel Packer, who attended Charles I. on the scaffold, and had for his arms "gules a cross lozengy or."

Grose says of the nine of diamonds: "Diamonds . . . imply royalty . . . and every ninth King of Scotland has been observed for having noms to be a tyrant and a curse to the country."—Tour Thru Scotland, 1789.

"It is a pity that Grose does not give the names of these kings. Malcolm III., was assassinated in 1093; Macbeth, William was taken prisoner by Henry II. (died 1125); James I. was assassinated in 1137."

Curses. Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. Curses fall on the head of the curser, as chickens which stray during the day return to their roost at night.

Cursing by Bell, Book, and Candle, is reading the anathema in the church, then closing the Bible, tolling the bell, and extinguishing all the candles, saying "Fiat, fiat! Lu-to (close) the Book, quench the candles, ring the bell. Amen, amen."

Custor (Latin, clercus de cursu). Formerly a clerk of the course; a chancery clerk, who made out original writs for the beat, course, or part of the county allotted him. A Newgate solicitor was called a curstor in depreciation of his office.

Curst. Curst cuss hare curst horns. Angry men cannot do all the mischief they wish. Curst means "angry" or "fierce," and curst is "short," as curt-mantle, curt-hose. The Latin proverb is, "Dat Deus immitti cor'nae curta hoc.""You are called plain Kate, and bonny Kate, and sometimes the curst."—Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, II. 1.

Curstall. To cut short. (French, court tailler, to short cut, whence the old French courtail.)

Curstain (The). In fortification, the line of rampart which joins together the flanks of two "bastions" (q.v.).

Curstain. To bring a matter to an end. A theatrical term. When the act or play is over, the bell rings and the green curtain comes down.

"A few more matters of routine will be accomplished, and then the curtain will be rung down on the Session of 1846."—Newspaper Paragraph, July 27th, 1846.

Curstain Lecture. The nagging of a wife after her husband is in bed. The lectures of Mrs. Caudle in French are first-rate caricatures of these "small cattle."

"Besides what endless bawls by wives are bred, The curtain lecture makes a mournful bed."—Dryden.

Curstal Friar. A friar who served as an attendant at the gate of a monastery court. As a curstal dog was not privileged to hunt or course, so a curstal friar virtually meant a worldly-minded one.

"Some do call me the curstal Friar of Fountain Dale; others again call me in jest the Abbot of Fountain Abbey; others still again call me simply Friar Tuck."—Howard Pyle: The Merry Adventures of Robin Hood, II. p. 141.

Curstana. The sword of Edward the Confessor, which, having no point, was the emblem of mercy. The royal sword of England was so called to the reign of Henry III.

"But when Curstana will not do the deed, You lay the pointless clergy-weapon by, And to the laws, your sword of justice, to."—Dryden: Unda et Pacata, part ii. 410-11.

Cursthoose (2 syl.). Robert II., Duc de Normandie (1087-1134).

Curstise (2 syl.). The little hound in the tale of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Allkman (1498). (High German, kurz; French, courte, short or small.)

Curstmantle. The surname of Henry II. He introduced the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors. (1133, 1151-1189.) (See Caracalla.)

Curstule Chair. Properly a chariot chair, an ornamental card-stool made of ivory placed by the Romans in a chariot for the chief magistrate when he went to attend the council. As dictators, consuls, praetors, censors, and the chief ediles occupied such a chair, they were termed curule magistrates or Curzon Street

Curzon Street (London). Named after the ground landlord, George August Curzon, third Viscount Howe.

Cassiness. Ungainliness; perversity; an evil temper; malice prepense. Haliwoll gives casus as surly.

"The turkey-cock is just as likely as not to trample on the young turkeys and maim them, or to split their skulls by a savage blow of his powerful beak. Whether this is 'cassiness' pure and simple... has not been satisfactorily determined."—Daily News, December 22nd, 1886.

Custard. A slap on the hand with a ferula. The word should be custred, unless a play is meant. (Latin, custus, a club or stick.)

Custard Coffin. (See Coffin.)

Customer. A man or acquaintance. A run customer is one better left alone, as he is likely to show fight if interfered with. A shop term. (See Card.)

"How many of her old customers."—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

Custos Rotularum (keeper of the rolls). The chief civil officer of a county, to whose custody are committed the records or rolls of the sessions.

Cut. To renounce acquaintance. There are four sorts of cut—
(1) The cut direct is to stare an acquaintance in the face and pretend not to know him.
(2) The cut indirect, to look another way, and pretend not to see him.
(3) The cut sublime, to admire the top of some tall edifice or the clouds of heaven till the person cut has passed by.
(4) The cut infernal, to strop and adjust your boots till the party has gone past.

There is a very remarkable Scripture illustration of the word cut, meaning to renounce: "Jehovah took a staff and cut it asunder, in token that He would break His covenant with His people; and He cut another staff asunder, in token that He would break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel" (Zechariah, xi. 7-14).

Cut. Cut and come again. Take a cut from the joint, and come for another if you like.

To cut the ground from under one (or from under his feet). To leave an adversary no ground to stand on, by disproving all his arguments.

He has cut his eye-teeth. He is wide awake, he is a knowing one. The eye-teeth are the canine teeth, just under the eyes, and the phrase means he can bite as well as bark. Of course, the play is on the word "eye," and those who have cut their eye-teeth are wide awake.

Cut your wisdom teeth. Wisdom teeth are those at the extreme end of the jaws, which do not make their appearance till persons have come to years of discretion. When persons say or do silly things, the remark is made to them that "they have not yet cut their wisdom teeth," or reached the years of discretion.

Cut the knot. Break through an obstacle. The reference is to the Gordian knot (q.v.) shown to Alexander, with the assurance that whoever loosed it would be made ruler of all Asia; whereupon the Macedonian cut it in two with his sword, and claimed to have fulfilled the prophecy.

I must cut my stick—i.e. leave. The Irish usually cut a shillelah before they start on an expedition. Punch gives the following witty derivation:—"Pilgrims on leaving the Holy Land used to cut a palm-stick, to prove that they had really been to the Holy Sepulchre. So brother Francis would say to brother Paul, 'Where is brother Benedict?' 'Oh (says Paul), he has cut his stick!'—i.e. he is on his way home."

I'll cut your comb for you. Take your conceit down. The allusion is to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

He'll cut up well. He is rich, and his property will cut into good slices.

Cut Blocks with a Razor (To). To do something astounding by insignificant means; to do something more eccentric than inconsiderate. According to Dean Swift, to "make pincushions of sunbeams." The tale is that Accius, or Attus Navius, a Roman augur, opposed the king Tarquin the Elder, who wished to double the number of senators. Tarquin, to throw ridicule on the augur, sneered at his pretensions of augury, and asked him if he could do what was then in his thoughts. "Undoubtedly," replied Navius; and Tarquin with a laugh, said, "Why, I was thinking whether I could cut through this whetstone with a razor." "Cut boldly," said Navius, and the whetstone was cut in two. This story forms the subject of one of Don Gaultier's ballads, and Goldsmith refers to it in his Retaliation:

"In short, 'twas his (Burke's) fate, unemployed or in place at
To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor."
Cut neither Nails nor Hair at Sea.

Petronius says, "Non licet cuiquam mortaliis in nave neque unguis neque capillos deponere, nisi cum pelago ventus irruat." The cuttings of the nails and hair were votive offerings to Prosperine, and it would excite the jealousy of Neptune to make offerings to another in his own special kingdom.

Cut Off with a Shilling. Disinherited. Blackstone tells us that the Romans set aside those testaments which passed by the natural heirs unnoticed; but if any legacy was left, no matter how small, it proved the testator’s intention, English law has no such provision, but the notion at one time prevailed that the name of the heir should appear in the will; and if he was bequeathed "a shilling," that the testator had not forgotten him, but disinherited him intentionally.

Cut out. Left in the lurch; superseded. In cards, when there are too many for a game (say whist), it is customary for the players to cut out after a [rubber], in order that another player may have a turn. This is done by the players cutting the cards on the table, and the lowest turn-up gives place to the new hand, who "supersedes" him, or takes his place.

? It does not refer to cutting out a ship from an enemy’s port.

He is cut out for a sailor. His natural propensities are suited for the vocation. The allusion is to cutting out cloth, etc., for specific purposes.

Cut your Coat according to your Cloth. Stretch your arm no farther than your sleeve will reach.

"Little hands must keep near shore, Larger ones may venture more."

French: "Selon ta bourse nourris ta bouche," "Selon le pain il faut le couteau," "Fou est qui plus dépense que sa rente ou vaut."

Italian: "Nosti facciamo la spesa secondo l’entrata."

Latin: "Ex quovis ligno non fit Mercurius."

 Parsum parva desint (Horace). "Messe tenus propria vive" (Persius). "Cui multum est piporis, etiam cleribus immiscet." "Sumptus censum non superat" (Plautus). "Sine possis nod velis, velis id quod posset" (Horace).

Cut a Dash. Make a show. Cut is the French couper, better seen in the noun coup, as a grand coup, a coup de main (a masterly stroke), so "to cut" means to make a masterly coup, to do something to be looked at and talked about. Dashing means striking - i.e., showy, as a "dashing fellow," a "dashing equipage." To cut a dash is to get one’s self looked at and talked about for a showy or striking appearance.

Cut and Dry. Already prepared. "He had a speech all cut and dry." The allusion is to timber cut, dry, and fit for use.

"Sets of phrases, cut and dry.
Every more thy tongue supply." Swift.

Cut and Run. Be off as quickly as possible. A sea phrase, meaning cut your cable and run before the wind.

Cut Away. Be off at once. This is a French phrase, couper (cut away) — i.e., to break through the enemy’s ranks by cutting them down with your swords.

Cut Capers (To). To act in an unusual manner.

"The quietest fellows are forced to fight for their money and sometimes to cut capers like the rest." — Le Faux: The House in the Churchyard, p. 143.

To cut capers (in dancing) is to spring upwards, and rapidly interchange one foot with the other.

Cut your capers! Be off with you! I’ll make him cut his capers, i.e., ruin his conduct.

Cut it Short. (See Audley.)

Cut of his Jib. The contour or expression of his face. This is a sailor’s phrase. The cut of a jib or foresail of a ship indicates her character. Thus, a sailor says of a suspicious vessel, he "does not like the cut of her jib."

Cut Short is to shorten. "Cut short all intermission" (Macbeth, iv. 3). To cut it short means to bring to an end what you are doing or saying. His life was cut short. He died prematurely. The allusion is to Atropos, one of the three Fates, cutting the thread of life spun by her sister Clo’tho.

Cut up Rough (To). To be disagreeable or quarrelsome about anything.

Cuthbert. St. Cuthbert’s head. Joints of the articulated stems of corncobs, used for rosaries. St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be termed the St. Patrick of Great Britain. He is said to sit at night on a rock in Holy Island, and to use the opposite rock as his anvil while he forges the entrochites (en-tro-kītēs). (See BEAD.)

On a rock of Lindsfarne
St. Cuthbert sits, and tells to fame
The sea-born beads that bear his name.
Scott: Mayrīm.

St. Cuthbert's Stone. A granite rock in Cumberland.

Cutter's Poetry. Mere jingles or rhymes. Knives had, at one time, a distich inscribed on the blade by means of aquafortis.

"Whose name was
For all the world like cutter's poetry
Upon a knife."
Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. i.

Cutpurse. Now called "pickpocket." The two words are of historical value. When purses were worn suspended from a girdle, thieves cut the string by which the purse was attached; but when pockets were adopted, and purses were no longer hung on the girdle, the thief was no longer a cutpurse, but became a pickpocket.

"To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Cutter's Law. Not to see a fellow want while we have cash in our purse. Cutter's law means the law of pursucutters, robbers, brigands, and highwaymen.

"I must put you in cash with some of your old uncle's broad-pieces. This is cutter's law; we must not see a fellow want, if we have cash ourselves."—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. 12.

Cuttle. Captain Cuttle. An eccentric, kind-hearted sailor, simple as a child, credulous of every tale, and generous as the sun. He is immortalised by the motto selected from Notes and Queries, "When found make a note of." (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

"Unfortunately, I neglected Captain Cuttle's advice, and am now unable to find it."—W. H. Buck: Notes and Queries.

Cutty. Scotch for short, as a cutty pipe, cutty sark. (A diminutive of curt.)

Cutty Pipe. A short clay pipe. Scotch, cutty (short), as cutty spoons, cutty sark, a cutty (little girl), etc., a cutty gun (a pop-gun).

Cutty Stool. A small stool on which offenders were placed in the Scotch church when they were about to receive a public rebuke.

Cwt. is C wt.—i.e. C. centum, wt. weight, meaning hundred-weight. (See Dwt.)

Cyc'ean Rocks (The). The Symp-LEGades at the entrance of the Euxine Sea. Said to close together when a vessel attempted to sail between them, and thus crush it to pieces. Cyc'ean means dark, and SympLEGades: means dashers together.

"Here are those hard rocks of trap, of a greenish-blue, coloured with copper, and hence called the Cyc'ean."—Ollier.

Cyco. A period or series of events or numbers which recur everlasting in precisely the same order.

Cycle of the moon, called "Mason's Cycle," from Meton, who discovered it, is a period of nineteen years, at the expiration of which time the phases of the moon repeat themselves on the same days as they did nineteen years previously. (See callipic Period.)

Cycle of the sun. A period of twenty-eight years, at the expiration of which time the Sunday letters recur and proceed in the same order as they did twenty-eight years previously. In other words, the days of the month fall again on the same days of the week.

The Platonic cycle or great year is that space of time which elapses before all the stars and constellations return to any given state. Tycho Brahe calculated this period at 25,816 years, and Riccioli at 25,920.

Cyc'ilo Poets. Inferior epic poets. On the death of Homer a host of minstrels caught thefloating of his poems, and wrote continuations, illustrations, or additions thereto. These poets were called cyclical because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war. The chief were Agias, Arctius, Eumemon, Lescheris, and Strasimus.

"Besides the Homerian poems, the Greeks of this age possessed those of the poets named Cyclo and they sang a traditional cycle of events..."—Rigby's. Greece, part i, chap. xvi, p. 120.

Cyclopaedia. The living cyclopedia. Longin's, so called for his extensive information. (213–273.)

Cyclo'pean. Huge, massive, like the Cyclops of classic mythology.

Cyclo'pean Masonry. The old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy, such as the Gallery of Trinys, the Gate of Lyons, the Treasury of Athens, and the Tombs of Phor'neus (3 syl.) and Da'noos. They are said to have been the work of the Cyclops. They are huge blocks fitted together without mortar, with marvellous nicety.

Cyclops. One of a group of giants with only one eye, and that in the centre of their forehead, whose business it was to forge iron for Vulcan. They were probably Pelasgians, who worked in quarries, and attached a lantern to their forehead to give them light underground. The lantern was their one eye as big as the full moon. (Greek, "circular-eye.") (See ARTIASPIANS.)

"Roused with the sound, the mighty family of one-eyed brothers hasten to the shore, and gather round the frowning Polyphemus."

Addison: Milton Imitated.

Cyll'aros, according to Virgil, was the celebrated horse of Pollux (Georg., iii. 90), but, according to Ovid, it was Castor's steed (Met., xii. 408).

"He, O Castor, was a courser worthy thee... Gauntlet black his colour, but like jet it shone; his legs and flowing tail were white alone."—Dryden: Ovid's Metamorphoses, xii.

Cymbeline. (See IMOGEN, ZIMERA.)

Cymoch'les. A man of prodigious might, brother of Pyroch'les, son of Mulico (Arc'tes) and Despite, and husband of Acras'ia, the enchantress. He sets out to encounter Sir Guyon, but is ferried over the idle lake by Want'nness (Phed'reia), and forgets himself; he is slain by King Arthur (canto vii.). The word means, "one who seeks glory in troubles."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, iii. 5.

Cymodoce (4 syll.). A sea nymph and companion of Venus. (Virgil: Georg., iv. 338; and again, Aeneid, v. 826.) The word means "wave-receiving."

The Garden of Cymodoce. Sark, one of the Channel islands. It is the title of a poem by Swinburne, 1880.

Cyneg'ris. It is said that when the Persians were pushing off from shore after the battle of Mar'athon, Cyneg'ris, the brother of E'schylus, the poet, seized one of their ships with his right hand, which was instantly lopped off; he then grasped it with his left, which was cut off also; lastly, he seized hold of it with his teeth and lost his head. (See BENBOW.)

Cynic. A sardonic, churlish person, like a cynic. The Cynics were so called because Antis'thenes held his school in the gymnasion called Cynosarg'ges, set apart for those who were not of pure Athenian blood. Cynosarg'ges means white dog, and was so called because a white dog once carried away part of a victim which Diome'des was offering to Hercules. The sect was often called the Dog-sect; and the effigy over Diogen'se's pillar was a dog, with this inscription:

"Say, dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb?"

"A dog?" His name?—"Diogenes."—From fury.

"Shin'tle."—What! who made a tub his home?"

"The name; now dead, amongst the stars a star."—E. C. B.

Cynick Tub (The). The tub from which Diogenes lectured. Similarly we speak of the "Porch," that is, the Porch Pocile, meaning Stoic philosophy; the "Garden," meaning Epicurean philosophy; the "Academy," meaning Platonist philosophy; the "Colonnade," meaning Aristotelian philosophy.

"[They] fetch their doctrines from the Cynik tub."—Milton: Comus, line 204.

Cynics. The chief were Antis'thenes of Athens (the founder), Diogen'nes, Onesic'ritos, Mon'timos, Crit'eus and his wife Hipparch'ia, Motroc'lès, Menip'pos, and Meno'domo the madman.

Cynosure (3 syll.). The polar star; the observed of all observers. Greek for dog's tail, and applied to the constellation called Ursa Minor. As seamen guide their ships by the north star, and observe it well, the word "cynosure" is used for whatever attracts attention, as "The cynosure of neighbouring eyes" (Milton), especially for guidance in some doubtful matter, as—

"Richmond was the cynosure on which all Northern eyes were fixed [in the American war]."—The Times.

Cynthia. The moon: a surname of Artemis or Diana. The Roman Diana, who represented the moon, was called Cynthia from Mount Cynthia, where she was born.

"And from embattled clouds emerging slow, Cynthia came riding on her silver car."—Herrick: Minstrel.

Cynthia. Pope, speaking of the inconstant character of woman, "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear," says—

"Come, then, the colours and the ground prepare! Dip in the rainbow, trick her off in air: Choose a firm cloud, before it fall, and in it Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of the minute."—Kydde li. 17-20.

Cypress (The) is a funeral tree, and was dedicated by the Romans to Pluto, because when once cut it never grows again.

"Cypress garlands are of great account at funerals amongst the gentler sort, but rosemary and bayes are used by the common sort at funerals and weddings. They are all plants which fade not a good while after they are gathered . . . and intimate that the remembrance of the present solemnity might not out the present."—Coles: Introduction to the Knowledge of Plants.
Daffodil

The magic cypress branch. In the opera of Roberto il Diavolo, after the “dance of love,” in which Helen seduces the duke, he removes the cypress branch, which has the power of imparting to him whatever he wishes. With this he enters the palace of Isabella, princess of Sicily, and transfixes the princess and her attendants in a magic sleep, but afterwards relenting, he breaks the branch, and is dragged away by the guards.

Cyprian Brass, or “ses Cyprium,” copper. Pliny (book xxxiv. c. ii.) says, “in Cypro cuim prima eris incendio fuit.”

Cypriote. A native of Cyprus; the dialect spoken on the island; pertaining or special to Cyprus.

D

D. This letter is the outline of a rude archway or door. It is called in Hebrew dalath (a door). In Egyptian hieroglyphics it is a man’s hand.

D or d, indicating a penny or pence, is the initial letter of the Latin denarius, a silver coin equal to 8½d. during the commonwealth of Rome, but in the Middle Ages about equivalent to our penny. The word was used by the Romans for money in general.

D stands for 500, which is half S, a form of S or M, which stands for mille.

D stands for 5,000.

D.O.M. Dopo Optima Maritae. Deter omnis mori (It is allotted to all to die).

D.T. A contraction of delirium tremens.

“They get a look after a touch of D.T., which nothing else that I know of can give them.”—Judson Yale.

Da Capo or D.C. From the beginning—that is, finish with a repetition of the first strain. A term in music. (Italian.)

Dab. Clover, skilled; as “a dab-hand at it”; a corrupt contraction of the Latin adeptus (an adept). “Dabster” is another form. Apt is a related word.

“An idiot stripping, training for the law. A dunce at learning, but a dab at law (worthless) as an 8. Amen: Logic; or, The Better Bit.

Dab, Din, etc.

“Hab Dab and David Din, Ding the dell over Dobson’s Linn.”

“Hab Dab” means Halbert Dobson; “David Din” means David Dun; and “Dobson’s Linn,” or Dob’s Linn, is a waterfall near the head of Moffat Water.

Dobson and Dun were two Camerounians who lived for security in a cave in the ravine. Here, as they said, they saw the devil in the form of a pack of dried hides, and after flinging the “fool field” for some time, they flung him into the waterfall.

Dahabra. An idol of the savages of Pamans, to whose honour slaves are burnt to death. (American mythology.)

Dab’bat [the Beast]. The Beast of the Apocalypse, which the Mahometans say will appear with Antichrist, called by them daghial. (Rev. xix. 19; xx. 10.)

Dabble. To dabble in the funds; to dabble in politics—i.e. to do something in them in a small way. (Dutch, dabbelen; our dip and tap.)

Dab’chick. The lesser grebe. Dab is a corruption of dep, the old participle of dip, and chick (any young or small fowl), literally the dipping or diving chick.

Dactyl (Will). The “smallest of pedants.” (Steele: The Tatler.)

Dactyls (The). Mythic beings to whom is ascribed the discovery of iron. Their number was originally three—the Smelter, the Hammer, and the Anvil; but was afterwards increased to five males and five females, whence their name Dactyls or Fingers.

Dad or Daddy. Father. The person who acts as father at a wedding; a stage-manager. The superintendent of a casual ward is termed by the inmates “Old Daddy.” (A Night in a Workhouse, by an Amateur Casual [J. Greenwood].)

In the Fortunes of Nigel, by Sir W. Scott, Steenie, Duke of Buckingham, calls King James “My dear dad and gossip.” (Welsh, tad; Irish, daid; father; Sanskrit, tada; Hindu, dada.)

Daddy Long-legs. A crane-fly; sometimes applied to the long-legged spiders called “harvestmen.”

Da’sdala. A Greek who formed the Cretan labyrinth, and made for himself wings, by means of which he flew from Crete across the Archipelago. He is said to have invented the saw, the axe, the gimlet, etc.

Daffodil (The), or “Lent Lily,” was once white; but Persephone, daughter of Demeter (Ceres), delighted to wander about the flowery meadows of Sicily. One spring-tide she tripped over the meadows, wrestled her head with wild lilies, and, throwing herself on the grass, fell asleep. The god of the infernal Regions, called by the Romans Pluto, fell in love with the beautiful maid, and carried her off for his bride. His touch turned the white flowers to a golden yellow, and some of them fell in Acheron, where they grew luxuriantly; and over since the flower has been planted on graves. Theophilus and Pliny tell us that the ghosts delight in the flower, called by them the Asphodel. It was once called the Affodil. (French, asphodelus; Latin, asphodilus; Greek, asphodilos.)

"Flour of daffodil is a cure for madness."—Med. Ms. Lincoln Cathedral, t. 270.

Dag (day). Son of Natt or night. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dagger or Long Cross (†), used for reference to a note after the asterisk (*), is a Roman Catholic character, originally employed in church books, prayers of exorcism, at benedictions, and so on, to remind the priest where to make the sign of the cross. This sign is sometimes called an obelisk—that is, "a spit." (Greek, obelos, a spit.)

Dagger, in the City arms of London, commemorates Sir William Walworth's dagger, with which he slew Wat Tyler in 1381. Before this time the cognisance of the City was the sword of St. Paul.

"Brave Walworth, knight, lord mayor, that slew rebellion Tyms in his arms. The king, therefore, did give him in London the dagger to the city arms." Fourth year of Richard II. (1381.) Fishmongers' Hall.

Dagger Ale is the ale of the Dag, a celebrated ordinary in Holborn.

"My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night in Holborn, at the Dagger."—Jonson: The Alchemist, i. 1.

Dagger-scene in the House of Commons. Edmund Burke, during the French Revolution, tried a bit of bunkum by throwing down a dagger on the floor of the House, exemplifying as he did so, "There's French fraternity for you! Such is the weapon which French Jacobins would plunge into the heart of our beloved king," Sheridan spoilt the dramatic effect, and set the House in a roar by his remark, "The gentleman, I see, has brought his knife with him, but where is his fork?"—(See COUP DE THEATRE.)

Daggers. To speak daggers, To look daggers. To speak or look so as to wound the sensibilities.

"I will speak daggers to her; but will use none."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, III. ii.

Daggers Drawn (44). At great enmity, as if with daggers drawn and ready to rush on each other.

Daggletail or Draggle-tail. A slovenly woman, the bottom of whose dress trails in the dirt. Dag (Saxon) means loose ends, mire or dirt; whence dag-locks, the soiled locks of a sheep's fleece, and dag-wool, refuse wool. (Compare TAG.)

Dagobert. King Dagobert and St. Eligius. There is a French song very popular with this title. St. Eligius tells the king his coat has a hole in it, and the king replies, "C'est vrai, le tient est bon; prele-le moi." Next the saint complains of the king's stockings, and Dagobert makes the same answer. Then of his wig and cloak, to which the same answer is returned. After seventeen complaints St. Eligius said, "My king, death is at hand, and it is time to confess," when the king replied, "Why can't you confess, and die instead of me?"

Dagon (Hebrew, dag On, the fish On). The idol of the Philistines; half woman and half fish. (See ATEKBOATA.)

"Dagon his name; sea-monster, upward man And downward fish; yet loud his temple high, Heard in Avarus, dreaded through the coast Of Palestine, in Gath and Ashdod, And Acreton and Gaza's frontier bounds."—Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 202.

Dagone (Sir). In the romance La Mort d'Arthur he is called the fool of King Arthur, and was knighted by the king himself.

"I remember at Mile-End Green, when I lay at "Leontes's Inn, I saw the Sir Dagone in Arthur's show."—2 Henry IV., III. 2. (Justice Shallow).

=Dagone= is the pen-name of Mr. G. R. Sims.

Daguerreotype (4 syl.). A photographic process. So named from M. Daguerre, who greatly improved it in 1839. (See TALLOTYPE.)

Da'gu. A god worshipped in Perga. When Khak-Kak destroyed the world, Dagun reconstructed it. (Indian mythology.)

Dahak. The Satan of Persia. According to Persian mythology, the ages of the world are divided into periods of 1,000 years. When the cycle of "chil- inians" (1,000-year periods) is complete, the reign of Ormazd will begin, and men will be all good and all happy; but this event will be preceded by the loosing of Dahak, who will break his chain and fall upon the world, and bring on man the most dreadful calamities. Two prophets will appear to cheer the oppressed, and announce the advent of Ormuzd.

Dahlia. A flower. So called from Andrew Dahl, the Swedish botanist.

Dahomey is not derived from Daho, the founder of the palace so called, but is a corruption of Dahu-homen, "Dah's Belly." The story is as follows: Ardrah divided his kingdom at death between his three sons, and Daho, one of the sons, received the northern portion. Being an enterprising and ambitious man, he coveted the country of his neighbour Dahn, King of Gedavin, and first applied to him for a plot of land to build a house on. This being granted, Daho made other requests in quick succession, and Dah's patience being exhausted, he exclaimed, "Must I open my belly for you to build on?" On hearing this, Daho declared himself insulted, made war on Dahn, and slew him. He then built his palace where Dahn fell, and called it Dahu-homen. (Nineteenth Century, October, 1890, pp. 605-6.)

Dai'both (3 syl.). A Japanese idol of colossal size. Each of her hands is full of hands. (Japanese mythology.)

Dai'koku (4 syl.). The god invoked specially by the artisans of Japan. He sits on a ball of rice, holding a hammer in his hand, with which he beats a sack; and every time he does so the sack becomes full of silver, rice, cloth, and other useful articles. (Japanese mythology.)

Dai'ri (3 syl.). The royal residence in Japan; the court of the mikado, used by motony for the sovereign or chief pontiff himself.

Dairy. A corrupt form of "dey-ehr," Middle English dierie and deygeyer, from dey, a dairymaid.

"The dey or farm-woman entered with her pitchers to deliver the milk for the family."—Scott: Fair Maid of Perth, chap. xxiii.

Da'is. The raised floor at the head of a dining-room, designed for guests of distinction (French, dais, a canopy). So called because it was used to be decorated with a canopy. The proverb "Sous le dais" means "in the midst of grandeur."

Da'sies. Slang for boots. Explained under CHIVY.

Daisy. Ophelia gives the queen a daisy to signify "that her light and fickle love ought not to expect constancy in her husband." So the daisy is explained by Greene to mean a Quip for an upstart courtier. (Anglo-Saxon deyes edge, day's eye.)

The word is Day's eye, and the flower is so called because it closes its pinky lashes and goes to sleep when the sun sets, but in the morning it expands its petals to the light. (See VIOLET.)

"That well by reason men call it male. The daisy, or else the die of the dale."—Chaucer.

Daisy (Solomon). Parish clerk of Chigwell. He had little, round, black, shiny eyes like beads; wore rusty black breeches, a rusty black coat, and a long-flapped waistcoat with queer little buttons. Solomon Daisy, with Phil Parkes, the ranger of Epping Forest, Tom Cobb, the chandler and post-office keeper, and John Willet, mine host, formed a quadrilateral or village club, which used to meet night after night at the Maypole, on the borders of the forest. Daisy's famous tale was the murder of Mr. Reuben Haredale, and the conviction that the murderer would be found out on the 19th of March, the anniversary of the murder. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, chap. i., etc.)

Daisy-cutter (A). In cricket, a ball that is bowled all along the ground.

Daisy-roots, like dwarf-elder berries, are said to stunt the growth; hence the fairy Milkah fed her royal foster-child on this food, that his standard might not exceed that of a pigmy. This superstition arose from the notion that everything had the property of bestowing its own speciality on others. (See FERN SEED.)

"She polished dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit, And fed him early with the daisy root, Whence through him the powers of useful things ran; And formed the beautuous miniature of man."—Tickell: Kensington Gardens.

Dala'i-Lama [grand lama]. Chief of the two Tartar priests—a sort of incarnate deity. The other lama is called the "Tesho-lama."

Dal'dah. Mahomet's favourite white mule.

Dalgar'no (Lord). A heartless profigate in Scott's Fortunes of Nigel.

Dalgety (Dugald). Jeffrey calls him "a compound of Captain Fluefflen and Bob'adil," but this is scarcely just. Without doubt, he has all the pedantry and conceal of the former, and all the vulgar assurance of the latter; but, unlike Bobadil, he is a man of real courage, and wholly trustworthy to those who pay him for the service of his sword, which, like a thifty mercenary, he lets out to the highest bidder. (Scott: Legend of Montrose.)

"Neither Schiller, Byron, Thanus, Monroe, nor Dugald Dalgety makes any mention of it."—Carlyle.

Dalice (King of). A kind of "Mayor of Garrat" (q.v.) at Kingston, in Ireland. A full description is given of this mock mayor, etc., in a book entitled Ireland Ninety Years Ago.

Dalle (French), écu de six francs (3s.). Money generally.

"Quirologque parle le de par . . . payeroit a la houreuse de l'Union certaine quantité de deniers, pour l'entretien des docteurs."—Sylva Sylvarum, 1624, p. 162.

Dalmatias or Dalmatier. A robe, open in front, reaching to the knees; worn at one time by deacons over the alb or stole, when the Eucharist was administered. It is in imitation of the regal vest of Dalmatia, and was imported into Rome by the Emperor Commodus. A similar robe was worn by kings, in the Middle Ages, at coronations and other great solemnities, to remind them of their duty of bountifulness to the poor. The right sleeve was plain and full, but the left was fringed and tasseled. Deacons had broader sleeves than sub-deacons, to indicate their duty to larger generosity; for a similar reason the sleeves of a bishop are larger than those of a priest. The two stripes before and behind were to show that the wearer should exercise his charity to all.

Dam. An ancient Indian copper coin, of which 1,600 went to a rupee. Hence came the expression "Not worth a dam," though wrongly, with "not worth a farthing," "not worth a sou." [TwoPenny Dam.]

Dame. What's the damage? What have I to pay? how much is the bill? The allusion is to the law assessing damages in remuneration to the plaintiff.

Dama. Linen. So called from Damascus, where it was originally manufactured.

Damaskeening. Producing upon steel a blue tinge and ornamental figures, sometimes inlaid with gold and silver, as in Damascus blades; so called from Damascus, which was celebrated in the Middle Ages for this class of ornamental art.

Dame'ba or Damb'ea. A lake in Gojam, Abyssinia, the source of the Blue Nile. Captain Speke traced the White Nile to Lake Victoria N'yamza, which, no doubt, is fed by the Mountains of the Moon.

"He (the Nile) thrw the lucid lake Of fair Dameba ro Osborne's stream."—Thomson: Summer, 182.7.

Dame du Lac. A fairy, named Vivienne, who plunged with the infant Lancelot into a lake. This lake was a kind of mirage, concealing the dominions of the lady "En la marche de la petite Bretagne." (See Vivienne.)

"En ce lieu . . . avait la dame monst de telles marnes et mont de riches et en unemain devent elle avoit une sceinte petite rivière."—D'Urville.

Damien's Bed of Steel. R. F. Damien, in 1737, attempted the life of Louis XV. He was taken to the Conciérgie; an iron bed, which likewise served as a chair, was prepared for him, and to this he was fastened with chains. He was then tortured, and ultimately torn to pieces by wild horses. (Smollet: History of England, v. 12, p. 39.)

"The uplifted axe, the approximating wheel, Luke's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel."—Goldsmith: The Traveller (1766).

Dame with Fault Praise. To praise with such a voice as to show plainly secret disapproval.

"Dame with fault praise, ascent with civil leer, And, without success, touch the rest to sour."—Pope: An Essay to Aboriginal.

Damocles' Sword. Evil foreboded or dreaded. Damocles, the sycophant of Dionysius the elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the tyrant to try the felicity he so much envied. Accordingly he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Damocles was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalising torment to him. (Cicero.)

"These fears hang like Damocles's sword over every feast, and make enjoyment impossible."—Chambers' Cyclopaedia.

Damon and Musidora. Two lovers in Thomson's Summer. One day Damon caught Musidora bathing, and his delicacy so won upon her that she promised to be his bride.

Damon and Pythias. Inseparable friends. They were two Syracusian youths. Damon, being condemned to death by Dionysius the tyrant, obtained leave to go home to arrange his affairs if Pythias became his security. Damon being delayed, Pythias was led to execution, but his friend arrived in time to save him. Dionysius was so struck with this honourable friendship that he pardoned both of them.

DAMPER (4). A snap before dinner, which damps or takes off the edge of appetite. "That's a damper" also means a wet-blanket influence, a rebuff which dampens or cools one's courage.

Also a large thin cake of flour and water baked in hot ovens. The mute of a stringed instrument to deaden the sound is also called a "damper."

Damsel. (See Domisellus.)

Dams'ion. A corruption of Damascene, a fruit from Damascus.

Damyen (3 syl.). A "silke squyer," whose illicit love was accepted by May, the youthful bride of January, a Lombard knight, sixty years old. (Chaucer: The Marchaundes Tale.)

Dan. A title of honour, common with the old poets, as Dan Phoebus, Dan Cupid, Dan Neptune, Dan Chaucer, etc. (Spanish, don.)

"Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled," On Faman's eternal beaurod worthy to be fled.

Spencer: Faerie Queene, book iv. canto i. 32.

From Dan to Beersheba. From one end of the kingdom to the other; all over the world; everywhere. The phrase is Scriptural. Dan being the most northern and Beersheba the most southern city of the Holy Land. We have a similar expression, "From John o' Groat's to the Land's End."

Dan Tucker. Out o' de way, old Dan Tucker. The first Governor of Bermuda was Mr. Moore, who was succeeded by Captain Daniel Tucker. These islands were colonised from Virginia.

Dan'ace (3 syl.). A coin placed by the Greeks in the mouth of the dead to pay their passage across the ferry of the Lower World.

Dan'ae. An Argive princess whom Zeus (Jupiter) seduced under the form of a shower of gold, while she was confined in an inaccessible tower. She thus became the mother of Perseus (2 syl.).

Dana'ides (4 syl.). Daughters of Dan'aeos (King of Argos). They were fifty in number, and married the fifty sons of Scyros. They all but one murdered their husbands on their wedding-night, and were punished in the infernal regions by having to draw water everlastingly in straws from a deep well.

This is an allegory. The followers of Dan'aos taught the Argives to dig wells, and irrigate their fields in the Egyptian manner. As the soil of Argos was very dry and porous, it was like a sieve.

The names of the fifty Danaidées and their respective husbands are as follows:

* Lyneus (2 syl.), the one saved by his wife, is marked with an asterisk (*).

Dan'aeos. According to the Roman de Rose, Denmark means the country of Dan'aes, who settled here with a colony after the siege of Troy, as Brutus is said by the same sort of name-legend to have settled in Britain. Saxo-Germanicus, with equal absurdity, makes Dan, the son of Ulysses, the first king, to account for the name of the country.

Danaw. The Danube (German).

"To Danaw Rhine or the Danaw."

Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 323.

Dance. The Spanish danza was a grave and stately court dance. Those of the seventeenth century were called Dancing-water

Russian: the cosack.
English: the reel.
Spanish: the bolero and fandango.

When Handel was asked to point out the peculiar taste of the different nations of Europe in dancing, he ascribed the minuet to the French, the saraband to the Spaniards, the saraband to the Italian, and the hornpipe and the morris-dance to the English.

Dances (Religious Dances):

Astronomical dances, invented by the Egyptians, designed (like our ordnances) to represent the movements of the heavenly bodies.
The Bacchic dances were of three sorts: grave (like our minuet), gay (like our gavotte), and mixed (like our minuet and gavotte combined). The dance Chamfrin, invented by Pan, quick and lively. The dancers (in the open air) wore wreaths of oak and garlands of flowers.
Children's dances in Laccenism, in honour of Diana. The children were nude; and their movements were grave, modest, and graceful.
Corinthian dance, in honour of Bacchus, accompanied with timbrels, fife, flutes, and a tumultuous noise produced by the clashing of swords and staves against broken ladders.
Funereal dances, in Athens, slow, solemn dances in which the priests took part. The performers wore long, loose robes, and carried cypress sticks in their hands.

Dances (National Dances):

Bohemian: the red'ren.
English: the hornpipe and dances.
French: the contredanse (country dance), cotillion, and quadrille.
German: the gallopade and Waltz.
Irish: the jig.
Nepali: the tarmulata.
Polish: the mazurka and brakovich.

Dancing-water and enriches them. It fell in a cascade in the Burning Forest, and could only be reached by an underground passage. Prince Chryl fetched a bottle of this water for his beloved Fair-star, but was aided by a dove. (Fairy Tales, by the Comtesse d'Aulnoy.) (See YELLOW WATER.)

Dandelion. A flower. The word is a corruption of the French dent de lion (lion's tooth). Also called Leontodon (lion-tooth, Greek), from a supposed resemblance between its leaves and the teeth of lions.

Dander. Is your dander up or riz? Is your angry passion up? This is generally considered to be an Americanism; but Halliwell gives, in his Archeological Dictionary, both dander (anger) and dandy (distracted), the former common to several counties, and the latter peculiar to Somersetshire.

"From this dog descended Davidson of Hyndlee's breed, the original Dandie-Dimont."—T. Brown: Our Dog, p. 104.

Dandin (French). A ninny, a nab. From Molière's comedy of George Dandin. (See Gandin.)

Dandin (George). A French cit, who marries a sprig of nobility, and lives with his wife's parents. Madame appeals on all occasions to her father and mother, who, of course, take part against her husband. Poor George is in a sad plight, and is for ever lamenting his fate with the expression, Vous lavez voulue, George Dandin ("Tis your own fault, George Dandin). George Dandin stands for anyone who marries above his sphere, and is pecked by his wife and mother-in-law. The word means "a ninny." (Molière's comedy called.)

Perrin Dandin. A sort of Lynch judge in Rabelais, who seated himself on the trunk of the first tree he came to, and there decided the causes submitted to him.

Dandiecrat or Dandycrat, according to Camden, is a small coin issued in the reign of Henry VII. Applied to a little fellow, it is about equal to our modern expression, a little "twopenny ha'penny" fellow.

Dando (A). One who frequents hotels, eating-houses, and other such places, satisfies his appetite, and decamps without payment.

Dandy. A coxcomb; a top. The feminine of "dandy" is either dandily or dandizz. Egan says the word was first used in 1813, but examples of the word occur at least one hundred years before that date. (French, dandia, a ninny, a vein, conceited fellow.)

Dandy-horse. (See Velocipede.)

Dandyism. The manners, etc., of a dandy; like a dandy.

Dane's Skin (M). A freckled skin. Red hair and a freckled skin are the traditional characteristics of Danish blood.

Dangle. A theatrical amateur in Sheridan's Citti. It was designed for Thomas Vaughan, a playwright.

Daniel Lambert weighed 739 lbs. In 1841 eleven young men stood within his waistcoat buttoned. (1770-1809.)

Danism. Lending money on usury. (Greek, dancismos, a loan.)

Dannebrog or Danebrog. The old flag of Denmark. The tradition is that Waldemar II. of Denmark saw in the heavens a fiery cross which betokened his victory over the Esthoniens (1219). This story is very similar to that of Constantine (p.e.), and of St. Andrew's Cross. (See Andrew, St.)
The order of Danebrog. The second of the Danish orders. Brog means "cloth" or banner.

Dan'necks. Hedging-gloves. A corruption of Tourney, where they were originally manufactured.

Danse. La danse commence l'-bas, fighting has broken out yonder.

"Mon Caporal, there is great news! La danse commence l'-bas."—Quinta: Under Two Flags, chap. XX.

A la danse. On the march.

"The regiment was ordered out a la danse There was fresh war in the interior."—Quinta: Under Two Flags, chap. XX. (See Dancer.)

Dansker. A Dane. Denmark used to be called Danské. Hence Polonius says to Reynaldo, "Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris." (Hamlet, ii. 1.)

Dante and Beatrice—i.e. Beatrice Portina'ri, who was only eight years old when the poet first saw her. His abiding love for her was chaste as snow and pure as it was tender, Beatrice married Dantesque (2 syl.). Dante-like—that is, a minute life-like representation of the infernal horrors, whether by words, as in the poet, or in visible form, as in Dore’s illustrations of the Inferno.

Daphnida. An elegy on Douglas Howard, daughter and heiress of Lord Howard. (Spenner, 1591.)

Daphne. Daughter of a river-god, loved by Apollo. She fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel, thenceforth the favourite tree of the sun-god.

"Nay, lady, say: If I but wave this wand,
Your hairs are all chained up in alabaster,
And you a statue, or, as Daphne was,
Root-bound, that fled Apollo."—Milton: Comus, 676-691.

Daphnis. A Sicilian shepherd who invented pastoral poetry.

Daphnus. The lover of Chloe in the exquisite Greek pastoral romance of Longos, in the fourth century. Daphnis was the model of Allan Ramsay’s Gentle Shepherd, and the tale is the basis of St. Pierre’s Paull and Virginia.

Dapper. A little, nimble, spruce young clerk in Ben Jonson’s Alchemist.

Dapple. The name of Sancho Panza’s donkey in Cervantes’ romance of Don Quixote. Bailey derives dapple from the Teutonic dopper (streaked or spotted like a pippin). A dapple-grey horse is one of a light grey shaded with a deeper hue; a dapple-bay is a light bay spotted with bay of a deeper colour. (Icelandic, dæptill, a spot.)

Darbies (2 syl.). Handcuffs. This is derived from “Darby and Joan,” because originally two prisoners were linked together as Darby and Joan.

"Hark ye! Jim Clink will fetch you the darbies."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak.

"Johnny Darbies, policemen, is a perversion of the French gentadarmes, in conjunction with the above.

Darby and Joan. A loving, old-fashioned, virtuous couple. The names belong to a ballad written by Henry Woodfall, and the characters are those of John Darby, of Bartholomew Close, who died 1730, and his wife, “As chaste as a picture cut in alabaster. You might sooner move a Scythian rock than shoot fire into her bosom.” Woodfall served his apprenticeship to John Darby.

"Perhaps some day or other we may be Darby and Joan."—Lord Lytton.

Darbies (3 syl.). The Plymough Brethren are so called on the Continent from Mr. Darby, a barrister, who abandoned himself to the work, and was for years the “organ” of the sect.

Darids (or) Stateres Dariri. Celebrated Persian coins. So called from Darius. They bear on one side the head of the king, and on the other a chariot drawn by mules. Their value is about twenty-five shillings.

Dariolet, Darioletto (French). An intriguing, a confidant, a go-between, a pandier. Originally a darrieul meant a little sweetmeat or cake mixed with little balls of paste.

"Dariolet, employé comme un des nombreux archeveques de monseigneur, et qui d’habitude miais le mousqueton et des cartouches de damier."—Rohault de Villeclerc, Malle, Vendetta de Malle, de Guise, c’est la dariolet."—Tudor, vol. 1, p. 125.

Darius. A classic way of spelling Daravesh (king), a Persian title of royalty. Guishtoar or Kishtoar assumed the title of Daravesh on ascending the throne, and is the person generally called Darius the Great.

Darius. Seven princess of Persia agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; as the horse of Darius was the first to neigh, Darius was proclaimed king.

Darius, conquered by Alexander, was Darn, surnamed kuchek (the younger). When Alexander succeeded to the throne, Dara sent him for the tribute of golden eggs, but the Macedonian returned for answer, “The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Dara must seek them.” The Persian king then sent him a bat and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers, with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master’s hand. Lastly, Dara sent him a bitter melon, as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the Shah eat his own fruit.
Dark. To keep dark. To lie perdu; to lurk in concealment. (Ang.-Sax. deo.)

"We'll get away to some of the far-out stations . . . where we could keep in the dark."—Boldrewood: Ballad Under Arms, xvi.

Keep it in the dark. Keep it a dead secret; don't enlighten anyone about the matter.

Dark Ages. The era between the death of Charlemagne and the close of the Carolingian dynasty.

Dark Continent (The). Africa, the land of the dark race or darkies.

Dark Horse. A racing term for a horse of good pretensions, but of which nothing is positively known by the general public. Its merits are kept dark from better and book-makers.

"As last a Liberal candidate has entered the field at Trowdon. The Conservatives have kept their candidate back, as a dark horse."—News-paper paragraphs, January, 1900.

Darkest Hour is that before the Dawn (The). When Fortune's wheel is lowest, it must turn up again. When things have come to their worst, they must mend. In Latin, Post nubila, Phaonin.

Darkey. A negro.

Darley Arabians. A breed of English racers, from an Arab stallion introduced by Mr. Darley. This stallion was the sire of the Flying Childers, and great-grand sire of Eclipse.

Darcon, Darconne (French). The sobriquet given, at the present day, by workmen to shopkeepers and cobblers.

"Il c'est maître de tout, jusqu'à manier l'argent de la darconne."—Histoire de Guillaume, cocher.

Darconne. The confidant of Elisienne, mother of Amadis and wife of Perion des Gaules. (Amadis de Gaul.)

Dart. (See Araris.)

Darwinian Theory. Charles Darwin, grandson of the poet, published in 1859 a work entitled Origin of Species, to prove that the numerous species now existing on the earth sprang originally from one or at most a few original forms; and that the present diversity is due to special development and natural selection. Those plants and creatures which are best suited to the conditions of their existing survive and become fruitful; certain organs called into play by peculiar conditions of life grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength, till they become so much a part and parcel of their frames as to be transmitted to their offspring. The conditions of life being very diverse, cause a great diversity of organic development, and, of course, every such diversity which has become radical is the parent of a new species. (See Evolution.)

Dash, in printer's copy. One dash under a word in MS means that the part so dashed must be printed in italics; two dashes mean small capitals; three dashes, large capitals.

Cut a dash. (See Cur.)

Dash my Wig. Dash my Buttons. Dash is a euphemism for a common oath; and wig, buttons, etc., are relics of a common fashion at one time adopted in comedies and by "maschers" of swearing without using profane language.

Date. Not quite up to date. Said of books somewhat in arrears of the most recent information.

Daughter. Greek, thugater, contracted into tugator; Dutch, dochter; German, tochter; Persian, dochtar; Sanskrit, dâhiter; Saxon, dohter; etc.

Daughter of Penelus (The). The bay-tree is so called because it grows in greatest perfection on the banks of the river Penelus (3 syl.).

Daughter of the Horseleech. One very exigant; one for over sponging on another. (Prov. xxx. 15.)

"Such and many such like were the morning attendants of the Duke of Buckingham—all genuine descendants of the daughter of the horseleech, whose cry is, 'Give, give.'"—Sir W. Scott: Pencrul of the Peak, chap. xxiv.

Dauphin. The heir of the French crown under the Valois and Bourbon dynasties. Guy VIII., Count of Vienne, was the first so styled, because he wore a daphlin as his cognisance. The title descended in the family till 1349, when Humbert II., de la tour de Pisa, sold his seigneurie, called the Dauphine, to King Philippe VI. (de Valois), on condition that the heir of France assumed the title of le dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; and the last was the Duc d'Angoulême, son of Charles IX., who renounced the title in 1630.

Grand Dauphin. Louis, Duc de Bourgogne, eldest son of Louis XIV., for whose use was published the Latin classics entitled Ad Usam Delphinum, (1661-1711.)

Second or Little Dauphin. Louis, son of the Grand Dauphin. (1682-1712.)

Davenport. A kind of small writing-desk with drawers each side, named after the maker.
Davenport (The Brothers), from America. Two impostors, who professed that spirits would unite them when bound with cords, and even that spirits played all sorts of instruments in a dark cabinet. The imposition was exposed in 1865.

David, in Dryden's satire called Absalom and Achitophel, represents Charles II.; Absalom, his beautiful but rebellious son, represents the Duke of Monmouth; Achitophel, the traitor, is the Earl of Shaftesbury; Barzillai, the faithful old man who provided the king with sustenance, is the Duke of Ormond; Hushai, who defeated the counsel of Achitophel, was Hyde, Duke of Rochester; Zadok the priest was Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Shimei, who cursed the king in his flight, was Bethel, the lord mayor; etc. etc. (2 Sam. xvii.-xix.)

"Once more the godlike David was restored.
And willing nations knew their lawful lord."

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, part 1.

David (St.) or David, was son of Xanthus, Prince of Creticus, now called Cardiganshire; he was brought up a priest, became an ascetic in the Isle of Wight, preached to the Britons, confuted Pelagius, and was preferred to the see of Caerleon, since called St. David's. He died 544. (See Taffy.)

St. David's (Wales) was originally called Menevia (i.e. main ave, narrow water or frith). Here St. David received his early education, and when Dyvrig, Archbishop of Caerleon, resigned to him his see, St. David removed the archiepiscopal residence to Menevia, which was henceforth called by his name.

David and Jonathan. Inseparable friends. Similar examples of friendship were Pythias and Eros (γ.ε.) ; Damon and Pythias (δ.π.) ; etc.

"I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan, very pleasant last thou been to me. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women."

—2 Sam. i. 26.

Davideis. An epic poem in four books, describing the troubles of King David. (Abraham Cowley [1618-1667].)

There is another sacred poem so called, by Thomas Elwood [1712].

Davus. Davus sum, non Edipus (I am a plain, simple fellow, and no solver of riddles, like Edipus). The words are from Terence's Adria, i. 2, 23.

Non te credas Davum ludere. Don't imagine you are deluding Davus. "Do you see any white in my eye?" I am not such a fool as you think me to be.

Davy. I'll take my davy of it. I'll take my "affidavit" it is true.

Davy (Smeary). David Wilson. (See Sir Walter Scott, The Antiquary, chap. iii. and note.)

Davy Jones's Locker. He's gone to Davy Jones's locker, i.e. he is dead. Jones is a corruption of Jonah, the prophet, who was thrown into the sea. Locker, in woman's phrase, means any receptacle for private stores; and davy is a ghost or spirit among the West Indian negroes. So the whole phrase is, "He is gone to the place of safe keeping, where davy Jonah was sent to."

"This same Davy Jones, according to the mythology of sailors, is the land that precludes over all the evil spirits of the deep, and is seen in various shapes . . . warms the devoted wretch of death and woe.‖—Smollett: Peregrine Pickle, xii.

Davy's Sow. Drunk as Davy's sow. Grosse says: One David Lloyd, a Welshman, who kept an ale-house at Hereford, had a sow with six legs, which was an object of great curiosity. One day David's wife, having indulged too freely, lay down in the sty to sleep, and a company coming to see the sow, David led them to the sty, saying, as usual, "There is a sow for you! Did you ever see the like?" One of the visitors replied, "Well, it is the drunkenest sow I ever beheld." Whence the woman was ever after called "Davy's sow." (Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue.)

Dawson (Bully). A noted London sharper, who swaggered and led a most abandoned life about Blackfriars, in the reign of Charles II. (See Jemmy Dawson.)

"Bully Dawson: kicked by half the town, and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson."—Charles Lamb.

Day. When it begins. (1) With sun-set: The Jews in their "sacred year," and the Church—hence the eve of feast-days; the ancient Britons "non die'rem ne'merum, ut non, sed ne'merum com'pul'tum," says Tacitus—hence "so'night" and "fort'night;" the Athenians, Chinese, Mahometans, etc., Italians, Austrians, and Bohemians. (2) With sun-rise: The Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks. (3) With noon: The ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers. (4) With midnight: The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spanish, Portuguese, Americans, etc.

A day after the fair: Too late; the fair you came to see is over.

Day in, day out. All day long.

"Sewing as she did, day in, day out."—W. E. Wilkins: The Honest Soul.
Every dog has its day. (See under Dog.)

I have had my day. My prime of life is over; I have been a man of light and leading, but am now "out of the swim."

"Old Joe, sir... was a bit of a favourite... once, but he has had his day."—Dickens.

I have lost a day (Perdi di diem) was the exclamation of Titus, the Roman emperor, when on one occasion he could call to mind nothing done during the past day for the benefit of his subjects.

To-day a man, to-morrow a mouse. In French, "Aujourd'hui nous roi, demain rien." Fortune is so fickle that one day we may be at the top of the wheel, and the next day at the bottom.

Day of the Barricades. (See Barricades.)

Day of the Dupes, in French history, was November 11th, 1630, when Marie de Médicis and Gaston Duc d'Orleans exorted from Louis XIII. a promise that he would dismiss his minister, the Cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal went in all speed to Versailles, the king repeated, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever. Marie de Médicis and Gaston were the dupes who had to pay dearly for their short triumph.

Day-dream. A dream of the imagination when the eyes are awake.

Daylight, in drinking bumpers, means that the wine-glass is not full to the brim; between the wine and the rim of the wine-glass light may be seen. Toastmasters used to cry out, "Gentlemen, no daylights nor heel-taps"—the heel-tap being a little wine left at the bottom of the glass. The glass must be filled to the brim, and every drop of it must be drunk.

Daylights. The eyes, which let daylight in the sensorium.

To darken one's daylights. To give one such a blow on the eyes with the fist as to prevent seeing. (Pugilistic slang.)

Days set apart as Sabbaths.

Sunday by the Christians; Monday by the Greeks; Tuesday by the Persians; Wednesday by the Assyrians; Thursday by the Egyptians; Friday by the Turks; Saturday by the Jews.

Christians worship God on Sunday. Greek saints' days follow Monday. Tuesday Persians spend in prayer, Assyrians Wednesday reverse, Egyptians Thursday, Friday Turks. On Saturday no Hebrew works. E. C. B.

Daysman. An umpire, judge, or intercessor. The word is days-man (a man who sits on the dais); a sort of lit de justice. Hence Piers Ploughman—

"And at the day of doom
At the height Days sit."

Dayspring. The dawn: the commencement of the Messiah's reign.

"The dayspring from on high hath visited us."

Daystar (The). The morning star. Hence the emblem of hope or better prospects.

"Again over the vine-covered ruins of France. See the day-star of liberty rise."

Wilson: "Noctem (John, i. 4, vol. i., p. 201."

De Bonne Grâce (French). Willingly; with good grace.

De Die in Diem. From day to day continuously, till the business is completed.

"The Ministry have elected to go on de die in diem."—Newspaper paragraph, December, 1868.

De Facto. Actually, in reality: in opposition to de jure, lawfully or rightfully. Thus John was de facto king, but Arthur was so de jure.

De Haut en Bas. Superciliously.

"She used to treat him a little de haut en bas."—C. Baude.

* But Du haut en bas. From top to bottom.

De Jure (Latin). By right, rightfully, lawfully, according to the law of the land. Thus a legal axiom says: "De jure Judices, de Jure Jurevocavit, respondent" (Judges look to the law, juries to the facts).

De Lunatico Inquirendo (Latin). A writ issued to inquire into the state of a person's mind, whether it is sound or not. If not of sound mind, the person is called non compos, and is committed to proper guardians.

De Mortuis Nil Nisi Bonum. Of the dead speak kindly or not at all.

De Nihilo Nihil Fit (Latin). You cannot make anything out of nothing.

De Novo (Latin). Afresh; over again from the beginning.

De Profundis [Out of the depths]. The 130th Psalm is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It is sung by Roman Catholics when the dead are committed to the grave.

De Rigueur. Strictly speaking, quite comme il faut, in the height of fashion.
De Trop (French). Supererogatory, more than enough. Rien de trop let nothing be in excess. Preserve in all things the golden mean. Also "one too many," in the way; when a person's presence is not wished for, that person is de trop.

Dead. Dead as a door-nail. The door-nail is the plate or knob on which the knocker or hammer strikes. As this nail is knocked on the head several times a day, it cannot be supposed to have much life left in it.

"Come thou and the five men, and if I do not leave you all as dead as a door-nail, I pray God I may never eat grapes more."—Shakespeare: Henry VI. v. 10. (Jack Cade.)

"Falarick. What is the old king dead?"
Pistol. As nail in door.
Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v. 3.

Dead as a herring. (See HERRING.)

Dead. He is dead. "Gone to the world of light." "Joined the majority."
"The wind is dead against us," Directly opposed to our direction. Instead of making the ship more lively, its tendency is quite the contrary. It makes a "dead set" at our progress.

Dead. Let the dead bury the dead. Let bygones be bygones. Don't rake up old and dead grievances.

"Let me entreat you to let the dead bury the dead, to cast behind you every recollection of bygone ills, and to cherish, to love, to sustain one another through all the vicissitudes of human affairs in the times that are to come."—Gladstone: Home Rule Bill (February 15th, 1886).

Dead Drunk. So intoxicated as to be wholly powerless. *

"Policemen has finely observed that a man is not to be considered dead drunk till he lies on the floor and stretches out his arms and legs to prevent his going lower."—Harrison.

Dead-eye, in nautical phrase, is a block of wood with three holes through it, for the lanyards of rigging to reeve through, without sheaves, and with a groove round it for an iron strap. (Dundee: Seaman's Manual. p. 12.)

"The holes are eyes, but they are dead eyes.

Dead-flat (A), in ship architecture, one of the bents amidsthip. (Dundee.)

Dead Freight. That part of a cargo which does not belong to the freight. Dead freight is not counted in the freight, and when the cargo is delivered is not to be reckoned.

Dead Hand (A). A first-rate. One that would dead-beat. (See MONTMAIN.)

"First-rate work I was too; he was always a dead hand at splitting."—Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms.

Dead-Heads, in theatrical language, means those admitted by orders without payment. They count for nothing. In the United States persons who receive something of value for which the taxpayer has to pay.

"In nautical language, a log floating so low in the water that only a small part of it is visible.

Dead Heat. A race to be run again between two horses that have "died." A heat is that part of a race run without stopping. One, two, or more heats make a race. A dead heat is a heat which goes for nothing.

Dead Horse. Flogging a dead horse. Attempting to revive a question already settled. John Bright used the phrase in the House of Commons.
"Working for a dead horse." Working for wages already paid.

Dead Languages. Languages no longer spoken.

Dead Letter. A written document of no value; a law no longer acted upon. Also a letter which lies buried in the post-office because the address is incorrect, or the person addressed cannot be found.

Dead-Letter Office (The). A department in the post-office where unclaimed letters are kept. (See above.)

Dead Lift. I am at a dead lift. In a strait or difficulty where I greatly need help; a hopeless exigency. A dead lift is the lifting of a dead or inactive body, which must be done by sheer force.

Dead Lights. Strong wooden shutters to close the cabin windows of a ship; they deaden or kill the daylight.
To ship the dead lights. To draw the shutter over the cabin window; to keep out the sea when a gale is expected.

Dead Lock. A lock which has no spring catch. Metaphorically, a state of things so entangled that there seems to be no practical solution.

"Things are at a dead lock."—The Times.

Dead Men. Empty bottles. Down among the dead men let us be. Let me get so intoxicated as to slip from my chair, and lie under the table with the empty bottles. The expression is a witticism on the word spirits. Spirit means life, and also alcohol (the spirit of full bottles); when the spirit is out the man is dead, and when the bottle is empty its spirit is departed. Also, a loaf of bread snuggled into the basket for the private use of the person who carries the bread out is called a "dead man."

Dead Men's Shoes. Waiting for dead men's shoes. Looking out for legacies; looking to stand in the place of some moneymaker when he is dead and buried.

Dead Pan. (The) A poem founded on the tradition that at the crucifixion a cry swept across the ocean in the hearing of many, "Great Pan is Dead," and that at the same time the responses of the oracles ceased for ever. Elizabeth Barrett Browning has a poem so called (1844).

Dead Reckoning. A calculation of the ship's place without any observation of the heavenly bodies. A guess made by consulting the log, the time, the direction, the wind, and so on. Such a calculation may suffice for many practical purposes, but must not be fully relied on.

Dead Ropes. Those which are fixed or do not run on blocks; so called because they have no activity or life in them.

Dead Sea. So the Romans called the "Salt Sea." Josephus says that the vale of Siddim was changed into the Dead Sea at the destruction of Sodom (Antiq. I. 8, 3, etc.). The water is of a dull green colour. Few fish are found therein, but it is not true that birds which venture near its vapours fall down dead. The shores are almost barren, but hyenas and other wild beasts lurk there. Called the "Salt Sea" because of its saltiness. The percentage of salt in the ocean water is generally about three or four, but of the Salt Sea it is twenty-six or more.

Dead-Sea Fruit. Fair to the eye, but nauseous to the taste; full of promise, but without reality. (See Apples of Sodom.)

Dead Set. He made a dead set at her. A pointed or decided determination to bring matters to a crisis. The allusion is to a setter dog that has discovered game, and makes a dead set at it.

To be at a dead set is to be set fast, so as not to be able to move. The allusion is to machinery.

To make a dead set upon someone is to attack him resolutely, to set upon him; the allusion being to dogs, bulls, etc., set on each other to fight.

Dead Shares. In theatrical sharing companies three or more supernumerary shares are so called. The manager has one or more of these shares for his expenses; a star will have another; and sometimes a share, or part of a share, is given to an actor who has brought down the house, or made a hit.

Dead Water. The muddy-water closing in with the ship's stern, as she passes through the water. It shifts its place, but is like taking money from one pocket and putting it into another.

Dead Weight. The weight of something without life; a burden that does nothing towards easing its own weight; a person who encumbers us and renders no assistance. (See Dead Lift.)

Dead Wind (A). A wind directly opposed to a ship's course; a wind dead ahead.

Dead Wood, in shipbuilding. Blocks of timber laid on the ship's keel. This is no part of the ship, but it serves to make the keel more rigid.

Dead Works, in theology. Such works as do not earn salvation, or even assist in obtaining it. For such a purpose their value is nil. (Heb. ix. 14.)

Deaf.

Deaf as an adder. (See below, Deaf Adder.)

Deaf as a post. Quite deaf; or so inattentive as not to hear what is said. One might as well speak to a gate-post or log of wood.

Deaf as a white cat. It is said that white cats are deaf and stupid.

Now so deaf as those who won't hear. The French have the same locution: "Il n'y a de pire sourd que celui qui ne veut pas entendre."

Deaf Adder. "The deaf adder stoppeth her ears, and will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely" (Psalm liii. 4, 5). Captain Bruce says, "If a viper enters the house, the charmer is sent for, who entices the serpent, and puts it into a bag. I have seen poisonous vipers twist round the bodies of these prey in all directions, without having their fangs extracted." According to tradition, the asp stops its ears when the charmer utters his incantation, by applying one ear to the ground and twisting its tail into the other. In the United States the copperhead is so called.

Deal. A portion. "A tenth deal of flour." (Exodus xxix. 40.) (German, Deal-fish.

So called because of some fancied resemblance to a deal-board, from its length and thinness.

Dean (the Latin Decimus). The chief over ten prebends or canons.
The Dean (El Piovo's). Arlott, the Italian humorist. (1395-1483.)
Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick. (1667-1745.)

Deans (Effie), in Scott's Heart of Midlothian, is Helen Walker. She is abandoned by her lover, Georgie Robertson [Staunton], and condemned for child-murder.

Jeanie Deans. Half-sister of Effie Deans, who walks all the way to London to plead for her sister. She is a model of good sense, strong affection, and disinterested heroism. (See Walker.)

Dear. Oh, dear me! Regarded, but without evidence, as a corruption of the Italian O Dio mio!

Dear Bought and Far Brought or Dear bought and far fell. A gentle reproof for some extravagant purchase of luxury.

Dearest. Most hateful, as dearest foe. The word dear, meaning "beloved," is the Saxon der, (dear, rare); but dear, "hateful," is the Anglo-Saxon dervan (to hurt), Scotch dree (to annoy).

"Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven,
Or ever I had seen that day, Horatio."—Shakespeare. Hamlet. 1, 2.

Death, according to Milton, is twinkeeper with Sin, of Hell-gate.

"The other shade
(If there it might be called that shape had none
Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb,
Other substance might be called that shadow seemed)
The likeness of a king's crown had on."—Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 163.

Death. (See BLACK DEATH.)
Death stands, like Mercury, in every way. (See MERCURY.)

Till death do us part. (See DEPART.)
Angel of Death. (See ABOU-JAHIA, AZZAI.)

At death's door. On the point of death; very dangerously ill.

In at the death. Present when the fox was caught and killed.

Death and Doctor Hornbook.
Doctor Hornbook was John Wilson the apothecary, whom the poet met at the Torbolton Masonic Lodge. (Burns.)

Death from Strange Cause.
Aeschylus was killed by the fall of a tortoise on his bald head from the claws of an eagle in the air. (Valerius Maximus, ix. 12, and Pliny: History, vii. 7.)
Agathocles (4 syl.), tyrant of Sicily, was killed by a toothpick at the age of ninety-five.

Ane'creon was choked by a grapestone. (Pliny: History, vii. 7.)
Bassus (Quintus Lucianus) died from the prick of a needle in his left thumb.
Chaleus, the soothsayer, died of laughter at the thought of having outlived the predicted hour of his death.
Charles VIII., of France, conducting his Queen into a tennis-court, struck his head against the lintel, and it caused his death.
Fabius, the Roman pretor, was choked by a single goat-hair in the milk which he was drinking. (Pliny: History, vii. 7.)
Frederick Lewis, Prince of Wales, died from the blow of a cricket-ball.
Gallus (Cornelius), the pretor, and Titus Haterius, a knight, each died while kissing the hand of his wife.
Gabrielle (La belle), the mistress of Henri IV., died from eating an orange.
Tudach died of thirst in the harvest-field because (in observance of the rule of St. Patrick) he refused to drink a drop of anything.
Lepidus (Quintus Anullus), going out of his house, struck his great toe against the threshold and expired.
Louis VI. met with his death from a pig running under his horse and causing it to stumble.

Margarite died of laughter on seeing a monkey trying to pull on a pair of boots.
Oceun, the poet, in a starving condition, had a guinea given him, on which he bought a loaf of bread, and died while swallowing the first mouthful.
Pamphilus (Pecun' Babius), a man of preroritum rank, died while asking a boy what o'clock it was.
Phalieres (1 syl.) died of laughter at seeing an ass eating the figs provided for his own dessert. (Valerius Maximus.)
Planty (Phillipus) dropped down dead while in the act of paying a bill. (Bosberry the Elder.)
Quenelault, a Norman physician, of Montpellier, died from a slight wound made in his hand in extracting a splinter.
Death in the Pot

Scaevola (Appius) was choked to death, supping up the white of an under-boiled egg. (Pliny: History, vii. 33.)

Torquatus (Aulus Manlius), a gentleman of consular rank, died in the act of taking a cheesecake at dinner.

Vedae (Lucius Tuscius), the physician, died in the act of taking a draught of medicine.

William III. died from his horse stumbling over a mole-hill.

Zuccet, the great painter, died of laughter at sight of a hog which he had just depicted.

It will be observed that four of the list died of laughter. No doubt the reader will be able to add other examples.

Death in the Pot. During a death in Gilgal, there was made for the sons of the prophets a potage of wild herbs, some of which were poisonous. When the sons of the prophets tasted the potage, they cried out, "There is death in the pot." Then Elisha put into it some meal, and its poisonous qualities were counteracted. (2 Kings iv. 40.)

Death under Shield. Death in battle.

"Her imagination had been familiarised with wild and bloody events . . . . and had been trained up to consider an honourable 'death under shield' (as that in a field of battle was termed) a desirable termination to the life of a warrior."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 6.

Death-bell. A tinkling in the ears, supposed by the Scotch peasantry to announce the death of a friend.

"O lady, 'tis dark, an' I heard the death-bell, An' I scarce can see yer. But I must see."—J. Hogg: Mountain Bard.

Death-meal (A). A funeral banquet.

"Death-meals, as they were termed, were spread in honour of the deceased."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 7.

Death-watch. Any species of Anobium, a genus of wood-boring beetles that make a clicking sound, once supposed to presage death.

Death's Head. Bawds and procurers used to wear a ring bearing the impression of a death's head in the time of Queen Elizabeth. Allusions not uncommon in plays of the period.

"Tell some of my dears to buy thee a death's-head, and put it (h) upon thy middle finger. Your least considering bawds do so much."—Messager: Old Law, iv. 1.

Death's Head on a Mopstick. A thin, sickly person, a mere anatomy, is so called. When practical jokes were more common it was by no means unusual to mount on a mopstick a turnip with holes for eyes, and a candle's inside, to scare travellers at night time.

Deathsmen. An executioner; a person who kills another brutally but lawfully.

"Great Hector's deathsmen."

—Heywood: Iron Age.

Debatable Land. A tract of land between the Eak and Sark, claimed by both England and Scotland, and for a long time the subject of dispute. This tract of land was the hotbed of thieves and vagabonds.

Debon. One of the heroes who accompanied Brute to Britain. According to British fable, Devonshire is the county or share of Debon. (See Devonshire.)

Debonair [Le Débonnaire]. Louis I. of France, sometimes called in English The Meek, son and successor of Charlemagne; a man of courteous manners, cheerful temper, but effeminate and deficient in moral energy. (778, 814-840.)

Debris. The débris of an army. The remnants of a routed army. Débris means the fragments of a worn-down rock. It is a geological term (débrisier, to break down).

Debt of Nature. To pay the debt of Nature. To die. Life is a loan, not a gift, and the debt is paid off by death.

"The slender debt to Nature's quickly paid."

—Quintus: Emblema.

Decameron. A volume of tales related in ten days (Greek, deka, hēmeras), as the Decameron of Boccaccio, which contains one hundred tales related in ten days.

Decamp. He decamped in the middle of the night. Left without paying his debts. A military term from the Latin de-campus (from the field); French, décamper, to march away.

Decamiller. To be off, to decamp, to escape. A curious instance of argot. Camille is old French for chenille, a pupa, imagо, or chrysalis. These afterwards become winged insects and take their flight. So a visitor says in France, "It faut me sauver," or "It faut decamiller." I must be off.

December. (Latin, the tenth month.) So it was when the year began in March with the vernal equinox; but since January and February have been inserted before it, the term is quite incorrect.
Deer

Deceit. (2 syl.) means "to knock out." Several things being set before a person, he eliminates all but one, which he selects as his choice. A derided man is one who quickly eliminates every idea but the one he intends to adhere to.

Decimo. A man in decimo—i.e., a hobby-de-boy. Jonson uses the phrase in decimo-secto.

Deck. A pack of cards, or that part of the pack which is left after the hands have been dealt.

To sweep the deck. To clear off all the stakes. (See above.) To deck is to decorate or adorn. (Anglo-Saxon, decean; Dutch, dekken, to cover.)

"I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid.
And not have strewed thy grave."

Clear the decks—i.e., get out of the way; your room is better than your company; I am going to be busy. A sea term. Decks are cleared before action.

Decking Churches. Isaiah (lx. 13) says: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary." The "glory of Lebanon" is the cedar-tree. These are not the evergreens mainly used in church decorations. At Christmas the holly is chiefly used, though those mentioned by Isaiah abound.

Décolleté [da-coal-ta]. Nothing even décolleté should be uttered before ladies—i.e., bearing the least semblance to a double entendre. Décolleté is the French for a "dress cut low about the bosom."

Decoration Day. May 30th: set apart in the United States for decorating the graves of those who fell in the "War of the Union" (1861-5).

Decoy Duck. A bait or lure; a duck taught to allure others into a net, and employed for this purpose.

Decrepit. Unable to make a noise. It refers rather to the mute voice and silent footstep of old age than to its broken strength. (Latin, de-crepo.)

Decuman Gate. The gate where the 10th cohorts of the legions were posted. It was opposite the Praetorian gate, and farthest from the enemy. (Latin, decem, ten.)

Dedanian. Intricate; variegated. So called from De'dalos, who made the Cretan labyrinth.

Dedlock (Sir Leicester). An honourable and truthful gentleman, but of such fossilised ideas that no "tongue of man" could shake his prejudices. (Charles Dickens: Bleak House.)

Dec—i.e., D for a detective. Look sharp! the dees are about.

Dee (Dr. John). A man of vast knowledge, whose library, museum, and mathematical instruments were valued at £2,000. On one occasion the populace broke into his house and destroyed the greater part of his valuable collection, under the notion that Dee held intercourse with the devil. He ultimately died a pauper, at the advanced age of eighty-one, and was buried at Mortlake. He professed to be able to raise the dead, and had a magic mirror, afterwards in Horace Walpole's collection at Strawberry Hill (1527-1608).

Dee's spectacles or mirror, in which persons were told they could see their friends in distant lands and how they were occupied. It is a piece of solid pink-tinted glass about the size of an orange. It is now in the British Museum.

Dee Mills. If you had the rest of Dee Mills, you would spend it all. Dee Mills, in Cheshire, used to yield a very large annual rent. (Cheshire proverb.)

"There was a jolly miller
Lived on the river Dee.
He worked and sang from morn to night—
No lark so blithe as he;
And this the burden of his song
For ever used to be—
I care for nobody, no, not I.
If nobody cares for me!"
Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1732).

Deer. Supposed by poets to shed tears. The drops, however, which fall from their eyes are not tears, but an oily secretion from the so-called tear-pits.

"A poor sequestered stag...
Did come to languish... and the big round tears
Coursed one another down his innocent nose
In pitious chase."
Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 2.

Small deer. Any small animal; and used metaphorically for any collection of trifles or trifling matters.

"But mice and rats, and such small deer, Have been Tom's food for seven long year."
Shakespeare: Lear, iii. 4.
Deities

Deerlayer. The hero of a novel so called, by F. Cooper. He is the beau-ideal of a man without cultivation—honourable in sentiment, truthful, and brave as a lion; pure of heart, and without reproach in conduct. The character appears, under different names, in five novels—The Deerlayer, The Pathfinder, The Last of the Mohicans, The Pioneers, and The Prairie. (See Natty Bumppo.)

Deus (The). (See above Dea.)

Deev-Binder. Tamunras, King of Persis, who deserted the Deev king and the fierce Demrush, but was slain by Houndkonz, another powerful Deev.

Default. Judgment by default is when the defendant does not appear in court on the day appointed. The judge gives sentence in favour of the plaintiff, not because the plaintiff is right, but from the default of the defendant.

Defeat. "What though the field be lost? all is not lost." (Milton: Paradise Lost, i. line 105-6.)

"All is lost but honour" (Tout est perdu, madame, fors l'honneur) is what Francois I. is said to have written to his mother, after the Battle of Pavia in 1525.

Defeat. There is a somewhat strange connection between de-fact and de-feature. Defeat is the French de-fait, un-made or un-done; Latin, de-factus (defectus, our "defect"); and feature is the Norman failure, Latin factura, the make-up, frame, or form. Hence old writers have used the word "defeat" to mean disfigure or spoil the form.

"Defeat thy favour [face] with an unwary beard."—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Defender of the Faith. A title given by Pope Leo X. to Henry VIII. of England, in 1521, for a Latin treatise On the Seven Sacraments. Many previous kings, and even subjects, had been termed "defenders of the Catholic faith," "defenders of the Church," and so on, but no one had borne it as a title. The sovereign of Spain is entitled Catho- lic, and of France Most Christian.

"God bless the king! I mean the faith's defender!"—John Byron: Short-hand Writer

Richard II., in a writ to the sheriffs, uses these words: "Ecclesia ejus non defensor avnum," and Henry VII., in the Black Book, is called "Defender of the Faith," but the pope gave the title to Henry VIII., and from that time to this it has been perpetuated. (See Graceless Florin.)

De'faut (Madame). Marie Antoinette. So called because she was always demanding money of her ministers, and never had any. According to the Revolu- tionary song:

"La Boulangère a des écus, Qui ne lui content guère."

(See Baker.)

Degenerate (4 syl.). is to be worse than the parent stock. (Latin, de genus.)

Dei Gratia. By God's grace. Introduced into English charters in 1106; as much as to say, "Dei non hominum gratia," by divine right and not man's appointment. The archbishops of Canterbury from 676 to 1170 assumed the same style.

† From the time of Offa, King of Mercia (A.D. 780), we find occasionally the same or some similar assumption as, Dei dono, Christo donante, etc. The Archbishop of Canterbury is now divina providentia.

Dei Gratia omitted on a florin. (See Graceless Florin.)

Dei Judicium (Latin). The judgment of God; so the judgment by ordeals was called, because it was supposed that God would deal rightly with the appellants.

Dei'ania. Wife of Hercules, and the inadvertent cause of his death. Nessos told her that anyone to whom she gave a shirt steeped in his blood, would love her with undying love; she gave it to her husband, and it caused him such agony that he burnt himself to death on a funeral pile. Dei'ania killed herself for grief.

Deiphobus (4 syl.). One of the sons of Priam, and, next to Hector, the bravest and boldest of all the Trojans. On the death of his brother Paris, he married Helen; but Helen betrayed him to her first husband, Menelaos, who slew him. (Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid.)

Deities.

Della, of Pope's line, "Slender or poison dread from Della's rage," was Lady Deloraine, who married W. Windham of Carsham, and died 1744. The person said to have been poisoned was Miss Mackenzie. (Satires and Epistles, i. 81.)

Della is not better known to our yard-dog—i.e., the person is so intimate and well known that the yard-dog will not bark at his approach. It is from Virgil, who makes his shepherd Menalces-boat "That his sweetheart is as well known to his dog as Della the shepherdess." (Eclogues, iii. 67.)

Dellas. The sacred vessel made by Theseus (2 syl.) and sent annually from Athens to Delos. This annual festival lasted 30 days, during which no Athenian could be put to death, and as Socrates was condemned during this period his death was deferred till the return of the sacred vessel. The ship had been so often repaired that not a stick of the original vessel remained at the time, yet was it the identical ship. So the body changes from infancy to old age, and though no single particle remains constant, yet the man 6 feet high is identical with his infant body a span long. (Sometimes called Theoris.)

Delight is "to make light." Hence Shakespeare speaks of the disemodied soul as "the delighted spirit" . . . blown with restless violence round about the pendant world." (Measure for Measure, iii. 1.) So again he says of gifts, "the more delayed, delighted" (Cymbeline, v. 6), meaning the longer they are delayed the "lighter" or less valuable they are esteemed. Delighted, in the sense of "pleased," means light-hearted, with buoyant spirits.

The delight of mankind. So Titus, the Roman emperor, was entitled (40, 79-81).

Delirium. From the Latin libido (the ridge left by the plough), hence the verb de-lire'. to make an irregular ridge or balk in ploughing. Delirius is one whose mind is not properly tilled or cultivated, a person of irregular intellect; and delirium is the state of a person whose mental faculties are like a field full of balks or irregularities. (See Prevaporation.)

Della Crusca's or Della Crusca's School. So called from Crusca, the Florentine academy. The name is applied to a school of poetry started by some young Englishmen at Florence in the latter part of the eighteenth century. These silly, sentimental affections, which appeared in the World and the Oracle, created for a time quite a furor. The whole affair was mercilessly gibbetted in the Breviary and Mervial of Gifford. (Academia della Crusca literally means, the Academy of Chaff, and its object was to sift the chaff from the Italian language, or to purify it.)
Delmonico. The great American cuinier, of New York.

"The table service is of heavy silver, French cut glasses, and handsome china; and the meals are worthy of Delmonico."—The Oracle, August 26, 1884, p. 465.

Delos. A floating island ultimately made fast to the bottom of the sea by Poseidon (Neptune). Apollo having become possessor of it by exchange, made it his favourite retreat. It is one of the Cyclades.

Delphi or Delphoi. A town of Phocis, famous for a temple of Apollo and for an oracle celebrated in every age and country. So called from its twin peaks, which the Greeks called brothers (a-delphoi).

Delphic Classics. A set of Latin classics edited in France by thirty-nine scholars, under the superintendence of Montausier, Bossuet, and Huet, for the use of the son of Louis XIV., called the Grand Dauphin. Their chief value consists in their verbal indexes or concordances.

Delta. The island formed at the mouth of a river, which usually assumes a triangular form, like the Greek letter (Δ) called delta; as the delta of the Nile, the delta of the Danube, Rhine, Ganges, Indus, Niger, Mississippi, Po, and so on.

Deluge. After me the Deluge ["Après nous le déluge"]). When I am dead the deluge may come for aught I care. Generally ascribed to Prince Metternich, but the Prince borrowed it from Mme. Pompadour, who laughed off all the reminiscences of ministers at her extravagance by saying, "Après nous le déluge" (Ruín, if you like, when we are dead and gone).

Deluges (3 syl.). The chief, besides that recorded in the Bible, are the following:—The deluge of Fohi, the Chinese; the Satyavrata, of the Indians; the Khins/Jrus, of the Assyrians; the Mexican deluge; and the Greek deluges of Deucalion and Ogips.

Demers. The most celebrated painting of Noah's Flood is by Poussin, in Paris; and that by Raphael is in the Vatican (Rome).

Demerits has reversed its original meaning (Latin, demerere, to merit, to deserve). Hence Plautus, Demeritas dura laudas (to accord due praise): Ovid, Nam tu cales demereris; Livy, demereri beneficio civitatem. The de- is intensive, as in "de-mand," "de-scribe," "de-claim," etc.; not the pri-

Democritos. The laughing philosopher of Abdur. He should rather be termed the deriding philosopher, because he derided or laughed at people's folly or vanity. It is said that he put out his eyes that he might think more deeply.

"Democritus, dear Loll, revisit earth.
And with our follies grant thy lightened mirth."—Prior.

Demodocos. A minstrel who, according to Homer, sang the amours of Mars and Venus in the court of Alcinous while Ulysses was a guest there.

Demogorgon. A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. Hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" (Paradise Lost, ii. 955). This tyrant king of the elves and fays lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. (See Poutr.)

"Must I call your master to my aid, At whose dread name the trembling furies quake, Hell stands abashed, and earth's foundations shake?"—Rowe: Lucan's Pharsalia, 1. 3.

"When the morn arises none are found, For cruel Demogorgon walks his round, And if he finds a sally in light, He draws the wretch before, and lashes into sight."—Dryden: The Flower and the Leaf, 492-5.

Demon of Matrimonial Unhappiness. Asmodeus, who slew the seven husbands of Sara. (Tobit.) (See Asmodaeus.)

Prince of Demons. Asmodeus. (Talmud.)

Demus (King). The electorate; the proctoriat. Not the mob, but those who choose and elect our senators, and are therefore the virtual rulers of the nation.

Demosthenes' Lantern. A choral monument erected by Lyric rates in Athens, originally surmounted by the tripod won by Lysicrates. A "tripod" was awarded to everyone in Athens who produced the best drama or choral piece of his tribe. The street in which Demosthenes' Lantern stood was full of these tripods.

Demurrage. An allowance made to the master or owners of a ship by the freighters for detaining her in port longer than the time agreed upon. (Latin, de-morari, to delay.)

"The extra days beyond the last days . . . are called days of demurrage."—Kent: Commentaries, vol. iii. part v. lecture xlv. p. 159.

Demy. A size of paper between royal and crown. Its size is 22½ in. × 17¼ in. It is from the French word demi (half), and means demi-royal (a small royal), royal being 25 in. × 20 in. The old watermark is a fleur-de-lis.

A Demy' of Magdalen College, Oxford, is a "superior" sort of scholar, half a Fellow.

Deo Gratias. A Roman silver coin, equal in value to ten ases (deni-ases). The word was used in France and England for the inferior coins, whether silver or copper, and for ready money generally. Now d (denarius) stands for money less than a shilling, as ½ d.

"The denarius . . . shown to our Lord . . . was the tribute-money payable by the Jews to the Roman emperor, and must not be confounded with the tribute paid to the Temple."—F. H. Madden: Jewish Coinage, chap. x. p. 247.

Denarius Dei [God's penny]. An earnest of a bargain, which was given to the church or poor.

Denarius St. Peter [Peter's pence]. One penny from each family, given to the Pope.

Denarius tertia comitatus. One-third of the pence of the county, which was paid to the earl. The other two-thirds belonged to the Crown. (See D.)

Denizen. A native citizen—i.e. an alien who has been naturalised by letters patent. (Old French denzein; Latin de-intus, from within.)

"A denizen is a kind of middle state, between an alien and a natural-born subject, and partakes of both."—Blackstone: Commentaries, book i. chap. x. p. 374.

Dennis (John), called the "best abused man in England." Swift and Pope both satirised him. He is called Zollus.

Dénouement (3 syl.). The untying of a plot; the winding-up of a novel or play. (French dénouer, to untie.)

Denys (St.), according to tradition, carried his head, after martyrdom, for six miles, and then deliberately laid it down on the spot where stands the present cathedral bearing his name. This absurd tale took its rise from an ancient painting, in which the artist, to represent the martyrdom of the bishop, drew a headless body; but, in order that the trunk might be recognised, placed the head in front, between the martyr's hands.

Sir Denys Brand, in Crabbe's Borough, is a country magnate who aeps humility. He rides on a sorry brown pony "not worth 5l.," but mounts his lackey on a racehorse, "twice victor for a plate." Sir Denys Brand is the type of a character by no means uncommon.

Deo Gratias (Latin). Thanks to God.
Deo Juvante (Latin). With God's help.

Deo, non Fortunâ (Latin). From God, not from mere luck; [I attribute it] to God and not to blind chance.

Deo Volente, contracted into D. V. (Latin). God being willing; by God's will.

Deodand means something "given to God" (deo-dandum). This was the case when a man met with his death through injuries inflicted by some chattel, as by the fall of a ladder, the toss of a bull, or the kick of a horse. In such cases the cause of death was said, and the proceeds given to the Church. The custom was based on the doctrine of purgatory. As the person was sent to his account without the sacrament of extreme unction, the money thus raised served to pay for masses for his repose. Deodands were abolished September 1st, 1846.

Depart. To part thoroughly; to separate effectually. The marriage service in the ancient prayer-books had "till death us depart," or "till alimony or death us depart," a sentence which has been corrupted into "till death us do part."

"Before they settle hands and hearts, Till alimony or death depart."

Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3.

Department. France is divided into departments, as Great Britain and Ireland are divided into counties or shires. From 1788 it was divided into governments, of which thirty-two were grand and eight petit. In 1790, by a decree of the Constituent Assembly, it was mapped out de novo into eighty-three departments. In 1804 the number of departments was increased to 197, and in 1812 to 130. In 1815 the territory was reduced to eighty-six departments, and continued so till 1860, when Savoy and Nice were added. The present number is eighty-seven.

Dependence. An existing quarrel.
(A term used among swordsmen.)

"Let us pause... until I give you my opinion on this dependence... for if we coldly examine the state of our dependence, we may the better apprehend whether the masters three have done one of us to expiate the same with our blood."

Depingses (2 syl.) or Deepingis. A breadth of netting to be sewed on a hobby (net) to make it sufficiently large. Sometimes the breadth is called a depth, and the act of sewing one depth on another is called deepening the net. In 1674 the Dutch settlers at Yarmouth were required "to provide themselves with twine and deepings in foreign places."

Deputations. The year of deputations. The eighth of the Hedj'rah, after Mahomet's victory over the Arabs near Taif, when deputations from all parts flocked to do him homage.

Depute (2 syl.). To depute means to prune or cut off a part; deputation is the part cut off. A deputation is a slip cut off to represent the whole. (Latin, deputo.)

Derbend [iron]. A town on the Caspian, commanding the coast road. D'Herbelot says: "Les Turcs appellent cette ville 'Demir Capi' (porte de fer); ce sont les Caspiens Porte des Anciens."

"Beyond the Caspian's iron gate."

Derryl. [Source: Fire Worshippers.]

Derby Stakes. Started by Edward Smith Stanley, the twelfth Earl of Derby, in 1780, the year after his establishment of the Oaks stakes (q.v.). The Derby Day is the day when the Derby stakes are run for; it is the second Wednesday of the great Epsom Spring Meeting, in May.

The Derby Day.

* The Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger are called "The Classic Races." The Oaks is the classic race for fillies only, three years' old (£1,000); the Derby (Darby) for colts and fillies three years' old; the St. Leger for colts and fillies, those which have run in the Oaks or Derby being eligible.

Derive (2 syl.) means "back to its channel or source" (Latin, de vivro). The Latin vivus (a river) does not mean the stream or current, but the source whence it flows, or the channel through which it runs. As Ulpian says, "Fons sive locus per longitudinalin depressus, quo aqua decurret."

Dernier Reftort (French). A last resource.

Derrick. A hangman; a temporary crane to remove goods from the hold of a vessel. So called from Derrick, the Tyburn hangman early in the seventeenth century, who for more than a hundred years gave his name to gibbets. (See HANGMAN.)

"He rides upon the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyburne the inn at which he will light."—Bellman of London, 1610.

Derwentwater. Lord Derwentwater's lights. The Aurora borealis; so called from James, Earl of Derwentwater, beheaded for rebellion February 24th, 1716. It is said that the northern lights were unusually brilliant on that night.

Desdemona (in Shakespeare's Othello). Daughter of Brabantio. She fell in love with Othello, and eloped with him. Iago, acting on the jealous temper of the Moor, made him believe that his wife had an intrigue with Cassio, and in confirmation of this statement told the Moor that she had given Cassio a pocket-handkerchief, the fact being that Iago's wife, to gratify her husband, had purloined it. Othello asked his bride for it, but she was unable to find it; whereupon the Moor murdered her and then stabbed himself.

"She... was ready to listen and weep, like Desdemona at the stories of his dangers and campaigns."—Thackeray.

Desmas. (See Diseases.)

Despair. The Giant Despair, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, lived in "Doubting Castle."

Dessert means simply the cloth removed (French, desservir, to clear the cloth); and dessert is that which comes after the cloth is removed.

Destruction. Prince of Destruction, Tamerlane or Timour the Tartar (1335, 1360-1405.)

Destructives (The), as a political term, arose in 1832.

"The Times newspaper, under the most effective advocate of the [Reform] bill, has been obliged to designate those whom it formerly glorified as Radicals, by the more appropriate and emphatic title of the Destructives."—Quarterly Review (Dec., 1832, p. 445.)

Desultory. Those who rode two or more horses in the circus of Rome, and used to leap from one to the other, were called desultorias; hence desultor came in Latin to mean one inconstant, or who went from one thing to another; and desultory means after the manner of a desultor.

Detest (Latin, de-testor.)

Deucalion, after the Deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother (i.e. the stones of mother earth). Those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women. For the interchange between λâs (people), and λâs (a stone), see Pindar: Olympic Games, ix. 66.

Deucalion's flood. According to Greek mythology, Deucalion was a king of Thessaly, in whose reign the whole world was covered with a deluge in consequence of the great impiety of man. (See DELUGE.)

Dene. The Kelts called wood-demons den. (Compare the Latin deus.)

"In the popular mythology both of the Kelts and Teutons there were certain hairy wood-demons, called by the former den, and by the latter wodan (German), who are common names of 'Dence' and 'Old scratch' are plainly derived from these."—Lowell: Among my Books (Witchcraft), p. 106.

It played the dence with me. It made me very ill; it disagreed with me; it almost ruined me.

The dence is in you. You are a very demon.

Dence take you. Get away! you annoy me.

What does the dence mean? What in the world is amiss?

Dence-ace. A throw of two dice, one showing one spot and the other showing two spots.

Dence of Cards (The). The two (French, deux). The three is called "Tray" (French, trois; Latin, trei).

"A gentleman being punched by a butcher's tray, exclaimed, 'Dence take the tray.' 'Well,' said the boy, 'I don't know how the dence is to take the tray.' "—Jest Book.

Deus (2 syl.). Deus ex machina. The intervention of a god, or some unlikely event, in order to extricate from difficulties in which a clumsy author has involved himself; any forced incident, such as the arrival of a rich uncle from the Indies to help a young couple in their pecuniary embarrassments. Literally, it means "a god (let down upon the stage or flying in the air) by machinery."

Devon's Vale. The valley of the river Deo or Deva, in Cheshire, celebrated for its pastures and dairy produce.

"He chose a farm in Devon's vale,
Where his long alps preyed upon the main."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, cant. ii.

Development. (See EVOLUTION.)

Devil. Represented with a cloven foot, because by the Rabbinical writers he is called seirissin (a goat). As the goat is a type of uncleanness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem.

Devil among the Tailors (The). On Dowton's benefit at the Haymarket, some 7,000 journeymen tailors congregated in and around the theatre to prevent a burlesque called The Tailors: a Tragedy for Warm Weather, which they considered insulting to the trade. Fairburn's edition of this play is headed The Devil among the Tailors, and contains an account of this fracas. (See also Biographia Dramatica, article Tailors.) There is a Scotch reel so called.

Devil and Bag O'Nails (The). The public-house by Buckingham Gate was so called, but the sign was The Blackamoor's Head and the Woolpack. (Remarkable Trials, ii. p. 14; 1765.)

Devil and Dr. Faustus (The). Faust was the first printer of Bibles, and issued a large number in imitation of those sold as manuscripts. These he passed off in Paris as genuine, and sold for sixty crowns apiece, the usual price being five hundred crowns. The uniformity of the books, their rapid supply, and their unusual cheapness excited astonishment. Information was laid against him for magic, and, in searching his lodgings, the brilliant red ink with which his copies were adorned was declared to be his blood. He was charged with dealings with the Devil, and condemned to be burnt alive. To save himself, he revealed his secret to the Paris Parlement, and his invention became the admiration of the world. N.B.—This tradition is not to be accepted as history.

Devil and his Dam (The). Either the Devil and his mother, or the Devil and his wife. Numerous quotations may be adduced in support of either of these interpretations. Shakespeare uses the phrase six times, and in King John (ii. 1) dam evidently means mother; thus Constance says that her son Arthur is as like his father as the Devil is like his dam (mother); and in Titus Andronicus Tumora is called the "dam" of a black child. We also read of the Devil's daughter and the Devil's son.

In many mythologies the Devil is supposed to be an animal: Thus in Cazotte's Diable Amoureux he is a camel; the Irish and others call him a black cat; the Jews speak of him as a dragon (which idea is carried out in our George and the Dragon); the Santons of Cull him a species of fox; others say he is a goat; and Dante associates him with dragons, swine, and dogs. In all which cases dam for mother is not inapposite.

On the other hand, dam for leman or wife has good support. We are told that Lilith was the wife of Adam, but was such a vixen that Adam could not live with her, and she became the Devil's dam. We also read that Belphégor "came to earth to seek him out a dam."

As women when they go wrong are for the most part worse than the other sex, the phrase at the head of this article means the Devil and something worse.

Devil and the Deep Sea (Between the). Between Scylla and Charybdis; between two evils, each equally hazardous. The allusion seems to be to the herd of swine and the devils called Legion.

"In the matter of passing from one part of the vessel to another when she was rolling, we were between the devil and the deep sea."—Nineteenth Century, April, 1881, p. 661.

Devil and Tom Walker (The). An American proverb, used as a caution to usurers. Tom Walker was a poor, miserly man, born at Massachusetts in 1727, and it is said that he sold himself to the Devil for wealth. Be this as it may, Tom suddenly became very rich, and opened a counting-house at Boston during the money panic which prevailed in the time of Governor Belcher. By usury he grew richer and richer; but one day, as he was foreclosing a mortgage with a poor land-jobber, a black man on a black horse knocked at the office door. Tom went to open it, and was never seen again. Of course the good people of Boston searched his office, but all his coffers were found empty; and during the night his house caught fire and was burnt to the ground. (Washington Irving: Tales of a Traveller.)

Devil catch the Hindmost (The). In Scotland (?) Salamanca it is said when a class of students have made a certain progress in their mystery studies, they are obliged to run through a subterranean hall, and the last man is seized by the devil, and becomes his imp.

Devil in Dublin City (The). The Scandinavian form of Dublin was Diveltp[a], and the Latin Dublinium. (See Notes and Queries, April 9th, 1881, p. 290, for another explanation.)

"Is just as true's the devil's in hell or Dublin city."

Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.

Devil looking Over Lincoln (The). Sir W. Scott in his Kenilworth has, "Like the Devil looking over Lincoln." A correspondent of Notes and Queries, September 10th, 1892, says—

"The famous devil that used to overlook Lincoln College, in Oxford, was taken down (Wednesday, 24th December 1851). He had been there two years since (previously) lost his head in a storm."—Gentleman's Magazine, 1881, p. 622.

As we have other similar phrases, as "The devil looking over Durham."
Devil loves Holy Water (As the). That is, not at all. The Roman Catholics teach that holy water drives away the Devil. The Latin proverb is, "Sicut sus amaricinum amat" (as swine love marjoram), Lucretius, vi. 974, says "amaricinum fugit sus."

Devil-may-care (4). A reckless fellow.

Devil must be Striking (Th.) (German). Said when it thunders. The old Norse Doner means Thor, equal to Jupiter, the god of thunder, and donner is the German for thunder or Devil, as may be seen in the expression, "The runaway goose is gone to the Devil" (Donner).

Devil on the Neck (4). An instrument of torture used by persecuting papists. It was an iron winch which forced a man's neck and legs together.

Devil rides on a Fiddlestick (Th.). Much ado about nothing. Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare, and others, use the phrase. "Fiddlesticks!" as an exclamation, means rubbish! nonsense! When the prince and his merry companions are at the Boar's Head, first Bardolph rushes in to warn them that the sheriff's officers are at hand, and anon enters the hostess to put her guests on their guard. But the prince says, "Here's a devil of a row to make about a trifle" (or "The devil rides on a fiddlestick") (1 Henry ii., ii. 2), and hiding some of his companions, he stoutly faces the sheriff's officers and browbeats them.

Devil Sick would be a Monk (Th.). [Dormen languobat, manouvus bona roe debat; Sed easa contrafut, manum et atra latat.] "When the Devil was sick, the devil a monk would be: When the Devil got well, the devil a monk was he."

Said of those persons who in times of sickness or danger make pious resolutions, but forget them when danger is past and health recovered.

Devil to Pay and no Pitch Hot (Th.). The "devil" is a seam between the garboard-strake and the keel, and to "pay" is to cover with pitch. In former times, when vessels were often careened for repairs, it was difficult to call and pay this seam before the tide turned. Hence the location, the ship is careened, the devil is exposed, but there is no pitch hot ready, and the tide will turn before the work can be done. (French, payer, from paix, paîre, pitch.)

Devil to Pay is the name of a farce by Jobson and Nelly.

Here's the very devil to pay. Is used in quite another sense, meaning: Here's a pretty kettle of fish. I'm in a pretty mess; this is confusion worse confused.

Proverbial Phrases.

Cheating the devil. Mining an oath; doing evil for gain, and giving part of the profits to the Church, etc. It is by no means unusual in monkish traditions. Thus the "Devil's Bridge" is a single arch over a cataract. It is said that his Satanic Majesty had knocked down several bridges, but promised the abbot, Giraldus of Eusiedel, to let this one stand, provided the abbot would sign to him the first living thing that crossed it. When the bridge was finished, the abbot threw across it a loaf of bread, which a hungry dog ran after, and "the rocks re-echoed with peals of laughter to see the Devil thus defeated." (Longfellow: Golden Legend, v.)

The bridge referred to by Longfellow is that over the Fall of the Reuss, in the canton of the Uri, Switzerland.

Rabelais says that a farmer once bargained with the Devil for each to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The sanny farmer sowed carrots and turnips when it was his turn to have the under-soil share, and wheat and barley the year following. (Pan triguel, book iv. chap. xvi.)

Give the devil his due. Give even a bad man or one hated like the devil the credit he deserves.

Gone to the devil. To ruin. The Devil and St. Dunstan was the sign of a public house, No. 2, Fleet Street, at one time much frequented by lawyers.

"Into the Devil Tavern three hooted trumpers strode."

Pull devil, pull baker. Lie, cheat, and wrangle away, for one is as bad as the other. (In this proverb baker is not a proper name, but the trade.)

"Like Punch and the Devil pugning about the Baker at the Bar!" -Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. xxxiv.

Talk of the devil and he's sure to come. Said of a person who has been the subject of conversation, and who unexpectedly makes his appearance. An older proverb still is, "Talk of the Dule and he'll put out his horns;" but the modern euphemism is, "Talk of an angel and you'll see its wings." If "from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh," their hearts must be full of the evil one who talk about him, Devil

so called for his infamous cruelties. (1215-1259.)

"Pierce Eselin, that most inhuman lord,
Who shall be deemed by men the child of hell."

Boce: Orlando Furioso, ill. 82.

The White Devil of Wallachia. George Castriota was so called by the Turks. (1404-1467.)

Devil's Advocate (The). In the Catholic Church when a name is suggested for canonisation, some person is appointed to oppose the proposition, and is expected to give reasons why it should not take place. This person is technically called Advocatus Diaboli. Having said his say, the conclave decides the question.

Devil's Apple. The mandrake.

Devil's Arrows (Yorkshire). Three remarkable "Druid" stones near Boroughbridge, like Harold's Stones, and probably marking some boundary.

Devil's Bird (The). The yellow bunting; is so called from its note, devil.

Devil's Bones. Dice, which are made of bones and lead to ruin.

Devil's Books. Playing cards. A Presbyterian phrase, used in reproof of the term King's Books, applied to a pack of cards, from the French livre des quatre rois (the book of the four kings). Also called the Devil's Bible.

Devil's Cabinet (The). Belphego, the Devil's ambassador in France; Hugn, in Italy; Belin, in Turkey; Tharung, in Spain; and Martinet, in Switzerland. His grand almoner is Dagon; chief of the eunuchs is Succor Beno; banker is Asmodeus; theatrical manager is Kobal; master of ceremonies, Verdelet; court fool is Nybs. (Victor Hugo: Thelers of the Seat.)

Devil's Candle. So the Arabs call the mandrake, from its shining appearance at night. (Richardson.)

"Those hellish fires that light
The mandrake's chamber leaves at night."

Devil's Current (The). Part of the current of the Bosporus is so called, from its great rapidity.

Devil's Daughter's Portion (The). The saying is

"Deal, Dover, and Harwich,
The devil gave his daughter in marriage," because of the scandalous impositions practised in these seaports on sailors and occasional visitors. (Grose: Classical Dictionary, etc.)
Devil's Den. A cromlech in a valley, near Marlborough. It now consists of two large uprights and an impost. The third upright has fallen. Some of the farm labourers, a few years ago, fastened a team of horses to the impost, and tried, but without effect, to drag it down.

Devil's Dust. Old rags torn up by a machine called the "devil," and made into shoddy by gum and pressure. Mr. Ferrand brought the subject before Parliament, March 4th, 1842. It is so called from the dishonesty and falsehood which it covers. (Latimer's Sermons.)

Devil's Dyke (Th). A ravine in the South Downs, Brighton. The legend is, that St. Cuthman, walking on the downs, plumed himself on having Christianised the surrounding country, and having built a nunnery where the dyke-house now stands. Presently the Devil appears and tells him all his labour is vain, for he would swamp the whole country before morning. St. Cuthman went to the nunnery and told the abbess to keep the sisters in prayer till after midnight, and then illuminate the windows. The Devil came at sunet with mattock and spade, and began cutting a dyke into the sea, but was seized with rheumatic pains all over the body. He flung down his mattock and spade, and the cocks, mistaking the illuminated windows for sunrise, began to crow; whereupon the Devil fled in alarm, leaving his work not half done.

Devil's Four-Poster (Th). A hand at whist with four clubs. It is said that such a hand is never a winning one.

Devil's Frying-pan (Th). A Cornish tin-mine worked by the Romans.

Devil's Luck (Th). Astounding good luck. Persons always lucky were thought at one time to have compounded with the Devil.

"You won't have to pay his annuity very long; you have the Devil's luck in large, always," Dickens.

Devil's Mass (Th). Swearing at everybody and everywhere.

"When a lad eats as much as the sun, he says the devil's mass...an 'unseemly' vesture unbecoming to the hour-copht hir." Soldiers' Verse, p. 64.

Devil's Noshirls (Th). Two vast caverns separated by a huge pillar of natural rock in the mainland of the Zetland Islands. (See The Pirate, chap. xxii.)

Devil's Own. (Connacht Boys.) The 88th. Foot. So called by General Picton from their bravery in the Peninsula War, 1809-1814.

Applied also to the Inns of Court Volunteers, the members of which are lawyers.

Devil's Paternoster (To say the). To grumble; to rail at providence.

Devil's Snuff-box (Th). A puff-ball; a fungus full of dust; one of the genus Lycoperdon.

Devil's Tattoo (Th). Tapping on the table with one's finger a wearisome number of times; tapping on the floor with one's foot in a similar manner; repeating any sound with wearisome pertinacity, giving those who hear the "blue devils" or the "fidgets."

Devil's Throat (Th). Cromer Bay. So called from its danger to navigation.

Devils (in Dante's Divine Comedy):

Alberico. (The alurer.)
Barbaricam. (The malicious.)
Caligornia. (The grace-colourer.)
Crepazza. (The earlier.)
Cristo Romanos. (The tanned ear.)
Draconigazza. (The fell dragon.)
Furuforllos. (The scadalmotter.)
Graficane. (The dragon.)
Libicoce. (The ill-tempered.)
Rubicante. (The red with rage.)
Scarovitone. (The harmless.)
The Blue Devils. The fidgets or magrins.

Devonshire, according to English mythology, is a corruption of Deboun's-share. This Debion was one of the heroes who came with Brute from Troy. One of the giants that he slew in the south coasts of England was Coulin, whom he chased to a vast pit eight leagues across. The monster trying to leap this pit, fell backwards, and lost his life in the chasm. When Brutus allotted out the island, this portion became Deboun's-share.

"And eke that ample pit, yet far renowned
For the large leap which Deiron did compass
Coulin to make, being eight fathoms of ground.
Into the which returning back he fell
In medio of those great conquests by them got,
Coulins had that pit since almost went..."

Speeman: Exile Queen, book in cantos xii. 14, 15.

Devonshire Foot. 1. Jones, a journeyman wool-comber, who lived at the close of the 18th century. Edward Capen, called "The rural Postman of Bideford," born 1619, and John Gay, author of the Beggar's Opera, etc. (1688-1732), of Barnstaple (Devonshire).

Dew-beaters. The feet; shoes to resist the wet.

"Hold out your dew-beaters till I take off the drench (iron shoes or fetters)."—Perioli of the Peak.

Dew-drink. A draught before breakfast. In harvest the men are allowed, in some counties, a drink of beer before they begin work.

Dexterity means right-handed skill (Latin, dexter, the right hand). "Awkward" (q.v.) means left-handed: gauche is the French, and sinister the Latin for the left hand. Certainly the German left-handed marriages are sinister ones.

Dgellahs'ân. The Persian era. Ogella Eddin, son of Togrug Beg, appointed eight astronomers to reform the calendar. The era began A.D. 1075, and is followed to this day.

Dhul'dul. (See Horse.)

Diable (Le), Olivier Lescal, the tool of Louis XI., and once the king's barber. So called because he was as much feared as his Satanic Majesty, and even more disliked. (Hang'd 1484.)

Robert le Diable. Meyerbeer's grand opera. (See ROBERT.)

D'adem meant, originally, a fillet wound round the head. The diadem of Bacchus was a broad band, which might be unfolded so as to make a veil. Hieronymus, king of Syracuse (n.c. 216-213), wore a diadem. Constantine the Great (306-337) was the first of the Roman emperors who wore a diadem. After his time it was set with rows of pearls and precious stones. (Greek, dia-deo, to bind entirely.)

Dialectics. Metaphysics: the art of disputation; that strictly logical discussion which leads to reliable results. The product or result is ideas, which, being classified, produce knowledge; but all knowledge being of the divine types, must conduct more or less to practical results and good morals. (Greek, dia-lego, to speak thoroughly.)

Kant used the word to signify the theory of fallacies, and Hegel for that concept which of necessity develops its opposite.

The following questions from John of Salisbury are fair specimens of the Middle-age subjects of discussion:—

1. When a person buys a whole cloak, does the cowl belong to his purchase?
2. When a dog is driven to market with a rope round its neck, does the man or the rope take him?

Diamond. A corruption of adamant. So called because the diamond, which cuts other substances, can be cut or polished with no substance but itself. (Greek, a damas, what cannot be subdued. Latin, adamas, gen. adaman [_tis_]; French, diamant.)

Diamond (3 syll.). Son of Ag'sp, a fairy. He was very strong, and fought either on foot or horse with a battle-axe. He was slain in single combat by Cam-halo. (See TRIANGLE.) (Spenser: Faerie Queen, book IV.)

A diamond of the first water. A man of the highest merit. The colour or lustre of a pearl or diamond is called its "water." One of the "first water" is one of the best colour and most brilliant lustre. We may say also, "A man of the first water."

A rough diamond. An uncultivated genius; a person of excellent parts, but without society manners.

"As for Warrington, that rough diamond had not had the polish of a dancing-master, and he did not know how to walk."—Thackeray.

Diamond cut diamond. Cunning outwitting cunning; a hard bargain over-reached. A diamond is so hard that it can only be ground by diamond dust, or by rubbing one against another.

Diamond (Newton's favourite little dog). One winter's morning, while attending early service in Trinity College, Newton inadvertently left Diamond shut up in his room. On returning from chapel he found that the little fellow had upset a candle on his desk, by which several papers containing minutes of many years' experiments, were destroyed. On perceiving this irreparable loss, he exclaimed, "Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!" (Diffusion of Useful Knowledge: Life of Newton, p. 25, col. 2.)

- Huygens, ibid., referring to this accident says: "Newtoni in lucubrationibus ejusdem amissae animi opinionis, saepe mutam mutuam asperasse, et dolorem satisfacere invenisset laboratorium chemicum et scripta quaedam annamat."
Diaper

Diaper. A sort of cloth said to be corrupted from Ypros (where it is manufactured), on analogy with calico from Calicut, nainsook from Nainkin, worsted from Worsted, in Norfolk, and other similar words. But the French diapé, variegated (connected with Lat.
Dido

A native-born inhabitant of Liverpool, as Tim Bobbin is a native of Lancashire.

Dictator of Letters. François Marie Arouet de Voltaire, called the Great Tun. (1694-1778.)

Didactic Poetry is poetry that teaches some moral lesson, as Pope’s Essay on Man. (Greek, didasko, I teach.)

Diddle (D). To cheat in a small way, as “I diddled him out of . . .” Edgar Allan Poe has an article on the art of “Diddling.” Rhyming slang is very common. (See Chivy.) Fiddle and diddle rhyme. “Fiddle” is slang for a sharper, and “diddle” is the act of a sharper. The suggestive rhyme was “Hi diddle diddle

The cat and the fiddle

A certain portion of the human race
Has certainly a taste for being diddled”

Howl: A Black Jug, stanza 1.

Diddler (Jeremy). An artful swindler; a clever, scatty vagabond, borrowing money or obtaining credit by his wit and wiles. From Kenny’s farce called Running the Wind.

Diderick. (See Dietrich.)

Dido. It was Porson who said he could rhyme on any subject: and being asked to rhyme upon the three Latin gerunds, gave this couplet—

“When Dido found Eneas would not come,
She mourned in silence, and was Dido dum(1).”

In the old Eton Latin grammar the three gerunds are called -di, -do,
When Dido saw Aeneas needs must go, She wept in silence, and was dumb (b) Do-do.

Dido was queen of Carthage, who fell in love with Aeneas, driven by a storm to her shores. After abiding awhile at Carthage, he was compelled by Mercury to leave the hospitable queen. Dido, in grief, burnt herself to death on a funeral pile. (Virgil: from Aenid, i. 494 to iii. 650.)

Dio. The die is cast. The step is taken, and I cannot draw back. So said Julius Caesar when he crossed the Rubicon.

"I have set my life upon the cross, And I will stand the hazard of the die." Shakespeare: Richard III, v. 4.

Dios. Whom the gods love die young. This is from Menander’s fragments (Hon hon theoi philousin apothenesei now). Demosthenes has a similar apophthegm. Plautus has the line, "Quem Di diligunt adolescens moritur." (See Byron: Don Juan, canto iv. 12.) Those who die young are “taken out of the miseries of this sinful life” into a happy immortality.

Dios-harba. The 57th Foot. Their colonel (Inglis) in the battle of Albuera (1811), addressing his men, said, “Die hard, my lads; die hard!” And they did die hard, for their banner was pierced with thirty bullets. Only one officer out of twenty-four survived, and only 163 men out of 594. This fine regiment is now called the West Middlesex; the East Middlesex (the Duke of Cambridge’s own) is the old 77th.

Diego (Sen). A corruption of Santiago (St. James), champion of the red cross, and patron saint of Spain.

Dios Alliensis. (See Alliensis.)

Dios Ira. A famous medieval hymn on the last judgment, probably the composition of Thomas of Celano, a native of Abruzzi, who died in 1255. Sir Walter Scott has introduced the former part of it into his Lay of the Last Minstrel.

"Dies irae, dies illa, Solvet saeculum in favilla. Testa David cum Sibilo illa."

On that day, that wrathful day, David and the Sibyll set Heaven and earth shall melt away.

E. C. B.

Dios Non. A non-business day. A law phrase, meaning a day when the courts do not sit, as on Sundays; the Purification, in Hilary term; the Ascension, in Easter term; St. John the Baptist, in Trinity term; and All Saints, with All Souls, in Michaelmas term. A contracted form of “Dies non juridicus,” a non-judicial day.

Dioes Sanqutinis. The 24th March, called Bellona’s Day, when the Roman votaries of the war-goddess cut themselves and drank the sacrificial blood to propitiate the deity.

Dietrich (3 syl.), of Berne or Vero’a, a name given by the German minnesingers (minstrels) to Theoderic the Great, king of the Ostrogoths. One of the liegemen of King Etzel. In the terrible broil stirred up by Queen Kriemhild in the banquet-hall of the Hunnish king, after the slaughter of Sir Rudiger, his friend Dietrich interfered, and succeeded in taking prisoners the only two surviving Burgundians, kings Gunther and Hagen, whom he handed over to Kriemhild, praying that she would set them free, but the angry queen cut off both their heads with her own hands. (The Nibelungen-Lied.)

Dieu. Dieu et mon droit (God and my right). The parole of Richard I, at the battle of Gisors (1198), meaning that he was no vassal of France, but owed his royalty to God alone. As the French were signalised beaten, the battleword was adopted as the royal motto of England.

Difference. Opheilia says to the queen, “You may wear your rue with a difference.” In heraldry differences or marks of cadency indicate the various branches of a family.

(1) The eldest son, during the lifetime of his father, bears a label (or lambel), i.e. a piece of silk, stuff, or linen, with three pendants, broader at the bottom than at the top.

(2) The second son bears a crescent.

(3) The third, a mullet (or star with five points).

(4) The fourth, a martlet.

(5) The fifth, an annulet.

(6) The sixth, a fleur-de-lis.

(7) The seventh, a rose.

(8) The eighth, a croix-moline.

(9) The ninth, a double quatre foil.

Opheilia says both she and the Queen are to wear rue: the one as the alliance of Hamlet, eldest son of the late king; the other as the wife of Claudius his brother, and the cadet branch. The latter was to have a "difference," to signify it was a cadet branch. "I [says Ophelia] shall wear the rue, but you [the Queen] must now wear it with a 'difference.'"
Dinah

Digest (The). The collection of all the laws of Rome compiled by Tribonian and sixteen assistants, by order of Justinian. It amounted to 2,000 volumes, and was finished in three years
(A.D. 533). (See Pandects.)

Diggings. Come to my diggings. To my rooms, residence, office, sanctum. A word imported from California and its gold diggings.

"My friend here wants to take diggings; and as you were complaining that you would get some-to go halves with you, I thought I had better bring you together."—A. G. Doyle: A Study in Scarlet, chap. i.

Diggory. A barn labourer, taken on grand occasions for Butler and footman to Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle. He laughs and talks while serving, and is as gauche as possible. (Goldsmithe: She Noope to Conquer.)

Digit. The first nine numerals; so called from the habit of counting as far as ten on the fingers. (Latin, digitus, a finger.)

Dignitary (A). A clergyman who holds preferment to which jurisdiction is annexed, as bishops, deans, archdeacons, canons, etc.

Dignus Vin'dice No'dus (Latin).
A knot or difficulty worthy of such hands to untie. Literally, a knotty point worthy to be made a civil action.
The person who brought a civil action was called in Roman law a rindex, and the action was called a rindicitio. If the rightful possessor was a matter of dispute, the question became a in rindicidatum, and was referred to the pretor to determine. A knotty point referred to the pretor was a "dignus vindice notus."

Dil Penatös (Latin). Household gods; now used for such articles of furniture or decoration as the lady of the house especially prizes.

Dilemma. The horns of a dilemma.
"Lemma" means a thing taken for granted (Greek, lam'bano, to take).
"Dilemma" is a double lemma, a two-edged sword which strikes both ways, or a bull which will toss you whichever horn you lay hold of. A young rhetorician said to an old sophist, "Teach me to plead, and I will pay you whom I gain a cause." The master sued for payment, and the scholar pleaded. "If I gain the cause I shall not pay you, because the judge will say I am not to pay; and if I lose my cause I shall not be required to pay, according to the terms of our agreement." To this the master replied, "Not so; if you gain your cause you must pay me according to the terms of our agreement; and if you lose your cause the judge will condemn you to pay me."

Dilettantœ (Italian). An amateur of the fine arts, in opposition to a professor. Plural, dilettanti.

"These gentlemen are to be judged, not as dilettanti, but as professors."—Atheneum.

Diligence is that energy and industry which we show when we do what we like (Latin, diligo, I like); but indolence is that listless manner with which we do what thoroughly vexes us.
(Latin, in, intensive; deseo, to grieve.)

Diligence. A four-wheeled stage-coach, drawn by four or more horses.
Common in France before the introduction of railways. The pun is well known.

St via pruère magistro, utere diligentia (i.e. be diligent).

Dilly (plural, Dilles). Stage-coaches.
They first began to run in 1779. An abbreviation of the French word dil-gence (q.v.). "Derby dilly."

Dim and Distant Future (The).
In November, 1885, Mr. W. E. Gladstone said that the disestablishment and disendowment of the Anglican Church were questions in "the dim and distant future."

Dimanche (Monsieur). A dun. The term is from Molière's Don Juan, and would be, in English, Mr. Sunday. The word dimanche is a corruption and contraction of dies Dominica (the Lord's day).

Dimetæ. The ancient Latin name for the inhabitants of Carmarthenshire,
Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

Dimissory. A letter dimissory is a letter from the bishop of one diocese to some other bishop, giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him. (Latin, di-mitto, to send away.)

Dimitry. A cloth said to be so called from Damietta, in Egypt, but really from the Greek di-mitos (double-thread).
(See Samite.)

Di'nah (Amy), in Sterne's Tristram
Shandy. She leaves Mr. Walter Shandy
Dione (3 syl.). Venus, who sprang from the froth of the sea, after the Dinnerless. Their hosts are the cross-legged knights. That is, the stone effigies of the Round Church. In this church at one time lawyers met their clients, and here a host of vagabonds used to loiter about all day, under the hope of being hired as witnesses. Dining with the cross-legged knights meant much the same thing as dining with duke Humphrey (q.v.).

D'Inos. (See Horses.)

Dint. By dint of war; by dint of argument; by dint of hard work. Dint means a blow or striking ( Anglo-Saxon, dynst); whence perseverance, power exerted, force; it also means the indentation made by a blow.

Dioecletian. The Roman Emperor noted for his fierce persecution of the Christians, 303. The Emperor Constantine, on the other hand, was the "nursing father" of the Church.

"To make the Church's glory shine, Should Dioecletian reign, not Constantine." Crabbe: Borough.

Dioecletian was the king, and Eras tus the prince, his son, in the Italian version of the Seven Wise Masters (q.v.).

Dio'genes (4 syl., q = ). The cynic philosopher is said to have lived in a tub.

"The whole world was not half as wide To Alexander, when he cried Because he had not one to substitute, As was a barley-narrow tub to Diogenes." Butler: Hudibras, 1. 3.

Dio'genes. Romanus IV., emperor of the East (1067-1071).

Diomed's Horses. Dinos (dreadful) and Lampom (bright-eyed). (See Horses.)

Diomede's Swap. An exchange in which all the benefit is on one side. This proverbial expression is founded on an incident related by Homer in the Iliad. Glauclus recognises Diomed on the battle-field, and the friends change armour.

"For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device, For which nine oxen paid (a vulgar price), He (Glaucus) gave his own, of gold divinely wrought. An hundred beavers the shining purchase bought." Pope: Iliad, v.

Diomede or Diomé. King of Ætolia, in Greece, brave and obedient to authority. He survived the siege of Troy; but on his return home found his wife living in adultery, and saved his life by living an exile in Italy. (Homer: Iliad.)

Dio'ne (3 syl.). Venus, who sprang from the froth of the sea, after the Dine (To). Qui s'orit dine. The seven sleepers and others required no food till they woke from their long sleep. The same may be said of all hibernating animals.

To dine with Democritus. To be cheated out of one's dinner. Democritus was the derider, or philosopher who laughed at men's folly.

To dine with Sir Thomas Gresham. To go without one's dinner; to be dinnerless. Sir Thomas Gresham founded the Royal Exchange, which was a favourite lounge for those who could not afford to provide themselves with a dinner.

To dine with Duke Humphrey. (See Humphrey.)

To dine with Mahomet. To die, and dine in paradise.

To dine with the cross-legged knights. (See next column, DINNERLESS.)

Dine Out (To). To be dinnerless; to go without a dinner.

Ding (A). A blow. To ding it in one's ear. To repeat a subject over and over again; to teach by repetition.

To ding. To strike. (Anglo-Saxon, domgan, to knock, strike, beat.) Hence "ding-dong," as "They were at it ding-dong!"

Ding-dong. They went at it ding-dong. Fighting in good earnest. To ding is to beat or bruise (Saxon, domgan); dong is a responsive word. One gives a ding and the other a dong.

"Din is the Anglo-Saxon dyn-ian, to make a din; dinning, a dimming noise.

Dingley Doll. The home of Mr. Wardle and his family, and the scene of Tupman's love adventure with Miss Rachel. (Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Dinner (Waiting for). The "mauvais quart d'heure."
mutilated body of Uranus (the sky) had been thrown there by Saturn.

"So young Dionysus, nursed beneath the waves, And rocked by Nereids in their coral caves, ...\n
2

Dionysus (the younger), being banished a second time from Syracuse, retired to Corinth, where he turned schoolmaster for a living. Posterity called him a tyrant. Byron, in his Ode to Napoleon, alludes to these facts in the following lines:

"Corinth's pedagogue hath now\nTransferred his byword to thy brow."

That is, Napoleon is now called tyrant, like Dionysius.

Dionysos. The Greek name of Bacchus (q.v.).

Father: Zeus (Jupiter).

Mother: Semele, daughter of Cadmus.

Mother: Juno.\n
Ours were his aversion.\n
Norns were the most general sacrifices offered to him.

Wife: Arinna.

The most famous statue of this god was by Praxiteles.

Attalus gave above £18,000 sterling for a painting of the god by Aristotle.

Diophantine Analysis. Finding commensurate values of squares, cubes, triangles, etc.; or the sum of a given number of squares which is itself a square; or a certain number of squares, etc., which are in arithmetical progression. The following examples will give some idea of the theory:

1. To find two whole numbers, the sum of whose squares is a square;
2. To find three square numbers which are in arithmetical progression;
3. To find a number from which two given squares being severally subtracted, each of the remainders is a square.

Diophantus was an Alexandrian Greek (6th cent. A.D.).

Dioscuri. Castor and Pollux. (Greek, Dios kunos, young men of Zeus; die is gen. of Zeus.)

The horses of the Dioscuri. Cyllares and Harpagos. (See Horse.)

Diotrephes. One who loves to have the pre-eminence among others. (3 John 9.)

"Neither a desperate Judas, like the prelate Sharp (archbishop of York's, who was murdered, that's gone to his place: nor a sanctuary-breaking Holofemes, like the blood-minded Glavehouse; nor an ambitious Diotrephes, like the lad (Lord Edendale) ... shall rain the arrows that are whetted and the bow that is bent against you." —Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. 21.

Dip (4). A tallow-chandler, one who makes or sells candles or "dips." These candles are made by dipping into melted tallow the cotton which forms the wick. (Anglo-Saxon dippen, to dip.)

Diphthera. The skin of the goat Amalthea's, on which Jove wrote the destiny of man. Diphtheria is an infectious disease of the throat; so called from its tendency to form a false membrane.

Diploma literally means something folded (Greek). Diplomas used to be written on parchment, folded, and sealed. The word is applied to licences given to graduates to assume a degree, to clergymen, to physicians, agents, and so on.

Diplomacy. The tact, negotiations, privileges, etc., of a diplomatist, or one who carries a diploma to a foreign court to authorize him to represent the Government which sends him out.

Diplomatic Cold (A). An excuse to get over a disagreeable engagement. Mr. Healy, M.P. (1885), said that Lord Hartington and Mr. Gladstone had "diplomatic colds," when they pleaded indisposition as an excuse for not giving addresses at public meetings in which they were advertised to speak. The day after the meetings both gentlemen were "much better."

Diplomats. The science of palaeography—that is, deciphering old charters, diplomas, titles; investigating their authenticity and genuineness, and so on. Papenbrich, the Hollandist, originated the study in 1675; but Mabillon, another Hollandist, reduced it to a science in his work entitled De re Diplomatica, 1681. Toussaint and Tassin further developed it in their treatise entitled Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, 1750-1760.

Diptych [dipt'ik]. A register folded into two leaves, opening like our books, and not like the ancient scrolls. The Romans kept in a book of this sort the names of their magistrates, and the Roman Catholics employed the word for the registers in which were written the names of those bishops, saints, and martyrs who were to be specially commemorated when oblations were made for the dead. (Greek, dipthuchos, folded in two.)

"The Greeks executed small works of great elegance, as may be seen in the diptychs, or ivory covers to senatorial records, or sacred volumes used in the church service." —J. Placeman: Lectures on Sculpture, III. p. 96.
Diocesean Swan.

Diocesan Swan. Pindar; so called from Dioces, a fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the poet's birthplace (a.c. 518-442).

Direct Tax is one collected directly from the owner of property subject to the tax, as when the tax-gatherer goes direct to the owner of a house and demands five, ten, or twenty pounds, as it may be, for Government uses. Indirect taxes are taxes upon marketable commodities, such as tea and sugar, the tax on which is added to the article taxed, and is paid by the purchasers indirectly.

Directory. The French constitution of 1795, when the executive was vested in five persons called directors, one of whom retired every year. After a nickly existence of four years, it was quashed by Napoleon Bonaparte. An alphabetical list of the inhabitants, etc., of a given locality, as a "London Directory."'

Dirlton. Doubting with Dirlton, and resolving those doubts with Stewart. Doubting and answering those doubts, but doubting still. It applies to law, science, religion, morals, etc. Sir John Niabet of Dirlton's Doubts on points of law, and Sir James Stewart's Doubts Resolved, are works of established reputation in Scotland, but the Doubts hold a higher place than the Solutions.

Dirlos (Count). A Paladin, the beau-ideal of valour, generosity, and truth. The story says he was sent by Charlemagne into the East, where he conquered Aliar'de, a great Moorish prince. On his return he found his young wife, who thought he was dead, betrothed to Celi'nos, another of Charlemagne's peers. The matter being set right, the king gave a grand banquet. Dirlos is D'Yrlos.

Dirt is matter in the wrong place. (Lord Palmerston.) This is not true: a diamond or sovereign lost on a road is matter in a wrong place, but certainly is not dirt.

"Throw plenty of dirt and some will be sure to stick. Scandal always leaves a trail behind.

Dirt cheap. Very low-priced. Dirt is so cheap that persons pay others to take it away.

To eat dirt is to put up with insults and mortification. An Eastern method of punishment.

"If dirt were trumps what a capital band you would hold!"—Charles Lamb to Martin Burney.

Dirty Half-Hundred. The 50th Foot, so called from the men wiping their faces with their black cuffs. Now called "The Queen's Own."

Dirty Lane. Now called Abingdon Street, Westminster.

Dirty Shirts (Thc). The 101st Foot, which fought at Delhi in their shirt-sleeves (1857). Now called "The Royal Bengal Fusiliers."

Dis. Pluto.

"Plucking gathering flowers, Hermes a tailor flower, by grimmy Dis Was gathered."—Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 270.

Disaster is being under an evil star (Greek, dias-aster, evil star). An astrological word.

"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera."—Judges v. 20.

Disastrous Peace (La Paix Malheureuse). It followed the battle of Gravelines (2 syl.), and was signed at Cateau - Cambre'sis. By this treaty Henri II. renounced all claim to Geno's, Naples, Milan, and Corsica (1559).

Disbar (To). To deprive a barrister of his right to plead. The bar is the part barred off in courts of law and equity for barristers or pleaders.

Discharge Bible (Thc). 1806. "I discharge [charge] thee before God." (I Tim. v. 21.)

Discipline (A). A scourge used by Roman Catholics for penitential purposes.

"Before the cross and altar a lamp was still burning... and on the floor lay a small discipline or penitential scourge of small cord and wire, the blades of which were stained with recent blood."—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman, chap. iv.

Discord means severance of hearts (Latin, discorda). It is the opposite of concord, the coming together of hearts. In music it means disagreement of sounds, as when a note is followed by another which is disagreeable to a musical ear. (See Arpeg.

Discount. A discount. Not in demand; little valued; less esteemed than formerly; less than their nominal value. (Latin dis-comperta, to depreciate.)

Discuss. To discuss a bottle. To drink one with a friend. Same as "crush" or "crack a bottle," (Discuss is the Latin dis-quatio; French, cassar. The Latin quassaré cassa is to break a drinking-vessel.)

"We all... drew round the table, an auster silence prevailing, while we discussed our meal."—E. Bronte: Wuthering Heights, chap. ii.
Disease

Disease, meaning discomfort, want of ease, mal aise, as

"In the world ye shall have disease."—Wyclif: John xvi. 33.

Dished (1 syl.). I was dished out of it. Cheated out of it; or rather, some one else contrived to obtain it. A contraction of disharit. The heir is dish't out of his inheritance when his father marries again and leaves his property to the widow and widow's family.

"Where's Brunnel? Dished!" Byron: Don Juan.

Dish-washer (1). A scullery-maid.

Distal. Daniel Finch, second earl of Nottingham.

"No wonder was Distal among the Whigs... but Lady Charlotte is taken knitting in St. James's Chapel [i.e. Lady Charlotte Finch, his daughter]."—The Examiner, April 30, 24th, 1715, No. 44.

Distemper (St.). The penitent thief.

[DISYMAK.]

Dish-washer. Daniel Finch, second earl of Nottingham.

"No wonder was Distal among the Whigs... but Lady Charlotte is taken knitting in St. James's Chapel [i.e. Lady Charlotte Finch, his daughter]."—The Examiner, April 30, 24th, 1715, No. 44.

Distemper. The Professor of Archaeology in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1851 by John Disney, Esq., of the Hyde, Ingatstone.

Disorder, says Franklin, "breaks with Plenty, dines with Poverty, sups with Misery, and sleeps with Death."

Dispensation. The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between Himself and man. The dispensation of Adam was that between Adam and God; the dispensation of Abraham, and that of Moses, were those imparted to these holy men; the Gospel dispensation is that explained in the Gospels. (Latin, dis-pensatio, to spread forth, unroll, explain, reveal.)

A dispensation from the Pope. Permission to dispense with something enjoined; a licence to do what is forbidden, or to omit what is commanded by the law of the Church, as distinct from the moral law.

"A dispensation was obtained to enable Dr. Barrow to marry." Ward Disp'ute (2 syl.) means, literally, to "hop down" (Latin, di-sputo): debate means to "knock down" (French, débatte); discuss means to "shake down" (Latin, dis-qualio): object is to "cast against" (Latin, ob-jurio); content is to "pull against" (Latin, contendo); quarrel is to throw darts at each other (Welsh, creoced, a dart); and wrangle is to strain by twisting (Swedish, cranga; Anglo-Saxon, wrigan).

"distract" means to divert the mind, and "distraction" means recreation or amusement (Latin, dis-traho). (See SLAVE.)

Distract (French). Absent-minded.

Dithyrambic. The father of dithyrambic poetry. Arion of Lesbos.

Ditty. When Godfrey was wounded with an arrow, an "odoriferous pan'sacy" distilled from dittany was applied to the wound; whereupon the arrow-head fell out, and the wound healed immediately. (See: Jerusalem Delivered, book xi.)

Ditto. (See Do.)

Dittoes (A suit of). Coat, waistcoat, and trousers all alike, or all ditto (the same).

Divan (Arabic and Persian, diwan) means a register kept on a white table exactly similar to our board. Among the Orientals the word is applied to a council-chamber or court of justice; but in England we mean a coffee-house where smoking is the chief attraction.

Divers Colours [in garments]. We are told, in 2 Sam. xiii. 18, that king's daughters were arrayed in a garment of divers colours, and Dr. Shaw informs us that only virgins wore drawers of needle-work; so that when the mother of Sisera (Judges v. 30) says, "Have they not spoil? Have they not divided the spoil?" To Sisera a prey of divers colours, of divers colours of needle-work?" she means--is not the king's daughter allotted to Sisera as a portion of his spoil? (See COAT OF MANY COLOURS.)

Divert. To turn aside. Business is the regular walk or current of our life, but pleasure is a diversion or turning aside for a time from the straight line. What we call diversion is called in French distraction, drawing aside. (Latin, di-vertus, to turn aside; dis-traho, to draw aside.)

Dives (1 syl.), Durs or Dwers. Demons of Persian mythology. According to the Koran, they are ferocious and gigantic spirits under the sovereignty of Eblis.

"At Lahore, in the Mogul's palace, are pictures of Jews and Dives with long horns, staring eyes, snaky hair, great fangs, ugly jaws, long tails, and such horrible deformity, that I wonder the poor women are not frightened."—William Finch: Pursuit of Pilgrims, vol. 1.

Dives (2 syl.). The name popularly given to the rich man in our Lord's parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke xvi.). The Latin would be Divus et Lazarus.

Divide (2 syl.). When the members in the House of Commons interrupt a speaker by crying out divide, they mean, bring the debate to an end and put the motion to the vote--i.e. let the eyes divide from the noes, one going into one room or lobby, and the others into another.

Divide and Govern. Divide a nation into parties, or set your enemies at loggerheads, and you can have your own way. A maxim of Machiavelli, a noted political writer of Florence (1490-1527).

"Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand."—Matthew xii. 23.

Divination. There are numerous species of divination referred to in the Bible. The Hebrew word is added in italics.

1. Judicial Anthology (Maccabees).
2. Astrology (Menarchenos).
3. Witchcraft (Mercuriaphus).
4. Enchanted Art (Hecatomus).
7. By Necromancy (Isa. xxv. 12).
8. By Arabian Poetry (Hos. iv. 12).
9. By Taraphium of household Idols.
10. By Hepatography or inspecting the liver of an animal.
11. By Dreams and their interpretations.
12. Divination by fire, air, and water; thunder, lightning, and meteors; etc.

The Divus and Thumanus was a prophetic tunic worn by the High Priest. (Consult: Gen. xxxviii. 2-11, xvi. 1; Is. viii. 12; 2 Chron. xxii. 6; Prov. xxii. 33; Ezek. xxi. 21; Hos. iii. 4, 5, etc.)

Divine. The divine right of kings. The notion that kings reign by divine right, quite independent of the people's will. This notion arose from the Old Testament Scriptures, where kings are called "God's anointed," because they were God's vicars on earth, when the Jews changed their theocracy for a monarchy.

"The right divine of kings to govern wrong."--Pope.

Divine (The). Ferdinand de Herrezura, a Spanish poet (1516-1665).
Raphael, the painter, il Divino (1483-1520).
Luis Moralès, Spanish painter, el Divino (1500-1586).

Divine Doctor. Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic (1294-1381).

Divine Pagan (The). Hypatia, who presided over the Neoplatonic School at Alexandria. She was infamously torn to pieces (A.D. 415) by a Christian mob, not without the concurrence of the Archbishop Cyril.
Divine Plant (The). Vervain, called by the Romans Herba Sacra (q.v.).

Divine Speaker (The). So Aristotle called Tyrtamos, who therefore adopted the name of Theophrastos (n.c. 370-287).

Divining Rod. A forked branch of hazel, suspended by the two prongs between the balls of the thumbs. The inclination of the rod indicates the presence of water-springs, precious metal, and anything else that simpletons will pay for. (See DOUBTERSWIVEL.)

Divinity in Odd Numbers. Falstaff tells us (in the Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 1) that this divinity affects "naughtiness, chance, and death." A Trinity is by no means confined to the Christian creed. The Brahmins represent their god with three heads; the Greeks and Romans had three Graces, three Fates, three Furies, and a three-fold Hecate. Jupiter had his three thunderbolts, Neptune his trident, and Pluto his three-headed dog. The Muses were three times three. Pythagoras says God is threefold—"the beginning, middle, and end of all things." Then, again, there are five features, five parts to the body, five vowels, five lines in music, five acts to a play, etc.; seven strings to a harp, seven planets (anciently, at any rate), seven musical notes, etc.

Chance. There's luck in odd numbers "Numero Deus impare gaudet" (Virgil: Eclogue vili, 75). The seventh son of a seventh son was always held notable. Baalam would have seven altars, and sacrificed on them seven bullocks and seven rams. Naaman was commanded to dip seven times in Jordan, and Elijah sent his servant seven times to look out for rain. Climacteric years are seven and nine with their multiples by odd numbers.

Death. The great climacteric year of life is 63 (i.e. 7 x 9), and Saturn presides over all climacteric years.

Div'no Lodov'co. Ariosto, author of Orlando Furioso, an epic poem in twenty-four books. (1474-1533.)

Division. The sign + for division was invented by John Pell of Cambridge in 1658.

Divorcement. A writing, or bill of divorcement. "Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement" (Matt. v. 31).

Adalet tells in the Nineteenth Century (July, 1892, p. 137):

"A woman [in Turkey] divorced from her husband is not treated with contumely . . . and often marries again. A man simply states to his wife that he has divorced her, on which she will go away; and the man, having repeated the same to the end, will receive an act of divorce written, which he will send to her. If it is the first or second time that this has occurred, he may take her back again without any formality ensuing, but, after a third divorce, she will be lost to him for ever. Seeing the case with which this may be done, it is not surprising if men abuse the licence, and sometimes divorce their wives for [a very small] fault . . . as a badly-cooked dinner, or a button unsnapped, knowing very well that if he repents of it he can have her back before evening. I know a lady who has been divorced from five husbands, and is now living with a sixth."

Divus in Latin, attached to a proper name, does not mean divine, but simply deceased or canonised; excellently translated in Notes and Queries (May 21st, 1892, p. 421), "of blessed memory." Thus, Divus Augustus means Augustus of blessed memory, not divine Augustus. Of course, the noun "divus" opposite to a proper noun is a god, as in Horace, 3 Odes v. 2, "Præseus divus habebitur Augustus." While living, Augustus will be accounted a god. Virgil (Eccl. i. 6) says, "Deus nobis hæc otia fecit;" the "deus" was Augustus.

Dix'e Land. Nigger land. Mason and Dixon drew a line which was to be the northern limit of slavery. In the third quarter of the 19th century the southern part of this line was called Dixie or nigger land.

Diary. A nickname of Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield) (1805-1881).

Djin'nestan'. The realm of the djinns or genii of Oriental mythology.

Do. A contraction of ditto, which is the Italian dìitto (said), Latin dictus.

How do you do? i.e. How do you fare? It should be, How do you do? (Anglo-Saxon, dyg-an = valóre); in Latin, Quomodo valeas.

Will to do. This, again, is not the transitive verb (faceré) but the intransitive verb (valóre), and means "well to fare." (Anglo-Saxon, dyg-an = valóre.) To do him, i.e. cheat or trick a person out of something.

I have done the Jew, i.e. over-reached him. The same as outdo = excel.

Do (to rhyme with go). The first or tonic note of the solfegio system of music.

Do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, Italian; ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, French. The latter are borrowed from a hymn by Paulus Fiacenus, addressed to St. John, which Guido, in the eleventh century, used in teaching singing:

"Ut queant laxis, Be-unare fibris, Morte gestorum Pa-mall tuorum, Set-te pollute Loh-lis rectum."*

Sancti Joannis.*

"Uttered be thy wondrous story, Re-proclaim earth through I be, Me make mindful of thy glory, Fa-rous son of Zacharees; Set-ace to my spirits iring, La-bouring thy praise to sing."

E. C. B.

(See WEISS in Hortologio, p. 263.) Le Maire added si (seventeenth century). (See ABETINIAN SYLLABLES.)

Do for. I’ll do for him. Ruin him; literally, provide for him in a bad sense. "Taken in and done for," is taken in and provided for; but, jocosely, it means "cheated and fleeced."

Do up (To). To set in order; to make tidy. "Dup the door." (See Dup.)

Dob (Indian). A tract of land between two rivers. (Pronounce do'-ab.)

Dobby (Humphrey). The valet-de-chambre and factotum of Sir Robert Bramble, of Blackbury Hall, in the county of Kent. A blunt, rough-spoken old retainer, full of the milk of human kindness, and most devoted to his master. (G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

Dobby’s Walk. The goblin’s haunt or beat. Dobby is an archaic word for a goblin or brownie. (See Washington Irving’s Bracebridge Hall, ii. 183 6.) Dobby also means an imbecile old man.

"The Dobby’s walk was within the inhabited domains of the Hall."-Sir W. Scott: Privat of the Peak, chap. 2.

Doceetes (3 syl.). An early heretical sect, which maintained that Jesus Christ was only God, and that His visible form was merely a phantom; that the crucifixion and resurrection were illusions. (The word is Greek, and means phantastikë.)

Dook-Alfar. The dark Alfs whose abode is underground. They are in appearance blacker than pitch. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dock-side Lumper (A). One engaged in delivering and loading ships’ cargoes.

"Judging of my histrionic powers by my outward man, he probably thought me more fit for a dock-side lumper than an actor."-C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 181.

Doctor. A seventh son used to be so dubbed from the notion of his being intuitively skilled in the cure of agues, the king’s evil, and other diseases.

"Pluseurs croyent qu’en France les septièmes garçons, nez de légitimes mariages (sans que la suite des sept âges, soit interrompue par la naissance d’aucune fille) peuvent aussi guérir des fièvres tierces, des fièvres quartes, et même des écoruilles, après avoir fumé trois ou huit jours avant que de toucher les malades."—Jean Baptiste Thiers: Traité des Superstitions, etc., I. p. 496.

Doctor (The). The cook on board ship, who "doctors" the food. Any adulterated or doctored beverage; hence the mixture of milk, water, nutmeg, and a little rum, is called Doctor; the two former ingredients being "doctored" by the two latter.

Doctor (The). Brown sherry, so called because it is concocted from a harsh, thin wine, by the addition of old boiled mosto stock. Mosto is made by heating unfermented juice in earthen vessels, till it becomes as thick and sweet as treacle. This syrup being added to fresh "must" ferment, and the luscious produce is used for doctoring very inferior qualities of wine. (Shaw: On Wine.)

To doctor the wine. To drug it, or strengthen it with brandy. The fermentation of cheap wines is increased by fermentable sugar. As such wines fail in aroma, connoisseurs smell at their wine. To doctor wine is to make weak wine stronger, and "sick" wine more palatable.

Doctored Dice. Loaded dice.

To doctor the accounts. To falsify them. They are ill (so far as you are concerned) and you falsify them to make them look better. This allusion is to drugging wine, beer, etc., and to adulteration generally.

Dr. Diafoirus in Molliere’s Malade Imaginaire. A man of fossilised ideas, who, like the monk, refused to change his time-honoured munpaulus (g.e.), for the new-fangled sympélaus. Dr. Diafoirus used to say, what was good enough for his forefathers was good enough for their posterity, and he had no patience with the modern fads about the rotundity of the earth, its motion round the sun, the circulation of the blood, and all such stuff.

Dr. Dove. The hero of Southey's Doctor.

Dr. Fell. I do not like thee, Dr. Fell. A correspondent of Notes and Queries says the author was Tom Brown, who wrote Dialogues of the Dead, and the person referred to was Dr. Fell, Dean of Christchurch (1625-1886), who expelled him, but said he would remit the sentence if he translated the thirty-third Epigram of Martial:

"Non anno te, Zahidii, nec ponsium decre te; Hoc raptum pontis decre, non anno te."

"I do not like thee, Dr. Fell. The reason why I cannot tell;
But this I know, I know full well.
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell."—T. Brown.

Doctor Mirabilis. Roger Bacon (1214-1292).

Doctor My-Book. Dr. John Abernathy, so called because he used to say to his patients, "Read my book"—on Surgical Observations. (1765-1830.)

Dr. Ben'le or Pedro Resto of Agua'ra. The doctor of Barat'ria, who forbade Sancho Panza to taste any of the meats set before him. Roasted partridge was forbidden by Hippocrates; podri'da was the most pereiscous food in the world; rabbits are a sharp-haired diet; veal is prejudicial to health; but the governor might eat a "few wafers, and a thin slice or two of quince." (Don Quixote, part ii. book iii. chap. 10.)

Dr. Sangra'do, of Vall'adolid, a tall, meagre, pale man, of very solemn appearance, who weighed every word he uttered, and gave an emphasis to his sage dicta. "His reasoning was geometrical, and his opinions angular." He said to the licentiate Sedillo, who was sick, "If you had drunk nothing else but pure water all your life, and eaten only such simple food as boiled apples, you would not now be tormented with gout." He then took from him six porringers of blood to begin with; in three hours he repeated the operation; and again the next day, saying: "It is a gross error to suppose that blood is necessary for life." With this depletion, the patient was to drink two or three pints of hot water every two hours. The result of this treatment was death "from obstinacy." (Gil Blas, chap. ii.)

Doctor Slop. An enthusiast, who thinks the world hinges on getting Uncle Toby to understand the action of a new medical instrument. (Sterne: Tristram Shandy.)

A nickname given by William Hone to Sir John Stoddart, editor of the New Times. (1773-1856.)

Doctor Squintum. George Whi'tefield, so called by Foot in his farce entitled The Minor. (1714-1770.)

Theodore Hook applied the same sobriquet to the Rev. Edward Irving, who had an obliquity of the eyes. (1792-1834.)

Doctor Syntax. A simple-minded, pious hump-backed clergyman, very simple-minded, but of excellent taste and scholarship, who left home in search of the picturesque. His adventures are told in eight-syllable verse in The Tour of Dr. Syntax, by William Combe. (See Duke Combe.)

Dr. Syntax's horse. Grizzle, all skin and bone. (See Horse.)

Doctors. False dice, which are doctored, or made to turn up winning numbers.

"The whole ante-chamber is full, my lord—knights and squires, doctors and dukes.
"The dice with their doctors in their pockets, I presume."—Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxxii.

"Or chaired at White's, anoints the doctors sit."—Dunciad, book 2. 290.

Doctors. The three best doctors are Dr. Quixt, Dr. Diet, and Dr. Merrigman.

"St. thine deficient medici, medicis tibi flant.
Lice i'rin: Mens-esia, Requies, Mordis-trema."—

Doctors' Commons. A locality near St. Paul's, where the ecclesiastical courts were formerly held, and wills preserved. To "common" means to dine together; a term still used at our universities. Doctors' Commons was so called because the doctors of civil law had to dine together four days in each term. This was called eating their terms.

Doctors Disagree. Who shall decide when doctors disagree. When authorities differ, the question must be left undecided. (Pope: Moral Essays, epistle iii. line 1.)

Doctor's Stuff. Medicine: stuff sent from the doctor.

Doctored Wine. (See To Doctor.)

Doctour of Phisikas Tale, in Chaucer, is the Roman story of Virginius, given by Livy. There is a version of this tale in the Roman de la Rose, vol. ii. p. 74; and another, by Gower, in his Confessio Amantis, book vii.
Doctrinists

Doctrinists or Doctrineuses. A political party which has existed in France since 1815. They maintain that true liberty is compatible with a monarchical Government; and are so called because they advocate what is only a doctrine or dream. M. Guizot was one of this party.

Dodge (1 syl.). An artful device to evade, deceive, or bilk some one. (Anglo-Saxon, doegian, to conceal or colour.)

The religious dodge. Seeking alms by trading on religion.

The tidy dodge. To dress up a family clean and tidy so as to excite sympathy, and make passers-by suppose you have by misfortune fallen from a respectable state in society.

Dodge About (To), in school phrase, is to skip about and not go straight on through a lesson. A boy learns a verb, and the master does not hear him conjugate it straight through, but dodges him about. Also in class not to call each in order, but to pick a boy here and there.

Dodger. A "knowing fellow." One who knows all the tricks and ways of London life, and profits by such knowledge.

Dodger. The Artful Dodger. John Dawkins, a young thief, up to every artifice, and a perfect adept in villainy. A sobriquet given by Dickens to such a rascal, in his Oliver Twist, chap. viii.

Dodington, whom Thomson invokes in his Summer, was George Bubb Dodington, Lord Melcomb-Regis, a British statesman, who associated much with the wits of the time. Churchill and Pope ridiculed him, while Hogarth introduced him in his picture called the Orders of Virtues.

Dod’ipoll. As wise as Dr. Dodipoll (or) Dodipole—i.e. not wise at all; a dunce. (Doddy in dodi-poll and doddy-pate is probably a variant of toty, small, puny. Doddy-poll, one of puny intellect.)

Dodman or Doddiman. A snail. A word still common in Norfolk; but Fairfax, in his Bulk and Selvedge (1674), speaks of “a snail or dodman.”

"Dodman, doddiman, put out your horn, Here comes a thief to steal your corn."

_Norfolk rhyme._

Dodo’na. A famous oracle in Epirus, and the most ancient of Greece. It was dedicated to Zeus (Jupiter), and situate in the village of Dodona.

* The tale is, that Jupiter presented his daughter Thēbē with two black pigeons which had the gift of human speech. Leprière tells us that the Greek word πελεται (pigeons) means, in the dialect of the Epirotes, old women; so that the two black doves with human voice were two black or African women. One went to Libya, in Africa, and founded the oracle of Jupiter Ammon; the other went to Epirus and founded the oracle of Dodona. We are also told that plates of brass were suspended on the oak trees of Dodona, which being struck by thongs when the wind blew, gave various sounds from which the responses were concocted. It appears that this suggested to the Greeks the phrase Κάλκος Τοδόνα (brass of Dodona), meaning a babbling, or one who talks an infinite deal of nothing.

Doeds (Moy). The old landlady in Scott’s novel called St. Ronan’s Well. An excellent character, made up of consistent inconsistencies; a mosaic of oddities, all fitting together, and forming an admirable whole. She was so good a housewife that a cookery book of great repute bears her name.

Dodson and Fogg. The lawyers employed by the plaintiff in the famous case of "Bardell v. Pickwick," in the Pickwick Papers, by Charles Dickens.

Doe (1 syl.). John Doe and Richard Roe. Any plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. They were sham names used at one time to save certain "niceties of law;" but the clumsy device was abolished in 1852. Any mere imaginary persons, or men of straw. John Doe, Richard Roe, John o’ Noakes, and Tom Styles are the four sons of "Mrs. Harris,” all bound apprentices to the legal profession.

Doeg (2 syl.), in the satire of Aesop and Arbiterpel, by Dryden and Tato, is meant for Elkanah Settle, a poet who wrote satires upon Dryden, but was no match for his great rival. Doeg was Saul’s herdsman, who had charge of his mules and asses. He told Saul that the priests of Nob had provided David with food; whereupon Saul sent him to put them to death, and eighty-five were ruthlessly massacred. (1 Sam. xxi. 7; xxii. 18.)

"Doeg, though without knowing law or why,
Made still a blundering kind of melody...
Let him rail on; let his invective Muse
Have four-and-twenty letters to abuse,
Which if he jumbles to one line of sense,
Indict him of a capital offence."

_Aesop and Arbiterpel, part i._
Doff is do-off, as "Doff your hat." So Dons is do-on, as "Doe your clothes." Dups is do-up, as "Dup the door" (g.v.).

"Doff thy harness, youth . . .
And tempt not yet the brushe of the war."
Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, v. 2.

Dog. This long article is subdivided into eleven parts:

1. Dogs of note.
2. Dogs of noted persons.
3. Dogs models of their species.
4. Dogs in phrases.
5. Dogs used metaphorically, etc.
6. Dogs in Scripture language.
7. Dogs in art.
8. Dogs in proverbs and fables.
10. Dogs the male of animals.
11. Dogs inferior plants.

(1) Dogs of Note:

Barry. The famous mastiff of Great St. Bernard's, in the early part of the present century instrumental in saving forty human beings. His most memorable achievement was rescuing a little boy whose mother had been destroyed by an avalanche. The dog carried the boy on his back to the hospice. The stuffed skin of this noble animal is kept in the museum of Berne.

(2) Dogs of noted persons:

Arcton's fifty dogs. Aes(try) (strength), Amarynthos (from Amarynthos or Evia), Asbolos (foot-colour), Ban'tos, Boreas, Canach' (ringing), Chelid'tros, Cissa'h, Co'ran (cropped, crop-earred), Cyll'o (haught), Cyll'op'tes (zig-zag runner), Cyp'ri'o (Cyprian), Drac'o (the dragon), Dro'mas (the corner), Dro'mios (seize-on), El'ch'nobs, Fud'rmos (good-runner), Har'pal' (various), Har'pi'a (lurk-on), Ichno'ma'ti (track-follower), La'bros (furious), La'cena (louder), La'ch'n (glowy-wood), Lya'ror (Spurstan), Lya'don (from Lycia, in Arcadia), Lya'lap (hurricane), Lam'paus (shouting-out), Len'tos (grey), Ly'scus, Ly'niua, Ma'chma (hazel), Mel'pi (black), Mel'nbu' (black), Meu'la (black), Meu'la (black), Men'ela (black), Mo'laos (from Molossos), Na'pa (bequeathed to a wolf), Nebr'ph'rees (fawn-bred), Oc'yroma (swift-runner), Or'es'trophi'o (mountain-bred), Or'i'basos (mountain-ranger), Phach'y'tos (thick-skinned), Pam'ph'aos (ravenous), Pe'men'is (leader), Pher'elas (winged), Stric'ta (spot), Ther'it'mas (beast-tamer or subdue'), The'ron (savage-faced), Thoos (shriek), U'ranis (heavenly-one).

Several modern names of dogs are of Spanish origin, as Ponte (pointer), Tray (fetch), etc.

King Arthur's favourite hound. Ca-vall.

Aubry's dog. Aubry of Montdidier was murdered, in 1371, in the forest of Bondy. His dog, Dragon, showed a most unusual hatred to a man named Richard of Macaire, always snarling and ready to fly at his throat whenever he appeared. Suspicion was excited, and Richard of Macaire was condemned to a judicial combat with the dog. He was killed, and in his dying moments confessed the crime.

Belyrade, the camp-salter's dog: Clumsy.

Browning's (Mrs.) little dog Flush, on which she wrote a poem.

Lord Byron's favourite dog. Boat-swarin, buried in the garden of Newstead Abbey.

Catherine de Medic's favourite lap-dog was named Phebe.

Cathullin's hound was named Luath (g.v.).

Douglas's hound was named Lufra or Lufr (g.v.).

Elizabeth of Bohemia's dog was named Apollon.

Fingal's dog was named Bran.

"Man e Bran, iis a brother (if it be not Bran, it is Bran's brother) was the powerful reh of Macromóbh."-Barzilay, chap. vi.

Frederick of Wales had a dog given him by Alexander Pope, and on the collar were these words—

"I am his Highness' dog at Kew:
Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?"

Geryon's dogs. Gargittios and Orthos.

The latter was the brother of Cerberos, but had but one head. Hercules killed both these monsters.

Iearus' dog. Mera (the glutton).

Icarus was slain by some drunken peasants, who buried the body under a tree. His daughter Eriugone, searching for her father, was directed to the spot by the howling of Mera, and when she discovered the body she hung herself for grief. Icarus became the constellation Basile, Eriugone the constellation Phleg, and Mera the star Procyon, which rises in July, a little before the Dog-star.

(Greek, pro-known.)

Keuneth's (Sir) famous hound was called Roswal. (See W. Scott: The Talisman.)

Lamb's (Charles) dog was named Dash.

Landor's (Savage) dog was named Giallo.

Landseer's greyhound was named Brutus. "The Invader of the Lander."
Dog

Llewellyn's greyhound was named Gelert (q.v.).

Ludlum's dog. (See Lazy.)

Lurgan's (Lord) greyhound was named Master McGarthy, from an orphan boy who reared it. It won three Waterloo Cups, and was presented at Court by the express desire of Queen Victoria, the very year it died (1866-1871).

Neville's dog. It ran away whenever it was called. In the corresponding Italian proverb the dog is called that of the Vicar Arlott. (See Chien.)

Mauthe dog. (See Mauthe.)

Sir Isaac Newton's, Diamond (q.v.).

Dog of Montargis. The same as Aubry's dog. A picture of the combat was for many years preserved in the castle of Montargis. (See Aubry's Dog.)

Ori'on's dogs were Arcoph'ones (bear-killer), and Poooph'agos (Ptoon-gluton.) (Ptoom is in Boeotia.)

Pope's dog was named Bounce. Punch's dog is Toby.

Richard II.'s greyhound was named Mathe. It deserted the king and attached itself to Bolingbroke.

Roderick the Goth's dog was named Theron.

Rupert's (Prince) dog, killed at Marston Moor, was named Boy.

Scott's (Sir Walter) dogs: his faroirute deerhound was named Maida; his jet-black greyhound was called Hamlet. He also had two Dandy Dinmont terriers.

Seven Sleepers (Dog of the). This famous dog, admitted by Mahomet to heaven, was named Katmir. The seven noble youths that fell asleep for 309 years had a dog, which accompanied them to the cavern in which they were walled up. It remained standing for the whole time, and neither moved from the spot, ate, drank, nor slept. (Sade's Usurpation, xviii., note.)

Tristan's dog was named Leon or Lion.

Ulysses' dog, Argos, recognised him after his return from Troy and died of joy.

(3) DOGS, MODELS OF THEIR SPECIES:

Argos (a Russian terrier); Baroness Cardiff (a Newfoundland); Black Prince (a mastiff); Bow-wow (a schipperke); Corney (a bull-terrier); Countess of Warwick (a great Dane); Dan O' Connor (an Irish water-spaniel); Dude (a pug); Fascination (a black cocker-spaniel); Fritz (a French poodle); Judith (a bloodhound); Kilocoe (a Scotch terrier); King Lud (a bulldog); King of the Heather (a dandie-dinmont); Mike (a Japanese spaniel); Olga (a deerhound); Romeo (a King Charles spaniel); Royal Kruger (a beagle); Scottish Leader (a smooth-coated St. Bernard); Sensation (a pointer); Sir Bedivere (a rough-coated St. Bernard); Spinaway (a greyhound); Toledo Blade (an English setter); Woodmansterne Trefoil (a collie).

(4) DOG IN PHRASES:

A dog in a doublet. A bold, resolute fellow. In Germany and Flanders the boldest dogs were employed for hunting the wild boar, and these dogs were dressed in a kind of buff doublet buttoned to their bodies. Rubens and Snyders have represented several in their pictures. A false friend is called a dog in one's doublet.

Between dog and wolf. The hour of dusk. "Entrez chien et loup," St. Roch and his dog. Two inseparables. "Toby and his dog." One is never seen without the other.

They lead a cat and dog life. Always quarrelling.

To lead the life of a dog. To live a wretched life, or a life of debauchery.

(5) DOG, USED METAPHORICALLY OR SYMBOLICALLY:

The dog. Diogenes, the Cynic (A.C. 412-323). When Alexander went to see him, the young King of Macedon introduced himself with these words: "I am Alexander, summoned the great," to which the philosopher replied: "And I am Diogenes, named the Dog." The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble, surmounted by a dog. (See Cynic.)

Dog of God. So the Laplanders call the bear. The Norwegians say it "has the strength of ten men and the wit of twelve." They never presume to speak of it by its proper appellation, gvaustija, lest it should revenge the insult on their flocks and herds, but they call it Moddlaaaja (the old man with a fur cloak).

A dead dog. Something utterly worthless. A phrase used two or three times in the Bible. (See (6).)

A dirty dog. In the East the dog is still held in abhorrence, as the scavenger of the streets. "Him that dieth in the city shall the dogs eat" (1 Kings xiv. 11). The French say, "C'est comme un barbet (muddy or dirty as a poodle), whose hair, being very long, becomes filthy with mud and dirt. Generally speaking, "a dirty dog" is one morally filthy, and is applied to those who talk and act nastily. Mere skin dirt is quite another matter, and those who are so defiled we call dirty pigs.

A surly dog. A human being of a surly temper, like a surly dog.

Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing? (2 Kings viii. 12, 13). Hazael means, "Am I such a brute as to set on fire the strongholds of Israel, slay the young men with the sword, and dash their children to the ground, as thou, Elijah, sayest I shall do when I am king?"

Sydney Smith being asked if it was true that he was about to sit to Landseer, the animal painter, for his portrait, replied, in the words of Hazael, "What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

The Thracian dog. Zoilus.

"Like cura, our critics haunt the poet's feast, And feed on scraps set by every guest."

From the old Thracian dog they learned the way.

"To snarl in want, and grumble over their prey," Putt: To Mr. Night. 1854.

Dogs of war. The horrors of war, especially famine, sword, and fire.

"And Cesar's spirit, ranging for revenge, With justice on his side, came best from hell. Shall in these confines, with a monarch's voice, Cry 'Havoc,' and let slip the dogs of war." Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.

(6) Dog (in Scripture language), whether dead or living, is a most degrading expression: "After whom is the King of Israel come out? After a dead dog?" (1 Sam. xxiv. 14.) "Beware of dogs" (Phil. iii. 2), i.e. sordid, noisy professors. Again, "Without are dogs" (Rev. xxii. 15), i.e. false teachers and sinners, who sin and return to their sins (2 Peter ii. 21).

There is no expression in the Bible of the fidelity, love, and watchful care of the dog, so highly honoured by ourselves.

(7) Dog in art.

Dog, in medieval art, symbolises fidelity.

A dog is represented as lying at the feet of St. Bernard, St. Benignus, and St. Wendelin; as licking the wounds of St. Roch; as carrying a lighted torch in representations of St. Dominic.

Dogs in monuments. The dog is placed at the feet of women in monuments to symbolise affection and fidelity, as a hound is placed at the feet of men to signify courage and magnanimity. Many of the Crusaders are represented with their feet on a dog, to show that they followed the standard of the Lord as faithfully as a dog follows the footsteps of his master.

(8) Dog in proverbs, fables, and proverbial phrases:

Barking dogs seldom bite. (See Barking.)

Dog don't eat dog. Ecclesia ecclesiâm non decimat: government letters are not taxed; church lands pay no tithes to the church.

A black dog has walked over him. Said of a sullen person. Horace tells us that the sight of a black dog with its pups was an unlucky omen. (See Black Dog.)

A dog in the manger. A churlish fellow, who will not use what is wanted by another, nor yet let the other have it to use. The allusion is to the well-known fable of a dog that fixed his place in a manger, and would not allow an ox to come near the hay.

Every dog has his day. In Latin, "Hodie mihi, cras tibi." "Nunc mihi, nunc tibi, benigna" [fortuna]. In German, "Heute mir, morgen dir." You may crow over me to-day, but my turn will come by-and-by. The Latin proverb, "Hodie mihi," etc., means, "I died to-day, your turn will come in time." The other Latin proverb means, fortune visits every man once. She favours me now, but she will favour you in your turn.

"Thus every dog at last will have his day—
He who this morning smiled, at night may wail.

The ruff to-day's a butterfly to-morrow."
P. Pindar: Odes of Condolence.

Give a dog a bad name and hang him. If you want to do anyone a wrong, throw dirt on him or rail against him.

Gone to the dogs. Gone to utter ruin; impoverished.

He has not a dog to lick a dish. He has quite cleared out. He has taken away everything.

He who has a mind to beat his dog will easily find a stick. In Latin, "Qui cultur cerdum cameum facit virentius systens." If you want to abuse a person, you will easily find something to blame. Dean Swift says, "If you want to throw a stone, every lane will furnish one."

"To him who wills, ways will not be wanting."

"Where there's a will there's a way."

Hungry dogs will eat dirty pudding. Those really hungry are not particular about what they eat, and are by no means dainty. When Darius in his flight from Greece drank from a ditch defiled with dead carcases, he declared he had never drunk so pleasantly before.

It was the story of the dog and the shadow—i.e., of one who throws good money, after bad; of one who gives cora gro inercis. The allusion is to the well-known fable.
Dog

"Ubdit species, ac den'thus astra mordit." (Down sank the meat in the stream for the fishes to board it.)

Loos me lose my dog. "Qui m'aime aime mon chien," or "Qui aime Bertrand aime son chien."

Old dogs will not learn new tricks. People in old age do not readily conform to new ways.

To call off the dogs. To break up a disagreeable conversation. In the chase, if the dogs are on the wrong track, the huntsman calls them off. (French, rompre les chiens.)

Throw it to the dogs. Throw it away, it is useless and worthless.

What! keep a dog and bark myself! Must I keep servants and myself do their work?

You are like Neville's dog, which runs away when it is called. (See CHIEN.)

(9) Dog, Dogs, in Superstitions:

"In the religious book at Bath the dogs howl when, with my breath, Great Samual, the angel of death, takes thru' the town his flight." Longfellow: Golden Legend, iii.

The hair of the dog that bit you. When a man has had a debuch, he is advised to take next morning "a hair of the same dog," in allusion to an ancient notion that the burnt hair of a dog is an antidote to its bite.

(10) Dog, to express the mate of animals, as dog-ape, dog-fox, dog-otter.

(11) Dog, applied to inferior plants: dog-brier, dog-berry, dog-cabbage, dog-daisy, dog-fennel, dog-leek, dog-lichen, dog-mercury, dog-parsley, dog-violets (which have no perfume), dog-wheat. (See below, Dog-grass, Dog-rose.

Dog and Duck. A public-house sign, to announce that ducks were hunted by dogs within. The sport was to see the duck dive, and the dog after it. At Lambeth there was a famous pleasure-resort so called, on the spot where Bethlehem Hospital now stands.

Dog-cheap. A perversion of the old English god-chepe (a good bargain). French, bon marché (good-cheap or bargain).

"Tue sack . . . would have bought no lights as good-cheap as the decent chandler's in Europe." —Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iii. 2.

Dog-days. Days of great heat. The Romans called the six or eight hottest weeks of the summer caniculares dies.

According to their theory, the dog-star or Sirius, rising with the sun, added to its heat, and the dog-days bore the combined heat of the dog-star and the sun. (July 3rd to August 11th.)

Dog-fall (in wrestling), when both wrestlers fall together.

Dog-grass (tritici repens). Grass eaten by dogs when they have lost their appetite; it acts as an emetic and purgative.

Dog-head (in machinery). That which bites or holds the gun-flint.

Dog-headed Tribes of India. Mentioned in the Italian romance of Guerino Moscena.

Dog-Latin. Pretended or mongrel Latin. An excellent example is Stevens' definition of a kitchen:

As the law classically expresses it, a kitchen is "a camera necessaria pro commensale: cum sauce, pannus, aestus, panche, scullero, dressero, cauldino, savor, skewack-jack, pro remansum, hollandum, fremundum, et plac-undando: hollandum . . . "—A Law Report (Daniel C. Bishelaltu).

Dog-leach (1). A dog—doctor. Formerly applied to a medical practitioner; it expresses great contempt.

Dog-rose. Botanical name, Cynorhodon. —.c. Greek kuno-rodou, dog-rose; so called because it was supposed to cure the bite of a mad dog (Rosa canina, wild briar).

"A moeris vero (i.e. of a mad dog) unicum remedium omnium quadam saepissim, radix s Apium roseus, quae cynorhodos appellatur." Pliny: Natural History, vii. 63; xxii. 6.

Dog-sick. Sick as a dog. We also say "Sick as a cat." The Bible speaks of dogs "returning to their vomit again" (Proev. xxvi. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 22).

Dog-sleep (A). A pretended sleep. Dogs seem to sleep with "one eye open.

Dog-star. The brightest star in the firmament. (See Dog-days.)

"Dog-vane is a term familiarly applied to a cockade."—Smith: Nature's Word-book.

Dog-watch. A corruption of dodge-watch: two short watches, one from four to six, and the other from six to eight in the evening, introduced to dodge the routine, or prevent the same men always keeping watch at the same time. (See Watch.)

Dog-whipper (A). A beadle who whips all dogs from the precincts of a church. At one time there was a church officer so called. Even so recently as 1856 Mr. John Pickard was appointed Dog-whipping 368 Dogmatic Facts

"dog-whipper" in Exeter Cathedral, "in the room of Mr. Charles Reynolds, deceased." (Exeter Gazette.)

Dog-whipping Day. October 18th (St. Luke's Day). It is said that a dog once swallowed the consecrated wafer in York Minster on this day.

Dogs (a military term). The 17th Lancers or Duke of Cambridge's Own Lancers. The crest of this famous cavalry regiment is a Death's Head and Cross-bones, OR GLORY, whence the acrostic Death Or Glory (D.O.G.).

The Spartan injunction, when the young soldier was presented with his shield, was, "With this, or On this," which meant the same thing.

Dogs, in Stock-Exchange phraseology, means Newfoundland Telegraph shares—that is, Newfoundland dogs. (See Stock-Exchange Slang.)

Dogs. Isle of Dogs. When Greenwich was a place of royal residence, the kennel for the monarch's hounds was on the opposite side of the river, hence called the "Isle of Dogs."

Dogs (Green). Extinct like the Dodo. Brederode said to Count Louis, "I would the whole race of bishops and cardinals were extinct, like that of green dogs." (Motley: Dutch Republic, part ii. 6.)

Dogs'-ears. The corners of leaves crumpled and folded down.

Dogs'-eared. Leaves so crumpled and turned up. The ears of many dogs turn down and seem quite limp.

Dogs'-meat. Food unfit for consumption by human beings.

Dogs'-meat and cats'-meat. Food cheap and nasty.

Dogs'-nose. Gin and beer.

"'Dogs' nose, which is, 1 believe, a mixture of gin and beer,'" "So it is," said an old lady."—Pickwick Papers.

Dogged. He dogged me, i.e. followed me about like a dog; shadowed me.

Dogged (2 syl). Sullen, snappish, like a dog.

Do'garees (g = j). The wife of a doge.

Doge (1 syl., g = j). The chief magistrate in Venice while it was a Republic. The first duke or doge was Anastase Paoluccio, created 697. The chief magistrate of Genoa was called a doge down to 1797, when the Republican form of Government was abolished by the French. (Latin, dux, a "duke" or "leader."

"For six hundred years . . . . her [Venice's] government was an elective monarchy, her . . . . doge possessing, in early times at least, as much independent authority as any other European sovereign."—Modern Stories of Venice, vol. i. chap. i. p. 24.

Doge. The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic was instituted in 1174 by Pope Alexander III., who gave the doge a gold ring from off his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istra over Frederick Barbarossa, in defence of the Pope's quarrel. When his Holiness gave the ring he desired the doge to throw a similar one into the sea every year on Ascension Day, in commemoration of the event. (See Bucen- taur.)

Dyvy dog. (See under Dog, No. 5.)

This alludes more to the animal called a dog, but implies the idea of badness.

Dogget. Dogget's coat and badge. The first prize in the Thames rowing-match, given on the 1st of August every year. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of Drury Lane, who signalised the accession of George I. to the throne by giving a waterman's coat and badge to the winner of the race. The Fishmongers' Company add a guinea to the prize. The race is from the "Swan" at London Bridge to the "Swan" at Chelsea.

Doggerel. Inferior sort of verse in rhymes.

Dogma (Greek). A religious doctrine formally stated. It now means a statement resting on the ipsa dixit of the speaker. Dogmatic teaching used to mean the teaching of religious doctrines, but now dogmatic means overbearing and dictatorial. (Greek dogma, gen. dogmatios, a matter of opinion; verb dokeo, to think, whence dogmatiz.)

Dogmatic Facts.

(1) The supreme authority of the Pope of Rome over all churches.
(2) His right to decide arbitrarily all controversies.
(3) His right to convocate councils at will.
(4) His right to revise, repeal, or confirm decrees.
(5) His right to issue decrees bearing on discipline, morals and doctrine.
(6) The Pope is the centre of communion, and separation from him is excommunication.
(7) He has ultimate authority to appoint all bishops.
(8) He has power to depose any ecclesiastic.
(9) He has power to judge every question of doctrine, and pronounce infallibly what the Church shall or shall not accept.

Dolgoic School of Medicine. Founded by Hippocrates, and so called because it set out certain dogmas or theoretical principles which it made the basis of practice.

Dolgoic Theology is that which treats of the dogmata (dogmas) of religion.

Dolley. (See DOLEY.)

Dolt (1 syl.) Not a dot. The dot was a Scotch silver coin = one-third of a farthing. In England the dot was a base coin of small value prohibited by 3 Henry V. c. 1.

"When they will not give a dot to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out ten to save a dead Indian."—Shakespeare: The Tempest, ii. 2

Dola'bra. A Roman axe.

Dolabra. A pickaxe used by miners and excavators.

Dolabra pontisfraxis. The priest's hatchet for slaughtering animals.

Dole far Niente (Italian). Delightful idleness. Pliny has "Non darem tamen nihil agere." (Ep. viii. 9).

Doldrums (Thir). The name given to that region of the ocean near the equator noted for calms, squalls, and baffling winds, between the N.E. and S.E. trade-winds.

"But from the bluffling head, where I watched to die, I saw her in the doldrums.

Byron: The Island, canton xii. 1.

In the doldrums. In the damps.

Dole, lamentation, from the Latin dolere, to grieve.

"He (the dwarf) found the dead bodies, wherefore he made great dole."—Launcelot Gre vit, book i. chap vii.

Dole, a portion allotted, is the Anglo-Saxon dél, a portion.

"Heaven has in store a precious dole."—Kebber, Cantilena Eros (4th Sunday of Lent).

"Happy man be his dole. May his share or lot be that of a happy or fortunate man, "—wherein, happy man be his dole, I trust that I shall not speed want, and that very quickily."—Damon and Philtus, chap v. 177.

Dole-dish. The share of fish allotted to each of one company of fishermen in a catch. Dole = the part dealt to anyone. (Anglo-Saxon dél or dél, from the verb dél-an, to divide into parts.)

Doll Money. A lady of Duxford left a sum of money to be given away annually in the parish, and to be called Doll Money. Doll is a corruption of dole, Saxon dél (a share distributed).

Dollar. Marked thus $, either seicent or §, a dollar being a "piece of eight" [reals]. The two lines indicate a contraction, as in $.

The word is a variant of the German, dahlor; Danish, daler, and means "a valley," our dole. The counts of Schlick, at the close of the fourteenth century, extracted from the mines at Joachim's thal (Joachim's valley) silver which they came into one-piece. These pieces, called Joachim's thalers, gained such high repute that they became a standard coin. Other coins being made like them were called thalers only. The American dollar equals 100 cents, in English money a little more than four shillings.

Dolly Murrey. A character in Crabbe's Borough, who died playing cards.

"A hole! how! she cried, 'the fault was mine.' Thus said she, gently, with a single word, 'Died as one taught and practiced how to die."—Crabbe: Borough.

Dolly Shop. A shop where rags and refuse are bought and sold. So called from the black doll suspended over it as a sign. Dolly shops are, in reality, no better than unlicensed pawn-shops. A black doll used to be the sign hung out to denote the sale of silks and muslins which were fabricated by Indians.

Dolmen. A name given in France to what we term "carnoles." These ancient remains are often called by the rural population devil's tables, fairies' tables, and so on. (Celtic, stow tables.) It consists of a slab resting on unheaved upright stones. Plural dolmens (dol, a table; men, a stone).

"The Indian dolmen may be said to be identical with those of Western Europe."—J. Lubbock: Prehistoric Time, chap vi. p. 47.

Dolopa'tos. A French metrical version of Sand'aban's Parables, written by Heber or Herbers or Pource Philippo, afterwards called Philippe le Hardi. Dolopa'tos is the Saracen king, and Virgil the tutor of his son Lucijan. (See SEVEN WISE MASTERS.)

Dolorous Dettie (Thir). John Skelton wrote an elegy on Henry Percy, fourth Earl of Northumberland, who fell a victim to the avarice of Henry VII. (1490). This elegy he entitled thus: "Upon the Dolorous Dettie and Dolphin. Called a sea-goose (oie de mer) from the form of its mouth, termed in French bec d'oie (a goose's beak). The dolphin is noted for its changes of colour when taken out of the water.

"Parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues
With a new colour as it glides away,
The last still loveliest." Byron: Childe Harold, canto IV. stanza 29.

Dolphin (The), in medieval art, symbolises social love.

Dom. A title applied in the Middle Ages to the Pope, and at a somewhat later period to other Church dignitaries. It is now restricted to priests and choir monks among the Benedictines, and some few others among the monastic orders, as Dom Mul-billon, Dom Calmet. The Spanish don, Portuguese dous, German son, and French de, are pretty well equivalent to it. (Latin, dominus.)

Dombev (Florence). A motherless child, hungering and thirsting to be loved, but regarded with frigid indifference by her father, who thinks that sons alone are worthy of his regard. (Dickens: Dombev and Son.)

Mr. Dombev. A self-sufficient, purse-proud, frigid merchant, who feels satisfied there is but one Dombev in the world, and that is himself. (Dickens: Dombev and Son.)

Dom-Daniel. The abode of evil spirits, gnomes, and enchanters, somewhere "under the roots of the ocean," but not far from Babylon. (Continuation of the Arabian Tales.)

"In the Domdantel caverns
Under the roots of the ocean." Southey.

Domesday Book consists of two volumes, one a large folio, and the other a quarto, the material of each being vellum. It was formerly kept in the Exchequer, under three different locks and keys, but is now kept in the Record Office. The date of the survey is 1086.

Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham are not included in the survey, though parts of Westmoreland and Cumberland are taken.

The value of all estates is given, firstly, as in the time of the Confessor; secondly, when bestowed by the Conqueror; and, thirdly, at the time of the survey. It is also called The King's Book, and The Winchester Roll because it was kept there. Printed in facsimile in 1783 and 1816.

Stow says the book was so called because it was deposited in a part of Winchester Cathedral called Domus-des, and that the word is a contraction of Domus-dei book; more likely it is connected with the previous surveys made by the Saxon kings, and called domin-boc (fibri judicatibus), because every case of dispute was decided by an appeal to these registers.

"Then sayde Gamelyn to the Justice...
This last given domes that hyn evil night,
I wil sitten in thy seto, and dressen hyn aight." Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (The Cook's Tale).

Domestic Poultry, in Dryden's Hind and Panther, means the Roman Catholic clergy. So called from an establishment of priests in the private chapel at Whitchurch. The nuns are termed "sister partlet with her hooded head."

Domicalary Visit (4). An official visit to search the house.

Dominic (St.). (1170-1221.) A Spanish priest who founded the Inquisition, and the order called the Dominicans or Preaching Friars. He was called by the Pope "Inquisitor - General," and was canonised by Gregory IX.

* Some say the Inquisition existed in 1184, when Dominic was under fourteen years of age.

He is represented with a sparrow at his side, and a dog carrying in its mouth a burning torch. The devil, it is said, appeared to the saint in the form of a sparrow, and the dog refers to a dream which his mother had during pregnancy. She dreamt that she had given birth to a dog, spotted with black and white spots, which lighted the world with a burning torch.

He is also represented sometimes with a city in his hand and a star either on his forehead or on his breast; sometimes also with a sword in his hand and a pile of books burning beside him, to denote his severity with heretics.

Dominical Letters. The letters which denote the Sundays or dies dominica. The first seven letters of the alphabet are employed; so that if A stands for the first Sunday in the year, the other six letters will stand for the other days of the week, and the octave Sunday will come round to A again. In this case A will be the Sunday or Domical Letter for the whole year.

Dominicans. Preaching friars founded by Dominic de Guzman, at Toulouse, in 1215. Formerly called in England Black Friars, from their black dress, and in France Jacobins, because their mother-establishment in Paris was in the Rue St. Jacques.

Domini Sampson. A village schoolmaster and scholar, poor as a church mouse, and modest as a girl. He scribes Latin like a porcus litera'rum, and exclaims "Prodigious!" (Scott: Guy Mannering.) (See STILLING.)

Dominions. One of the orders of angels, symbolised in Christian art by an ensign.

Domino. A hood worn by canons; a mask.

"Ce nom, qu'on donnait autrefois, par allusion à quelque passage de la liturgie, an canau dont les prêtres se couvraient la tête et les épaules pendant l'office, ne designe aujourd'hui qu'un habit de deuil pour les bais masques."—Bouillet: Dictionnaire des Sciences, etc.

Domi'noes. 1 syl. The teeth; also called ivories. Dominoes are made of ivory.

Domisl'ins. The son of a king, prince, knight, or lord before he has entered on the order of knighthood. Also an attendant on some abbot or nobleman. The person domiciled in your house. Hence the king's body-guards were called his domi'sseaux or danoisels.

Froissart styles Richard II. le jeune domoisel Richard. Similarly Louis VII. (Le Jeune) was called the royal danois.

"Dansiens ou Danoisins designait autrefois les fils de chevaliers, de barons, et toutes les jeunes gentilshommes qui n'étaient pas encore chevaliers. On le donnait aussi aux fils de rois qui n'étaient pas encore en état de porter les armes."—Bouillet: Dictionnaire Universel.

Dominsels and domiselles are diminutives of dominus, a lord. In old French we find danoisins and danoiselle. The word Ma-demoiselle is ma domisella or domoiselle.

Don is do-on, as "Don your bonnet." (See DOFF, DIP.)

"Then up he rose, and donned his clothes, And dupp'd the chamber door."
Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1. 6.

Don. A man of mark, an aristocrat. At the universities the masters, fellows, and noblemen are termed dons. (Spanish.)

Don Giovanni. Mozart's best opera. (See DON JUAN.)

Don Ju-an. A native of Seville, son of Don José and Donna Inez, a blue-stockiing. When Juan was sixteen years old he got into trouble with Donna Julia, and was sent by his mother, then a widow, on his travels. His adventures form the story of the poem, which is incomplete. (Byron: Don Juan.)

A Don Juan. A libertine of the aristocratic class. The original of this character was Don Juan Tenorio of Seville, who lived in the fourteenth century. The traditions concerning him have been dramatised by Tirso de Molina; thence passed into Italy and France. Gluck has a musical ballet of Don Juan, and Mozart has immortalised the character in his opera of Don Giovanni (1787).

Don Quixote. (2 syl.) A gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, gentle and dignified, affectionate and simple-minded, but so crazed by reading books of knight-errantry that he believes himself called upon to redress the wrongs of the whole world, and actually goes forth to avenge the oppressed and run a tilt with their oppressors. The word Quixote means The cudgelled. (See QUIXONIC.)

A Don Quixote. A dreamy, unpractical man, with a "bee in his bonnet."

Donation of Pepin. (The). When Pepin conquered Ataulf the exarchate of Ravenna fell into his hands. Pepin gave both the exarchate and the Republic of Rome to the Pope, and this munificent gift is the famous "Donation" on which rested the whole fabric of the temporal power of the Popes of Rome (A.D. 755).

Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, dispossessed the Pope of his temporal dominions, and added the Papal States to the united kingdom of Italy (1870).

Donatists. Followers of Donatus, a Numidian bishop who opposed Cæcilius. Their chief dogma is that the outward church is nothing, "for the letter killeth, it is the spirit that giveth life." (Founded 314.)

Doncaster. Sigebert, monk of Gemblours, in 1100, derived this word from Thong-caster, the "Castle of the thong," and says that Heugist and Horse purchased of the British king as much land as he could encompass with a leather thong. The thong was cut into strips, and encompassed the land occupied by the city of Doncaster.

This is the old tale of Dido and the hide, and so is the Russian Yakutaks. (See BURSA.)

† Of course it means the "City on the river Don." (Celtic, Don, that which spreads.)

Dondasch. An Oriental giant contemporary with Seth, to whose service he was attached. He needed no weapons, as he could destroy anything by the mere force of his arms.
Done Brown. He was done brown. Completely bamboozled or made a fool of. This is a variety of the many expressions of a similar meaning connected with cooking, such as “I gave him a roasting,” “I cooked his goose,” “I put him into mince-meat,” “I put him into a pretty stew,” “I settled his hash,” “He was dished up,” “He was well dressed” [drubbed], “He was served out,” etc. (See Cooking.)

Done For or Regularly done for. Utterly ruined. This “for” is the prefix thoroughly, very common as a prefix.

Done Up. Thoroughly tired and weared out. Up means ended, completed, as the “game is up” (over, finished), and adverbially it means “completely,” hence to be “done up” is to be exhausted completely.

Don'{'eq}gild (3 syl.). The wicked mother of Alla, King of Northumberland. Hating Cyanusance because she was a Christian, she put her on a raft with her infant son, and turned her adrift. When Alla returned from Scotland and discovered this cruelty of his mother, he put her to death. (Chaucer: Man of Law's Tale.)

The tradition of St. Mungo resembles the Man of Law's Tale in many respects.

Donkey. An ass. It was made to rhyme with “monkey,” but is never now so pronounced. The word means a little tawny or dun-coloured animal.

Donkey. The cross of the donkey's back is popularly attributed to the honour conferred on the beast by our Lord, who rode on an ass in “His triumphant entry” into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. (See Christian Traditions.) The donkey means our thing and the driver another. Different people see from different standpoints, their own interest in every case directing their judgment. The allusion is to a fable in Plutarch, where a donkey-driver exhorts his donkey to flee, as the enemy is at hand. The donkey asks if the enemy will load him with double pack-saddles. “No,” says the man. “Then,” replies the donkey, “what care I whether you are my master or someone else?” To ride the black donkey. To be pig-headed, obstinate like a donkey. Black is added, not so much to designate the colour, as to express what is bad.

Two more, and up goes the donkey—i.e. two pennies more, and the donkey shall be balanced on the top of the pole or ladder. It is said to a braggart, and means—what you have said is wonderful, but if we admit it without gainsaying we shall soon be treated with something still more astounding.

Who ate the donkey? When the French were in their flight from Spain, after the battle of Vittoria, some stragglers entered a village and demanded rations. The villagers killed a donkey, and served it to their hated foes. Next day they continued their flight, and were waylaid by the villagers, who assaulted them most murderously, jeering them as they did so with the shout, “Who ate the donkey?"

Who stole the donkey? This was for many years a jest against policemen. When the force was first established a donkey was stolen, but the police failed to discover the thief, and this failure gave rise to the laugh against them.

Who stole the donkey? Answer: “The man with the white hat.” It was said, in the middle of the nineteenth century, that white hats were made of the skins of donkeys, and that many donkeys were stolen and sold to hatters.

Donkey Engine (A). A small engine of from two to four horse-power.

Dony. Florimel's dwarf. (Spenser: Faerie Queen, book iii. canto 6.)

Donzel (Italian). A squire or young man of good birth.

* "He is aquire to a knight-errant, donzel to the damsels."—Batter: Characters.

Doollin of Mayence. The hero of a French romance of chivalry, and the father of Ogier the Dane. Doollin's Sword. Mervilleuse (wonderful). (Sir Sword.)

Doom. The calf of doom. The signal for the final judgment.

Doom Book (doom-book) is the book of dooms or judgments compiled by King Alfred. (See Doomsday Book.)

Doom-rings, or Circles of Judgment. An Irishland term for circles of stones resembling Stonehenge and Avebury.

Doomsday Sedgwick. William Sedgwick, a fanatical prophet and preacher during the Commonwealth. He pretended to have had it revealed to him in a vision that doomsday was at hand; and, going to the house of Sir Francis Russell, in Cambridgeshire, he called upon a party of gentlemen playing at bowls to leave off and prepare for the approaching dissolution.
Doomstead. The horse of the Scandinavian Nornes or Fates. (See Norse.)

Door. (Greek, thura; Anglo-Saxon, dora.)

The door must be either shut or open. It must be one way or the other. This is from a French comedy called Le Grondeur, where the master scolds his servant for leaving the door open. The servant says that he was scolded the last time for shutting it, and adds: "Do you wish it shut?"—"No."—"Do you wish it open?"—"No."—"Why," says the man, "it must be either shut or open."

He laid the charge at my door. He accused me of doing it.

Next door to it. As, if not so, it was next door to it, i.e. very like it, next-door neighbour to it.

Sin lieth at the door (Gen. iv. 7). The blame of sin lies at the door of the wrong-doer, and he must take the consequences.

Door Nail. (See Dean.) Scrooge's partner is "dead as a door-nail." (Dickens: Christmas Carol, chap. i.)

Door-opener (The). So Crateas, the Theban, was called, because every morning he used to go round Athens and rob the people for their late rising.

Door-tree (A). The wooden bar of a door to secure it at night from intruders. Also a door-post.

Doors [house]. As, come indoors, go indoors. So Virgil: "Suis forum divus dux... Dido... revsidi." (Then Dido seated herself in the house or temple of the goddess.) (Enid, i. 565.)

Out of doors. Outside the house; in the open air.

Doorm. An earl called "the Bull," who tried to make Enid his handmaid; but, when she would neither eat, drink, nor array herself in bravery at his bidding, "he smote her on the cheek;" whereupon her lord and husband, Count Geraint, starting up, slew the "russet-bearded earl" in his own hall. (Tennyson: Idylls of the King: Enid.)

Dora. The first wife of David Copperfield; she was a child-wife, but no helpmeet. She could do nothing of practical use, but looked on her husband with idolatrous love. Tennyson has a poem entitled Dora.

Dorado (El). (See El Dorado.)

Dorax. A Portuguese renegade, in Dryden's Don Sebastian—by far the best of all his characters.

Dorcas Society. A society for supplying the poor with clothing. So called from Dorcas, mentioned in Acts ix. 39.

Dorchester. As big as a Dorchester butt. Very corpulent, like the butts of Dorchester. Of Toby Filpot it is said: "His breath-doors of life on a sudden were shut, And he died full as big as a Dorchester butt." (W. Keafe: Poor Soldier.)

Doric. The oldest, strongest, and simplest of the Grecian orders of architecture. So called from Doris, in Greece, or the Dorians who employed it. The Greek Doric is simpler than the Roman imitation. The former stands on the pavement without fillet or other ornament, and the flutes are not scalloped. The Roman column is placed on a plinth, has fillets, and the flutings, both top and bottom, are scalloped.

Doric Dialect. The dialect spoken by the natives of Doris, in Greece. It was broad and hard. Hence, any broad dialect.

Doric Land. Greece, Doris being a part of Greece.

"Through all the bounds Of Doric land."
Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 519.

Doric Reed. Pastoral poetry. Everything Doric was very plain, but cheerful, chaste, and solid. The Dorians were the pastoral people of Greece, and their dialect was that of the country rustics. Our own Bloomfield and Robert Burns are examples of British Doric.

"The Doric reed once more Well pleased, I 'hast." (Thomson: Autumn, 3-4.)

Doricourt. A sort of Tremaine of the eighteenth century, who, having over-refined his taste by the "grand tour," considers English beauties insipid. He falls in love with Letitia Hardy at a masquerade, after feeling aversion to her in assumed character of a hoyden. (Mrs. Cowley: The Belle's Strategem.)

Dorigen. A lady of high family, who married Arviragus out of pity for his love and meekness. She was greatly beloved by Aurelius, to whom she had been long known. Aurelius, during the absence of Arviragus, tried to win the heart of the young wife; but Dorigen made answer that she would never listen to him till the rocks that beset the coast of Britain are removed and there is no stone yseen." Aurelius, by the aid of a young magician of Orleans, caused all the rocks to disappear, and claimed his reward. Dorigen was very sad, but her husband insisted that she should keep her word, and she went to meet Aurelius. When Aurelius saw how sad she was, and heard what Arviragus had counselled, he said he would rather die than injure so true a wife and noble a gentleman. So she returned to her husband happy and untainted. (See DIANA.) (Chaucer: Frankline's Tale.)

Dormant. Drawn from the Earl of Rochester, a witty, aristocratic libertine, in Etherege's Of Mode.

Dorinda, in the verses of the Earl of Dorset, is Catherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester, mistress of James II.

Dormer Window. The window of an attic standing out from the slope of the roof. (O. French, dormeur = a sleeping room formerly fitted with windows of this kind.)

"Thatched were the roofs, with dormer windows." Longfellow: Evangeline, part i. stanza 1.

Dornock. Stout figured linen for tablecloths; so called from a town in Scotland, where it was originally made.

Dorothea (St.), represented with a rose-branch in her hand, a wreath of roses on her head, and roses with fruit by her side; sometimes with an angel carrying a basket with three apples and three roses. The legend is that Theophilus, the judge's secretary, scoffingly said to her, as she was going to execution, "Send me some fruit and roses, Dorothea, when you get to Paradise." Immediately after her execution, while Theophilus was at dinner with a party of companions, a young angel brought to him a basket of apples and roses, saying, "From Dorothea, in Paradise," and vanished. Theophilus, of course, was a convert from that moment.

Dorset. Once the seat of a British tribe, calling themselves Duro-triges (water-dwellers). The Romans colonised the settlement, and Latinised Duro-triges into Duro-triges. Lastly came the Saxons, and translated the original words into their own tongue, dor-satla (water-dwellers).

Dorsemian Downs. The Downs of Dorsetshire.

"Spread the pure Dorsetian downs in boundless prospect." Thomson: Autumn.

Dosith'eus. A religious sect which sprang up in the first century; so called because they believed that Dosith'eus had a divine mission superior to that of prophets and apostles.

Do'son. A promise-maker and a promise-breaker. Antigonus, grandson of Demetrios the be-siger, was so called.

Doss. A hassock stuffed with straw; a bed—properly, a straw bed; whence the cunt word for a lodging-house is a dossingken. Dossel is an old word for a bundle of hay or straw, and dosser for a straw basket. These words were common in Elizabeth's reign. The French dossier means a "bundle."

Doss-house (A). A cheap lodging-house where the poorer classes slept on bundles of straw. (See above.)

In the New Review (Aug., 1884) there is an article entitled "In a Woman's Doss-house," which throws much light on the condition of the poor in London.

Dossor. One who sleeps in a low or cheap hired dormitory. The verb doss = to sleep.

Do-the-Boys' Hall. A school where boys were taken in and done for by a Mr. Squeers, a puffing, ignorant, overbearing brute, who starved them and taught them nothing. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.)

It is said that Mr. Squeers is a caricature of Mr. Shaw, a Yorkshire schoolmaster; but Mr. Shaw was a kind-hearted man, and his boys were well fed, happy, and not ill-taught. Like Squeers he had only one eye, and like Squeers he had a daughter. It is said that his school was run by Dickens's caricature.

Dot and go Ono (A). An infant just beginning to toddle; one who limps in walking; a person who has one leg longer than the other.

Dot'terel or Dot'trel. A doting old fool; an old man easily cajoled. The bird thus called, a species of plover, is said to be so fond of imitation that any one who excites its curiosity by strange antics may catch it.

To dor the dot'trel. Dor is an archaic word meaning to trick or cheat. Whence the phrase to "dor the dot'trel" means to cheat the simpleton.

Dou'ay Bible. The English translation of the Bible sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Church. The Old Testament was published by the English college at Douay, in France, in 1589; but the New Testament was published at Rheims in 1582. The English college at Douay was founded by William Allen (afterwards cardinal) in 1568. The Douay Bible translates such words as repentance by the word penance, etc., and the whole contains notes by Roman Catholic divines.

Double (To). To pass or sail round, as "to double the cape." The cape (or point) is twice between the ship and the land. (French, doubler; Latin, dobro.)

Douglas. To double or quit. The winner stakes his stake, and the loser promises to pay twice the stake if he loses again; but if he wins the second throw he pays nothing, and neither player loses or wins anything. This is often done when the stake is 3d., and the parties have no copper: if the loser loses again, he pays 6d.; if not, the winner does not claim his 3d.

Doubles or Double-walkers. Those aerial duplicates of men or women who represent them so minutely as to deceive those who know them. We apply the word to such persons as the Dromio brothers, the Coriscan brothers, and the brothers Antipholus. The "head centre Stephens" is said to have had a double, who was perpetually leading astray those set to hunt him down.

Doubling Castle. The castle of the giant Despair, in which Christian and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called "Promise." (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress.)

Douceur. (French.) A gratuity for service rendered or promised.

Douglas. The tutelary saint of the house of Douglas is St. Bridget. According to tradition, a Scottish king in 770, whose rank had been broken by the fierce onset of the Lord of the Isles, saw the tide of battle turned in his favour by an unknown chief. After the battle the king asked who was the "Du-glass" chieftain, his deliverer, and received for answer Sholto Du-ghlas. (Behold the dark-grey man you inquired for.) The king then rewarded him with the Clyde-valley for his services.

"Let him not cross or thrust me," said the page, "for I will not yield him an inch of way, but lie in his body the soul of every Briton that has lived since the time of the Duke of Monm.," - Scott. The Abbot, chap. XXXI.

Black Douglas, introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Castle Dangerous, is James, eighth Lord Douglas, who twice took Douglas Castle from the English by stratagem. The first time he partly burnt it, and the second time he utterly razed it to the ground. The castle, says Godschart, was nicknamed the hazardous or dangerous, because every one who attempted to keep it from the "gud schyr James" was in constant jeopardy by his wiles.

"The Good Sir James, the dreadful blacke Douglass. That in his days so wise and worthie was, Who here and on the insidels of Spain, Such honour, praise, and triumphs did receiue," - Gordon.
Douglas

The person generally called "Black Douglas" is William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, who died in 1390. It was of this Douglas that Sir W. Scott said—

"The name of this indefatigable chief has become so formidable, that women used, in the northern counties, to Still their tow'rd children by threatening them with the Black Douglas."—History of Scotland, chap. xi.

Douglas Tragedy (The). A ballad in Scott's Border Minstrelsy. Lord William steals away Lady Margaret Douglas, but is pursued by her father and two brothers. Being overtaken, a tight ensues, in which the father and his two sons are sore wounded. Lord William, wounded, creeps to his mother's house, and there dies; the lady before sunrise next morning dies also.

Dousen the Glim. Put out the light; also knock out a man's eye. To douse is to lower in haste, as "Douse the top-sail!" Glim, gleam, glimmer, are variants of the same word.

Yet, and so you would turn honest, Captain Goff, a-seeing, would ye! said an old weather-beaten pirate who had lost one eye: 'What though he made my eye down the glim... he is an honest man.'—The Pirate, chap. xxxiii.

Dousterswivel. A German swindler, who obtains money under the promise of finding buried wealth by a divining-rood. (Scott: Antiquary.)

Dout. A contraction of do-out, as don is of do-on, doff of do-off, and dup of do-up.

In Devonshire and other southern counties they still say Dout the candle and Dout the fire. In some counties extinguishers are called douters.

"The drum of base
Both all the more substance dount."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1. 4.

Dove—i.e., the diver-bird; perhaps so called from its habit of ducking the head. So also columba (the Latin for dove) is the Greek columbias (a diver).

Dove (The). The dove, in Christian art, symbolises the Holy Ghost. In church windows the seven rays proceeding from the dove signify the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. It also symbolises the human soul, and as such is represented coming out of the mouth of saints at death.

A dove with six wings is emblematic of the Church of Christ.

The seven gifts of the Holy Ghost are: (1) counsel, (2) the fear of the Lord, (3) fortitude, (4) piety, (5) understanding, (6) wisdom, and (7) knowledge.

Doves or pigeons not eaten as food in Russia. (See Christian Traditions.)

Doves or pigeons. The clergy of the Church of England are allegorised under this term in Dryden's Hind and Panther, part iii. 947, 988-1002.

"A sort of doves were噪声 'tior near the hall... [i.e. the private chapel at Whitehall! Our pampered pigeons, with malignant eyes, Beheld those inmates [the Roman Catholic clergy], The bare waste, and at evening, and at morn, A series of water and an ear of corn, Yet still they grudged that modicum."— Soiled doves. Women of the demi-monde.

Dover's Dung. In 2 Kings vi. 25, during the siege of Samaria, "there was a great famine... and... an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung [harmonium] for five pieces of silver." This "harmonium" was a plant called chickpea, a common article of food still sold to pilgrims on their way to Mecca.

In Denmark there are many tradesmen whose sole occupation is preparing [harmonium] for sale. They have always been esteemed as provision meet for a lengthy journey, and are a necessary part of the outfit of all who travel in the remote parts of Syria and Asia Minor."—Bible Flowers, p. 71.

Dover (A). A réchauffé or cooked food done over again. In the professional slang of English cooks a resuscitation dish is still called a dover (do over again).

Dover. When Dover and Calais meet—i.e., never.

A jack of Dover. A "jack" is a small drinking vessel made of waxed leather, and a "jack of Dover" is a bottle of wine made up of fragments of opened bottles. It is customary to pour the refuse into a bottle, cork it up, and sell it as a fresh bottle. This is called dovering, a corruption of do-over, because the cork is done over with wax or resin.

"Many a jack of Dover hast thou sold,"—Chaucer: Coke's Prologue.

Dovers (Stock Exchange term). The South-Eastern railway shares. The line runs to Dover. (See CLARAS; Stock Exchange Slang.)

Dovercourt or Dovercourt. A confused gabble: a Babel. According to legend, Dover Court church, in Essex, once possessed a cross that spoke; and Foxe says the crowd to the church was so great "that no man could shut the door." The confusion of this daily throng gave rise to the term.

"And now the rood of Dovercourt did speak, Confirming his opinions to be true,"—Collier of Grendon.

Dovetail. Metaphorically, to fit on or fit in nicely; to correspond. It is a word in carpentry, and means the fitting one board into another by a tenon in the shape of a dove’s tail, or wedge reversed.

Dowgate Ward (London). Some derive it from Dour (water), it being next to the Thames, at the foot of the hill; others say it is “Down-gate,” the gate of the down, dune, or hill, as Brighton Downs (hills), South-downs, etc.

Downs (Mr.). A generic name for a linendraper, who sells downs, a coarse linen cloth, so called from Doulens in Picardy, where it is manufactured.

Downing (Captain). A character in Crabbe’s Borough; a great drunkard, who died in his cups.

“Come fill my glass. He took it and he went”
(i.e. died). Letter xvi.

Down. He is quite down in the month.
Out of spirits; disheartened. When persons are very sad and low-spirited, the corners of the mouth are drawn down. “Down in the jib” is a nauti-tical phrase of the same meaning.

Down in the Dumps. Low-spirited.

Down on Him (To be). I was down on him in a minute. I pounced on him directly; I detected his trick immediately. Also to treat harshly. The allusion is to birds of prey.

Down on his Luck. In ill-luck.

“‘I guess, stranger, you’ll find me an ex-president down on his luck.’” A. B. Hanby: Bart.

Down to the Ground. That suits me down to the ground. Entirely.

Down - hearted. Without spirit;
the heart prostrated.

Down Town. I am going down town,
i.e. to the business part of the town.

Down the country properly means down the slope of the land, or as the rivers run.

*We say “I am going up to town” when we mean out of the country into the chief city.

Down-trod. Despised, one trodden under foot.

“T will lift
The down-trod Mortimer as high t’ the air
As this ungrateful knave.”
Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. i. 2.

Downfall (A). A heavy shower of rain; a loss of social position.

Downing Professor. The Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1800 by Sir George Downing, Bart.

Downing Street (London). Named after Sir George Downing, who died 1684. He was elected M.P. for Morpeth in 1661.

Downpour (A). A very heavy shower of rain. “A regular downpour.”

Downright. Thoroughly, as “downright honest,” “downright mad”; outspoken; utter, as a “downright shame.”
The word means from top to bottom, throughout.

Downright Dunstable. Very blunt, plain speaking. The present town of Dunstable is at the foot of the Chiltern Hills, in Bedfordshire. There was somewhere about the same site a Roman station called Magionium or Magintum, utterly destroyed by the Danes, and afterwards overgrown by trees. Henry I. founded the present town, and built there a palace and priory.

“If this is not plain speaking, there is no such place as downright Dunstable.”—Sir W. Scott: Edgewartie, chap. xvii.

Downstairs. Stairs leading from a higher to a lower floor; on the lowest floor, as “I am downstairs.”

Downy (The). Bed. Gone to the downy, gone to bed. Bed being stuffed with down.

Downy Cove (A). A knowing fellow, up to every dodge. On the “Lucus a non lucendo” principle, contraries are often substituted in slang and facetious phrases. (See Lucis a non Lucendo.)

Dowsabell. Daughter of Cassamen, a knight of Arden, who fell in love with a shepherd. The two make love with Arcadian simplicity, and vow eternal fidelity.

With that she bent her snow-white knee
Down by the shepherd kneeled she,
And him she sweetly kiss’d,
With that the shepherd whooped for joy.
Quoth he, “There’s never shepherd but That ever was so blind.”
Dryden: Dowse (a ballad).

Dowse on the Chops (A). A ding or blow on the face. “A dowse on the blubber-chops of my friend the baronet” means a setting down, a snubbing.

Doxy. A baby; a plaything; a paramour. In the West of England babies are called doxies.

Doyleys. Now means a small cloth used to cover dessert plates; but originally it had a much wider meaning. Thus Dryden speaks of “doyley petticoats;”
and Steele, in No. 102 of the Tatler, speaks of his "doiley suit." The Doyleys were linen-drappers, No. 346, east corner of Upper Wellington Street, Strand, from the time of Queen Anne to the year 1850.

Dozen. (See Baker's Dozen.)

D. P. or Dom. Proc. The House of Lords. (Latin, Domus Processum.)

Drac. A sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is the caverns of rivers. Sometimes these dracs will float like golden cups along a stream to entice women and children bathing, and when they attempt to catch the prize drag them under water. (South of France mythology.)

"Faire le drac, same as "Faire le diable," Irish, "Play the Puck;" English, "Play the dace."

"Belamen qu'y eux tarz le Drac
Se jamay troilh dus un sac
Cinc d'sies milante pisto'ius
Exapos cumu de rodoyes."

Gaudenzia: Castelo e l'Ayer.

Drachenfels (Dragon-rocks). So called from the legendary dragon killed there by Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungen-Lied.

"The castled rag of Drachenfels
Frowne o'er the wide and windling Rhine,
Whose breast of waters broadly swells
Between the banks which bear the vine."

Byron: Child Harold, iii. 55.

Draco'nan Code. One very severe. Draco was an Athenian law-maker. As every violation of a law was made in this code a capital offence, Demædis the orator said "that Draco's code was written in human blood."

Draft. The Druids borrowed money on promises of repayment after death (Patricia). Purchas tells us of some priests of Pekin, who barter with the people in bills of exchange, to be paid in heaven a hundredfold.

Draft on Aldgate (A), or A draft on Aldgate pump. A worthless note of hand; a fraudulent draft or money order. The pun is between draft or draught of drink, and draft a money order on a bank.

Drag in, Neck and Crop, or To drag in, head and shoulders. To introduce a subject or remark abruptly. (See A Propos de Bottes.)

Draggle-tail. A slut; a woman who allows her petticoats to trail in the dirt. The word should be "daggle-tail" (q.v.), from the Scotch dog (dew on the grass), daggl (wet with the grass-dew), like the Latin collus'tulo irro're.

Dragoman (plural, Dragomans). A cicerone; a guide or interpreter to foreigners. (Arabic targumah, an interpreter; whence targum.)

"My dragoman had me completely in his power, and I resolved to become independent of all interpreters."-Baker: Albert Nyrusus, chap. i. p. 8.

Dragon. The Greek word drakos comes from a verb meaning "to see," to "look at," and more remotely "to watch" and "to flash."

The animal called a dragon is a winged crocodile with a serpent's tail; whence the words serpent and dragon are sometimes interchangeable.

From the meaning a watcher we get the notion of one that watches; and from the meaning "to flash," we connect the word with meteors.

"Swift, swift, go dragons of the night!—that Dawning of the morning light.
May haro the raven's eye."

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, ii. 2.

Dragon. This word is used by ecclesiastics of the Middle Ages as the symbol of sin in general and paganism in particular. The metaphor is derived from Rev. xii. 9, where Satan is termed "the great dragon." In Ps. xci. 13 it is said that the saints "shall trample the dragon under their feet." In the story of the Fall, Satan appeared to Eve in the semblance of a serpent, and the promise was made that in the fulness of time the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head.

Another source of dragon legends is the Celtic use of the word for "a chief." Hence pen-dragon (summus rex), a sort of dictator, created in times of danger. Those knights who slew a chief in battle slew a dragon, and the military title soon got confounded with the fabulous monster. Dragon, meaning "quick sighted," is a very suitable word for a general.

Some great inundations have also been termed serpents or dragons. Hence Apollo (the sun) is said to have destroyed the serpent Python (i.e. dried up the overflow). Similarly, St. Romana delivered the city of Rouen from a dragon, named Gargouille (waterspout), which lived in the river Seine.

From the idea of watching, we have a dragon placed in the garden of the Hesperides; and a duenna is poetically called a dragon:

"In England the garden of beauty is kept
By a dragon of jewely placed within call;
But so oft the tempestuous dragon hath slept,
That the garden's hut carelessly watched
After all."

T. Moore: Irish Melodies. No. 2 ("We may roam through this world," etc.).
A spiteful, violent, tyrannical woman is called a dragoness.

The blind dragon, the third party who plays propriety in flirtations.

"This state of affairs was hailed with undisguised thankfulness by the rector, whose feeling the harmony had been rudely jarred by the necessity of his acting the blind dragon."—J. O. Hobbes: Some Emotions and a Moral, chap. iv.

Dragon in Christian art symbolises Satan or sin. In the pictures of St. Michael and St. Margaret it typifies their conquest over sin. Similarly, when represented at the feet of Christ and the Virgin Mary. The conquest of St. George and St. Silvester over a dragon means their triumph over paganism. In the pictures of St. Martha it means the inundation of the Rhone, spreading pestilence and death; similarly, St. Romanus delivered Rouen from the inundation of the Seine, and Apollo's conquest of the python means the same thing. St. John the Evangelist is sometimes represented holding a chalice, from which a winged dragon is issuing.

Ladies guarded by dragons. The walls of feudal castles ran winding round the building, and the ladies were kept in the securest part. As adventurers hr.1 to scale the walls to gain access to the ladies, the authors of romance said they overcame the serpent-like defence, or the dragon that guarded them. Sometimes there were two walls, and then the bold invader overcame two dragons in his attempt to liberate the captive damsel. (See Enchanted Castles.)

A flying dragon. A meteor. The Chinese dragon. In China, the drawing of a five-clawed dragon is not only introduced into pictures, but is also embroidered on state dresses and royal robes. This representation is regarded as an amulet.

The Green Dragon. A public-house sign in compliment to St. George.

The Red Dragon. A public-house sign in compliment to Henry VII., who adopted this device for his standard at Bosworth Field. It was the ensign of Cudwallader, the last of the British kings, from whom the Tudors descended.

Dragon Slayers.

(1) St. Philip the Apostle is said to have destroyed a huge dragon at Hieropolis, in Phrygia.

(2) St. Martha killed the terrible dragon called Tarasque at Aix (la Chapelle).

(3) St. Florent killed a dragon which haunted the Loire.

(4) St. Cado, St. Maudet, and St. Paul did similar feats in Brittany.

(5) St. Keyne of Cornwall slew a dragon.

(6) St. Michael, St. George, St. Margaret, Pope Sylvester, St. Samson (Archbishop of Dol), Donatus (fourth century), St. Clement of Metz, and many others, killed dragons.

(7) St. Romain of Rouen destroyed the huge dragon called La Gargouille, which ravaged the Seine.

Dragon of Wantley (i.e. Werncliff, in Yorkshire). A monster slain by More, of More Hall, who procured a suit of armour studded with spikes; and, proceeding to the well where the dragon had his lair, kicked it in the mouth, where alone it was vulnerable. Dr. Percy says this dragon was an overgrown, rascally attorney, who cheated some children of their estate, but was made to disgorge by a gentleman named More, who went against him, "armed with the spikes of the law," after which the dragon attorney died of vexation. (Reliques.)

Dragon's Hill (Berkshire) is where the legend says St. George killed the dragon. A bare place is shown on the hill, where nothing will grow, and there the blood of the dragon run out.

In Saxon annals we are told that Cedric, founder of the West Saxon kingdom, slew there Naud, the pen-dragon, with 5,000 men. This Naud is called Natan-leod, a corruption of Ndantun leod (Naud, the people's refuge).

Dragon's Teeth. Subjects of civil strife; whatever rouses citizens to rise in arms. The allusion is to the dragon that guarded the well of Arès. Cadmus slew it, and sowed some of the teeth, from which sprang up the men called Spartans, who all killed each other except five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Those teeth which Cadmus did not sow came to the possession of Aëtus, King of Colchis; and one of the tasks he enjoined Jason was to sow these teeth and slay the armed warriors that rose therefrom.

"Citizens rising from the soil, richly sown with dragon's teeth, for the rights of their several states."—The Times.

To sow dragons' teeth. To foment contentions; to stir up strife or war. The reference is to the classical story of Jason or that of Cadmus, both of whom sowed the teeth of a dragon which he had slain, and from these teeth sprang up armies of fighting men, who attacked each other in fierce fight. Of course, the figure means that quarrels often arise out of a contention supposed to have been allayed (or slain). The Philistines sowed dragons' teeth when they took Samson, bound him, and put out his eyes. The ancient Britons sowed dragons' teeth when they massacred the Danes on St. Bryce's Day.

Dragonaedes (3 syl.). A series of religious persecutions by Louis XIV., which drove many thousand Protestants out of France. Their object was to root out "heresy;" and a bishop, with certain ecclesiastics, was sent to see if the heretics would recant; if not, they were left to the tender mercies of the dragoons who followed these "ministers of peace and goodwill to man."

"France was drifting toward the fatal atrocities of the dragonade."—P. Parkman: The Old Regime, chap. IV., p. 187.

Dragoons. So called because they used to be armed with dragons, i.e. short muskets, which spouted fire like the fabulous beast so named. The head of a dragon was wrought on the muzzle of these muskets.

Drake means the "duck-king." The old English word end means a duck, and end-ric becomes dric, drake. Similarly the German tauber-rich is a male dove, and ganse-rich, a male goose, or gander.

Drama. Father of the French drama.

Etienne Jodelle (1552-1573).

Father of the Greek drama. Thespis (sixth century B.C.).

Father of the Spanish drama. Lope de Vega (1562-1635).

Drama of Exile (A). A poem by Elizabeth Barret Browning (1844). The exile is Eve, driven out of Paradise into the wilderness. Lucifer, Gabriel, and Christ are introduced into the poem, as well as Adam and Eve.

Dramatic Unities (The three). One catastrophe, one locality, one day. These are Aristotle's rules for tragedy, and the French plays strictly follow them.

The French have added a fourth, one style. Hence comedy must not be mixed with traged. Addison's Cato is a good example. Unity of style is called the Unity of Uniformity. Shakespeare disregards all these canons.

Dramatis Personae. The characters of a drama, novel, or actual transaction.

"The dramatic personae were nobles, country gentlemen, justices of the quorum, and custodias rotulorum (keepers of the rolls)."—The Truce.

Drap. One of Queen Mab's maids of honour. (Drayton.)

Draper's Letters. A series of letters written by Dean Swift to the people of Ireland, advising them not to take the copper money coined by William Wood, by patent granted by George I. These letters crushed the infamous job, and the patent was cancelled.

Dean Swift signed himself M. B. Dra- pier in these letters.

Drat 'em! A variant of Od rot 'em! The first word is a minced form of the word God, as in "Od's blood!" "Od sounds!"=God's wounds, "Od's bodi-kins," etc. (See Od's.) A correspondent in Notes and Queries suggests "[May] God out-root them!" but we have the words draise and thrattle (to choke) which would better account for the a and the o, and which are also imprecations.

Draught of Thor (The). The ebb of the sea. When Asa Thor visited Jötunheim he was set to drain a bowl of liquor. He took three draughts, but only succeeded in slightly reducing the quantity. On leaving Jötunheim, the king, Giant Skrymir, told him he need not be ashamed of himself, and showed him the sea at low ebb, saying that he had drunk all the rest in his three draughts. We are told it was a quarter of a mile of sea-water that he drank.

Drupair. Odin's magic ring, from which every ninth night dropped eight rings equal in size and beauty to itself.

Draw.

To draw amiss. To follow scent in the wrong direction. Fox-hunting term, where to draw means to follow scent.

To draw a furrow. To plough or draw a plough through a field so as to make a furrow.

To draw a person out. To entice a person to speak on any subject, often with the intention of ridiculing his utterances.

Draw it Mild (To). We talk of remarks being highly flavoured, of strong language, of piquant remarks, of spicy words; so that to "draw it mild" refers to liquor; let it be mild, not too highly-flavoured, not too spicy and strong.

Draw the Long Bow (To). To exaggerate. Some wonderful tales are told of Robin Hood and other foresters practised in the long bow. (See Bow.)

Drawback. Something to set against the profits or advantages of a concern. In commerce, it is duty charged on goods paid back again when the goods are exported.

"It is only on goods into which dutiable commodities have entered in large proportion, and obvious ways that drawbacks are allowed."—2. George: Protection or Free Trade, chap ix. p. 65

Dreadnought. A burlesque tyrant in The Rehearsal, by G. Villiers, Duke of Buckingham (1672). He kills every one, "sparing neither friend nor foe." The name stands for a blustering brag-gart, and the farce is said to have been a satire on Dryden's inflated tragedies. (See BAYES, BODADIL.)

"[He] frights his ministers, sancks up kings, baffles armies, and does what he will, without regard to numbers, good sense, or justice."—Bayes: The Rehearsal.

Drawing-room. A room to which ladies withdrew or retire after dinner. Also a levee where ladies are presented to the sovereign.

Drawing the Cork. Giving one a bloody nose. (See CLARET.)

Drawing the King's (or Queen's) Picture. Coining false money.

Drawing the Nail, i.e., absolving oneself of a vow. In Cheshire, two or more persons would agree to do something, or to abstain from something, say drinking beer; and they would go into a wood, and register their vow by driving a nail into a tree, swearing to keep their vow as long as that nail remained in the tree. If they repented of their vow, some or all of the party went and drew out the nail, whereupon the vow was cancelled.

Drawn. Hanged, drawn, and quartered, or Drawn, hanged, and quartered. The question turns on the meaning of drawn. The evidence seems to be that traitors were drawn to the place of execution, then hanged, then "drawn" or disembowelled, and then quartered. Thus the sentence on Sir William Wallace was that he should be drawn (destrahatur) from the Palace of Westminster to the Tower, etc., then hanged (subpinnatatur), then disembowelled or drawn (debitatur), then beheaded, and quartered (decolletit et decipitiatur). (See Notes and Queries, August 15th, 1891.)

7 If by "drawn" is meant conveyed to the place of execution, the phrase should be "Drawn, hanged, and quartered;" but if the word is used as a synonym of disembowelled, the phrase should be "Hanged, drawn, and quartered."

"Lord Ellenborough used to say to those condemned, 'You are drawn on hurdles to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged, but not till you are dead; for, while still living, your body is to be taken down, your bowels torn out and burnt before your face; your head is then cut off, and your body divided into four quarters'"—Gentleman's Magazine, 1808, part i. pp. 177, 270.

Drawn Battle. A battle in which the troops on both sides are drawn off, neither combatants claiming the victory.

Dreadnought. The Seaman's Hospital Society; a floating hospital.

Dream Authorship. It is said that Coleridge wrote his Kubla Khan, a poem, in a dream. Coleridge may have dreamt these lines, but without doubt Purchas's Pilgrimage haunted his dreams, for the resemblance is indubitable.

Dreng. A servant boy, similar to the French garçon and Latin puer. A Danish word, which occurs in Domesday Book.

Dress your Jacket (or hide). I'll dress your jacket for you. I'll give you a beating. I'll give you a dressing, or a good dressing. To dress a horse is to curry it, rub it, and comb it. To dress ore is to break it up, crush it, and powder it in the stamping mill. The original idea of dressing is preserved, but the method employed in dressing horses, ore, etc., is the prevailing idea in the phrases referred to.

Dreyfusard. Dreyfusite. An advocate of the innocence of Capt. Dreyfus, a Jewish officer of the French artillery, condemned in 1895 for betraying military secrets, degraded and sent to Devil's Island. In 1899 the first trial was annulled. He was brought back to France, retried, and again condemned, but shortly afterwards pardoned. It was believed that he was sacrificed to save the General Staff.

Drink Doop. Drink a deep draught. The allusion is to the peg tanks. Those who drank deep drank to the lower pegs. (Hamlet, i. 2.) (See PE.)

Drinks and Welcome. One of the numerous publications of John Taylor, the Water Poet (1637). The subject is thus set forth: "The famous Historie of the most parts of Drinks in use now in the Kingdome of G. Britaine and Ireland; with an especiall declaration of the potency, virtue, and operation of our English Ale. With a description of all sorts of Waters, from the Ocean-sea to the Teares of a Woman. As also the causes of all sorts of weather, faire or foul, sleet, rain, hail, frost, snow, fogges, mists, vapours, clouds, storms, winde, thunder, and lightning. Compiled first in High Dutch Tongue by the painefull and industrious Huldricke van Speagel, a grammatical brewer of Lubeck; and now most learnedly enlarged, amplified, and translated into English verse and prose, by John Taylor, the Water Poet."
Drink

Drinking like a Fish (To). To drink abundantly. Many fishes swim with their mouths open.

Drinking Healths was a Roman custom. Thus, in Plautus, we read of a man drinking to his mistress with these words: "Bene vae, bene nos, bene te, bene me, bene nostrum etiam Stephani nunc" (Here's to you, here's to us all, here's to thee, here's to me, here's to our dear —). (Stich. v. 1, 20) Persius has a similar verse: "Bene mihi, bene vestis, bene amica nostra" (Here's to myself, here's to you, and here's to I shan't say who). Martial, Ovid, Horace, etc., refer to the same custom.

The ancient Greeks drank healths. Thus, when Theramene was condemned by the Thirty Tyrants to drink hemlock, he said: "Hoc pulcro Citiae" — the man who condemned him to death.

The ancient Saxons followed the same habit, and Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Hengist invited King Vortigern to a banquet to see his new levies. After the meats were removed, Rowe'snna, the beautiful daughter of Hengist, entered with a golden cup full of wine, and, making obeisance, said, "Laurae kying, wacht heit" (Lord King, your health). The king then drank and replied, "Drinck heit" (Here's to you). (Geoffrey of Monmouth, book vi. 12.) Robert de Brunne refers to this custom:

"This is ther custom and byr geste
When they are at the ale or foot
Ihh mey be hart servate him drink
Selle my 'Wassen' to him drink;
He berr thissell sail my 'Wassen';
The other saille say again 'Drinckalle.'
That says 'Wassen's drinks of the cup,
Kiss and his felow he giveth it.'"

Robert de Brunne.

In drinking healths we hold our hands up towards the person toasted and say, "Your health ..." The Greeks handed the cup to the person toasted and said, "This to thee," "Greci in epliis postium alius tradisiri, cum nominare solent." Our holding out the wine-glass is a relic of this Greek custom.

Drinking Song. The oldest in the language is in the second act of Gammer Gurton's Needle, by John Still, called The Jolly Bishop. It begins:

"I cannot eat but little meat,
My stomach is not good."

Drinking at Freeman's Quay, that is, drinking gratis. At one time, all porters and carmen calling at Freeman's Quay, near London Bridge, had a pot of beer given them gratis.

Drive. (Anglo-Saxon drif-an.)

"To drive a good bargain. To exact more than is quite equal."

"Heaven would no bargain for its blessings drive."

Dryden: Astris Hecube. I. 87.

To drive a roaring trade. To be doing a brisk business. The allusion is to a coachman who drives so fast that his horses pant and roar for breath.

To drive the swine through the bank of yarn. To spoil what has been painfully done; to squander thrift. In Scotland, the yarn wrought in the winter (called the gude-wife's thrift) is laid down by the burn-side to bleach, and is peculiarly exposed to damage from passing animals. Sometimes a herd of pigs driven along the road will run over the hanks, and sometimes they will stray over them from some neighbouring farm-yard and do a vast amount of harm.

Drive at (To). What are you driving at? What do you want to prove? What do you want me to infer? We say the "wind drove against the sails," i.e. rushed or moved violently against them. Falstaff tells us of "four rogues in buckram who let drive at him," where at means against or towards. "What are you driving at?" is, against or towards what object are you driving or moving?

Drive Off. To defer, to procrastinate. The idea is, running away or drawing off from something that ought to be done, with the promise of coming to it at a future time.

Driveller. An idiot, an imbecile, whose saliva drives out of his mouth.

"And Swift expires a driveller and a show."

Driving Doterage. In weak old age saliva drops unconsciously from the mouth.

"This exhibition of driving dotage was attended with many other incoherent expressions." —J. F. Kennedy: The Skellow Burn, chap. xli. p. 453.
Driver of Europe (Le Cocher de l’Europe). So the Empress of Russia used to call the Duc de Choiseul, minister of Louis XV., because he had spies all over Europe, and thus ruled its political cabals.

Drivers, in the Irish uprising about 1843, were persons engaged by landlords to drive all the live stock of defaulting tenants and lodge them in a pound [like that at Carrickmacross]. They were resisted by the Molly Maguires.

Drives fat Oxen (Who). Brook, in his Gustavus Vasa, says: “Who rules o’er freemen should himself be freé,” which Dr. Johnson parodied thus: “Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat.” (Boswell’s Life, year 1784.)

Driving for Rent, in Ireland, was a summary way of recovering rent by driving cattle to a pound, and keeping them till the rent was paid, or selling them by auction.

“Is was determined that I and the bailiffs should go out in a body and ‘drive for rent.’”—Trench: Realities of Irish Life, chap. v.

Driving Pigs. He is driving pigs, or driving pigs to market—i.e. snoring like pigs, whose grunt resembles the snore of a sleeper.

Droit d’Ambaine. In France the king was entitled, at the death of foreign residents (except Swiss and Scots), to all their movable estates; the law was only abolished in 1819. Ambaine means “alien,” and droit d’ambaine the “right over an alien’s property.”

“Had I died that night of an indisposition, the whole world could not have uprooted the effects of the droit d’ambaine: my shirt and black pair of breeches, petticoats and all, must have gone to the king of France.”—Sterne: Sentimental Journey (Introduction).

Drôle. “C’est un drôle,” or “C’est un drôle d’homme” (he is a rump customer). “Un joyeux drôle” means a boor companion. “Une drôle de chose” means a queer thing; something one can make neither head nor tail of.

Dromio. The brothers Dromio. Two brothers exactly alike, who serve two brothers exactly alike, and the mistakes of masters and men form the fun of Shakespeare’s Comedy of Errors, based on the Menachmi of Plautus.

Drone (I syl.). The largest tube of a bagpipe; so called because it sounds only one continuous note. (German, drohne, verb, drohnen, to groan or drone.) A drone. An idle person who lives on the means of another, as drones on the honey collected by bees; a slaggard. (Anglo-Saxon dræn, a male bee.)

Drop. To take a drop. A euphemism for taking what the drinker chooses to call by that term. It may be anything from a sip to a Dutchman’s draught.

A drop of the crater. In Ireland means a drink of whisky, or “creature-comfort.”

To take a drop too much. To be intoxicated. If it is the “last feather which breaks the camel’s back,” it is the drop too much which produces intoxication.

To take one’s drops. To drink spirits in private.

Drop (To). To drop an acquaintance is quietly to cease visiting and inviting an acquaintance. The opposite of picking up or taking up an acquaintance.

Drop in (To). To make a casual call, not invited; to pay an informal visit. The allusion is to fruit and other things falling down suddenly, unexpectedly, or accidentally. It is the intransitive verb, not the transitive, which means to “let fall.”

Drop off (To). “Friends drop off,” fall away gradually. “To drop off to sleep,” to fall asleep (especially in weariness or sickness).

Drop Serene (gutta serena). An old name for amaurosis. It was at one time thought that a transparent, watery humour, distilling on the optic nerve, would produce blindness without changing the appearance of the eye.

“So thick a ‘drop serene’ hath quenched these orbs.”—Milton: Paradise Lost, ill. 25.

Drown the Miller (To). To put too much water into grog or tea. The idea is that the supply of water is so great that even the miller, who uses a water wheel, is drowned with it.

Drowned Rat. As wet as a drowned rat—i.e. soaking wet. Drowned rats certainly look deplorably wet, but so also do drowned mice, drowned cats, and drowned dogs, etc.

Drowned in a Butt of Malmsey. George, Duke of Clarence, being allowed to choose by what death he would die, chose drowning in malmsey wine (1477). See the continuation of Monstrelet, 196; Fulgens, ix. 12; Martin du Bellais’s Memoirs (year 1514).

Admitting this legend to be an historic fact, it is not unique: Michael Harlob, of Berlin, wished to meet death in a similar way in 1671, if we Drowning Men. Drowning men catch at straws. Persons in desperate circumstances cling in hope to trifles wholly inadequate to rescue or even help them.

Drows or Trows. A sort of fairy race, residing in hills and caverns. They are curious artificers in iron and precious metals. (Zetland superstition.)

"I hung about thy neck that gifted chain, which all in our states knew was wrought by no earthly artist, but by the Drows in the secret recesses of their caverns."—Scott: The Pirate, chap. x.

Drub, Drubbing. To fog, a fogging. Compare Greek tribo, to rub, bruise; Anglo-Saxon, dregan, to beat.

Drug. It is a mere drug in the market. Something not called for, which no one will buy. French drogue = rubbish, as ce n'est que de la drogue; hence droquet (drugget), inferior carpet-cloth made of rubbish or inferior wool, etc.

Druid. A chief priest (Celtic, der, superior; soydd, priest or instructor). In Tulaicen we read, Biuin gymhdd yogwearth an (at length I became a priest or wydd). It was after this period that the wydds were divided into two classes, the Derwydds and the Go-wyddas (D'рузphs and Ovidda). Every chief had his druid, and every chief druid was allowed a guard of thirty men (strabo). The order was very wealthy. (Not derived from the Greek drus, are oak.)

"Patrick tells us that the Druids were wont to borrow money to be repaid in the life to come. His words are: "Druidic pecuniam mutuo accipiant in posteriore vita redituri.""

Drum. A crowded evening party, a contraction of "drawing-room" (drum-oom). Cominges, the French ambassador, writing to Louis XIV., calls these assemblies driurung and driurumes. (See ROUGH, HURRICANE.)

"The Comte de Broglie ... goes sometimes to the driurung, and sometimes to the driurume of the Princess of Wales."—Nineteenth Century: Comte de Cominges, Beij., 1881, p. 461.

"It is impossible to live in a drum."—Lady M. W. Montagu.

John Drum's entertainment. Turning an unwelcome guest out of doors. The allusion is to drumming a soldier out of a regiment.

Drum Ecclesiastic. The 'pulpit cushion, often vigorously thumped by what are termed "rousing preachers."

"When Gospel trumpeter, surrounded
With lung-clogged rout, to battle sounded;
And pulpits, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with flat instead of a stick."

—Taliesin."

Drum-head Court-martial. One held in haste; like a court-martial summoned on the field round the big drum to deal summarily with an offender.

Drummers. So commercial travelers are called in America, because their vocation is to drum up recruits or customers.

Drummond Light. The limelight. So named from Captain Thomas Drummond, R.E.

"Wisdom thinks, and makes a solar Drummond Light of a point of dull lime."—Dickens: Entering on Life (N_IMM, p. 211).

Drumsticks. Legs. The leg of a cooked fowl is called a drumstick.

Drunk. (Anglo-Saxon drinen-an.)

Drunk as a fiddler. The reference is to the fiddler at wakes, fairs, and on board ship, who used to be paid in liquor for playing to rustic dancers.

Drunk as a lord. Before the great temperance movement set in, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, those who could afford to drink thought it quite comme il faut to drink two, three, or even more bottles of port wine for dinner, and few dinners ended without placing the guests under the table in a hopeless state of intoxication. The temperate habits of the last quarter of the nineteenth century renders this phrase now almost unintelligible.

Drunk as blazes. "Blazes" of course means the devil.

Drunk as Chloe. Chloe, or rather Cloe (2 syl.), is the cobbler's wife of Linden Grove, to whom Prior, the poet, was attached. She was notorious for her drinking habits.

Drunk as Heracl's cow. (See DAVY'S SOW.)

Drunken Cloak (4). A tub with holes for the arms to pass through. At one time used for drunkards and scolds by way of punishment.

Drunken Deddington. One dead drunk. The proper name is a play on the word dead.

Drunkeness. The seven degrees:

1. Ape drunk; (2) Lion drunk; (3)
Swine drunk; (4) Sheep drunk; (5) Martin drunk; (6) Goat drunk; (7) Fox drunk. (Nash.)

Drunkenness. It is said that if children eat owl's eggs they will never be addicted to strong drinks.

"Tous les oiseaux lui [i.e. to Bacchus] étaient agréables, excepté le chouette qui les vaut à rentrer les oiseaux qui les mangeaient en même temps."—Noël: Dictionnaire de la Table, vol. i. p. 306.

Drupe [the driper]. A gold ring given to Odin; every ninth night other rings dropped from it of equal value to itself. (The Edda.)

Drury Lane (London) takes its name from the habitation of the great Drury family. Sir William Drury, K.G., was a most able commander in the Irish wars. Drury House stood on the site of the present Olympic theatre.

Drusian (2 syl.). A people of Syria governed by emirs. Their faith is a mixture of the Pentateuch, the Gospel, the Koran, and Sufism. They offer up their devotions both in mosques and churches, worship the images of saints, and yet observe the fast of Ram'dadan. Their language is pure Arabic. (Hakem, the incarnate spirit, was assis'd by Daras in propounding his religion to these Syrians; and the word Druse is said to be derived from Daras, shortened into D'ras.)

Dry. Thirsty. Hence to drink to "wet your whistle" (i.e. throat); and malt liquor is called "heavy wet." (Anglo-Saxon dryg, dry.)

Dry Blow (A). A blow which does not bring blood.

Dry Goods (in merchandise), such as cloths, stuffs, silks, laces, and drapery in general, as opposed to groceries.

Dry Lodgings. Sleeping accommodation without board. Gentlemen who take their meals at clubs live in dry lodgings.

"Dry Lodging of seven weeks, 20s. 4d."—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (Intr. Rob. Patterson ded. to Margaret Chrysalte).

Dry-nurse. When a superior officer does not know his duty, and is instructed in it by an inferior officer, he is said to be dry-nursed. The inferior nurses the superior, as a dry-nurse rears an infant.

Dry Rot. The spontaneous rot of timber or wall-paper, not unfrequently produced by certain fungi attaching themselves thereto. It is called dry rot because the wood is not purposely exposed to wet, although, without doubt, damp from defective ventilation is largely present, and the greenness of wood employed contributes greatly to the decay.

Dry Sea (A). A sandy desert. The camel is the ship of the desert. We read of the Persian sea of sand.

"The sea that men sleep, the gravelly sea, that is all gravel and sand with cteeny drops of water."—Mauriceville: Travels.

Dry Shave (A). A shave without soaking the face; to scrape the face with a piece of iron hoop; to scratch the face; to box it and bruise it. Sometimes it means to beat and bruise generally; ill usage.

"The fellow will get a dry shave."—Peter Pindar: Great Dry and Little Wool, Ep. 1. "I'll shave her, like a punished soldier, dry."—Peter Pindar: The Loutsied, canto li.

Dry Style (of writing). Without pathos, without light and shade; dull level, and unamusing.

Dry Wine. Opposed to sweet or fruity wine. In sweet wine some of the sugar is not yet decomposed; in dry wine all the sugar has been converted into alcohol. The doctoring of wine to improve its quality is called dosage.

"Upon the nature and amount of the dosage, the character of the wine (whether it be dry or sweet, light or strong) very much depends."—Phizelle: Facts about Champagne, chap. v. p. 30.

Dryads. Nymphs of the trees. (Greek, dron, any forest tree.) They were supposed to live in the trees and die when the trees died. Everychlos, the wife of Orphous (2 syl.) the poet, was a dryad.

Dryasdust (Rev. Dr.). A heavy, plodding author, very prosy, very dull, and very learned; an antiquary. Sir Walter Scott employs the name to bring out the prefatory matter of some of his novels.

"The Prussian Dryasdust ... exsce all other 'Dryasdust' yet known."—Galtiga.

Dualism. A system of philosophy which refers all things that exist to two ultimate principles. It is eminently a Persian doctrine. The Orphic poets made the ultimate principles of all things to be Water and Night, or Time and Necessity. In theology the Manichean doctrine is dualistic. In modern philosophy it is opposed to monism (q.v.), and insists that the creator and creation, mind and body, are distinct entities. That creation is not deity, and that mind is not an offsprings of matter. (See Monism.)
Dub. To make a knight by giving him a blow. Dr. Tuzer says, "The ancient method of knighting was by a box on the ear, implying that it would be the last he would receive, as he would henceforth be free to maintain his own honour." The present ceremony is to tap the shoulder with a sword. (Anglo-Saxon, dubbin, to strike with a blow.)

Dub Up! Pay down the money. A dub is an Anglo-Indian coin, hence "down with your dubs," money down. A "dubloon" is a double pistole.

Dublin (the Irish duibh-lim, the "black pool"). The chief part of the city stands on land reclaimed from the river Liffey or the sea.

True as the De'il is in Dublin city. (Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.) Probably Burns refers to the Scandinavian name Diiriel, which suggested first Deiriel and then Deil or De'il.

Dubs in "marbles" is a contraction of double or doublots. Thus, if a player knocks two marbles out of the ring, he cries dubs, before the adversary cries "no dubs," and claims them both.

Ducat. A piece of money; so called from the legend on the early Sicilian pieces: S. tihi, Christe, datu, quem tu regis, sed ducatis (May this ducy [ducat-us] which you rule be devoted to you, O Christ).

Duchesse (2 syl.). Le père Duchéne, Jacques Rémy Hébert, chief of the Cordeliers Club in the French Revolution, the members of which were called Hébertists. He was called "Father Duchéne," from the name of his vile journal. (1755-1791.)

Duchess. The wife or widow of a duke; but an old woman is often jeerosly termed an old duchess or a regular old duchess. The longevity of the peers and peeresses is certainly very striking.

Duck. A lame duck. A stock-jobber who will not, or cannot, pay his losses. He has to "waddle out of the alley like a lame duck."

Like a dying duck in a thunderstorm. Quite chap-fallen.

To get a duck. A contraction of duck's egg or 0, in cricket. A player who gets no run off his bat is marked down 0.

Duck Lane. A row for old and second-hand books which stood formerly near Smithfield, but has given way to city improvements. It might be called the Holywell Street of Queen Anne's reign.

Duck's Egg. Broke his duck's egg. Took his first school prize. In cricket a "duck's egg" or 0 in a score is broken by a run.

Duck's-foot Lane [City.] A corruption of Duke's Foot Lane; so called from the Dukes of Suffolk, whose manor house was there.

Ducks and Drakes. The ricocheting or rebounding of a stone thrown from the hand to skim along the surface of a pond or river.

To make ducks and drakes of one's money. To throw it away as stones with which "ducks and drakes" are made on water. The allusion is to the sport of throwing stones to skim over water for the sake of seeing them ricocheting or rebounding.

"What favored states are best to make on watery surface duck and drake."—Butler: Hudibras, 11. 3.

"Mr. Locke Harper found out, a month after his marriage, that somebody had made ducks and drakes of his wife's money."—Dinah M. Craik: Agatha's Husband, chap. xxxii.

Duckie. Diminutive of "duck," a term of endearment — darling or beloved one. (Norwegian and Danish, dukke, a doll, a baby.)

Ducking (A). A drenching. (German, ducken, to dive under water.)

Duckwood. A weed which floats on the surface of stagnant water and forms a harbour for insects which ducks feed on. Its Latin name is "Lemna;" Greek, limnë (a stagnant pool).

Dude. A masher. One who renders himself conspicuous by affectation of dress, manners, and speech. The word was first familiarised in London in 1881, and is a revival of the old word dudes (clothes). We have several derivations, as dudder, one who sells dress-pieces; dudtery, a rag-shop; deddle, to wrap up warmly (Hultswell), etc. It is not of American origin.

"I should just as soon expect to see Mercutio smoke a cigarette, as to find him shambling about the stage with the prancing manners of a dude."—Jefferson: Century Magazine, January, 1880, p. 383.

Dudeism (3 syl.). The tomfoolery of a dude (2 syl.).

Dudgeon (The). The handle of a dagger, at one time made of box-wood Dudman.  When Dudman and Ramhead meet.  Never.  Dudman and Ramhead (now spelt Ramhead) are two forelands on the Cornish coast, about twenty miles asunder.  (See Never.)

"Make yourself scarce! depart! vanish! or we'll have you summoned before the mayor of Ha'ganar, and that before Dudman and Ramhead meet."—Scott: Kenilworth, iv.

Duds.  Old clothes, tattered garments (Gaelic, dud, a rag; Dutch, tad; Italian, tozzo).  A dudder or dudisman is a scarecrow, or man of straw dressed in cast off garments to fray birds; also a pedlar who sells duds or gown-pieces.  (Compare the Greek duoz, to put on [clothes]; Latin, in-duo, to clothe.)

Dudu.  A pensive maiden of seventeen, "who never thought about herself at all," (Byron: Don Juan, vii. viii.)

Duende (3 syl.).  A Spanish goblin or house-spirit.  Calderon has a comedy called La Donna Dueenda.  (See FAIRY.)

Dueossa [Lady].  The female of don.  The Spanish don is derived from the Latin dominus = a lord, a master.  A dueossa is the chief lady-in-waiting on the Queen of Spain; but in common parlance it means a lady who is half companion and half governess, in charge of the younger female members of a nobleman's or gentleman's family in Portugal or Spain.

"There is no dueossa so rigidly prudent and externally decorous as a supernatural coquette."—W. Irving: Sketch-Book (Spectre Bridegroom).

Duergar (2 syl.).  Dwarfs who dwell in rocks and hills; noted for their strength, subtlety, magical powers, and skill in metallurgy.  They are the personification of the subterranean powers of nature.  According to the Gothic-German myth, the duergar were first maggot in Ymir's flesh, but afterwards assumed the likeness of men.  The first duergar was Mudosgn'er, the next Dyrv, N.B.—The Giant Ymir is Chaos.  (See HELDENBUCH.)

Dueessa (Double-name or False-faith).  Daughter of Falsehood and Shame, who assumes divers disguises to beguile the Red Cross Knight.  At one time she takes the name of Fidesa, and entices the knight into the Palace of Pride (Luciferus).  The knight having left the palace, is overtaken by Duessa, and drinks of an enchanted fountain, which paralyses him, in which state he is taken captive by the giant Orgoglio.  Prince Arthur slays the giant and rescues the knight; Duessa, being stripped of her gorgeous disguise, is found to be a hideous Hag, and flees into the wilderness for concealment.  She appears again in book ii.  (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book i. 2. 7; v. 3.)

Dufarge.  Jacques and Madame Dufarge are the presiding genii of the Faubourg St. Antoine, and chief instigators of many of the crimes committed by the Red Republicans in Dickens's Tale of Two Cities.

Duffer (A) now means a person easily bamboozled, one of slow wit; but originally it meant one who cheated or bamboozled.  To duff = to cheat.  Persons who sell inferior goods as "great bargains," under the pretence of their being smuggled, are duffers; so are hawkers generally.  At the close of the eighteenth century passers of bad money were so called.  Now the word is applied to persons taken in, and by artists to inferior pictures.

"Robinson a thorough duffer is."—Alexander Smith: Summer Idyll.

Duglas, the scene of four Arthurian battles.  It is a river which falls into the Ribble.  Mr. Whittaker says, "six cwt. of horse-shoes were taken up from a space of ground near the spot during the formation of a canal."

Duke Coombe.  William Coombe, author of Dr. Syntax, The Dervil upon Two Sticks, etc., who in the days of his prosperity was noted for the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment.  Having spent all his money he turned author, but passed the last fifteen years of his life in the King's Bench.  (1743-1823.)

Duke Ernest.  (See ERNEST.)

Duke Humphrey.  (See HUMPHREY.)

Duke Street (Strand), so named from George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

Duke and Duchess in Don Quixote, who play so many tricks on the Knight of the Woeful Countenance, were Don Carlos de Borja, Count of Ficallo, who married Donna Maria of Aragon, Duchess of Villahermosa, in whose right the Count had extensive estates on the banks of the Ébro; among others he had a country seat called Cuesta, which was the place Cervantes referred to.

Duke or Darling. Heads or tails; pitch and toss. When the scolds about the Duke of York and Mrs. Clarke were the common talk of the town, the street boys, instead of crying Heads or tails, used to say Duke or Darling. (Lord Colchester: Diary, 1861.)

Duke's. A fashionable theatre in the reign of Charles II. It was situated in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was named from its great patron, James, Duke of York, afterwards James II. The modern Duke's theatre.

Duke's Walk. To meet one in the Duke's Walk. An invitation to fight a duel. In the vicinity of Holyrood House is a place called the Duke's Walk, from being the favourite promenade of the Duke of York, afterwards James II., during his residence in Scotland. This walk was the common rendezvous for settling affairs of honour, as the site of the British Museum was in England.

"If a gentleman shall ask me the same question, I shall regard the incivility as equivalent to an invitation to meet him in the Duke's Walk."—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, chap. xxxiv.

Dukeries. A district in Nottinghamshire, so called from the number of ducal residencies in the vicinity, including Welbeck Abbey, Thorby, Clumber, Worksop, Kiveton Hall, etc.

Dulcarnein. The horns of a dilemma. (or Syllagismum contrarium); at my wit's end; a puzzling question. Dulcarnein is the Arabic dhul'karnain (double-horned, having two horns). Hence the 47th proposition of the First Book of Euclid is called the Dulcarneorn, as the 5th is the yonis axiornum. Alexander the Great is called Iscander Dulcarnein, and the Macedonian era the era of Dulcarnein. Chaucer uses the word in Troilus and Cressida, book iii. 126, 127.

"The horns of the 47th proposition are the two squares which contain the right angle.
To be in Dulcarnein. To be in a quandary, or on the horns of a dilemma.
To send one to Dulcarnein. To daze with puzzles.

Dulce Domum. The holiday song of Winchester school. Mr. Brandon says it was composed by a boy of St. Mary's College, Winchester, who was confined for misconduct during the Whitsun holidays, "as report says, tied to a pillar." On the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays, "the master, scholars, and choristers of the above college walk in procession round the 'pillar,' chanting the six stanzas of the song." In the March number of the Gentleman's Magazine, 1796, a translation, signed "J. R.," was given of the song; and Dr. Milnor thinks the original is not more than a century old. It is rather remarkable that the author has made "domum" a neuter noun. (See Anon. Fiddlers.)

CHORUS:

Dulce est Desipere in Loco. It is delightful to play the fool occasionally; it is nice to throw aside one's dignity and relax at the proper time. (Horace: 4 Odes, xii. 28.)

Dulce et Decorum est pro Patria Mori (Latin). It is sweet and becoming to die on our country's behalf, or to die for one's country.

Dulcimer (Italian dolcimello), according to Bishop (Musical Dictionary, p. 45), is "a triangular chest strung with wires, which are struck with a little rod held in each hand;" but the word "symphonius," translated dulcimer in Daniel iii. 5, was a species of bagpipe. Fürst deduces it from the Hebrew sumî (a pipe).

"The sound of cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, symphonius, or dulcimer, and all kinds of music."—Dan. iii. 5.

Dulcin'ea. A lady-love. Taken from Don Quixote's amie du coeur. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcin'ea del Tobo'so.

"I must ever have some Dulcines in my head—it harmonises the soul."—Sterne.

Dulcinists. Heretics who followed the teaching of Dulcin, who lived in the fourteenth century. He said that God reigned from the beginning to the coming of Messiah; and that Christ reigned from His ascension to the fourteenth century, when He gave up His dominion to the Holy Ghost. Dulcin was burnt by order of Pope Clement IV.

Duli'a. An inferior degree of worship or veneration, such as that paid by Roman Catholics to saints and angels; Hyper-dul'ia is a superior sort of veneration reserved for the Virgin, but that worship which is paid to God alone is called lat'tra. "Dul'ia" means that sort of veneration which slaves pay to their lords (Greek, doullo's, a slave); "lat'tra" means that sort of veneration which mortals pay to the gods (Greek, lat'ren, to worship the gods).

Dull as a Fro. A crow or sti is a kind of wedge for splitting wood. It is not a sharp-edged instrument like a chisel, but a blunt or dull one.

Dull as Ditch-water. Uninteresting, ditch-water is stagnant and has no go in it.

Dullness. King of dul'nna Colley Cibber, poet laureate after Dryden

Dum Solo (Latin). While single or unmarried.

Dum Spiro, Spero. While I h e, I hope, or, While there’s life, there’s hope.

Dum Vivimus, Vivamus (Latin). While we live, let us enjoy life. The motto of Dr Doddridge’s coat of arms, which he converted into the subjoined epigram—

Dumachus. The impotent thief, called Dymas in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus In Longfellow’s Golden Legend Dumachus and Titus were two of a band of robbers who attended Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, "Let these good people go in peace," but Dumachus replied, "Let let them pay for them release." Up in thus Titus gave his fellow-robbers forty ghosts, and the infant Jesus said—

When thirty years shall have gone by, I at Jerusalem shall die. On the second true Then my right and my left side These thieves shall err to be crucified. And Titus henceforth shall abide In Paradise when I The Miracle Play, lit.

Dumb-barge (A) A barge without sails, used for a pear, and not for conveying merchandise up and down a river.

Dumb-bell Nebula. (The) A still congealing mass, so called from being of the shape of a dumb-bell.

Dumb-bells. A corruption of Dumps or Dumpsies, the same word as Dumpho’s, and meaning heavy (weights) (German and Danish, dum, heavy, dull unspaid, dumpling, a heavy, impud. pudding, dump, heavy, stupid moroseness) (See Dump).

Dumb-bells. In New College, Oxford, there still is an apparatus for developing the muscles similar to that which sets church-bells in motion. It consists of a fly-wheel with a weight attached, and the gymnas is carried by it up and down to bring his muscles into play. The present apparatus was substituted for it, and answers a similar purpose, though the name is greatly obscured.

Dumb-bidding. A sale by auction effected thus. The owner fixes an upset price on an article, writes it on a slip of paper, and covers the slip up. The article is then offered to the bidders, and withdrawn unless some bid reaches the upset price.

Dumb-cook (In) To broil meat, to cow (Anglo-Indian). Dumb Crambo. (See Crambo).

Dumb Dog (A) One who remains silent when he ought to speak.

Dumb Ox of Cologne (In) Thomas Aquinas (1224-1274), known afterwards as "the Angelic Doctor" or "Angel of the Schools," Albertus Magnus, the tutor of the "dumb ox," said of him, "The dumb ox will one day tell the world with his lowering." He was born at Naples, but was a student in the monastery of Cologne.

Dumb-waiter. A piece of dunegoom furniture, fitted with shelves, to hold glasses, dishes, and plates. So called because it answers all the purposes of a waiter, and is not possessed of an insolent tongue or the gift of carrying food from a kitchen to the dining-room, etc.

Dum my. In three-handed what the exposed hand is called dummy.

Dum'bies (2 syll) Empty bottles or drawers in a druggist’s shop. Wooden heads in a hardware’s shop. Is figures. in a tailor's shop; persons on the stage who appear before the lights, but have nothing to say. These all are dumb, actually or figuratively.

Dump. A Brazilian copper coin, worth about 2d.; also a round flat lump of lead used on board ship for playing quoits and chuck-penny. Hence dumpy or dump (squint or small). An egg is called a humpdy-dumpty in the nursery verses beginning with "*Humpdy Dumpty sat on a wall," etc.

"Death saw two players playing cards.
- But the game was not worth a dump."

Dumps. To be in the dumps. Out of spirits; in the "sulens." According to a mythological fable, it is derived from Dumps, King of Egypt, who built a pyramid and died of melancholy. Gay's Third Pastoral is Wednesday, or the Dumps.

(1) "Why, how now, daughter Katharine? in your dumps?" — Shakspeare: Taming of the Shrew, ii. 1.

(2) "An unnerate dum . . . is an inferior creditor of some ten shillings or downwards, contracted for horse-hire, or perchance drink; too wnek to be put in suite." — Bishop Erskine: Microcosmographius (1601-1603).

Squire Dun. The hangman between Richard Brandin and Jack Ketch.

"And presently a batter got,
Made of the best strong hempen leer;
And, ere a cat could lick his ear,
Had tied him up with such art.
As Dun himself could do for a heart."

Dun Cow. The dun cow of Dunsmore heath was a savage beast slain by Sir Guy, Earl of Warwick. A huge tusk, probably that of an elephant, is still shown at Harwich Castle as one of the horns of the dun-cow. (See Guy.)

The fable is that this cow belonged to a giant, and was kept on Mitchell Fold (middle fold), Shropshire. Its milk was inexhaustible; but one day an old woman who had filled her pail, wanted to fill her sieve also. This so enraged the cow, that she broke loose from the fold and wandered to Dunsmore heath, where she was slain by Guy of Warwick.

Isaac Taylor, in his Words and Places (p. 269), says the dun cow is a corruption of the Dona Gau or Danish settlement in the neighbourhood of Warwick. Gau, in German, means region, country. If this explanation is correct, the great achievement of Guy was a victory over the Danes, and taking from them their settlement near Warwick.

Dun in the Mire. To draw Dun out of the mire. To lend a helping hand to one in distress. The allusion is to an English game, explained by Mr. Gifford in his edition of Ben Jonson, vii. 283. A log of wood is brought into a room. The log, called Dun, is supposed to have fallen into the mire, and the players are to pull him out. Every player does all he can to obstruct the others, and as often as possible the log is made to fall on some one's toes. Constant allusion is made to this game.

"If thou art dun, we'll draw thee from the mire." — Shakspeare: Romeo and Juliet, I. 4.

"Well done, my masters, lend your hands;
Draw Dun out of the ditch.
Draw, pull, help all. Ho, ho; well done."

Dickens of Suffolk (1831).

Dunce. A dolt; a stupid person. The word is taken from Duns Scotus, the learned schoolman and great supporter of the immaculate conception. His followers were called Dunsters. Tyndal says, when they saw that their hair-splitting divinity was giving way to modern theology, "the old barking curs raged in every pulpit" against the classics and new notions, so that the name indicated an opponent to progress, to learning, and hence a dunce.

"He knew what's what, and that's as high
As metaphysic wit can fly . . . .
A second Thomas, or at once
To blame them all, another Dunce."

Butler: Hudibras, I. 1.

Dun'cadiad. The dunciadic, an satire by Alexander Pope. Enuden, the poet laureate, being dead, the goddess of Dunless elects Colley Cibber to be his successor. The installation is celebrated by games, the most important being the proposal to read, without sleeping, two voluminous works—one in verse and the other in prose: as everyone falls asleep, the games come to an end. King Cibber is now taken to the temple of Dunless, and is lulled to sleep on the lap of the goddess; and, during his slumber, sees in a vision the past, present, and future triumphs of the empire. Finally, the Dundreary (Lord) (3 syl.). The impersonation of a good-natured, indolent, blundering, empty-headed swell. The chief character in Tom Taylor's comic piece called Our American Cousin. Mr. Sothen created the character of Lord Dundreary by the power of his conception and the genius of his acting. (See Brother Sam.)

Dungaree. A coarse blue cloth worn by sailors; coarse and vulgar. Dungaree is the Wapping of Bombay.

Dunghill! Coward! Villain! This is a cockpit phrase; all cocks, except gamecocks, being called dunghills.

"Out, dunghill! dar'nt thou brave a molyman?"

Shakespeare: King John, iv. 3.

That is, Dare you, a dunghill cock, brave a thoroughbred gamecock?

Dunghill. Thou hast it, ad dunghill, at thy fingers' ends. To this Holofernes replies: "Oh, I smell false Latin; 'dunghill' for 'ringenem.'" (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. i.)

Dunkers. (See Tunners.)

Dunmow. To eat Dunmow bacon. To live in conjugal unity, without even wishing the marriage knot to be less firmly tied. The allusion is to the institution of Robert Fitzwalter, between 1244 and 1772 eight claimants have been admitted to cut the flitch. Their names merit immortality:

1445. Richard Wright, labourer, Barnburgh, near Norwich.
1467. Steven Samuel, of Little Ayston, Essex.
1510. Thomas Ley, fuller, Coggeshall, Essex.
1761. Thomas Shakeshaft, woolcomber, Weathersfield, Essex.

1763. Names unknown!

1772. John and Susan Gilder, Tarling, Essex.

The attempt to revive this "premium for humbug" is a mere "get-up" for the benefit of the town.

"Ah, madam! I cease to be mistaken; Few married fowl perk Dunmow bacon." Prior: Tartlet and Sparrow, 288.

Dunmow Pitches. The oath administered was in the doggerel subjoined:

"You shall swear, by the custom of our confession, That you never made any nuptial transgression Since you were married man and wife, By household brawls or contentious strife:
Or, since the parish clerk said 'Amen,' Wished yourself as unmarried again;
Or, in a twelvemonth and a day, Repented not in thought any way.
If to these terms, without all fear, Of your own accord you will freely swear, A summon of bacon you shall receive, And hear it hence with our good cheer.
For this is our custom at Dunmow well known--
The sport is ours, but the bacon your own."

Duns Scotus. A schoolman, called Duns from Dunce in Berwicksire, (1265-1308.) Not John Scotus, Egeria, the schoolman, who died A.D. 875.

Dunstable. Bailey, as if he actually believed it, gives the etymology of this word Dun's stable: nailing Duns or "Duns was a robber in the reign of Henry I., who made it dangerous for travellers to pass that way." (Duns or dun's parlour, our table—i.e. the tablo-land or flat of the hills.)

Dunwright Dunstable. (See Downright.)

Plain as the road to Dunstable; or, as Shakespeare says, "Plain as way to parish church." The road leading to Dunstable is the confluence of many leading to London, but the play is on the word dunce.

Dunstan (St.). Patron saint of goldsmiths, being himself a noted worker in gold. He is represented generally in pontifical robes, but carrying a pair of pincers in his right hand. The pontificals refer to his office as Archbishop of Canterbury, and the pincers to the legend of his holding the Devil by the nose till he promised never to tempt him again.

St. Dunstan and the devil. Dunstan was a painter, jeweller, and blacksmith. Being expelled from court, he built a cell near Glastonbury church, and there he worked at his handicrafts. It was in this cell that tradition says the Devil had a gossip with the saint through the lattice window. Dunstan went on talking till his tongs were red hot, when he turned round suddenly and caught his Satanic Majesty by the nose. One cas trace in this legend the notion that all knowledge belonged to the Black Art; that the "saints" are always more than conquerors over the spirits of evil; and the singular cunning which our forefathers so delighted to honour.

Duodecimo. A book whose sheets are folded into twelve leaves each. This word, which differs from both the Italian and French, is from the Latin duodecim (twelve). It is now called twelvemo, from the contraction 12mo. The term is still applied to books that are the same size as the old duodecimo, irrespective of the number of leaves into which the sheet is folded.

A man in duodecimo is a dwarf. (See Decimo.)

Duomo (The). The cathedral.

"The supreme executive of Florence suspended Savonarola from preaching in the 'Duomo.'"—Symonds: Renaissance in Italy.

Dup is do up. Thus Ophelia says, in one of her snatches, "I'll dup the chamber door," i.e. did up or pushed up the latch, in order to open the door, that he might "let in the maid" (Hamlet, iv, 1). A portcullis and some other doors were lifted up or dupped.

"Iche weene the porters are drunk. Will they not dup the gate to-day."—Edwards: Damon and Pythias (1717).

Dupes. (See Day of the Dupes.)

Durandana or Durin'dana. Orlando's sword, given him by his cousin Malagigi. It once belonged to Hector, and was made by the fairies. It could cleave the Pyrenees at a blow. N.B.—In French romance Orlando is called Roland, Malagigi Mangis, and the sword arrondat or arrin'dal. (See Sword.)

"Nor plaited slain, nor tempered casque defends,

Where Durindana's trenchant edge descends."—Hoole: Orlando Furioso, book v.

Dur'ran'dar'te. A knight who fell at Roncesvalles, cousin to Montesi'nos. The tale says he loved Belerma, whom he served seven years, at the expiration of which time he was slain. In his last breath he told Montesi'nos to take his heart and give it to Belerma. He is described by Lewis as "Sweet in manner, fair in favour,

Mild in temper, fierce in fight."

Durante.

Durante bene placito (Latin). During pleasure.

Durante minore estate (Latin). During minority.

Durante viuiditate (Latin). During widowhood.

Durante vita (Latin). For life.

Durbair (Indian word). A levée.

"Durbair which might rival in splendour of colour and jewelled bravery the stories of the court of Byzantium."—McCarter: England under Gladstone, chap. iv, p. 80.

Durt'en (Dame). A notable housewife. Dame Durden, of the famous English song, kept five serving girls to carry the milking pails, and also kept five serving men to use the spade and flail. The five men loved the five maids.

"Twas Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Draggletail; And John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail."—Dunn.

Dürer (Albert). Of Nürnberg, called by his countrymen "the prince of artists," and by many the "Chaucer of painting." (1471-1528.)

* Dürer's portraits of Charlemagne and other emperors are unrivalled; but Lucas Kranach's (1472-1553) portraits of Luther and other reformers are said to run them very close in merit.

Duresley. You are a man of Duresley, i.e. a great liar and cheat. Duresley is a market-town in Gloucestershire, famous for its broadcloth manufactury. Now called Dursley. (See Fuller: Worthies.) The word "cabbage," connected with tailors, seems to confirm the notion that our forefathers had no very high opinion of their honesty.

Durham Book. By Eadfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died in 721, one of the most splendid examples of illumination in the world.

Durham Mustard. So called from the residence of Mrs. Clements, who first conceived the idea of grinding mustard in a mill, instead of pounding it in a mortar. George I. stamped it with his approval, hence the pots labelled "Durham mustard" bear the royal initials in a medallion.

Dus or Deuce. The chief god of the Brigan'tis, one of whose altars, bearing an inscription, was discovered at Grettland. (Camden: Britannia.)

Du'siens. The name given by the Gauls to those demons that produce nightmares.

"Dummones quoque 'dusieus' Galeo nuncupant."—St. Augustine: De Civitate Dei, chap. xxiii.

Dust. Money; so called because it is made of gold-dust. It is said that Dean Swift took for the text of a charity sermon, "He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord." Having thrice repeated his text, he added, "Now, brethren, if you like the security, down with your dust." That ended his sermon.
Dust. The wild Irish peasantry believe that dust is raised on roads by fairies on a journey, and raise their hats to it, saying, "God speed you, gentlemen." The Arabs think the whirlwind and waterspout are caused by evil jims.

I'll dust your jacket for you. Give you a good beating. The allusion is to dusting carpets, etc., by beating them with a stick.

To raise a dust, To kick up a dust. To make a commotion or disturbance.

To throw dust in one's eyes. To mislead. The allusion is to a Mahometan practice of casting dust into the air for the sake of "confounding" the enemies of the faith. This was done by Mahomet or two or three occasions, as in the battle of Horsen; and the Koran refers to it when it says, "Neither didst thou, O Mahomet, cast dust into their eyes; but it was God who confounded them." But the following incident will suffice: One day the Koreishites surrounded the house of Mahomet, resolved to murder him. They peeped through the crevice of his chamber-door, and saw him lying asleep. Just at this moment his son-in-law Ali opened the door silently and threw into the air a handful of dust. Immediately the conspirators were confounded. They mistook Ali for Mahomet, and Mahomet for Ali; allowed the prophet to walk through their midst uninjured, and laid hands on Ali. No sooner was Mahomet safe, than their eyes were opened, and they saw their mistake.

"When the English king pursued the Imam who had stolen the daughter of Allah, Allah threw dust in his eyes to check his pursuit." - Legend at Bort (respecting the beauty of the Georgiads).

Dustman has arrived (Thre), or "The sandman is about." It is bedtime, for the children rub their eyes, as if dust or sand was in them.

Dusty. Well, it is none so dusty, or Not so dusty. I don't call it bad; rather smart. Here dusty is the opposite of neat, and neat = spruce. "None so dusty" or "Not so dusty" means therefore, Not so unspruce, or rather smart.

Dusty-foot. (See Pe Pouder.)

Dutch. The Dutch have taken Holland. A quiz when anyone tells what is well known as a piece of wonderful news. Similar to Queen Bess (or Queen Anne) is dead; the Ark rested on Mount Ararat; etc.

Dutch Auction. An "auction" in which the bidders decrease their bids till they come to the minimum price. Dutch gold is no gold at all; Dutch courage is no real courage; Dutch concert is no music at all, but mere hubbub; and Dutch auction is no auction, or increase of bids, but quite the contrary.

Dutch Clocks, i.e. German clocks, chiefly made in the Black Forest. As many as 180,000 are exported annually from Friburg. (German, Deutsch, German.)

"A woman, that is like a German clock, Still a-repairing, ever out of frame, And never going right." - Shakespere: Love's Labour's Lost, iii. 1.

Dutch Comfort. "Tis a comfort it was no worse. The comfort derivable from the consideration that how bad soever the evil which has befallen you, a worse evil is at least conceivable.

Dutch Courtey. The cause excited by drink; pot valour.

"In the Dutch wars (in the time of Charles II.), . . . the captains of the Hollander man-of-war, when about to engage with our ships, usually set . . . a hugehead of brandy aboard before the mast, and lost the men drink . . . and our men felt the force of the brandy to their cost." - Notes and Queries (Oct 15, 1862, p. 364).

Dutch Gleek. Tippling. Gleek is a game, and the phrase means the game loved by Dutchmen is drinking.

"Nor could be partaker of any of the good cheer except it were the liquid part of it, which they call 'Dutch Gleek.'" - Gayton.

Dutch Gold. Deutsche or German gold. An alloy of copper and zinc, invented by Prince Rupert of Bavaria.

Dutch Nightingales. Frogs. Similarly, Cambrigeshire nightingales; Liège nightingales, etc.

Dutch School of painting is a sort of "pre-Raphaelite" exactness of detail without selection. It is, in fact, photographing exactly what appears before the artist, as faithfully as his art will allow. The subjects are generally the lower classes of social life, as pothouse scenes, drunken orgies, street groups, Dutch Hours, etc., with landscapes and still-life. The greatest of the Dutch masters are: for portraits, Rembrandt, Bol, Flinck, Hals, and Vanderhelst; for conversation pieces, Gerhard Douw, Terburg, Metsu, Mieris, and Netscher; for low life, Ostade, Brower, and Jan Steen; for landscapes, Ruysdael, Hobbema, Cuyp, Vandermeer, Berchem, and A. Both; for battle scenes, Wouverman.
and Huchtenburg; for marine pieces, Vandevelde and Bakhuizen; for still-life and flowers, Kalf, A. Van Utrecht, Van Huysem, and De Heem.

Dutch Toys. chiefly made in Meeiningen, part of the duchy of Coburg-Gotha. (Dutch, i.e. Deutsch, German.)

Dutch Uncle. I will talk to you like a Dutch uncle. Will reprove you smartly. Uncle is the Latin notion of patrns, "an uncle," "severe guardian," or "stern castigator." Hence Horace, 3 Od. xii. 3, "Metuentes patres vebera lingus" (dreading the castigations of an uncle's tongue); and 2 Sat. iii. 88, "Ne sis patrns willis." (Don't come the uncle over me.)

Dutchman. I'm a Dutchman if I do. A strong refusal. During the rivalry between England and Holland, the word Dutch was synonymous with all that was false and hateful, and when a man said, "I would rather be a Dutchman than do what you ask me," he used the strongest term of refusal that words could express.

If not I'm Dutchman, means, I will do it or I will call myself a Dutchman. Well, I'm a Dutchman! An exclamation of strong incredulity.

Duty means what is due or owing, a debt which should be paid. Thus obedience is the debt of citizens to rulers for protection, and service is the debt of persons employed for wages received.

"Strictly considered, all duty is owed originally to God only; but, in duty to God may be distinguished into duty towards self, towards manhood, and towards God." —Gregory: Christian Ethics, part ii. division i. p. 172.

Duun'virs (3 syl.) or Dumttri. Certain Roman officers who were appointed in pairs, like our London sheriffs. The chief were the two officers with charge of the Sibylines books, the two who had the supervision of the municipal cities, and the two who were charged with naval matters.

Dwarf (The). Richard Gibson, painter (1618-1690), a page of the backstairs in the court of Charles I. He married Anne Shepherd, a dwarf also, and the King honoured the wedding with his presence. Each measured three feet ten inches.

"Design or chance makes others wise; But Nature did this match contrive." —Waller.

The Black Dwarf. A fairy of the most malignant character; a genuine northern Duergar, and once held by the dalesmen of the border as the author of all the mischief that befell their flocks and herds. Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called, in which the "black dwarf" is introduced under the aliases of Sir Edward Mauley; Elshander, the reclus; Canne Elshe; and the Wise Wight of Muckestane Moor.

Dwarf Alberich (in the Nibelungen Lied) is the guardian of the famous "hoard" won by Siegfried from the Nibelungs. The dwarf is twice vanquished by the hero, who gets possession of his Tarn-kappe (cloak of invisibility). (See Elberich.)

Dwarf Peter (das Peter Mauch). An allegorical romance by Ludwig Tieck. The dwarf is a castle spectre that advises and aids the family; but all his advice turns out evil, and all his aid productive of trouble. The dwarf represents that corrupt part of human nature called by St. Paul the "law in our members which wars against the law of our minds, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin."

Dwarfs (under three feet in height).

ANDROMEDA, 2 ft. 4 in. One of Julia's free maids. (See below, CONOPAN.)

ARIS-TATOS, the poet, was so small that Athenians says, "no one could see him."

BRINK, or Nicholas Ferry, 2 ft. 9 in. A native of France (1714-1737). He had a brother and sister, both dwarfs.

BROOKWALLS (Count Joseph), 2 ft. 4 in. at the age of twenty. (1739-1817.)

BUCINGER (Matthew), a German, born 1704. He was born without hands, legs, or feet. Facsimiles of his writing are amongst the Harleian MSS.

CHEN (a Chinese), 2 ft. 1 in., weight 52 lbs. Exhibited in London in 1840.

COLDERRI (of Sicily). 2 ft. 1 in., weight 25 lbs. at the age of 21 (1831).

CONOPAN, 2 ft. 4 in. One of the dwarfs of Julia, niece of Anne (See above, ANUHQRADA.)

COPPERNIX, the dwarf of the Princess of Wales, mother of George III. The last court dwarf in England.

CHACL'AM' (Caroline). Born at Palsmon; 1 ft. 8 in. at death. (1811-54.) Exhibited in Bond Street, London, 1824.

DREKKE, or DUCKER (John), 2 ft. 6 in. An Englishman (1610).

FAIRY QUEEN (The), 1 ft. 4 in., weight 4 lbs. Exhibited in Regent Street, London, 1820. Her feet were less than two inches.

GIBSON (Richard), a good portrait painter. His wife's maiden name was Anne Shepherd. Each measured 2 ft. 10 in. Walker sung their praises. (In the reign of Charles I.)

HURST (Sir Jeffrey). Born at Oakham, Rutlandshire; 1 ft. 3 in. at the age of thirty (1793-30).

JUXTA (John), 2 ft. Page of honour to Queen Mary (1550-56).

LONKIN WINTER, 2 ft. 2 in., weight 57 lbs. Exhibited at Astley's in 1790.

L'ETRUS, 2 ft., weight 17 lbs. The dwarf of the Emperor Augustus.

MARKLE (Lorrie), 2 ft. 9 in., weight 43 lbs.

MIDDLES, THE. Lucas Zarate, the eldest sister, 1 ft. 5 in., weight 45 lbs. at the age of eighteen. Her sister was a little taller. Exhibited in London, 1821.

MILLER (Elizabeth), of Virginia, 2 ft. 2 in.

MITZ (General), 1 ft. 9 in. (weight 6 lbs.) at the age of seventeen. Exhibited in London, 1821.

PAUL (Simon). A Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 4 in., weight 27 lbs.
Dwile, or Dywel. A house-flannel for cleaning floors, common in Norfolk, and called in the piece "dwyling." (Dutch: duvel, a clout or swab.)

Dwile, or Dywel. A house-flannel for cleaning floors, common in Norfolk, and called in the piece "dwyling." (Dutch: duvel, a clout or swab.)

Drying Beards. The drying of beards is mentioned by Strabo, and Bottom the Weaver satirizes the custom when he undertakes to play Pyramus, and asks, "what beard were I best to play it in?"

"I will discharge it in either your straw-colour beard, your orange-tawny beard, your tawny-tawny one, or your French-crown-colour beard (your perfect yellow)."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 2.

The French crown-crown-twenty-five-francs, which therefore the French-crown-colour was a golden yellow; but the word French-crown also means laineux brought on by lice." (See Colman's A Legacy of the French-crows have no hair at all.)

Dyelers. "They call drinking deep, dyeing scarlet."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. 4.

Dying Sayings

Dying Sayings (real or traditional):

CARY (Goldsmith): "Scots, follow me!"

(Cary was killed at Ball-hun, 21st July, 1779.)

CASTLEBARD: "Banished, let me fall into your arms. It is all over." (Said to Sir B. boiled.)

CATCHBY (one of the conspirators in the gun-powder Plot): "Standing by me, Tom, and we will see the world together."

CHARLEMAGNE: "Lord, into Thy hand I commend my spirit." (See Colman's A Legacy of the French-crowns have no hair at all.)

CHARLES I. (of England, just before he laid his head on the block, said to Jusso, Archbishop of Canterbury: Remember me.)

CHARLES II. (of England): "Don't forget poor Nell." or "Don't let poor Nell starve." (Meaning Nell Gwyn.)

CHARLES V.: "All! Jesus."

Dwile, a Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 6 in. at the age of eighteen.

WANER (Lucy), 2 ft. 6 in., weight 45 lbs. Exhibited in London, 1861, at the age of forty-six.

WAXER (Lucy), married to General Tom Thumb in 1868, was also a dwarf, and in 1868 she married another dwarf, Count Perino Magri, who was 2 ft. 8 in.

WOMERSLEY (John), 2 ft. 7 in., at the age of thirty, cried crown during period.

XIT was the dwarf of Edward VI.

ZARATI (Lucia), 1 ft. 3 in., an excellent linguist of Turin, stood 5 ft. 1 in.

"Euphrasius Gallus tells us of an Egyptian dwarf not bigger than a partridge."

Several infants are known whose heads have not exceeded in size an ordinary billiard ball. The son of D. C. Miller, of Caudle-bridge, died October 27th, 1667, weighed only 4 lb. 8 oz. A silver dollar would entirely hide its face, and its mouth was too small to admit an ordinary lemon.

The head of the son of Mrs. Charles Tran., of Kingsbridge, N.Y., was not bigger than a horses' chestnut, and the mouth would hardly grasp a goose-quill. The mother's wedding ring would slip easily up its lean and thick legs.

The head of Mr. Marion Poe's child was not so big as a billiard ball, and the mother's ring would slip up the arm as high as the shoulder. Mr. Poe stands over six feet in height.

I have a list of several other ladies of similar dimensions.

FOXTAIL: "I suffer nothing, but I fear a sort of difficulty in its Ingery." (Chap.

FRANKLIN: "A dying man does not care much." (Chap.

FREDERICK V. (of Denmark): "There is not a drop of blood on my hands, said."

GREAT: "We are all going to heaven, and Yandzryke is of the company." (See Chom.

GASTON DE FOIX (called "Phraclus" for his beauty): "I am a dead man! Lord, have mercy on my soul." (Chap.

GEORGE IV.: "Watty, what is this? What! It is death, my boy. They have deceived me." (Said to his son, Sir John, when Waller.)

GEDDES: "Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu!"
...some experiments in which he was engaged. He was told that the Republic was in no need of a soldier. His father was recanting. LAVERNE (C.) (to the king): "Don't give up the ship. (Mortally wounded on the Cheesepie.)" LAWRENCE (Sir James): "By the arm of St. James, it is time to die." "LEOPOLD (The Kaiser): "Let me die to the sound of sweet music." (See STRANGE.)" "LORD-CHIEF JUSTICE (Sir Henry): "Ay! but I have been nearer to you, my friends, many a time, and you have missed me." LOCKE (John): "Oh! the depth of the riches of God, and the knowledge of God. These now. (This was said to Lady Masham, who was reading to him some of the Psalms.)" LOUIS XVI. (to the scaffold): "Frenchmen, I die as a criminal. The crimes imputed to me. Pray God my blood fail not on your view." LOUIS XVIII.: "A king should die standing." MADIBOY (James): "I always talk better lying down." MANSFIELD OF MEXICAN: "O Allah! be it so! Honorable among the glorious host of Paradise." MANSFIELD (to the priest): "Hold your tongue! your wretched chatter disgust me." MARAT (stabbed in his bath by Charlotte Corday): "Help! help me, my dear!" (To his housekeeper.) MARGARET OF SCOTLAND, wife of Louis XL of France: "O dear! qu'recoutez, tu mesurons plus?" MARIE ANTOINETTE: "Farewell, my children, for ever. I am going to your father." MARTIN (St.): "What dost thou hear, thou cruel beast?" (Said to the devil). (St. Nuptiina: Epistle to Roman.) MARTINETI (Cardinal), the Wolesie of Hungary: "For your dissimulated uttering the words, 'Jesus, Maria!'" MARY (Queen of England): "You will find the last words of the first "I am ready." MARANIELLO: "Ungrateful traitors!" (To his assassins.) MARCO FREDERICK (Charles): "I am ready." MAXIMILIAN (Emporer of Mexico): "Poor Carlotta!" (Referring to his wife.) MELOCHION (In reply to the question, "Do you want anything?"): "Nothing but heaven." MIRA-NATI: "Let me fall asleep to the sound of delicious music." (See LEOPOLD.) "MONICA (St.): "In peace I will sleep with him and take my rest." (St. Augustine: Confessions.) "MOPSY (the actress): "Reason thus with life: Louis! sweet Louis! I do love a thing That none but fools would keep. (The same is said of Paterson, an actor in the same company.)" "MORRIS (Hamnet): "Patty, joy." MORRIS (Sir Thomas): "For my coming down, you must have my best intentions." MOZART: "You spoke of a refreshment, Emilie; take my last notes, and let me hear once more what I am dying. (To his sister.)" "MURAT (King of Naples): "Soldiers, save my face; aim at my heart, Farewell." (Said to a carpenter, to shoot him.)" NAPOLEON I.: "Mon Dieu! La Nation Francaise, Sauvez-la!" NAPOLEON III.: "Were you at Sedan?" (To Dr. Conneau.) -

Nelson: "I thank God! I have done my duty. Kiss me, Hardy."

Nero: "Quo vadis, periculum!"

Palmes (the actor): "There is another and a better world." (This he said on the scaffold. It is a line in the part he was performing—The Stranger.)

PASCAL: "My God, forsake me not." PENGUIN (the king): "You have never caused any citizen to put on mourning on my account." (See FREDERICK V.)

Pitt (William): "Dear, my country!"

Pizarro: "Jesus!"

PYPHOUND (Mme. de): "Stay a little longer, M. de Thou, and we will go together." PONIATOWSKY (after the bridge over the Vltava was blown up): "Gentlemen, it behoves us now to click with honour.

Pope: "Friendship itself is but a part of virtue." PRIMROSE: "It will come for the first time, the honor is over." (See DEMOSSAY.)

RAFLESU: "It matters little how the head lies." (Said on the scaffold where he was beheaded.)

Rex: "We perish, we disappear, but the march of time goes on for ever." Richard II.: "Youth, I forgive thee!" (This was said to Bertrand de Goujins, who shot him with an arrow at Calais.) Then to his attendant note, he added "Note," and then gave him 100 shillings, and let him go.

RICHARD III. (of England): "Treason! treason!" (At Bosworth, where his heart was torn open and he joined the army of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII.)

ROBERSTHERE (taunted with the death of Dancon): "Cowards! Why did you not defend him?" (This he said to have been broken by the shot of the gandarme the day before he was guillotined.)

ROHESIAN (the Vendéan hero): "We go to meet the foe. If I advance, follow me; if I retreat, stay me; if I fall, avenge me." Rollo (Lancastrian): "O liberty! What crimes are committed in thy name!"

Saladin: "When I am buried, carry my winding-sheet on the point of a spear, and say these words: Behold the spoils which Saladin carries with him! Of all his victories, renown, and riches, nothing remains to him but this." (See SAVREUX.)

Sand (George): "Laissez la verdure." (That is—leave the spot green, and do not cover the grave with bricks or stone.)

Sackrey: "Ah, my children, you cannot cry for me so much as I have made you laugh.

Schiller: "Many things are growing plain and clear to my understanding.

Scott (Sir Walter): "God bless you all. I feel myself again. (To his family.)"

Shakespeare (to the stage): "Go, go, go, go, and make your way.

Maravillo: "Ungrateful traitors!" (To his assassins.)

Mansfield (Charles): "I am ready.

Maximilian (Emperor of Mexico): "Poor Carlotta!" (Referring to his wife.)

Melmoth (in reply to the question, "Do you want anything?): "Nothing but heaven.

Mira-Nati: "Let me fall asleep to the sound of delicious music." (See Leopold.)

Monica (St.): "In peace I will sleep with him and take my rest." (St. Augustine: Confessions.)

Mopsy (the actress): "Reason thus with life: Louis! sweet Louis! I do love a thing That none but fools would keep.

(Moore (Hamnet): "Patty, joy.

Morris (Sir John): "I hope my country will do justice.

Morris (Sir Thomas): "For my coming down, you must have my best intentions.

Mozart: "You spoke of a refreshment, Emille; take my last notes, and let me hear once more what I am dying. (To his sister.)

Murat (King of Naples): "Soldiers, save my face; aim at my heart, Farewell." (Said to a carpenter, to shoot him.)

Napoleon I.: "Mon Dieu! La Nation Francaise, Sauvez-la!

Napoleon III.: "Were you at Sedan?" (To Dr. Conneau.) - TALEMA: "The worst is, I cannot see." (But his name was Voltaire.)

Tasso: "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." (See Unabridged, and Columbia.)

Taylor (George Zachary): "I have tried to do my best; I am not afraid to die; I am ready."

Tenterden (Lord Chief Justice): "Gentlemen of this city, you may retire."

Threepenny Athenian, condemned by Criises to drink hemlock, said as he drank the poison: "This is to the fair Critias.

Thief (The Penitent): "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy Kingdom."

Thor (Lord): "I'll be shot if I don't believe I'm dying."

Tyler (Wad): "Because they are all under my command, they are sworn to do what I bid them."

Vane (Sir Henry): "It is a bad cause which cannot bear the words of a dying man."

Verplanck: "A king should die standing" (See Louis XVIII. and Bward); but his last words were: "Ut puto, Deus fio." (Referring to the fact that he was the first of the Roman emperors who died a natural death, if, indeed, Augustus was poisoned, as many suppose.)

Viozara (Holley): "Cover my face."

Walter: "Do not let me die in peace."

Watherton (Deputy): "It is well, I die hard, but not afraid to go."

Welles: "The best of all is, God is with us."

Wolsey: "I have this of my father said, "So He giveth His beloved sleep;" to which William-force replied: "Yes, and sweet indeed is the rest, which Christ giveth." (Saying this, he never spoke again.)

William 1.: "To my Lady, the Holy Mary, I commend myself; that she, by her prayers, may reconcile her beloved son to me."

William II.: "Shout, Walter, in the devil's name." (Walter Tyrell did shoot, but killed the king.)

William III.: "Can this last long?" (To his physician. He suffered from a broken collar-bone.)

William (of Nassau): "O God, have mercy upon me, and upon this poor nation." (This was just before he was slain by Balthasar Giebenr.)

Wilson (the ornithologist): "Bury me where the birds will sing over my grave."

Wolfe (General): "What, do they run already? Then I die happy." (See Ervingston.)

Wolsey (Cardinal): "Had I but served my God with half the zeal that I have served my king, he would not have left me in my grey hairs."

Woodworth: "God bless you! Is that you, Dora?"

Wyatt: (Thomas): "What I then said (about the treason of Sir Thomas More, now) is true, and what now say is the truth." (This was said to the priest who waited on him on the scaffold.)

Ziska (John): "Make my skin into drum-heads for the Bohemian cause."

Many of these sayings, like all other history, belong to the region of Phrase and Fable, but the collection is interesting and fairly exhaustive.

Dymphna. The tutelar saint of those stricken in spirit. She was a native of Britain, and a woman of high rank. It is said that she was murdered, at Geer, in Belgium, by her own father, because she resisted his incestuous passion. Geer, or Gheel, has long been a famous colony for the insane, who are sent thither from all parts of Europe, and are boarded with the peasantry.

Dynamite (3 syl.). An explosive compound consisting of some absorbent (as infusionary earth) saturated with nitroglycerine. (Greek, dynamis, power.)

"Dynamite Saturday. January 24th, 1885, when great damage was done to the Houses of Parliament and the Tower of London by explosions of dynamite. The Law-Courts and some other public buildings were to have been attacked by the dynamiters, but happily were well guarded. (See Clan-na-Gael.)

Dyett Street. Bloomsbury Square, London; now called George Street, St. Giles. Made famous by a well-known song in Bombastes Furioso:

"My lodging is in heather lane, A parliour that's next to the sky."

Dysnomas Day. Tithe day. (Portuguese, didimas, tithe; Law Latin, decima.)

E.

E. This letter represents a window; in Hebrew it is called he (a window).

E.G. or c.g. (Latin for exempli gratia). By way of example; for instance.

E Pluribus Unum (Latin). One unity composed of many parts. The motto of the United States of America.

Eager or eagre. Sharp, keen, acrid; the French aigre. (Latin, crude form, acris; "acrid," sharp.)

"It doth possesse And eul, like eager dropout into milk."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 5.

"Vex him with eager words."

Shakespeare: Henry VI., ii. 4.

Eagle (in royal banners). It was the ensign of the ancient kings of Babylon and Persia, of the Ptolemies and Seleucids. The Romans adopted it in conjunction with other devices, but Ma'arius made it the ensign of the legion, and confined the other devices to the cohorts. The French under the Empire assumed the same device.

Eagle (in Christian art) is emblematic of St. John the Evangelist, because, like the eagle, he looked on "the sun of glory"; the eagle was one of the four figures which made up the cherub (Ezek. i. 10).
Eagle (in funerals). The Romans used to let an eagle fly from the funeral pile of a deceased emperor. Dryden alludes to this custom in his stanzas on Oliver Cromwell after his funeral, when he says, "Officines haste did let too soon the sacred eagle fly."

Eagle (in heraldry) signifies fortitude.

Eagle (for lecterns in churches). The eagle is the natural enemy of the serpent. The two Testaments are the two outspread wings of the eagle.

Pliny in his Natural History (book x, chap. 3) enumerates six kinds of eagles: (1) Meleagroctos, (2) Pygargus, (3) Morphnos, which Homer (Iliad, xxiv. 316) calls perknos, (4) Percnopterus, (5) Guesso, the royal eagle, and (6) Harletoctos, the osprey.

Eagle (in phrases). Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's (Ps. cix. 5). This refers to the superstition feigned by poets that every ten years the eagle soars into the "fiery region," and plunges thence into the sea, where, moulting its feathers, it acquires new life.

The golden eagle and the spread eagle are commemorative of the crusades: they were the devices of the emperors of the East.

Eagle. The spread eagle. A device of the old Roman or Eastern Empire, brought over by the crusaders.

Eagle of the doctors of France. Pierre d'Ailly, a French cardinal and great astrologer, who calculated the horoscope of our Lord, and maintained that the stars foretold the great deluge. (1350-1425.)

Eagle of Brittany. Bertrand Duguesclin, Constable of France. (1320-1380.)

Eagle of Meaux [non]. Jacques Bénigne Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, the grandest and most sublime of the pulpit orators of France. (1627-1704.)

Eagle. The two-headed eagle. Austria, Prussia (representing Germany), and Russia have two-headed eagles, one facing to the right and the other to the left. The one facing to the west indicates direct succession from Charlemagne, crowned the sixty-ninth emperor of the Romans from Augustus. In Russia it was Ivan Basiliowitz who first assumed the two-headed eagle, when, in 1472, he married Sophia, daughter of Thomas Paleologus, and niece of Constantine XIV., the last Emperor of Byzantium. The two heads symbolize the Eastern or Byzantine Empire and the Western or Roman Empire.

Eagle-stones or Actites (aërites). Yellow clay ironstones supposed to have sanative and magical virtues. They are so called because they are found in eagles' nests. Epiphanius says, "In the interior of Scythia there is a valley inaccessible to man, down which slaughtered lambs are thrown. The small stones at the bottom of the valley adhere to these pieces of flesh, and eagles, when they carry away the flesh to their nests, carry the stones with it." The story of Sindoah in the Valley of Diamouds will occur to the readers of this article (Epiphanius: De duodecim gemma, etc., p. 30; 1743).

It is said that without these stones eagles cannot hatch their eggs.

Ear. (Anglo-Saxon, āer.)

A deaf ear. One that refuses to listen; as if it heard not.

How down Thine ear. Condescend to hear or listen. (Ps. xxxi. 2.)

By ear. To sing or play by ear means to sing or play without knowledge of musical notes, depending on the ear only.

Give ear to. . . Listen to; give attention to.

I am all ear. All attention.

"I was all ear.
And took in strings that might create a soul Under the veil of death."

Milton: Comus, 574.

I'll send you o'ff with a flea in your ear. With a cuff or box of the ear. The allusion is to domestic animals, who are sometimes greatly annoyed with these "tiny torments." There seems also to be a pun implied—flea and flea.

"The French equivalent is 'Mettre la puce à l'oreille,' to give one a good jobation.

In at one ear, and out at the other. Forgotten as soon as heard.

No ear. A bad ear for musical intonations; "ear-blind" or "sound-blind."

Dionysius's Ear. A bell-shaped chamber connected by an underground passage with the king's palace. Its object was that the tyrant of Syracuse might overhear whatever was passing in the prison.

Ear-finger. The little finger, which is thrust into the ear if anything tickles it.

Ear-marked. Marked so as to be recognised. The allusion is to marking cattle and sheep on the ear, by which they may be readily recognised.

"The increase of those wild cattle were duly branded and ear-marked each year."—Nineteenth Century (May, 1893), p. 270.

"The late president [Balmaceda] took on board a large quantity of silver, which had been earmarked for a particular purpose."—Newspaper paragraph, Sept. 4, 1891.

Ear-shot. _Within ear-shot._ Within hearing. The allusion is palpable.

Ears.

About one's ears. Causing trouble. The allusion is to a house falling on one, or a hornet's nest buzzing about one's head.

*Bring the house about your ears._ Set the whole family against you.

"If your ears burn, people say some one is talking of you._ This is very old, for Pliny says, "When our ears do glow and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence." Shakespeare, in _Much Ado About Nothing_ (iii. 1), makes Beatrice say, when Ursula and Hero had been talking of her, "What fire is in mine ears?" Sir Thomas Browne ascribes this conceit to the superstition of guardian angels, who touch the right ear if the talk is favourable, and the left if otherwise. This is done to cheer or warn.

"One ear singles; some there be That are stinging now at me._"—Herick: _Hesperides._

Little pitchers have large ears. (See PITCHERS.)

Mine ears hast thou bourn. Thou hast accepted me as thy bond-slave for life. If a Hebrew servant declined to go free after six years' service, the master was to bring him to the doorpost, and bore his ear through with an awl, in token of his voluntary servitude. (Exod. xxi. 6.)

Over head and ears. (in love, in debt, etc.). Wholly, desperately.

"He is over head and ears in love with the maid. He loves her better than his own life._"—Trevor in _English._

To give one's ears [to obtain an object]. To make a considerable sacrifice for the purpose. The allusion is to the ancient practice of cutting off the ears of those who loved their own offensive opinions better than their ears.

To have itching ears. Loving to hear news or current gossip. (2 Tim. iv. 3.)

To prick up one's ears. To listen attentively to something not expected, as horses prick up their ears at a sudden sound.

"At which, like unbacked colts, they pricked their ears._"—Shakespeare: _The Tempest_, iv. 1.

To set people together by the ears. To create ill-will among them; to set them quarrelling and pulling each other's ears.

"When civil dudgeon first grew high, And men fell out, they knew not why; When hard words, jealousies, and fears, Set folks together by the ears._"—Butler: _Hudibras_ (The opening).

To tickle the ears. To gratify the ear either by pleasing sounds or flattering words.

_Walls have ears._ Things uttered in secret get rumoured abroad. Chaucer says, "That field hath eyen, and the wood hath ears._" (Canterbury Tales, v. 1,624.)

Ears to ear Bible (The). (1810.)

"Who hath ears to ear, let him hear._" (Matt. xiii. 43.) (See BIBLE.)

Earing. Ploughing. (Anglo-Saxon, eardan, to plough; Latin, arvo.)

"And yet there are five years, in which there shall neither be earing nor harvest._"—Genesis xlv. 6.

"In earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest._"—Exodus xxxvi. 21.

Earl (Anglo-Saxon, eorl, a man of position, in opposition to eord, a churl, or freeman of the lowest rank; Danish, jarl). William the Conqueror tried to introduce the word Count, but did not succeed, although the wife of an earl is still called a countess.

"The sheriff is called in Latin vice-comes, as being the deputy of the earl or comte, to whom the custody of the shire is said to have been committed._"—Blackstone: _Commentaries_, book i. chap. ix. p. 239.

Earl of Mar's Grey Brecks. The 21st Foot are so called because they wore grey breeches when the Earl of Mar was their colonel. (1678-1686.)

The 21st Foot is now called the "Royal Scots Fusiliers._"

Early to Bed. "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise._"

"Lever a cinq, diner a neuf,
Soupé a cinq, couché a neuf,
Faut vivre d'‘une somme neuf._" (The older of the two.)

"Lever à six, diner à huit,
Soupé à six, couché à dix,
Fait vivre l'homme dix fois dix._"

Earth. To gather strength from the earth. The reference is to Anteo, son of Poseidon and Ge, a giant and wrestler of Libya (Africa). So long as he touched the earth his strength was irresistible. Hercules, knowing this, lifted him into the air and crushed him to death. Near the town of Tingis, in Mauritania, is a hill in the shape of a man, and called The hill of Antaeus. Tradition says it is the wrestler's tomb. (See MALEGEA.)

Earthmen (The). Gnomes and fairies of the mines: a solemn race, who nevertheless can laugh most heartily and dance most merrily.

"We fear not; we eat at the mines for men; we put the one in readiness for the others."—Beauant and Rice: Titan's Farewell.

Earthquakes. According to Indian mythology, the world rests on the head of a great elephant, and when, for the sake of rest, the huge monster refreshes itself by moving its head, an earthquake is produced. The elephant is called 'Muha-pudma.'

"Having penetrated to the south, they saw the great monster: Muha-pudma,' equal to a huge mountain, sustaining the earth with its head."—The Ramayana (section xxxiii.).

"The Lamas say that the earth is placed on the back of a gigantic frog, and when the frog stretches its limbs or moves its head, it shakes the earth. Other Eastern mythologists place the earth on the back of a tortoise.

Greek and Roman mythologists ascribe earthquakes to the restlessness of the giants which Jupiter buried under high mountains. Thus Virgil (Envid, iii. 578) ascribes the eruption of Etna to the giant Enceladus.

Earwig. A corruption of the Saxon ear-wejiga (ear-insect): so called because the hind wings resemble in shape the human ear. The word has engendered the notion that these insects are apt to get into our ears.

An earwig, metaphorically, is one who whispers into our ears all the curious and scandal going, in order to curry favour; a flatterer.

"Court earwigs laugh from your ear."—Political Ballads.

Ease. (Anglo-Saxon, eath; Latin, otium.)

At ease. Without pain or anxiety.
Ill at ease. Uneasy, not comfortable, anxious.

Stand at ease! A command given to soldiers to rest for a time. The "gentlemen stood at ease" means in an informal manner.

To ease one of his money or purse. To steal it. (See LITTLE EASE.)

Ease (Chapel of). (See CHAPEL.)

Ease Her! A command given on a steamer to reduce speed. The next order is generally "Stop her!"—i.e. the steamboat.

East. The custom of turning to the east when the creed is repeated is to express the belief that Christ is the Day-spring and Sun of Righteousness. The altar is placed at the east end of the church to remind us of Christ, the "Day-spring" and "Resurrection": and persons are buried with their feet to the east to signify that they died in the hope of the Resurrection.

The ancient Greeks always buried their dead with the face upwards, looking towards heaven; and the feet turned to the east or the rising sun, to indicate that the deceased was on his way to Elysium, and not to the region of night or the inferno. (Diogenes Laertius: Life of Solon, in Greek.)

East Indies.

(1) He came safe from the East Indies, and was drowned in the Thames. He encountered many dangers of great magnitude, but was at last killed where he thought himself secure.

(2) To send to the East Indies for Kentish pippins. To go round about to accomplish a very simple thing. To crush a fly on a wheel. To send to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a penny postage-stamp.

Easter. April was called Ostermoonth—the month of the Ost-end wind (wind from the east). Easter is therefore the April feast, which lasted eight days. Our Easter Sunday must be between March 21st and April 25th. It is regulated by the pashal moon, or first full moon between the vernal equinox and fourteen days afterwards. (Teutonic, ostara; Anglo-Saxon, eastre.)

Easter. The Saxon goddess of the east, whose festival was held in the spring.

Easter-day Sun. It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day. Sir Thomas Browne combats the notion in his Vindiar Errors.

"But oh, she dances not a way, No sun upon an Easter day Is laid so fine a sight."—Sir John Suckling.

Easter Eggs, or Pasch eggs, are symbolical of creation, or the re-creation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends at Easter is Magian or Persian, and bears allusion to the mundane egg, for which Ormus and Ahriman were to contend till the consummation of all things. Easter Eggs, 401

Easter Eggs, or Pasch eggs, are symbolical of creation, or the re-creation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends at Easter is Magian or Persian, and bears allusion to the mundane egg, for which Ormus and Ahriman were to contend till the consummation of all things. It prevailed not only with the Persians, but also among the Jews, Egyptians, and Hindus. Christians adopted the custom to symbolise the resurrection, and they colour the eggs red in allusion to the blood of their redemption. There is a tradition, also, that the world was “hatched” or created at Easter-tide.

“Bless, Lord, we beseech thee, this Thy creature of eggs, that it may become a wholesome assurance to Thy faithful servants, eating it in thankfulness to Thee, on account of the resurrection of our Lord.” — Pope Paul V.: Ritual.

Eat. To eat humble pie. (See HUMBLE PIE.)

To eat one out of house and home. To eat so much that one will have to part with house and home in order to pay for it.

To eat one’s words. To retract in a humiliating manner; to unsay what you have said; to eat your own lick.

To eat the mad cow. A French phrase, implying that a person is reduced to the very last extremity, and is willing to eat even a cow that has died of madness; glad to eat cat’s meat.

“J’ mange de ce chou inexprima ble quel’ appel e de la vache carbonée.” — Victor Hugo: Les Misérables.

To eat the leek. (See LEEK.)

To eat well. To have a good appetite. But “It eats well” means that what is eaten is agreeable or flavorful. To “eat badly” is to eat without appetite or too little; not pleasant to the taste.

Eat not the Brain. This is the 31st Symbol in the Protreptic of Talmudisch; and the prohibition is very similar to that of Moses forbidding the Jews to eat the blood, because the blood is the life. The brain is the seat of reason and the ruler of the body. It was also esteemed the Divine part—at least, of man.

Eat not the Heart. This is the 30th Symbol in the Protreptic of Talmudisch. Pythagoras forbade judges and priests to eat animal food at all, because it was taking away life. Other persons he did not wholly forbid this food, but he restricted them from eating the brain (the seat of wisdom) and the heart (the seat of life).

Eat One’s Heart Out (To). To fret or worry unreasonably; to allow one grief or one vexation to predominate over the mind, tincture all one’s ideas, and absorb all other emotions.

Eats his Head Off (The horse). Eats more than he is worth, or the work done does not pay for the cost of keeping.

A horse which stands in the stable unemployed eats his head off.

Eating One’s Terms. To be studying for the bar. Students are required to dine in the Hall of the Inns of Court at least three times in each of the twelve terms before they are “called” [to the bar]. (See DOCTORS’ COMMONS.)

Eating Together. To eat together in the East was at one time a sure pledge of protection. A Persian nobleman was once sitting in his garden, when a man prostrated himself before him, and implored protection from the rabble. The nobleman gave him the remainder of a peach which he was eating, and when the incensed multitude arrived, and declared that the man had slain the only son of the nobleman, the heart-broken father replied, “We have eaten together; go in peace,” and would not allow the murderer to be punished.

Eau de Cologne. A perfumed spirit, prepared at Cologne. The most famous maker was Jean Maria Farina.

Eau de Vie. Brandy. A French translation of the Latin aqua vitae (water of life). This is a curious perversion of the Spanish agua de vie (water or juice of the vine), rendered by the monks into aqua vitae instead of agua vitae, and confounding the juice of the grape with the alchemists’ elixir of life. The same error is perpetuated in the Italian acqua viva; the Scotch whisky, which is the Celtic nine-ly; and the Irish uisce-beatha, which is the Gaelic and Irish uisce-boutha. (See AQUA VITE.)

Eaves-dropper. One who lisets stealthily to conversation. The derivation of the term is not usually understood. The owners of private estates in Saxon times were not allowed to cultivate to the extremity of their possessions, but were obliged to leave a space for eaves. This space was called the geyndrype (eaves-drip). An eaves-dropper is one who places himself in the eaves-drip to overhear what is said in the adjacent house or field.

“Under our tents I’ll play the eaves-dropper, To hear if any mean to shrink from me.” — Shakespeare: Richard III. v. 3.

Ebonism. The doctrine that the poor only shall be saved. Ebion, plural ebionim (poor).

“At the end of the second century the Ebionites were treated as heretics, and a pretended leader (Ebon) was invented by Tertullian to explain the name.” — Renan: Life of Jesus, chap. xi.

Ebionites (4 syl.). A religious sect of the first and second centuries, who maintained that Jesus Christ was merely an inspired messenger, the greatest of all prophets, but yet a man and a man only, without any existence before His birth in Bethlehem. (See above.)

Ebis or Ibis. A jinn, and the ruler of the evil genii, or fallen angels. Before his fall he was called Azaz'el or Hha'ris. When Adam was created, God commanded all the angels to worship him; but Ebis replied, "Me thou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?" God was very angry at this insolent answer, and turned the disobedient fay into a Sheytan (devil), and he became the father of devils.

"His majesty was a hundred feet in height; his skin, stripped with red, was covered with small scales, which made it glisten like armour; his hair was so long and curly a snake might be lost in it; his flat nose was pierced with a ring of porous workmanship; his small eyes assumed all the prismatic colours; his ears, which resembled those of an elephant, flapped on his shoulders; and his tail, sixty feet long, terminated in a hooked claw."—Croquemitane, i. 19.

"When he said unto the angels, Worship Adam, all worshipped him except Ebis."—Ex Koran, ii.

Ebony. God's image done in chowy. Negroes. Thomas Fuller gave birth to this expression.

Ebu'da. The Hebrides. (Avosdo: Orlando Finito.)

Eco Homo. A painting by Correggio of our Lord crowned with thorns and bound with ropes, as He was shown to the people by Pilate, who said to them, "Eco Homo!" (Behold the man!) (John xix. 5.)

Other conceptions of this subject, either painted or engraved, are by Albert Durer (1471-1528), Titian (1477-1576), Cigoli (1559-1613), Guido (1571-1642), Albani (1578-1660), Vandyke (1590-1641), Rembrandt (1606-1669), Poussin (1613-1673), and some others.

Eco Siguum. See it, in proof! Behold the proof!

"I saw eight times thrust through the donkey's four through the hose; my buckler cut through and through; my sword looked like a hand saw—eco sigum."—Shakespeare, i Henry IV., ii. 4.

Eccentrical means deviating from the centre; hence irregular, not according to rule. Originally applied to those planets which wander round the earth, like comets, the earth not being in the centre of their orbit. (Latin, ex centrum.)

Eccentric Sensation. The sensations of the brain transferred to objects without. For example: we see a tree; this tree is a reflection of the tree on the retina transferred to the brain; but the tree seen is the tree without, not the tree in the brain. This transferred perception is called an "Eccentric Sensation."

Eccentric Theory (The) in astronomy. A theory which uses an eccentric instead of an epicycle in accounting for the sun's motion.

Ecclesiastes (5 syl.). One of the books in the Old Testament, arranged next to Proverbs, generally ascribed to Solomon, because it says (verse 1), "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem." This seems, so far, to confirm the authorship to Solomon; but verse 12 says, "I, the Preacher, was king over Israel, in Jerusalem," which seems to intimate that he was once a king, but was so no longer. If so, it could not be Solomon, who died king of the twelve tribes. "Son of David" often means a descendant of David, Christ himself being so called.

Ecclesiastical. The father of ecclesiastical history. Eusebius of Csesarea (264-340).

Ecclesiastics is so called, not because the writer was a priest, but because the book (in the opinion of the fathers) was the chief of the apocryphal books, designated by them Ecclesiasticus (or) I. (books to be read in churches), to distinguish them from the canonical Scriptures.

Echidna (E-kidn-a). Half-woman, half-serpent. She was mother of the Chimera, the many-headed dog Orthos, the hundred-headed dragon of the Hesperides, the Colchian dragon, the Sphinx, Cerberos, Scylla, the Gorgous, the Lernean Hydra, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of Prometheus, and the Nemean Lion. (Hesiod.)

"[She] seemed a woman to the want, and fair, but ended foul in many a scaly fold, Voluminous and vast."

Echo. The Romans say that Echo was a nymph in love with Narcissus, but her love not being returned, she pined away till only her voice remained. We use the word to imply similarity of sentiment: as You echo my ideas; That is an echo to my opinion.

"Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen Within thy glory shell, By slow Mondey's margin green, . . .

Canst thou not tell me of a secret tear That liquid the Narcissus sent?"

Milton Comus, 30, 40, 49, etc.

Echo. (Gr., echo; verb, êcho, to sound.) To applaud to the echo. To applaud so loudly as to produce an echo.
Eckhardt. A faithful Eckhardt, who warns everyone (German). Eckhardt, in German legends, appears on the evening of Maundy Thursday to warn all persons to go home, that they may not be injured by the headless bodies and two-legged horses which traverse the streets on that night.

Eclectics. Ancient philosophers, who selected what they thought best in all other systems, and made a patchwork therefrom. There is the eclectic school of painters, of which Paul Delaroche was the founder and best exponent; the eclectic school of modern philosophy, founded by Victor Cousin; the eclectic school of architecture; and so on. (Greek, ek-lege, to pick out.)

Eclectic or Modern Platonists. A Christian sect which arose in the second century. They professed to make truth their sole object of inquiry, and adopted from existing systems whatever, in their opinion, was true. They were called Platonists because they adopted Plato's notions about God and the human soul.

Eclipses were considered by the ancient Greeks and Romans as bad omens. Nicias, the Athenian general, was so terrified by an eclipse of the moon, that he durst not defend himself from the Syracusans; in consequence of which his whole army was cut to pieces, and he himself was put to death.

The Romans would never hold a public assembly during an eclipse. Some of their poets feign that an eclipse of the moon is because she is gone on a visit to Endymion.

A very general notion was and still is among barbarians that the sun or moon has been devoured by some monster, and hence the custom of beating drums and brass kettles to scare away the monster.

The Chinese, Lapps, Persians, and some others call the evil beast a dragon. The East Indians say it is a black griffin.

The notion of the ancient Mexicans was that eclipses were caused by a sun and moon quarrels, in which one of the litigants is beaten black and blue.

Eclipse. The path apparently described by the sun in his annual course through the heavens. Eclipses happen only when the moon is in or near the same plane.

Eclogue (2 syl.). Pastoral poetry not expressed in rustic speech, but in the most refined and elegant of which the language is capable. (Greek, meaning "elegant extracts," "select poetry.")

Econ'phia. A sort of hurricane, similar to the Typhon.

"The circling Typhon, whirled from point to point,
And dire Econphia reign."—Thomson: Summer.

École des Femmes. Molière borrowed the plot of this comedy from the novelletti of Ser Giovanni, composed in the fourteenth century.

Econ'omy means the rules or plans adopted in managing one's own house. As we generally prevent extravagant waste, and make the most of our means in our own homes, so the careful expediture of money in general is termed house-management. The word is applied to time and several other things, as well as money. (Greek, oikos nomos, house-law.)

Animal economy. The system, laws, and management whereby the greatest amount of good accrues to the animal kingdom.

"Animal . . . economy, according to which animal affairs are regulated and disposed."—Shaftesbury: Characteristics.

Political economy. The principles whereby the revenues and resources of a nation are made the most of. Thus: Is Free Trade good or bad economy? Articles are cheaper, and therefore the buying value of money is increased; but, on the other hand, competition is increased, and therefore wages are lowered.

Vegetable economy. The system, laws, and management, whereby the greatest amount of good is to be derived by the vegetable kingdom.

The Christian Economy. The religious system based on the New Testament. That is, what is the best economy of man, taking into account the life that now is, and that which is to come? The answer is thus summed up by Christ: "What is a man profited though he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? For what should a man give in exchange for his soul?"

The Mosaic economy. The religious system taught by God: that is, the system whereby man obtains the greatest amount of value for his conduct, whether by serving God or living for this life only. Also called "The Jewish Economy."

Economy is a great income. "No alchemy like frugality." "Ever save, ever have." The following are to a similar effect: "A pin a day is a great a year." "Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves." "Many a little makes a mickle." "Free saving, comes having." "A peany saved is a penny gained." "Little and often fills the purse."

Latin: "Non intelligent homines quam magnum vectigal sit parsimonia" (Caesar). "Sera in fundo est parsimonia" (Senev).

French: "Plusieurs Peu font un Beaucoup." "Denier sur denier bâtit la maison."

German: "Die sparsamkeit ist ein grosser zyll" (Parsimony is a great income).

Economy of Nature (7thc). The laws of nature, whereby the greatest amount of good is obtained; or the laws by which the affairs of nature are regulated and disposed.

Scrocheurs. Freebooters of the twelfth century, in France; so called because they stripped their victims of everything, even their clothes. (French, bavarich, to flay.)

Ecstasy (Greek εκστασεις, from εκ-ουομαι, to stand out of [the body or mind]). To stand out of one's mind is to lose one's wits, to be beside oneself. To stand out of one's body is to be disembodied. St. Paul refers to this when he says he was caught up to the third heaven and heard unutterable words, "whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell" (2 Cor. xii. 2-4). St. John also says he was "in the spirit"—i.e. in an ecstasy—when he saw the apocalyptic vision (i. 10). The belief that the soul left the body at times was very general in former ages, and is still the belief of many. (See Estatici.)

Estatico Doctor (The). Jean de Ruysbrock, the mystic (1294-1381).

Estatici (The). A class of diviners among the ancient Greeks, who used to lie in trances, and when they came to themselves gave strange accounts of what they had seen while they were "out of the body." (Greek, εκ-ιστέμει.)

Ester (Sir). The foster-father of King Arthur.

Edda. There are two religious codes, so called, containing the ancient Scandinavian mythology. One is in verse, composed in Iceland in the eleventh century by Snæmund Sigfusson, the Sage; and the other in prose, compiled a century later by Snorri Sturluson, who wrote a commentary on the first edda. The poetical edda contains an account of creation, the history of Odin, Thor, Freyr, Balder, etc., etc. The prose one contains the exploits of such conquerors as Ælfgiva, Sigurd, Attila, etc., and is divided into several parts. The first part contains historical and mythological traditions; the second a long poetical vocabulary; and the third Scandinavian prosody, or the modes of composition adopted by the ancient Skalds. The poetical compilation is generally called Snæmund’s Edda, and the prose one Snorri’s Edda.

Eden. Paradise, the country and garden in which Adam and Eve were placed by God (Gen. ii. 15). The word means delight, pleasure.

Eden Hall. The luck of Eden Hall. An old painted drinking-glass, supposed to be sacred. The tale is that the butler once went to draw water from St. Cuthbert’s Well, in Eden Hall garden, Cumberland, when the fairies left their drinking-glass on the well to enjoy a little fun. The butler seized the glass, and ran off with it. The goblet is preserved in the family of Sir Christopher Musgrave. Longfellow wrote a poem on the subject. The superstition is—

"If that glass either break or fall, Farewell the luck of Eden Hall."

* Readers of the Golden Butterfly, by Besant and Rice, will remember how the luck of Gilead P. Beck was associated with a golden butterfly.

Edinburgh, i.e. Edwin’s burgh. The fort built by Edwin, king of Northumbria (605-633). Dun Eden or Dunedin, is a Saxon form; Edina a poetical one.

Edgar or Edgaró. Master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucy Ashton (Lucia di Lammermoor). While absent in France on an important embassy, the lady is led to believe that her lover has proved faithless to her, and in the torrent of her indignation consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but stabs him on the wedding-night, goes mad, and dies. In the opera Edgardo stabs himself also; but in the novel he is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies-Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy. (Donizetti’s opera of “Lucia di Lammermoor”; Sir Walter Scott’s “Bride of Lammermoor.”)

Edge. (Anglo-Saxon, cyp.)

Not to put too fine an edge upon it. Not to mince the matter: to speak plainly.

"He is, not to put too fine an edge upon it, a thorough scoundrel."—Lowell.

To be on edge. To be very eager or impatient.

To set one’s teeth on edge. To give one the horrors; to induce a tingling organ-ing sensation in one's teeth, as from acids or harsh noises.

"I had rather hear a brisen canstic turned,
Or a dry wheel grate on the arie-tree;
And that would set my teeth nothing on edge,
Nothing so much as inducing poetry."
Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. iii. 1.

Edge Away (76). To move away very gradually, as a ship moves from the edge of the shore. Often called egey.

(Angeo-Saxon, egey, an edge; egey-clif, is a sea cliff.)

Edge-bone. (See Aitch-bone.)

Edge on. (See Egg on.)

Edge of the Sword. To fall by the edge of the sword. By a cut from the sword; in battle.

Edgewise. One cannot get in a word edgewise. The [conversation is so engrossed by others] that there is no getting in a word.

Edged Tools. It is dangerous to play with edged tools. It is dangerous to tamper with mischief or anything that may bring you into trouble.

Edhiligi. The aristocratic class among the Anglo-Saxons; the second rank were termed the Friligi; and the third the Lazii. (Angeo-Saxon, edeale or edele, noble; fire-lang, frc-born. Ricardo says of the third class, they were the "unwilling to work, the dull" —quos hodie lazie dicimus.)

Edit of Milan. Proclaimed by Constantine, after the conquest of Italy (313), to secure to Christians the restitution of their civil and religious rights.

Edit of Nantes. An edict published by Henri IV. of France, granting toleration to his Protestant subjects. It was published from Nantes in 1598, but repealed in 1685 by Louis XIV.

Edie Ochiltree. In Scott's Anti-query.

"Charles II. would be as sceptical as Edie Ochiltree about the existence of circles and avenues, altar-stones and cromlechs." - Knight; Old England.

Edify is to build a house (Latin, edex-facio); morally, to build instruction in the mind methodically, like an architect. The Scripture word edification means the building-up of "believers" in grace and hopelessness. St. Paul says,
"Ye are God's building," and elsewhere he carries out the figure more fully, saying—

"All the buildings [or body of Christians], rightly joined together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord." - Eph. ii. 21.

Ed'ma. (2 syl.) Roman officers who had charge of the streets, bridges, aqueducts, temples, and city buildings generally. We call our surveyors city edima sometimes. (Latin, edima, a house.)

Edith, called the Maid of Lorn (Argyleshire), was about to be married to Lord Ronald, when Robert, Edward, and Isabel Bruce, tempest-tossed, sought shelter at the castle. Edith's brother recognised the Bruce, and being in the English interest, a quarrel ensued, in the course of which the abbot arrived, but refused to marry the bridal pair amidst such discord. Edith fled, and, assuming the character of a page, passed through divers adventures. At length Robert Bruce won the battle of Ban-nockburn, and when peace was restored Ronald married the "Maid of Lorn."
(Scott : Lord of the Isles.)

Ednam, in Roxburghshire, near the Tweed, where Thomson, the author of The Seasons, was born.

"The Tweed, pure parent-stream, Whose pastoral banks first heard my Dornic reed." - Autumn (1806).

Ed'de (2 syl.). Adobe cottages are those made of sun-dried bricks, like the buildings of ancient Egypt. (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, i. 16.)

"The present and proper form of this word is Adobe (Spanish, adobar, plaster).

"They make adobes, or sun-dried bricks, by mixing ashes and earth with water, which is then moulded into large blocks and dried in the sun."

Edward. Edward the Confessor's sword. Curta'ma (the cutter), a blunt sword of state, emblematical of mercy.

The Chevalier Prince Charles Edward.

The Young Pretender. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Redgauntlet, first as "Father Buona Ventura," and afterwards as Pretender to the Crown. Again in Waverley.

Edwidge. Wife of William Tell.

(Rosini's opera of Guiglielmo Tell.)

Edwin. The hero of Bebbie's Minstrel.

"And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy;
Deep thought oft seemed in his infant eye,
Dauntless he headed not, nor past, nor toy.
Save one short pipe of rude. minstrelsy,
Silent when glad; affectionate, though sad.
And now his look was most demurely sad;
And now he laughed aloud, yet none knew Why.
The neighbours stared and sighed, yet blessed the lad;
Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad." - Canto i. 16.

Edyn. Son of Nuill; called the "Sparrowhawk." He ousted the Earl of Yn’iol from his earldom, and tried to win E’nid, the earl’s daughter, but failing in this, became the evil genius of the gentle earl. Being overthrown in a tournament by Prince Geraint, he was sent to the court of King Arthur, where his whole nature was completely changed, and “subdued to that gentleness which, when it weds with manhood, makes a man.” (Idylls of the King; E’nid.)

Eel. A nickname for a New Englander.

Eel. A salt cel. A rope’s end, used for scouring. At one time eddikins were used for whips.

“With my salt cel, went down in the garner, and there got my boy and did beat him.”—Peep’s Diary (April 24th).

Eel. (Anglo-Saxon, cel.)

Holding the eel of science by the tail.

That is, to have an ephemeral smattering of a subject, which slips from the memory as an eel would wriggle out of one’s fingers if held by the tail.

“Caede tenes anguillam, in eos apte directur, quibus res cur cum hominebus lubrica sede, per-fidique, aut qui rem fugitivam arque incertam alquam latent, quain terti dim non possint.”

Bracius: Adagia, p. 320. (1629.)

To get used to it, as a skinned cel, i.e. as an eel is used to being skinned, it may be unpleasant at first, but habit will get the better of such annoyance.

“It ain’t always pleasant to turn out for morning chappel, is it, Jim-bumps? But it’s just like the eels with their skinning: it goes against the grain at first, but you soon get used to it.”—Cuthbert Bede [Bradley]: Verdict Green, chap. vii.

To skin an eel by the tail is to do things the wrong way.

Elkhance Tables. The celebrated calculation of Nazir’ u Dien, the Persian astronomer, grandson of Zenghis Khan, brought out in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Effend’i. A Turkish title, about equal to our “squire,” given to emirs, men of learning, and the high priests of mosques. The title is added after the name, as Ali effend’i (Ali Esquire).

Effigy. To burn or hang one in effigy. To burn or hang the representation of a person, instead of the person himself, in order to show popular hatred, dislike, or contempt. The custom comes from France, where the public executioner used to hang the effigy of the criminal when the criminal himself could not be found.

Efrontery. Out-facing, rude persistance, and overbearing impudence. (Latin, ex-frons, i.e. ex-frons, out-face.)

Égalité. Philippe, Duc d’Orléans, father of Louis-Philippe, King of the French, was so called because he sided with the revolutionary party, whose motto was “Liberty, fraternity, and equality.” Philippe Égalité was guillotined in 1793.

Eger’ia. The nymph who instructed Numa in his wise legislation. Numa used to meet her in a grove near Aric’ia.

Egg. Eggs. (Anglo-Saxon, age.)

A bad egg. A bad speculation; a man who promises, but whose promises are pie-crust.

A duck’s egg, in cricket. (See DUCK.)

Golden eggs. Great profits. (See GOOSE.)

“I doubt the bird is flown that laid the golden eggs.”—Scout: The Antiquary.

The unudnare egg. The Phoenicians, and from them the Egyptians, Hindus, Japanese, and many other ancient nations, maintained that the world was hatched from an egg made by the Creator. Orpheus speaks of this egg.

Eggs of Nymrberge. (See Nuemberge.)

Egg: (See Easter Eggs.)

The serpent’s egg of the Druids. This wonderful egg was hatched by the joint labour of several serpents, and was buoyed into the air by their hissing. The person who caught it had to ride off at full speed, to avoid being stung to death; but the possessor was sure to prevail in every contest or combat, and to be courted by those in power. Pliny says he had seen one of these eggs, and that it was about as large as a moderate-sized apple.

Phrases and Proverbs:

Don’t put all your eggs in one basket. Don’t venture all you have in one speculation; don’t put all your property in one bank. The allusion is obvious.

From the egg to the apples. (Latin, “ab ovum vaque ad mala.”) From first to last. The Romans began their “dinner” with eggs, and ended with fruits called “mala.”

I have eggs on the spit. I am very busy, and cannot attend to anything else. The reference is to roasting eggs on a spit. They were first boiled, then the yolk was taken out, braided up with spices, and put back again; the eggs were then drawn on a “spit,” and roasted. As this required both despatch and constant attention, the person in charge could not leave them. It must be remembered that the word "spit" had at one time a much wider meaning than it has now. Thus toasting-forks and the hooks of a Dutch oven were termed spits.

"I forgot to tell you, I write short journals now; I have eggs on the spit." So df.

I got eggs for my money means I gave valuable money, and received instead such worthless things as eggs. When Wolsey accused the Earl of Kildare for not taking Desmond prisoner, the Earl replied, "He is no more to blame than his brother Ossory, who (notwithstanding his high promises) is glad to take eggs for his money," i.e. is willing to be imposed on. (Campion: History of Ireland, 1633.)

Like as two eggs. Exactly alike.

"They say we are almost as like as eggs."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, 1.2.

Sure as eggs is eggs. Professor de Morgan suggests that this is a corruption of the logician's formula, "x is x." (Notes and Queries.)

Teach your grandmother to suck eggs. Attempting to teach your elders and superiors. The French say, "The goslings want to drive the geese to pasture" (Les ossons veulent nourrir les ois poitr.

There is reason in roasting eggs. Even the most trivial thing has a reason for being done in one way rather than in some other. When wood fires were usual, it was more common to roast eggs than to boil them, and some care was required to prevent their being "ill-roasted, all on one side," as Touchstone says (As You Like It, iii. 2).

"One likes the plum's wing, and one the leg; The vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg."— Pope: Epodes, II.

To tread upon eggs. To walk gingerly, as if walking over eggs, which are easily broken.

Will you take eggs for my money? Will you allow yourself to be imposed upon? Will you take kicks for half-pence?" This saying was in vogue when eggs were plentiful as blackberries.

"My honest friend, will you take eggs for money?"—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, 1.2.

Egg Feast. In Oxford the Saturday preceding Shrovetide Tuesday is so called; it is also called Egg-Saturday, because asch eggs are provided for the students on that day.

Egg-flip, Egg-hot, Egg-nog. Drinks composed of warm spiced ale, with sugar, spirit and eggs; or eggs beaten up with wine, sweetened and flavoured, etc.
Egoism. The theory in Ethics which places man's summum bonum in self. The correlative of altruism, or the theory which places our own greatest happiness in making others happy. Egoism is selfishness pure, altruism is selfless benevolence. "Egoist," a disciple of egoism.

"To say that each individual shall reap the rewards brought to him by his own powers. . . is to enunciate egoism as an ultimate principle of conduct."—Spencer: Data of Ethics, p. 189.

Egotism. The too frequent use of the word I; the habit of talking about oneself, or of parading one's own doings. "Egotist," one addicted to egotism.

Egypt, in Dryden's satire of Ahab'om and Achitophel, means France. "Egypt and Tyre (Holland) intercept your trade, and Jealousies (Papists) your sacred rites invade." Part I. PG-6.

Egyptian Crown (The). That of Upper Egypt was a high conical white cap, terminating in a knob. That of Lower Egypt was round. If a king governed both countries he wore both crowns (that of Lower Egypt outside the other). This double crown was called a pechent.

Egyptian Days. The last Monday in April, the second Monday of August, and the third Monday of December. So called because Egyptian astrologers marked them out.

"Three days there are in the year which we call Egyptian Days."—Saxo, MS. (British Museum).

Egyptian Festivals (The). The six great festivals of the ancient Egyptians were—
1. That of Bubastis (= Diana, or the moon);
2. That of Busiris, in honour of Isis;
3. That of Sais (= Minerva, Herës, or Wisdom);
4. That of Helioptases, in honour of the sun;
5. That of Butis, or Buto, the goddess of night; and
6. That of Paprëmis (= Mars or Arës, the god of War).

Eider-down. The down of the eider duck. This duck is common in Greenland, Iceland, and the Islands north and west of Scotland. It is about the size of a goose, and receives its distinctive name from the river Eider, in Denmark.

Elken Bastîke [Portraiture of the King]. A book attributed to Charles I., but claimed by John Cauden, Bishop of Exeter. "The Elken is wholly and only my invention." (Cauden: Letter to the Lord Chancellor.)

Elagabalus. A Syro-Phcenician sun-god, represented under the form of a huge conical stone. The Roman emperor, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, was so called because in childhood he was priest of the Elagabalus. Wormwood wine. Hamlet says to Laertes, "Would's drink up eisell—i.e. drink wormwood wine to show your love to the dead Ophelia? In the Troy Book of Ludgate we have the line "Of bitter ëssell and of eager [sour] wine." And in Shakespeare's sonnets:

"I will drink
Poisons of eyes, and of the strong infection;
No bitterness that I will bitter think,
Nor double penance to correct correction."

Eisteddfod. The meetings of the Welsh bards and others, now held annually, for the encouragement of Welsh literature and music. (Welsh, "a session," from eistedd, to sit.)

Either. (Greek, hekter; Irish, ceachtar; Saxon, egther, Ceatch, our "each," and egther, our "either.")

Ejusdem Carinae (Latin). Of the same kidney; of the same sort.

"Lord Hartington, Lord Derby, Mr. Childers, and others ejusdem carinae."—Newspaper paragraph, November, 1861.

El Dora'do. Golden illusion: a land or means of unbounded wealth. Orella'nà, lieutenant of Pizarro, pretended he had discovered a land of gold (el dorado) between the rivers Orino'co and Am'azon, in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh twice visited Guiana as the spot indicated, and published a highly-coloured account of its enormous wealth. Figuratively, a source of wit, wealth, or abundance of any kind.

The real "land of gold" is California, and not Guiana. (See BALINDBARLE.)

"The whole comedy is a sort of El Dorado of wit."—T. Moore.

"El Dorado (masculine), "the gilt one," can hardly refer to a country; it seems more likely to refer to some prince; and we are told of a prince in South America who was every day powdered with gold-dust blown through a rend. If this is admitted, no wonder those who sought a golden country were disappointed.

El Infante de Anteque'ra is the Regent Fernando, who took the city of Anteque'ra from the Moors in 1419.

El Islam. The religion of the Moslems. The words mean "the resigning one's-self to God."

El Khîdr. One of the good angels, according to the Koran.

Elagabalus. A Syro-Phcenician sun-god, represented under the form of a huge conical stone. The Roman emperor, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, was so called because in childhood he was priest of the Sun-god. Of all the Roman emperors none exceeded him in debauchery and sin. He reigned about four years (B.C. 218-222), and died at the age of eighteen.

This madman invited the principal men of Rome to a banquet, and smothered them in a shower of roses.

Elaine (2 syl.). The “lily maid of Astolat” (Guildford, in Surrey), who loved Sir Lancelot “with that love which was her doom.” Sir Lancelot, being sworn to celibacy, could not have married her, even if he had been willing; and, unhappily, what little love he had was bestowed on the queen. Elaine felt that her love was a vain thing, and died. According to her last request, the bed on which she died was placed on a barge, and on it was laid her dead body, arrayed in white, a lily in her right hand, and a letter avowing her love in the left. An old dumb servitor steered and rowed the barge up the river, and when it stopped at the palace staith, King Arthur ordered the body to be brought in. The letter being read, Arthur directed that the maiden should be buried like a queen, with her sad story blazoned on her tomb. The tale is taken from Sir T. Malory’s History of Prince Arthur, part iii. Tennyson turned it into blank verse. (Idylls of the King; Elaine.)

Elas'motherium (Greek, the metal- plate beast). An extinct animal, between the horse and the rhinoceros.

Elberich. The most famous dwarf of German romance. He aided the Emperor Omin (who ruled over Lombardy) to gain the wife of the soldier’s daughter. (The Heldenbuch.)

Elbow. (Anglo-Saxon, el-boga; el= an all, boga=a bow.)

A knight of the elbow. A gambler.

At one’s elbow. Close at hand.

To elbow one’s way in. To push one’s way through a crowd; to get a place by hook or crook.

To elbow out; to be elbowed out. To supersede; to be ousted by a rival.

Up to one’s elbow [in work]. Very busy, or full of work. Work piled up to one’s elbows.

Elbow Grease. Perspiration excited by hard manual labour. They say “Elbow grease is the best furniture oil.”

Elbow Room. Sufficient space for the work in hand.

Elbows. Out at elbows. Shabbily dressed (applied to men only): metaphorically, short of money; hackneyed; stale; thus, we say of a play which has been acted too often that it is worn out at elbows. It is like a coat which is no longer presentable, being out at the elbows.

Elden Hole. Elden Hole needs filling. A reproof given to great braggarts. Elden Hole is a deep pit in Derbyshire Peak, said to be fathomless. (See Sir W. Scott: Pilgrims of the Peak, ch. iii.)

Elder Brethren. (See Trinity House.)

Elder-tree. Sir John Maundeville, speaking of the Pool of Siloe, says, “Past by is the elder-tree on which Judas hanged himself... when he sold and betrayed our Lord.” Shakespeare, in Love’s Labour’s Lost, v. 2, says, “Judas was hanged on an elder.” (See Fig-tree.)

“Judas he laped
With Jewish ailer,
And sitten on an elder tree
Hanged humself.”

Piers Plowman: Vision.

Eleanor Crosses. (See Charter Cross.)

Elastic Philosophy. Founded by Xenophon’s of El’ea about B.C. 530. The Ionic school believed there was but one element; the Eleatics said there were four or six, as heat and cold, moisture and dryness, odd and even, from the antagonisms of which visible objects sprang: Thus, Fire is heat acting on dryness; Air is heat acting on moisture; Water is cold acting on moisture; and Earth is cold acting on dryness. (See below.)

The New Elastic School was founded by Leucippos of El’ea, a disciple of Zeno. He wholly discarded the phantasmagoric theory, and confined his attention to the physical properties of the visible world. He was the father of the Atomic System, in which the agency of chance was again revived.

Elecampane and Amrida. Sweetmeats which confer immortality (Latin, helenium campana or inula campana). Pliny tells us the plant so called sprang from Helen’s tears. The sweetmeat so called is a coarse sugar-candy. There was also an electuary so called, said to cure wounds given in fight.

“Here, take this essence of elecampane, Rise up, Sir George, and fight again.”

Miracle Play of St. George.

Elector. A prince who had a vote in the election of the Emperor of Germany. Napoleon broke up the old German empire, and the college of electors fell asunder.
The Great Elector, Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620-1688), ...
Elephant Paper. A large-sized drawing-paper, measuring 20 inches by 23. There is also a "double elephant paper," measuring 40 inches by 26½.

Elephant and Castle. A public-house sign at Newington, said to derive its name from the skeleton of an elephant dug up near Battle Bridge in 1714. A flint-headed spear lay by the remains, whence it is conjectured that the creature was killed by the British in a fight with the Romans. (The Times.)

There is another public-house with the same sign in St. Pancras, probably intended to represent an elephant with a howdah.

Elephantina, in Bombay, is so called from a stone elephant, which carried a tiger on its back, and formerly stood near the landing-place on the south side of the island. It has now nearly disappeared. The natives call it Gahrapooree (cave town), from its cave, 130 feet long. (Choo-choo.)

Elephantine (4 syl.). Heavy and ungainly, like an elephant. In Rome, the registers of the senate, magistrates, generals, and emperors were called elephantine books, because they were made of ivory. In geology, the elephantine period was that noted for its numerous large thick-skinned animals. The disease called elephantiasis is when the limbs swell and look like those of an elephant more than those of a human being.

Eleusinian Mysteries. The religious rites in honour of Demeter or Ceres, performed at Eleusis, in Attica.

Elevation of the Host (Thur). The celebrant lifting up the "consecrated wafers" above his head, that the people may see the paten and adore "the Host" while his back is turned to the congregation.

Even (Anglo-Saxon, ævenefene, and = ain, lefene = lef, left). One left or one more after counting ten (the fingers of the two hands). Twelve is Twal (two left): all the other tens up to 20 represent 3, 4, 5, etc. + ten. It would seem that at one time persons did not count higher than twelve, but in a more advanced state they required higher numbers, and introduced the "teen" series, omitting eleven and twelve, which would be eleven and twen-teen.

Eleven Thousand Virgins. Ursula being asked in marriage by a pagan prince, fled towards Rome with her eleven thousand virgins. At Cologne they were all massacred by a party of Huns, and even to the present hour "their bones" are exhibited to visitors through windows in the wall. Maury says that Ursula's handmaid was named Undecimella, and that the legend of her eleven thousand virgins rose out of this name. (Legends Pictur.)

Eleventh Hour (At the). Just in time (Matt. xx. 1).

Elf (plural, Elves, Anglo-Saxon, elf). Properly, a mountain fay, but more loosely applied to those airy creatures that dance on the grass or sit in the leaves of trees and delight in the full moon. They have fair golden hair, sweet musical voices, and magic harps. They have a king and queen, marry and are given in marriage. They impersonate the shimmering of the air, the felt but indefinable melody of Nature, and all the little prettinesses which a lover of the country sees, or thinks he sees, in hill and dale, copse and meadow, grass and tree, river and moonlight. Spenser says that Prometheus called the man he made "Elfe," who found a maid in the garden of Adonis, whom he called "Fay," of "whom all Fayres spring."

"Of those a mighty people shortly grew,
And pleasant kines, which all the world warred,
And to themselves all nations did sublime."

Part II Quer. 11. 9. stanza 70. etc.

Elf and Goblin, as derived from Guelf and Ghibelline, is mentioned in Johnson (article Goblin), though the words existed long before those factions arose. Heylin (in his Cosmography, p. 130) tells us that some supported that opinion in 1670. Skinner gives the same etymology.

Red Elf. In Iceland, a person gaily dressed is called a red elf (røtt elf), in allusion to a superstition that dwarfs wear scarlet or red clothes. (Nial's Saga.) Black elves are evil spirits; white elves, good ones.

Elf-arrrows. Arrow-heads of the neolithic period. The shafts of these arrows were reeds, and the heads were pieces of flint, carefully sharpened, and so adjusted as to detach themselves from the shaft and remain in the wounded body. At one time they were supposed to be shot by elves at people and cattle out of malice or revenge.

"These every head by such experience knows
How, wounded with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly,
When the sick eare her summer food forgone,
Or stretched on earth the heart-smit elders lie." - Collins : Popular Superstitions.
Elf-fire. The ignis-fatua. The name of this elf is Will-o' the Wisp, Jack o'lantern, Peg-a-lantern, or Kit o' the candlestick (candlestick).

Elf-land. The realm ruled over by Oberon, King of Faery. King James says: "I think it is like Virgil's Campi Enysiai nor anything that ought to be believed by Christians." (Demanology, iii. 5.)

Elf-locks. Tangled hair. It is said that one of the favourite amusements of Queen Mab is to tie people's hair in knots. When Edgar impersonates a madman, "he elfs all his hair in knots." (Lea, ii. 3.)

"This is that very Mab that plies the mane of horses in the night, and makes [by cakes] the elf-locks in foul stultish hairs." Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 4.

Elf-marked. Those born with a natural defect, according to the ancient Scottish superstition, are marked by the elves for mischief. Queen Margaret called Richard III.—

"Thou elf-marked, shortly roasting hog!"—Shakespeare: Richard III., i. 3.

Elf-shot. Afflicted with some unknown disease, and supposed to have been wounded by an elfin arrow. The renderpest would, in the Middle Ages, have been ascribed to elf-shots. (See Elf-Arrows.)

Elfin. The first fairy king. He ruled over India and America. (Middle Age Romancer.)

Elgin Marbles. A collection of ancient bas-reliefs and statues made by Lord Elgin, and sent to England in 1812. They are chiefly fragments of the Parthenon at Athens, and were purchased by the British Government for £35,000, to be placed in the British Museum (1816). (Elgin pronounced 'gin,' as in begin.)

Elia. A nom de plume adopted by Charles Lamb. (Essays of Elia.)

"The adoption of this name was purely accidental. Lamb's first contribution to the London Magazine was a description of the old Southsea House, where he had passed a few months November as a clerk, and remembering the name of a man in his head for forgets, who shivered them at the time, substituted his name for his own"—Talfourd.

Eliah, in the satire of Abasolin and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington. Eliah was one of the chiefs of the Gadites who joined David at Ziklag. (1 Chron. xxii. 9.)

"And the task to do Eliah right: Long with the royal wanderer [Charles 1] he proved, And firm in all the turns of fortune proved"—Abasolin and Achitophel, part ii. 956-6.

El'l'alim. Jehoiakim, King of Judah. (B.C. 635, 610-598.)

El'idure (3 syl.). A legendary king of Britain, advanced to the throne in place of his elder brother, Arthgallo, supposed by him to be dead. Arthgallo, after a long exile, returned to his country, and Elidure resigned to him the throne. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

Eligibles and Detriments. Sons which are socially good and bad parties, to be introduced to daughters with a view of matrimony.

"The County Families of the United Kingdom is useful to all who are concerned with questions of precedence, and especially useful to mothers who desire to distinguish between 'eligible' and 'detrimental.'"—Notes and Queries, February 1st, 1880, p. 110.

El'ljah's Melons. Certain stones on Mount Carmel are so called. (See Stanley, Sinai and Palestine.)

"Similar formations are those called "The Virgin Mary's Pens" (q.v.). Compare also the Bible story of Lot's wife. The story is that the owner of the land refused to supply the wants of the prophet, and consequently his melons were transformed into stones.

Eliminate (1 syl.). To turn out of doors; to turn out of an equation everything not essential to its conditions. (Latin, eliminare, out of doors.)

El'liot (George). A nom de plume of Marian Evans (Mrs. Cross), author of Adam Bede, etc. (1820-1880.)

El'liott's Tailors. The 15th Hussars, now the 15th [King's] Hussars, previously called the 15th, or king's own royal light dragoon guards. In 1799 Lieutenant-Colonel Elliott enlisted a large number of tailors on strike into a cavalry regiment modelled after the Russian hussars. This regiment so highly distinguished themselves, that George III. granted them the honour of being called "the king's royal."

Elissa. Dido, Queen of Carthage. A Phoenician name signifying heroic, brave.

"Nec me meminisse pietat Elissa." Virgil: Aenid, vi. 332.

Dido was the niece of the Bible Jezebel. Ithobal I., king of Tyre (1 Kings xvi. 13), had for children Belus, Margæus, and Jezebel. Of these Belus was the father of Pygmalion and Dido. Hence Jezebel was Dido's aunt.

Elissæ (ελίσσα) or pursimony: Greek, ellipsis). Step-sister of Medina and Ferissæ, but they could never agree upon any subject. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii.)
Bloliistic

Bloliistic

(Scandinavian mythology.)

Bloliistic

In the Black Dwarf, by Sir Walter Scott, are seven of that name, viz. Halbert or Hobbie Elliot, of the Heugh-foot (a farmer); Mrs. Elliot, his grandmother; John and Harry, his brothers; and Lilia, Jean, and Arnot, his sisters.

Bloliistic

The souls of the ancient Druids, which, being too good for hell, and not good enough for heaven, are permitted to wander upon earth till the judgment day, when they will be admitted to a higher state of being. (Welsh mythology.)

Bloliistic

In theology, Elohim (the plural of Elah) means the "Lord of Hosts," or Lord of all power and might. Jehovah signifies rather the God of mercy and forgiveness. Hence, Elohim is used to express the God of creation, but Jehovah the God of the covenant of mercy.

Elohim designates the fulness of Divine power.—Religious Encyclopedia.

Elohistic and Jehovahistic Scriptures. The Pentateuch is supposed by Bishop Colenso and many others to have been written at two widely different periods, because God is invariably called Elohim in some paragraphs, while in others He is no less invariably called Jehovah. The Elohistic paragraphs, being more simple, more primitive, more narrative, and more pastoral, are said to be the older; while the Jehovahistic paragraphs indicate a knowledge of geography and history, seem to exalt the priestly office, and are altogether of a more elaborate character. Those who maintain this theory think that some late transcriber has compiled the two Scriptures and combined them into one.
much the same as if the four Gospels were collated and welded together into a single one. To give one or two examples:—Gen. i. 27, it is said, "So God (Elohim) created man in His own image, (both) male and female"; whereas, in the next chapter (21-24), it is said that God (Jehovah) caused a deep sleep to fall on Adam, and that He then took from the sleeping man a rib and made it a woman: and therefore (says the writer) a man shall cleave unto his wife, and the two be considered one flesh. Again (Gen. vi. 19) Elohim tells Noah, "Two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, a male and a female"; and (vii. 9) "There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God (Elohim) commanded Noah." In Gen. vii. 2 Jehovah tells Noah he is to make a distinction between clean and unclean beasts, and that he is to admit the former by sevens and the latter by twos. In the first example, the priestly character is indicated by the moral, and in the latter by the distinction made between clean and unclean animals. We pass no opinion on this theory, but state it as fairly as we can in a few lines.

Elois. (See under Ely.)

Elvina. The ball of the goddess Hel (q.v.).

Elvino. A rich farmer, in love with A'muna, the somnambulist. The fact of A'muna being found in the bed of Count Rodolpho the day before the wedding, induces Elvino to reject her hand and promise marriage to Liza; but he is soon undeceived—A'muna is found to be innocent, and Liza to have been the paramour of another: so A'muna and Elvino are wedded under the happiest auspices. (Bellini’s opera, La Sonambula.) (See Liza.)

Elvira (Dona). A lady deceived by Don Giovanni, who dolled her into a liaison with his valet, Leporello. (Mozart’s opera, Don Giovanni.)

Elvira. A lady who loved Eru'ni, the robber-captain, and head of a league against Don Carlos, afterwards Charles V. of Spain. She was betrothed to Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detested, and Ernani resolved to rescue her; but it so happened that the king himself fell in love with her, and tried to win her. When Silva learned this, he joined the league; but the king, overhearing the plot in concealment, arrested the conspirators. Elvira interceded for them, and the king granted them a free pardon. When Ernani was on the point of wedding Elvira, Ernani, being summoned to death by Silva, stabbed himself. (Verdi’s opera of Ernani.)

Elvish or Eilish. Irritable, peevish, spiteful; full of little mischievous ways, like the elves. Our superstitious forefathers thought such persons were actually “possessed” by elves; and elvish-marked is marked by elves or fairies.

That dishonest victory
At Chorone, fatal to liberty
Killed with report that old man eloquent.”
Milton: Sonnets To Lady Margaret Loyd.

The eloquent doctor, Peter Aureolus, Arch bishop of Aix, a schoolman.

Elshender or Cannie Elishie. The Black Dwarf, alias Sir Edward Manley, alias the Reclusse, alias the Wise Wight of Muckelestone Moor. (Sir Walter Scott: The Black Dwarf.)

Elsie. The daughter of Gottlieb, a farm tenant of Prince Henry of Hohe nek. The prince was suffering severely from some malady, and was told that he would be cured if any maiden would give her life as a substitute. Elsie vowed to do so, and accompanied the prince from Germany to Salerno. Here Elsie surrendered herself to Lucifer, but was rescued by the prince, who married her. His health was perfectly re-established by the pilgrimage. (Tennyson: The Golden Legend.)

“O'er which were shadowy cast Elysian gleams.”
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, l. 44.

"Would take the prisoner soul,
And lay it in Elysium."
Milton: Comus, 325-2.
Elzevir. An edition of a classic author, published and printed by the family of Elzevir, and said to be immaculate. Virgil, one of the masterpieces, is certainly incorrect in some places. (1582-1626.)

Emb. The unit of measure in printing. The standard is a pica M; and the width of a line is measured by the number of such M's that would stand side by side in the "stick." This dictionary is in double columns; each column equals 11 pica M's in width, and one M is allowed for the space between. Some work is made up to 10 1/2, 20 1/2, etc., ems; and for the half-em printers employ the letter N, which is in width half a letter M. As no letter is wider than the M, and all narrower letters are fractions of it, this letter forms a very convenient standard for printing purposes.

Embargo. To lay an embargo on him or it is to impose certain conditions before you give your consent. It is a Portuguese and Spanish word, meaning an order issued by authority to prevent ships leaving port for a fixed period.

Embarrass de Richesse. More matter than can be used; overcrowded with facts or material. A publisher or editor who is overwhelmed with MSS., or contributions; an author who has more incidents or illustrations in support of his theory than he can produce, etc., have an embarrassment.

Ember Days are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of Ember Weeks (q.v.).

Ember Weeks. A corruption of quadragesima, through the Dutch quattuorsem and German quatersem. The four times are after Quadragesima Sunday, Whit Sunday, Holyrood Day (September), and St. Lucia's Day (December). The supposition that persons sat in embers (or ashes) on these days is without foundation.

Emblem is a picture with a hidden meaning; the meaning is "cast into" or "inserted in" the visible device. Thus, a balance is an emblem of justice, white of purity, a sceptre of sovereignty. (Greek, en-ballo, which gives the Greek emblem.) (See Apostles, Patron Saints.)

Some of the most common and simple emblems of the Christian Church are—A chalice. The eucharist.
The circle inscribed in an equilateral triangle. To denote the co-equality and co-eternity of the Trinity.

A crown. The reward of the perseverance of the saints.
A dove. The Holy Ghost.
A hand from the clouds. To denote God the Father.
A lamb, fish, pelican, etc., etc. The Lord Jesus Christ.
A phœnix. The resurrection.

Emblems of the Jewish Temple, (See Exod. xxv. 30-32; Rev. i. 12-20.)
Golden candlestick. The Church, its seven lights, the seven spirits of God. (Rev. ii. 6.)
The shew-bread. The twelve loaves of the twelve tribes of Israel. Represented in the Gospel by the twelve apostles.
The increase of sweet spices. Prayer, which rises to heaven as incense. (Rev. viii. 3, 4.)
The Holy of Holies. The nature of the Jews as God's peculiar people. When the veil which separated it from the temple was "rent in twain," it signified that therefrom Jews and Gentiles all formed one people of God.

Em'broyo means that which swells inside something (Greek, en-br'yo, which gives the Greek embr'yon); hence the child in the womb; the rudiment in a plant before it shows itself in a bud; an idea not developed, etc.

Em'lyye. The sister-in-law of "Duke Theseus," beloved by the two knights, Pal'amon and Ar'cyte, the former of whom had her to wife. It is of this lady the poet says, "Up roos the sun, and up roos Em'lyye" (v. 2275).

"This passeth year by year, and day by day,
Till it fell comes in a month of May,
Tim's Em'lye, that father was to wean
Then is the lute on hire stakes a crown,
And fasttech she than the May with flowers new.
And it was she, as she was went to do Sche was arisen." (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (The Knight's Tale).

Em'erald Isle. Ireland. This term was first used by Dr. Drennan (1764-1820), in the poem called Erin. Of course, it refers to the bright green verdure of the island.

"An emerald set in the ring of the sea." (Cowshanecker.

"Not one feeling of vengeance presume to delite

Em'erals. According to tradition, if a serpent fixes its eyes upon an emerald it becomes blind. (Ahmed ben Abdalazz: Treatise on Jewels.)

Emerg'ency. A sudden emergency is something which starts suddenly into view, or which rises suddenly out of the current of events. (Latin, e-merygo, to rise out of "the water.")

Emergency Man (Am). One engaged for some special service, as in Irish evictions.
Emeute (French). A seditious rising or small riot. Literally, a moving-out. (Latin, e-mo'v-er.)

Emile (2 syl.). The French form of Emil'ius. The hero of Jean Jacques Rousseau's novel of the same name, and his ideal of a perfectly educated young man.

Emilia (in Shakespeare's Othello). Wife of Iago. She is induced by her husband to purloin Desdemona's handkerchief, which Iago conveys to Cassio's chamber, and tells the Moor that Desde- mo'na had given it to the lieutenant as a love-token. At the death of Desdemona, Emilia (who, till then, never suspected the real state of the case) reveals the fact, and Iago kills her.

Emile (The divine), to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was Madame Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey for ten years.

Emmet contracted into Ant: thus, Em't, ent, ant (Anglo-Saxon, emnet).

"A bracelet made of emmet's eyes."

Enno. Your enne Christen (Dow-north), i.e., your even or fellow Christian. Shakespeare (Hamlet, v. 1) has "your even Christian." (Anglo-Saxon, Enme cristen, fellow-Christian.)

Emolument. Literally, that which comes out of the mill. (Latin, e-mo'lu-men) It originally meant toll on what was ground. (See Grist.)

Emotion. Literally, the movement of the mind brought out by something which affects it. The idea is this: The mind, like electricity, is passive till something occurs to affect it, when it becomes roused; the active state thus produced is its emotion, and the result thereof is passion or affection. (Latin, e-mo'v-er.)

Empanel or Impanel is to write the names of a jury on a panel, or piece of parchment. (French, panneu, i.e. pan de peau, piece of skin.)

Empanel. To put the pack-saddle on a beast of burden.

"Saddle Reziminate, and empanel thine ass."

- Don Quixote, ii. 28.

Empedocles (4 syl.) of Sicily. A disciple of Pythag'or-as. According to Lu'cian, he threw himself into the crater of Etna, that persons might suppose he was returned to the gods; but Etna threw out his sandal, and destroyed the illusion. (Horace: Ars Poetica, 404.) (See CHARCOMBOTS.)

"We who, to be deumed
A god, leaved finally into Etna's flames, Empedocles."

- Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 471.

Emperor. Emperor, not for myself, but for my people. The maxim of Ha'drian, the Roman emperor (117-138).

Emperor of the Mountains, king of the woods, and lord of the highways from Florence to Naples. A title assumed by Peter the Calabrian, a famous bandit-chief (1812).

Empire City (The). New York, the great commercial city of the United States.

Empire of Reason; the Empire of Truth, etc., i.e. reason or truth as the governing principle. Empire is the Latin imperium, a jurisdiction, and an emperor is one who holds command.

Empire. Quacks. A school of medicine founded by Serapion of Alexandria, who contended that it is necessary to obtain a knowledge of the nature and functions of the body in order to treat diseases, but that experience is the surest and best guide. They were opposed to the Dogmatists (q.v.). (Greek, smirao, to try, which gives the Greek emperia, experience.)

"We must not
So stain our judgment, or corrupt our hope,
To prosecute our last-cure mainly
To empiric."- Shakespeare: All's Well That Ends Well, ii. 1.

Employé. (French). One in our employ: such as clerks, shopmen, servants, etc. Employé, a female employed by a master. Employee, either sex.

"In Italy, all railroad employes are subjected to rigorous examination."- Bartlett: English, i. 64.

"All these employes should be known of charac-ter."- Macaulay's Magazine (Jul.), 1862, p. 157.

Empson. The favourite flageloct-payer of Charles II., introduced into Scott's Peregrin the Peak.

"Julian could only bow obedience, and follow Empson, who was the same person that played so rarely on the flageloct."- Chap. xxx.

Empty. (Ang.-Sax., a-m'tig.)

"Dead men's cries to fill the empty air."

- Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., v. 2.

Empty Champagne Bottles. Fellow-commoners at Cambridge used to be so called, their academical dress being a gaudy purple and silver gown, resembling the silver foil round the neck.
of a champagne bottle. Very few of these wealthy magnates took honour.

The nobleman's gown was silk.

Empty Chance. A chance not worth calculating on. The ace of dice was, by the Greeks and Romans, left empty, because the number of dice was equal to the number of aces thrown. As ace is the lowest chance, the empty chance was the least likely to win.

Empyrean. According to Ptolemy, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure celestial fire and the seat of deity; this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (from the Greek _en-pur_, in fire). (See Heaven.)

"Now had the Almighty Father from above,
From the pure empyrean where He sits High throwed above all height, bent down his eye."—Milton: Paradise Lost, ii, 660.

And again, book vi. 833:

"The steadfast empyrean shone without."

En Evidence (French). To the fore.

"Mr. —— has been much en evidence of late in the lobby; but as he has no seat, his chance of being in the ministry is very problematical."—Newspaper paragraph, February, 1886.

En Garçon. As a bachelor, "To me en garçon," without ceremony, as a bachelor fares in ordinary life.

En Masse. The whole lot just as it stands; the whole.

En Rapport. In harmony with; in sympathetic lines with.

En Route. On the way; on the road or journey.

Enél'tio-saurians (Greek, _sea-lizards_). A group of fossil saurians, including the Ichthyosaur, Pleiosaur, Sauropteryx, etc., etc.

Encelad's. The most powerful of the giants that conspired against Zeus (Jupiter). The king of gods and men cast him down, and threw Mount Etna over him. The poets say that the flames of this volcano arise from the breath of this giant. The battle-field of his contest was Phlegrea, in Macedoniana.

"So fierce Enceladis in Phlegrea stood:"

_Heracl. Jerusalem Delivered._

"I tell you, younglings, not Encelados,
With all his threatening sound of Typhon's brood.
Shall seize this prey of his father's hands."

_Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, iv. 2._

Enchanted Castles. De Saint Foix says that women and girls were subject to violence whenever they passed by an abbey quite as much as when they approached a feudal castle. When these victims were sought for and demanded back, the monks would sustain a siege rather than relinquish them; and, if close pressed, would bring to the walls some sacred relic, which so awed the assailants that they would desist rather than incur the risk of violating such holy articles. This, he says, is the origin of enchanters, enchantments, and enchanted castles. (Historical Essays.)

Enchanter is one who sings incantations. (Latin, _in-canto_, to sing over or against some one.)

Enoethium. The Greek _kōnom_ is a revel in honour of [Bacchus], in which the procession marches from _kōmē_ to _kōmē_: i.e. village to village. _En-kōmion_ is the hymn sung in these processions in honour of Bacchus; hence, praise, eulogy.

Encore (French). Our use of this word is unknown to the French, who use the word _bis_ (twice) if they wish a thing to be repeated. The French, however, say _encore un tasse_ (another cup), _encore une fois_ (still once more). It is strange how we have perverted almost every French word that we have naturalised. (See English French.)

Encratites (4 syl.). A sect of the second century, who condemned marriage, forbade eating flesh or drinking wine, and rejected all the luxuries and comforts of life as "things sinful." The sect was founded by Tatian, a heretic of the third century, who compiled from four other books what he called a _Diatessaron_—an heretical gospel. (See Euripides, book iv. chap. xxix.) (Greek, _egocrates_, self-mastery.)

This heretic must not be confounded with Tertullian the philosopher, a disciple of Justin Martyr, who lived in the second century.

Encroach means literally to put on a hook, or to hook on. Those who hook on a little here and a little there. (French, _en croc_, on a hook.)

End. (Ang._-Sax. _ende_, verb _endian._)

_At my wit's end._ At a standstill how to proceed farther; at a non-plus.

_He is no end of a fellow._ A capital chap; a most agreeable companion; an A1 [A one, _q.v._]. He is an "all round" man, and therefore has no end.

_To be one's end._ The cause or agent of [his] death.

"This apoplexy will be his end._

_Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iv. 4._

To begin at the wrong end. To attempt to do something unmethodically. This is often done in education, where children are taught grammar before they are taught words. No one on earth would teach his child to talk in such a manner. First talk anyhow, and when words are familiar, teach the grammar of sentences. The allusion may be to thread wound on a card or bobbin; if anyone attempts to unwind it at the wrong end, he will entangle the thread and be unable to unwind it.

To come to the end of one's tether. To do all that one has ability or liberty to do. The allusion is to an animal tied to a rope; he can graze only so far as his tether can be carried out.

To have it at my finger's end. To be perfectly au fait; to remember perfectly, and with ease; tanguam quis vis write. The allusion is to work done with the fingers (such as knitting), which needs no thought after it has become familiar.

To have it on [or at] the tip of my tongue. (See Tip of my Tongue.) A rope's end. A short length of rope bound at the end with thread, and used for punishing the refractory.

A shoemaker's end. A length of thread pointed with a bristle, and used by shoemakers.

My latter end. At the close of life. "At the latter end," towards the close.

"At the latter end of a dinner." Shakespeare: All's Well, etc., ii. 5.

On end. Erect.

To put an end to. To terminate or cause to terminate.

West end, East end, etc. The quarter or part of a town east or west of the central or middle part.

End-irons. Two movable iron cheek or plates, still used in cooking-stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure. The term explains itself, but must not be mistaken for andirons or "dogs."

End of the World (Thc). According to rabbinical mythology, the world is to last six thousand years. The reasons assigned are (1) because the name Jehovah contains six letters; (2) because the Hebrew letter m occurs six times in the book of Genesis; (3) because the patriarch Enoch, who was taken to heaven without dying, was the sixth generation from Adam (Seth, Enos, Caiman, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch); (4) because God created the world in six days; (5) because six contains three binaries—the first 2000 years were for the law of nature, the next 2000 years the written law, and the last 2000 the law of grace.

Seven would suit this fancy quite as well: there are seven days in a week; Jehovah contains seven letters; and Enoch was the seventh generation of the race of man; and the first two binaries were not equal periods.

Ends. To burn the candle at both ends. To be like a man on double business bound, who both neglects. Of course, no candle could burn at both ends, unless held horizontally, as the lower end would be extinguished by the melted wax or tallow.

To make two or both ends meet. To make one's income cover expenses; to keep out of debt. The allusion is to a belt somewhat too tight. The French say joindre les deux bouts.

Endemic. Pertaining to a locality. An endemic disease is one common to a particular district, from which it shows no tendency to spread. Thus intermittent fevers are endemic in marshy places.

Endorse. I endorse that statement. I accept it; I fully accord with it. The allusion is to the commercial practice of writing your name on the back of a bill of exchange or promissory note if you choose to make yourself responsible for it. (Latin, in-dorsum, on the back.)

Endymion, in Greek mythology, is the setting sun with which the moon is in love. Endymion was condemned to endless sleep and everlasting youth, and Seleucides kisses him every night on the Lybian hills.

"The moon sleeps with Endymion, And would not be awakened." Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

Enemy. How goes the enemy? or What says the enemy? What o'clock is it? Time is the enemy of man, especially of those who are behind time.

Enfant Terrible (Au) [lit., a terrible child]. A moral or social nuisance.

Enfield Rife. So called from the factory at Enfield where it is made.

Enflaticle (French) means literally to spin out; to put thread in [a needle], as enflater une aiguille; to string beads by putting them on a thread, as enflater des perles. Soldiers being compared to thread, we get the following metaphors: to go through a place as thread through a needle—to string artillery by placing it in a line and directing it against an enemy; hence, to scour or rake with shot.

England. Verstegan quaintly says that Egbert was "chiefly moved" to call his kingdom England "in respect of Pope Gregory's changing the name of Engildise into Anglesyke. And this "may have moved our kings upon their best gold coins to set the image of an angel." (Restitution of Decayed Intelligences in Antiquities concerning... the English Nation, p. 147.)

? The Anges migrated from the east of the Elbe to Schleswig (between the Jutes and the Saxons). They passed over in great numbers to Britain during the 6th century, and in time established the kingdoms of the heptarchy.

England Expects that Every Man will do his Duty. The parole signalled by Horatio Nelson to his fleet before the battle of Trafalgar.

England's Darling. Hereward the Wake, in the time of William the Conqueror. The "Camp of Refuge" was established in the Isle of Ely, and the Earl of Morcar joined it in 1071. It was blockaded for three months by William, and Hereward (3 syl.) with some of his followers escaped.

Englentyne (3 syl.). The Nomine or Prior of Chaucer's pilgrims. An admirable character sketch. (Canterbury Tales; Prologue, 118-164.) (See Eloi.)

English French. A kind of perplexity seems to pervade many of the words which we have borrowed from the French. Thus curate (French vicaire); Vicar (French curé). Encore (French bis). Epergne (French surtorn); Surtout (French pardessus). Screw (French vis), whereas the French écuron we call a nut; and our vicar is étain in French.

Some still say à l'outrance (French à outrance).

We say double entendre, the French à deux entente.

The reader will easily call to mind other examples.

Englishman. The national nickname of an Englishman is "a John Bull." The nation, taken in the aggregate, is nicknamed "John Bull." The French nickname for an Englishman is "Godam!" (See BULL.)

Englishman's Castle. His house is so called, because so long as a man shuts himself up in his own house, no bailiff can break through the door to arrest him or seize his goods. It is not so in Scotland.

Enid. The daughter and only child of Yviol, and wife of Prince Geraint, one of the Knights of the Round Table. Ladies called her "Enid the Fair," but the people named her "Enid the Good." (Idylls of the King; Geraint and Enid.)

Enlightened Doctor (The). Raymond Lully, of Palma, one of the most distinguished men of the thirteenth century. (1234-1315.)

Enniskillens. The 6th Dragoons; instituted 1689, on account of their brave defence of the town of Enniskillen, in favour of William III.

? This cavalry regiment must not be confounded with the Innskillings or Old 27th Foot, now called the "1st battalion of the Royal Innskilling Fusiliers," which is a foot regiment.

Ennius. The Chaucer or father of Roman poets. (B.C. 239-189.)

The English Ennius, Layamon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of Wace's Brut.

The French Ennius. Guillaume di Lorris (1235-65), author of the Romance of the Rose, called the Iliad of France. Sometimes Jehan de Meung (1260-1320), who wrote the continuation of the same romance, is so called.

The Spanish Ennius. Juan de Mena, born at Cor'dova. (1412-56.)

Enough. ( Anglo-Saxon, genoh or genog.) Enough! Stop now; you have said all that is needful.

Enough is as good as a feast.

Latin: "Illud satius est, quod satis est."

French: "On est assez riche, quand on a le nécessaire."

At one time Enow was used for numbers reckoned by tale, as: There are chairs enow, nails enow, men enow, etc.; but now enough does duty for both words, and enow is archaic.

En sou' oo (2 syl.). To hide; to put under cover. Literally, to cover with a scowre, or fort. (German, schwanze, a fort; Danish, schaua; Swedish, skana; Latin, abscondo, to hide.)

Ensemble. The tout ensemble. The general effect; the effect when the whole is regarded. (French.)

Ensign. (French, enseigne.) Of ancient Athens. An owl. America. The Stars and Stripes. The British Navy. The Union Jack (g.r.). The white ensign (Royal Navy) is the banner of St. George with the Jack cantoned in the first quarter. The red ensign is that of the merchant service.
Ensilage

The blue ensign is that of the navy reserve.

China. A dragon.

Ancient Corinth. A flying horse—i.e.

Pegasus.

Ancient Danes. A raven.

Ancient Egypt. A bull, a crocodile, a vulture.

Ancient France. The cape of St. Martin; then the oriflamme.

The Franks (Ripus'riam). A sword with the point upwards.

The Franks (Salian). A bull's head.

The Gauls. A wolf, bear, bull, cock.

The ancient Macedonians. The Greek capital letter L (lambda λ).

The ancient Messenians. The Greek letter mu μ.

The ancient Persians. A golden eagle with outstretched wings on a white field; a dove; the sun.

The Paidarvian dynasty of Persia. A blacksmith's apron. (See STANDARD.)

The ancient Romans. An eagle for the legion; a wolf, a horse, a boar, etc.

Rout'ulus. A handful of hay or fern (manip'ulus).

The ancient Saxons. A trotting horse.

The ancient Thibans. A sphinx.

The Turks. Horses' tails.

The ancient Welsh. A dragon.

Ensilage. A method of preserving green fodder by storing it in mass under pressure in deep trenches cut in a dry soil.

Entail. An entail is an estate cut from the power of a testator. The testator cannot bequeath it; it must go to the legal heirs. (French, en-tailler.)

Entangle. The Anglo-Saxon tan means a twig, and twigs smeared with birdlime were used for catching small birds, who were "un-tangled" or twigged.

Entelechy. The kingdom of Queen Quintessence in the famous satirical romance of Rabelais called the History of Gargantua and Pantagruel. Pantagruel and his companions went thither in search of the Holy Bottle. It may be called the city of speculative science.

"The word is used to express the realisation of a beau ideal." Lovers have preconceived notions of human perfections, and imagine that they see the realities in the person beloved, who is the entelechy of their beau ideal.

*"O lumiere! enlevie D'un feu divin, qui m'arde si vivement, Pour me donner l'ete et le mouvement. Etes-vous par mes sens entelechie?"

Humbert: sonnet 83 (1524-65).

Enter a House right Foot foremost (Petronius). It was thought unlucky to enter a house or to leave one's chamber left foot foremost. Augustus was very superstitious on this point. Pythagoras taught that it is necessary to put the shoe on the right foot first. "When stretching forth your feet to have your sandals put on, first extend your right foot" (Protreptics of Iamblichus, symbol xii.). Iamblichus tells us this symbolized that man's first duty is reverence to the gods.

Entering Short. When bills are paid into a banker's hands to receive the amount when due, it is called "entering them short." In this case, if the banker fails, the assignees must give them up. Bills in the hands of factors may be so entered.

Enthusiast is one who believes that he himself is in God, or that God is in him (Greek, en theos). Our word inspired is very similar, being the Latin in spiritu (in the spirit).

Entire. Ale, in contradistinction to "cooper," which is half ale and half porter. As Calvert's entire, etc.

Entre Nous (French). Between you and me; in confidence.

N.B.—One of the most common vulgarisms of the better class is "Between you and I."

Entrée (To have the). To be eligible for invitations to State balls and concerts.

Entremets (arv-tray-may). Sweet foods or kickshaws served at table between the main dishes, courses, or removes; literally, entr' met (French), things put between. We now use two words, entries and entremets, the former being subordinate animal foods handed round between the main dishes, and the latter being sweet made dishes.

Eolian. An Eolian harp. A box fitted with strings, like a fiddle. The strings, however, are not sounded by a bow, but by a current of air or wind passing over them.

"Awake, Eolian harp, awake, And give to rapture all thy trembling strings."

Gray: Progress of Poetry, lines 1, 2.

Eolus. God of the winds. (Roman mythology.)

Epact. The excess of the solar over the lunar year, the former consisting of 365 days, and the latter of 354, or eleven days fewer. The epact of any year is the number of days from the last new moon of the old year to the list of the following: January. (Greek, épactos, feminine épactis, adicitionis.)

Epargne (2 syl.). A large ornamental stand placed in the middle of a dining-table. It is generally said to be a French word, but the French call such an ornamental stand a surtout, strangely adopted by us to signify a frock-coat, which the French call a pardessus. The nearest French word is épargne, saving, as cause d'épargne, a savings bank; verb épargner, to spare or save. (See English French.)

Ephes'ians. Youths between the age of eighteen and twenty were so called at Athens. (Greek, arrived at puberty.)

Ephesian. A jovial companion; a thief; a roysterer. A pun on the verb to pheeeze—A-pheeeze-ian. Pheese is to flatter.

"It is thine host, thine Ephesian, calls."—Swift, Mercury's Widow, iv. 5.

Ephesian Letters. Magic characters. The Ephesians were greatly addicted to magic. Magic characters were marked on the crown, cincture, and feet of Diana; and, at the preaching of Paul, many which used curious [magical] books burnt them. (Acts xix. 19.)

The Ephesian poet. Hippo'max, born at Ephesus in the sixth century B.C.

Ephial'tes (4 syl.). A giant who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Ephial'tes (4 syl.). The nightmare. (Greek, ephal'tes, an incubus; from ep'hal'to'mai, to leap upon.)

"Perish innumerable all, with which those who are haunted by the night-hag, whom the learned call Hecate, but we too well know acquainted."—Sir W. Scott; The Antiquary, chap. 4.

Eph'i're or Eph'or. Spartan magistrates, five in number, annually elected from the ruling caste. They exercised control even over the kings and senate.

Epic. 1. Father of epic poetry. Homer (about 950 B.C.), author of the Iliad and Odyssey.

2. Celebrated epics are the Iliad, Odyssey, Enuüd, Paradise Lost.

The great Puritan epic. Milton's Paradise Lost.

"Speaking of M. Doré's performances as [i.e.: illustrator of the great Puritan epic]—The Times.

Epi'cure (3 syl.). A sensualist; one addicted to good eating and drinking. So called from Epicu'ros (q.v.).

Sir Epicure. A worldly sensualist in The Alchemist, by Ben Jonson. His surname is "Mammon."

Epicu'ros. Carnal; sensual; pertaining to good eating and drinking. (See Epicurean.)

T. Moore has a prose romance entitled The Epicurean.

"Epicurean cooks sharpen with clavichords saucy his appetite."—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 1.

Epic'urean. (Latin form, Epicureus.)

The Greek philosopher who founded the Epicure'an school. His axiom was that "happiness or enjoyment is the summum bonum of life." His disciples corrupted his doctrine into "Good living is the object we should all seek," or, according to the drinking song, "Who leads a good life is sure to live well."

"Hast he the day I 'scape the wrangling crew, From Pyrrha's [q.v.] maze and Epicurean sly."

Hesiod: Mythol.

The Epicureus of China. Tao-tse, who commenced the search for the "elixir of life." Several of the Chinese emperors lost their lives by drinking his "potion of immortality." (n.c. 540.)

Epi-dem'ic is from the two Greek words epi-de'mos (upon the people), a disease that attacks a number of people at once, either from bad air, bad drainage, or other similar cause.

Epigram. A short pointed or anti-theatrical poem; or any short composition happily or anti-theatrically expressed.

Epilepsy was called by the Romans the Comital or Congress sickness (morbus comitialis), because the polling for the comitia centuriata was null and void if any voter was seized with epilepsy while the votes were being taken.

Epi'men'idës (5 syl.). A philosopher of Crete, who fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake again for fifty-seven years, when he found himself endowed with miraculous wisdom. (Pliny: Natural History.) (See Rip Van Winkle.)

"Like Epi'menidës, I have been sleeping in a cave; and, waking, saw those whom I left children were bearded men."—Bulwer Lytton: Lord Lytton.

Epiph'any. The time of appearance, meaning the period when the star appeared to the wise men of the East. The 6th January is the Feast of the Epiphany.

2. The word is not special to Christianity. One of the names of Zeus was Epiphanes (the manifest one), and festivals in his honour were called "Epiphanies." (Greek, epi-phaíno, to shine upon, to be manifest [in creation].)

Episo'mon, in Greek numerals, is a sign standing for a numeral. Thus, ἔπισομον βάβ, generally called Pam.
held on Epsom Downs, and were instituted by Charles I. The second day (Wednesday) is the great Derby day, so called from Lord Derby, who instituted the stakes in 1780. The fourth day (Friday) is called the Oaks, so called from "Lambert's Oaks." The "Oaks Estate" passed into the Derby family, and the twelfth Earl of Derby established the stakes.

* The Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger (held at Doncaster) are called the Three Classic Races. N.B.—There are other races held at Epsom besides the great four-day races mentioned above—for instance, the City Suburban and the Great Metropolitan (both handicap races).

Epsom Salts. A salt formerly obtained by boiling down the mineral water in the vicinity of Epsom, but now chemically prepared. It is the sulphate of magnesia.

Equal-to, in mathematics. The symbol (=), two little parallel lines, was invented by Robert Recorde, who died 1558.

"As he said, nothing is more equal than parallel lines."

Equation of Time. The difference between mean and apparent time—i.e., the difference between the time as shown by a good clock and that indicated by a sundial. The greatest difference is in November, at the beginning of which month the sun is somewhat more than sixteen minutes too slow. There are days in December, April, June, and September when the sun and the clock agree.

Equus Aura'tus. A knight bachelor, called aura'tus because he was allowed to gild his armour—a privilege confined to knights.

Equipage (3 syl.). Tea equipage. A complete tea-service. To equip means to arm or furnish, and equipage is the furniture of a military man or body of troops. Hence camp equipage (all things necessary for an encampment); field equipage (all things necessary for the field of battle); a prince's equipage, and so on.

Equity. (See Astrea.)

Era. A series of years beginning from some epoch or starting-point, as:

The Era of the Greek Olympiads... B.C.
- The Foundation of Rome... 753
- Nabonassar... 747
- Alexander the Great... 324
- the Science... 315
- Julius Era... 45
The Mundane Era, or the number of years between the Creation and the Nativity:

According to the modern Greek Calendar 7,368

Josephus 7,368
Believer 1,916
the ancient Greek Church 5,559
Professor Hale 5,411
Bartholomew Of the Dates 4,999
Archbishop Usher 4,704
Calmet 4,000 the Jews 2,500

Other Eras:
American Independence, July 4, A.D. 1776.
Augustus, B.C. 27.
Diocletian, A.D. 284.
Tyre, Oct. 10, A.D. 125.
the Chinese, B.C. 207.
the French Republic, Sept. 22, A.D. 1792.
the Hegira, July 10, A.D. 622.
the Marcheaux, B.C. 166.
the Martyrs, Feb. 23, A.D. 313.

The Christian Era begins from the birth of Christ.

Erastius, the emperor, condemned a knight to death because the companion who went out with him returned not. "Thou hast slain thy fellow," said the emperor, "and must die." Go," continued he, to another knight, and lead him to death. On their way they met the knight supposed to be dead, and returned to Erastius, who, instead of revoking his sentence, ordered all three to be put to death—the first because he had already condemned him to death; the second because he had disobeyed his orders; and the third because he was the real cause of the death of the other two. Chaucer tells this anecdote in his Sompnoures Tale. It is told of Cornelius Piso by Sene'ca in his De Ira, lib. i. 16; but in the Gesta Romanorum it is ascribed to Erasius.

Eras'tians. The followers of Thomas Lieber, Latinised into Erastus, a German heretic of the sixteenth century. (1524-1583.)

Eras'tianism. State supremacy or interference in ecclesiastical affairs. Thus, the Church of England is sometimes called "Erasian," because the two Houses of Parliament can interfere in its ritual and temporalities, and the sovereign, as the "head" of it, appoints bishops and other dignitaries thereof.

Erebus. Darkness. The gloomy cavern underground through which the Shades had to walk in their passage to Hadès. "A valley of the shadow of death."

Not Erebus itself were dim enough To hide thee from prevention. Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

Erete'rius. The Eretrian bull. Mened'emos of Eretria, in Eubœa; a Greek philosopher of the fourth century B.C., and founder of the Eretrian school, which was a branch of the Socrat'ic.
He was called a "bull" from the bull-like gravity of his face.

Er'igena. John Scotus, called "Sco'tus the Wise," who died 886. He must not be confounded with Duns Scotus the schoolman, who lived some four centuries after him (1265-1308).

Erin. Ireland (q.v.).

Eri'nus or Erin'us. The goddess of vengeance, one of the Furies. (Greek mythology.)

Eriph'lia. The personification of avarice, who guards the path that leads to pleasure, in Orlando Furioso, vi. 61.

Eri'x, son of Goliath (c) and grand-son of Atlas. He invented legedernain. (Duchat: Enires de Rabelais; 1711.)

Eri-king. King of the elves, who prepares mischief for children, and even deceives men with his seductions. He is said to haunt the Black Forest.

Er'meline (Dame). Reynard’s wife, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Er'meonos (4 syl.). A renegade Christian, whose name was Clement. He was entrusted with the command of the caliph’s “regal host,” and was slain by Godfrey. (Tasso: Jerusalem De­livered.)

Er'mine or Hermine. Littré derives the word from Armentia, and says it is the “Pontic rat” mentioned by Pliny; if so, the better spelling would be “Armire.” Prof. Skert derives the word from the French hermine, through harme, the ermine, stoat, or weasel. The ermine is technically called the Mustela ermica.

Er'mine Street. One of the four great public ways made in England by the Romans. The other three are Wil­ling Street, Ikenwold Street, and the Fawke. Germanicus derives Ermin from Hermœ, whence Irminus/n (a column of Mercury), because Mercury presided over public roads. This is not correct; Irminus, or rather Ermensul, is the Scandinavian Odín, not a “Column of Mercury” at and Erming Street really means Odin's Street.

Fare wees many on ther ben in Engeland,
But four most of all mes sund rod.
From the south into the north toast Eyning-streede;
From the east into the west sooth Armeled-streede;
From south-east (east) to North-west (that is sum del grete)
From letter [Dover] into Chester goth Watting-streede.
The frost is most of all that tills from Tote-nes.
From the one end of Cornwall anon to Catenay (Caithines).
From the south to North-east into Englonde and Fore men callith think voix.

Robert of Gloucester.

Ermin'ia. The heroine of Jerusalem Delivered. When her father, the King of Antioch, was slain at the siege of Antioch, and Erminia fell captive into the crusader's hands, Tancred gave her her liberty, and restored to her all her father's treasures. This generous conduct quite captivated her heart, and she fell in love with the Christian prince. Al'adine, King of Jerusalem, took charge of her. When the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, she dressed herself in Clandria's armour to go to Tancred, but, being discovered, fled, and lived awhile with some shepherds on the banks of the Jordan. Meeting with Vafri'tno, sent as a secret spy by the crusaders, she revealed to him the design against the life of Godfrey, and, returning with him to the Christian camp, found Tancred wounded. She cured his wounds, so that he was able to take part in the last great day of the siege. We are not told the ultimate fate of this fair Syriam.

Ernani. The bandit-captain, Duke of Segor'bia and Cardo'na, Lord of Ar'gon, and Count of Ermani, in love with Elvira, who is betrothed to Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests. Charles V. of Spain also loves her, and tries to win her. Silva, finding that the king has been tampering with his betrothed, joins the league of Ermani against the king. The king in concealment overhears the plotters, and, at a given signal, they are arrested by his guards, but, at the intercession of Elvira, are pardoned and set free. Ernani is on the point of marrying Elvira, when a horn is heard. This horn Ermani had given to Silva when he joined the league, saying, "Sound but this horn, and at that moment Ermani will cease to live." Silva insists on the fulfilment of the compact, and Ermani stabs himself. (Verdi's opera of Ernani.)

Ernest (Duke). A poetical romance by Henry of Veldig (Waldeck), contemporary with Frederick Barbarossa.

Duke Ernest is son-in-law of Kaiser Conrad II. Having murdered his feudal lord, he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to expiate his crime, and the poem describes his adventures on the way. It is a mixture of Homeric and Oriental myths, and the tales of crusaders. Duke Ernest fulfilled his pilgrimage, returned to Germany, and received absolution.

Eros, the Greek equivalent of Cupid.

Eros'trusus. The man who set fire to the temple of Diana in Ephesus, on the day Alexander the Great was born. This he did to make his name immortal. In order to defeat his vainglory, the Ephesians forbade his name to be mentioned, but such a prohibition would be sure to defeat its object.

Erra-Pater. An almanack. William Lilly, the almanack-maker and astrologer, is so called by Butler. It is said to have been the "name" of an eminent Jewish astrologer. (Halliwell: Archaic Dictionary.)

"In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Eris Pater." Butler: Hudibras, 1.1.

Erse (1 syl.). The native language of the West Highlanders of Scotland, who are of Irish origin. It is a variant of Irish. Applied by the Scotch Lowlanders to the Highland dialect of Gaelic. In the eighteenth century Scotch was often called Erse, without distinction of Highland and Lowland; and Irish was spoken of as Irish Gaelic. The practice now is to limit the word Erse to Irish, and Gaelic to Scotch Highlanders.

Erudite. Most erudite of the Romans. Marcus Terentius Varro, a man of vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature. (b.c. 116-27.)

Erythro'os. (See Horse.)

Erythynus. Have no doings with the Erythynus. This is the thirty-third Symbol of the Protreptics of Iamblichus. The Erythynus is a fish called by Pliny (ix. 77) erythirous, a red fish with a white belly. Pythagoras used this fish as a symbol of a braggadocio, which has a lily liver. Have no doings with those who are tongue-doughty, but have white stomachs (where stomach means true courage).

Escapad' (3 syl.). French. Means literally an escape [from restraint]; hence a spree, lark, or prank. (Spanish, escapar, escapada.)

"His second escapade was made for the purpose of visiting the field of Rutlison Green."—Scott: Guy Mannering, xxxvi.
Eslandre. An event which gives rise to scandal. "By the famous Bou-andre."

"Since the last 'Esandrea' he had held little or no communication with her." — Lady Herbert: Addio, 13.

Esquage (3 syll.) means "shield service," and is applied to that obligation which bound a vassal to follow his lord to war at his own private charge. (French, escu, escus; a shield.)

Esca'lpious (Latin, Esculapius). A disciple of Esculapius means a medical student. Esculapius, medical. Escula'pios, in Homer, is a "blameless physician," whose sons were the medical attendants of the Greek army. Subsequently, he was held to be the "god of the medical art."

Eso'ri-al. The palace of the Spanish sovereigns, about fifteen miles north-west of Madrid. It is one of the most superb structures in Europe, but is built among rocks, as the name signifies.

Eso'tocheon of Pretence (Au). That of a wife, either heirless or co-hereless, placed in the centre of her husband's shield.

Easin'ga. A title given to the kings of Kent, from Esc, their first king, sometimes called Oehtha.

Esmond (Henry). A chivalrous cavalier in the reign of Queen Anne. The hero of Thackeray's novel entitled Esmond.

Exoter'ic (Greek, those within). Exoteric, those without. The term originated with Pythagoras, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his exoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoterics.

Aristotle adopted the same terms, though he did not teach behind a curtain. He called those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, his exoterics; and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Espir'l (Ex-pel). Nephew of Orinade la Fée. A dwarf, not more than three feet high, with yellow hair as fine as gold, and though above a hundred years old, a seeming child of seven. He was one of the falsest knaves in the world, and knew every kind of enchantment. (Romance of Maugis d'Aigrémont et de Vrissian frère.)

Espian'dian. Son of Amadis and Oriana. He is the hero of Montalvo's continuation of Amadis, called The Fifth Book.

Esprit de Corps. Fellow-feeling for the society with which you are associated. A military term—every soldier will stand up for his own corps.

Esprit Folin. A bogle which delights in misleading and tormenting mortals.

Esquire. One who carried the escutcheon of a knight. (Latin, scutiger, a shield-bearer.)

Copy of a letter from C. H. Athill, Esq., "Richmond Herald": —

"Herald's College, B.C., January 29th, 1863.

"The following persons are legally 'Esquires': —

"The sons of peers, the sons of baronets, the sons of knights, the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and in their eldest sons in perpetuity, the eldest son of the oldest son of a knight, and his eldest son in perpetuity, the kings of arms, the heralds of arms, officers of the Army or Navy of the rank of captain and upwards, sheriffs of counties for life, J.P.'s of counties whilst in commission, serjeants-at-law, queen's counsel, serjeants-at-arms, companions of the Orders of Knighthood, certain principal officers in the Queen's household, deputy lieutenants, commissi- ioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, masters of the Supreme Court, those whom the Queen, in any commission or warrant, styles esquire, and any person who, in virtue of his office, takes precedence of esquires."

* Add to these, graduates of the universities not in holy orders.

Es'ays. Lord Bacon's essays were the first in English that bore the name.

"To write just sentiments requisite to the writer and reader... which is the cause which hath made me choose to write certain brief notes... I have called 'essays.' — Dedication to Prince Henry.

Esso'nes (2 syll.). A sect among the Jews in the time of our Saviour. They were communists who abjured every sort of fleshly indulgence. They ate no animal food, and drank only water. Their sacrifices to God were only fruits of the earth. They kept the Sabbath so strictly that they would not even wash a plate or rinse a cup on that day. They always dressed in white, took no part in public matters, but devoted themselves to contemplative studies. They held the Jewish Scriptures in great reverence, but interpreted them allegorically.

Essex. East seaxu (the territory of the East Saxons).

Essex Lions. Calves, for which the county is famous.

Valiant as an Essex lion (ironical).

Essex Stile. A ditch. As Essex is very marshy, it abounds in ditches, and has very few stiles.
Est-il-possible. A nickname of Prince George of Denmark, given him by James II. The story goes that James, speaking of those who had deserted his standard, concluded the catalogue with these words, "And who do you think besides? Why, little Est-il-possible, my worthy son-in-law." James applied this cognomen to the prince because, when George was told of his father-in-law's abdication, all he did was to exclaim, "Est-il-possible?" and when told, further, of the several noblemen who had fallen away from him, "Est-il-possible?" exhausted his indignation.

Estafette (French; Spanish, estafeta). Military couriers sent express. Their duty is to deliver the dispatches consigned to them to the postillions appointed to receive them.

Estates. Estates of the realm. The powers that have the administration of affairs in their hands. The three estates of our own realm are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons; popularly speaking, the public press is termed the fourth estate. It is a great mistake to call the three estates of England the Sovereign, the Lords, and the Commons, as many do. The word means that on which the realm stands. (Latin, sta, to stand.) (See Fourth Estate.)

"Here . . . made a supper to his . . . chief estates."—Mark vi. 21.

"The king and the three estates of the realm assembled in parliament."—Cicero for Rom. iv.

Esto. The house of Esto had for their armorial bearing a white eagle on an azure shield. Rinaldo, in Jerusalem Delivered, adopted this device; and Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, gives it both to Mandricarillo and Rogero, adding that it was borne by Trojan Hector. As the Dukes of Brunswick are a branch of the house of Este, our Queen is a descendant of the same noble family.

D'Este was the surname adopted by the children of the Duke of Sussex and Lady Augusta Murray.

Estotiland. An imaginary tract of land near the Arctic Circle in North America, said to have been discovered by John Scalvii, a Pole.

"The snow From cold Estotiland." Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 365.

Estramagon (French). A blow or cut with a sword, hence also "estramagonner," to play at backword. Sir Walter Scott uses the word in the sense of a feint or pretended cut. Hence Sir Jeffrey Hudson, the dwarf, says:

"I tripped a hasty morris . . . upon the dining-table, now offering my sword [to the Duke of Buckingham], and now recovering it, I made . . . a sort of estramagon at his nose, the externity of which consisted in coming mildly near to the object without touching it."—Pseudor. of the Pack, chap. xxiv.

Estrich Wool is the soft down of the ostrich, called in French, d'etre ch'antriche. It lies immediately under the feathers of the ostrich.

Estridis or Estrild. Daughter of a German king, and handmaid to the mythical King Humber. When Humber was drowned in the river that bears his name, King Loricin fell in love with Estrildis, and would have married her, had he not been betrothed already to Guendole'a; however, he kept Estridis for seven years in a palace underground, and had by her a daughter named Sabrina. After the death of Loricin, Guendole'a threw both Estridis and Sabrina into the Severn. (Geoffrey: British History, ii. ch. ii. v.)

Estuary. Literally, the boiling place; the mouth of a river is so called because the water there seems to seethe and boil. (Latin, aestu, to boil.)

Eternal City (The). Rome. Virgil makes Jupiter tell Venus he would give to the Romans imperium sine fine (an eternal empire). (Aeneid: i. 79.)

Eternal Fitness of Things. The congruity between an action and the agent.

"Can any man have a higher notion of the rule of right, and the eternal fitness of things?"—Fielding: Tom Jones, book iv. chap. iv.

Eternal Tables. A white pearl, extending from east to west, and from heaven to earth, upon which, according to Mahomet, God has recorded every event, past, present, and to come.

Etesian Wind (An). "Etesia flabra Agrilorum," says Lucretius (v. 741). A wind which rises annually about the dog-days, and blows forty days together in the same direction. It is a gentle and mild wind. (Greek, etiosos, annual.)

"Deem not, good Fortens, that in this my song I mean to buoy up thy humble mind And pray that youth in London known so long: For harm and softness, an Etesian wind."—Peter Pindar: Nil Admirari.

Ethnic Plot. The Popish plot. In Dryden's satire of Abolition and Achitophel, Charles II. is called David, the royalists are called the Jews, and the Papists Gentiles or Ethni, whence “Ethnophones” means the Gentile or Pekish plot.

“Saw with disdain an Ethnophonic plot... Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.” Part i. 516, 532-3.

Ethnophones (4 syl.). A sect of heretics of the seventeenth century, who practised the observances of the ancient Pagans. (Greek, ethnos-phren, heathen-minded.)

Etceon. The eagle or vulture that gnawed the liver of Prometheus.

Etiquette (3 syl.). The usages of polite society. The word means a ticket or card, and refers to the ancient custom of delivering a card of directions and regulations to be observed by all those who attended court. The original use was a soldier’s billet. (French, etiquette; Spanish, etiqueta, a book of court ceremonies.)

“... had its original application to those ceremonial and formal observances practised at Court... The term came afterwards &... to signify certain formal methods used in the transactions between sovereign States.” —Burke: Works, vol. viii. p. 329.

Etta. Virgil ascribes its eruption to the restlessness of Enceladus, a hundred-headed giant, who lies buried under the mountain. (Aen. iii. 578, etc.) In Etta the Greek and Latin poets place the forges of Vulcan and the smithy of the Cyclops.

Etroues (2 syl.). New-year’s gifts are so called in France. Stercia, the Roman goddess, had the superintendence of new-year’s gifts, which the Romans called streva. Tertius entered Rome on New-year’s Day, and received from some angus palmus cut from the sacred grove, dedicated to the goddess Stercia. Having succeeded, he ordained that the 1st of January should be celebrated by gifts to be called streva, consisting of figs, dates, and honey; and that no word of ill omen should be uttered on that day.

Etrick Shepherd. James Hogg, the Scotch poet, who was born in the forest of Etrick, Selkirkshire. (1772-1835.)

“The Etrick Shepherd was my guide.” Worsnop.

Etzel—i.e. Attila. King of the Huns, a monarch ruling over three kingdoms and more than thirty principalities; being a widower, he married Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In the Nibelungen-Lied, where he is introduced (part ii.), he is made very insignificant, and sees his liegemen, and even his son and heir, struck down without any effort to save them, or avenge their destruction. He is as unlike the Attila of history as possible.

Eucharies. in Fénelon’s Théopaque, is meant to represent Mdlle. de Fontanges.

Eucharist literally means a thank-offering. Our Lord said, “Do this in remembrance of me”—i.e. out of gratitude to me. The elements of bread and wine in the Lord’s supper. (Greek, eu-charistia.)

Eufelia. A penurious old hunk in one of the comedies of Plautus (Aulularia).

Eurates (3 syl.). More shifts than Eurates. Euclides, the miller, was one of the archons of Athens, noted for his shifts and excuses for neglecting the duties of the office.

Eudoxiana. Heretics, whose founder was Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch in the fourth century. They maintained that the Son had a will independent of the Father, and that sometimes their wills were at variance.

Eugenius. This was John Hall Stephenson, author of Crazy Tales, a relative of Sterne. In Sterne’s Tristram Shandy, Eugenius is made the friend and wise counsellor of Yorick.

Eugubine Tables. Seven bronze tables found near Eugubium (Gubbio) in Italy, in 1444. Of the inscriptions, five are Umbrian and Etruscan, and two are Latin.

“The Umbrian, the tongue of north-eastern Italy, is yet more fully represented to us by the Eugubine tablets... supposed to be as old as the third and fourth centuries before our era.” —W. D. Whitney: Study of Languages, lecture vi. p. 220.

Euallae (St.). Eu’lal’ie is one of the names of Apollo; but in the calendar there is a virgin martyr called Euallae, born at Merida, in Estramadura. When she was only twelve years old, the great persecution of Diocletian was set on foot, whereupon the young girl left her maternal home, and, in the presence of the Roman judge, cast down the idols he had set up. She was martyred by torture, February 12th, 308.

Longfellow calls Evangeline the “Sunshine of St. Euallae.”

Eulenspiegel (Thyl) or Tyll Owl-glass. The hero of a German tale, which relates the pranks and drolleries, the ups and downs, the freaks and fun of a wandering cottager of Brunswick. The Bustamania.

Eustathians. A denomination so called from Eustathius, a monk of the fourth century, excommunicated by the council of Gangra.

author is said to have been Dr. Thomas Munro (1475–1530).

Eunastes or Eunastes. A swineherd.

So called from the slave and swineherd of Ulysses.

"This second Eunastes strode hastily down the forest glade, driving before him . . . the whole herd of his inharmonious charge."—Sir Walter Scott.

Eumenides [the good-tempered goddesses]. A name given by the Greeks to the Furies, as it would have been ominous and bad policy to call them by their right name, Erinyses.

Eumnestes [Memory], who, being very old, keeps a little boy named Anamnestes [Research] to fetch books from the shelves. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii. 9.)

Eunomia. Heretics, the disciples of Eunomius, Bishop of Cyzicus in the fourth century. They maintained that the Father was of a different nature to the Son, and that the Son did not in reality unite Himself to human nature.

Eupatridae. The oligarchy of Attica. These lords of creation were subsequently set aside, and a democratic form of government established.

Euphemisms. Words or phrases substituted, to soften down offensive expressions.

Place never mentioned to earn polite. In the reign of Charles II., a worthy divine of Whitehall thus concluded his sermon: "If you don't live up to the precepts of the Gospel . . . you must expect to receive your reward in a certain place which 'tis not good manners to mention here" (Laeovico). Pope tells us this worthy divine was a dean:

"To rest the cushion and soft beam invite,
Who never mentioned hell to ears polite."—Moral Essays, epist. iv. 41, 50.

"His Satanic majesty;" "light-fingered gentry;" "a gentleman on his travels" (one transported); "she has met with an accident" (has had a child before marriage); "help" or "employ" (a servant); "not quite correct" (a falsehood); "an obliquity of vision" (a sight); "an innocent" (a fool); "beldam" (an ugly woman), and hundreds of others.

Hurka, or rather Hurka (I have found it out). The exclamation of Archimedes, the Syracusan philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero’s crown. The tale is, that Hiero delivered a certain weight of gold to a workman, to be made into a votive crown, but suspecting that the workman had alloyed the gold with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test the crown. The philosopher went to bathe, and, in stopping into the bath, which was quite full, observed that some of the water ran over. It immediately struck him that a body must remove its own bulk of water when it is immersed, and putting his idea to the test, found his surmise to be correct. Now then, for the crown. Silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound-weight of silver will be more bulky than a pound-weight of gold, and being of greater bulk will remove more water. Vitruvius says: "When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath exclaiming, ‘Heurka! heurka!’ and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment." Dryden has mistaken the quantity in the lines—

"The dead thinks he stands on firmer ground, Cries ‘Hurka! the mighty secret’s found."

But Byron has preserved the right quantity—

Our hands and crq, "Hurka!"—

Childe Harold, iv. st. 61.

*** The omission of the initial H fluids a parallel in our word udometer for "hulometer," enuresis for "hemorrhoids," herpetology for "herpology"; on the other hand, we write humble-pie for "humble-pie."

Eurus (2 syl.). The east wind. So called, says Huttmann, from εΟς, the east. Probably it is εΟς ερυθρός, drawn from the east. Ovid confirms this etymology: "*Vires capit Eurus ab ortu. Brennan says it is a corruption of *euros."

"While southern gales or western ocean roll,
And Eurus steals his ire-winds from the pole,"—Hurca: Economy of Vegetables, canto i.

Eurydice (4 syl.). Wife of Orpheus, killed by a serpent on her wedding night. Orpheus went down to the infernal regions to seek her, and was promised she should return on condition that he looked not back till she had reached the upper world. When the poet went to the confines of his journey, he turned his head to see if Eurydice were following, and she was instantly caught back again into Hades.

"Repose, restore Eurydice to life:"

Pope: Ode on St. Cecilia’s Day.
Evangelists. Symbols of the four:

Matthew. A man with a pen in his hand, and a scroll before him, looking over his left shoulder at an angel. This Gospel was the first, and the angel represents the Being who dictated it.

Mark. A man seated writing, and by his side a couchant winged lion. Mark begins his gospel with the sojourn of Jesus in the wilderness, amidst wild beasts, and the temptation of Satan, "the roaring lion." (See Lion.)

Luke. A man with a pen, looking in deep thought over a scroll, and near him a cow or ox chewing the cud. The latter part refers to the ecstatic character of St. Luke's Gospel.

John. A young man of great delicacy, with an eagle in the background to denote sublimity.

The more ancient symbols were—for Matthew, a man's face; for Mark, a lion; for Luke, an ox; and for John, a flying eagle; in allusion to the four living creatures before the throne of God, described in the Book of Revelation: "The first . . . . was like a lion, and the second . . . . like a calf, and the third . . . . had a face as a man, and the fourth . . . . was like a flying eagle" (iv. 7). Ireneus says: "The lion signifies the royalty of Christ; the calf His sacerical office; the man's face His incarnation; and the eagle the grace of the Holy Ghost."

Evans (Sir Hugh). A pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of wondrous simplicity and shrewdness. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Evans (William). The giant porter of Charles I., who carried about in his pocket Sir Geoffrey Hudson, the king's dwarf. He was nearly eight feet high. (Died 1632.) Fuller speaks of him in his Worthies, and Sir Walter Scott introduces him in Peveril of the Peak.

"As tall a man as is in London, always excepting the king's porter, Master Evans, that carried you about in his pocket, Sir Geoffrey, as all the world has heard tell."—Chap. xxxiii.

Evaporate (4 syl.). Be off; vanish into thin air.

"Bob and Jonathan, with similar meekness, took their leave and evaporated."—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, part ii. 5.

Events. At all events. In any case; be the issue what it may; "nuncumque occiderit."

In the event, as "In the event of his being elected," means in case, or provided he is elected; if the result is that he is elected.

Evst and Anon. From time to time. (See Anon.)

Ever-sworded (The). The 29th Regiment of Foot, now called the "Worcestershire Regiment." In 1746 a part of this regiment, then at St. John's Island, was surprised by the French and massacred, when a command was issued that henceforth every officer, even at meals, should wear his sword. In 1842-1856 the regiment was in the East Indies, and the order was relaxed, requiring only the captain and subaltern of the day to dine with their swords on.

Ever-Victorious Army (The). Ward's army, raised in 1861, and placed under the charge of General Gordon. By 1864 it had stamped out the Taiping rebellion, which broke out in 1851. (See Chinese Gordon.)

Everlasting Staircase (The). The treadmill.

Every Man Jack of Them. Everyone. The older form of everyone was everichon, often divided into every chone, corrupted first into every-john, then Evidence (In). Before the eyes of the people; to the front; actually present (Latin). Evidence, meaning testimony in proof of something, has a large number of varieties, as—Circumstantial evidence. That based on corroborative incidents.

Demonstrative evidence. That which can be proved without less or doubt.

Direct evidence. That of an eye-witness.

External evidence. That derived from history or tradition.

Internal evidence. That derived from conformity with what is known.

Material evidence. That which is essential in order to carry proof.

Moral evidence. That which accords with general experience.

Presumptive evidence. That which is highly probable.

Prime facie evidence. That which seems likely, unless it can be explained away.

Queen's or King's evidence. That of an accessory against his accomplices, under the promise of pardon.

Secondary evidence. Such as is produced when primary evidence is to be obtained.

Self evidence. That derived from the senses; manifest and indubitable.

Evil Communications, etc. He who touches pitch must expect to be defiled. A rotten apple will injure its companions. One scabby sheep will infect a whole flock.

French: Il ne faut qu'une braise galeuse pour gaster tout un troupeau.

To the same effect is the location, “C'est une brebis galeuse,” and the idea implied is, he must be separated from the flock, or else he will contaminate others.

Evil Eye. It was anciently believed that the eyes of some persons darted noxious rays on objects which they glared upon. The first morning glance of such eyes was certain destruction to man or beast, but the destruction was not unfrequently the result of emaciation. Virgil speaks of an evil eye making cattle lean. (See Mascotte, Jetttator.)

“Ne vivi quis tenetors oculus ind gavirant agnos.”

Evil May Day (1517). So called because of the riots made on that day by the London apprentices, who fell on the French residents. The ringleaders, with fifteen others, were hanged; and four hundred more of the rioters were carried to Westminster with halters round their necks, but were pardoned by “Bluff Harry the King.” The Constable of the Tower discharged his cannon on the mob assembled in tumult in Cheapside Way.

Evil Principle. (See Arimanes, Arimanes, Asarol.)

Evils. “Of two evils, I have chosen the least” (Prior).

Evolution (Darwinian). Darwin’s theory is that different forms of animal and vegetable life are due to small variations, and that natural selection is a main agent in bringing them about. If favourable, these variations are perpetuated, if not they die off.

Spencer’s theory is that the present multitude of objects have all sprung from separate atoms originally homogeneous.

“Evolution is the integration of matter and consequent dissipation of motion, during which the matter passes from an imitable, incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity; and during which the attained motion undergoes a parallel transformation.”—Spencer: First Principles, part ii., chap. xvii., p. 300.

Evolution, its process, according to biologists.

Part i.

Assuming the existence of some element, call it proto (243), in some we get matter, and motion. From matter and motion proceed cohesion and reproduction, and from cohesion and reproduction we get crystals.

Next comes chemical action into play, from which springs plant, or prototrophic, or the protoplasmic clot of purely chemical origin.

By further development the microvilli cell is formed, with its power to assimilate, and this will account for air, water, and minerals.

By parasitism next comes the proto-cell of fungus, living on the green cells.

And then will follow the protozoa, the first example of animal life.

Part ii.

(1) The Ameba is the lowest of known animals, a mollusc, with the sole power of locomotion.

(2) The Vorticella is the uncellular, with an organism adapted for sensation, digestion, and the power of reproduction.

(3) Then will come the Anemone, an organised being, with an external mouth.

(4) Next the Hydra or Poly, which has localised sense-organs and instincts.

(5) Then the Hydrae, with nerves, muscles, and nerve functions.

(6) Next come worms, which have special sense-organs, etc.

(7) Then the insects, or Sack-worms, which has a rudimentary spinal cord.

Part iii. From the Sack-worm to Man.

(1) The Larve of Ascidians.

(2) Lowly-organised fish, like the Lancelet.

(3) The Lepeo-animals, and other fish.

(4) The Anemones.

(5) Birds and Reptiles.

(6) Monotremes, which connect reptiles with mammals.

(7) Marsupials.

(8) Placentals Mammals.

(9) The Lemuridae.

(10) The Echidna.

(11) The Monkey tribe, consisting of the New World monkey (called Pithecus), and the Old World monkey (called Cebus), is 8 yds.).

(12) The Missing Link between the catarrhine monkey and man. The Alail is thought by some to supply this link. It is one of the monkey tribes which approaches nearer to the human species than any other yet discovered.

This is no place to criticize the theory of evolution, but merely to state it as briefly and plainly as possible.

Ewe-lamb (A). A single possession greatly prized. (2 Sam. xii. 1-14.)

Ex Cathe'dra (Latin). With authority. The Pope, speaking ex cathedra, is said to speak with an infallible voice—to speak as the successor and representative of St. Peter, and in his pontifical character. The words are Latin, and mean "from the chair"—i.e., the throne of the pontiff. The phrase is applied to all dicta uttered by authority, and ironically to self-sufficient, dogmatical assertions.

Ex Hypoth'esi, according to what is supposed or assumed.

"The justification of the charge [i.e., the tax for betterment] less ex hypothesi in an enhanced value of the property in the betterment area."—The Property Protection objections against section 20 of the Betterment clause of the Towner Bridge Southern Approach Bill (1884).

Ex Luc'e Lucellum. To make a gain out of light; to make a cheese-paring from lucifer-matches. When Robert Lowe proposed to tax lucifer-matches, he suggested that the boxes should be labelled Ex luce lucellum. (Parliamentary Reports, 1871.)

"Lucifer ammunition ex luce haurite lucellum inedita in temperibus; lex nova famus curat.*

Ex Offic'e (Latin, by virtue of his office). As the Lord Mayor for the time being shall be ex officio one of the trustees.

Ex Parte (Latin, proceeding only from one of the parties). An ex-parte statement is a one-sided statement, a partial statement, a statement made by one of the litigants without being modified by the counter-statement.

Ex Pod'e Her'culem. From this sample you can judge of the whole. Plutarch says that Phythag'rous ingeniously calculated the height of Hercules by comparing the length of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length, but Hercules' stadium at Olympia was much longer. Now, says the philosopher, as the stadium of Olympia is longer than an ordinary stadium, so the foot of Hercules was longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained. (Varia Scripta.)

Ex Post Facto (Latin). An ex post facto law. A law made to meet and punish a crime after the offence has been committed.

Ex Professo (Latin). Avowedly; expressly.

"I have never written ex professo on the subject."—Windsor: Nineteenth Century, Nov., 1888.

Ex Uno Omnes means from the one instance deduced you may infer the nature of the rest. A general inference from a particular example. If one oak-tree bears acorns, all other oak-trees will grow similar fruit.

Exaltation. In old astrology, a planet was said to be in its "exaltation," when it was in that sign of the zodiac in which it was supposed to exercise its strongest influence. Thus the exaltation of Venus is in Pisces, and her "dejection" in Virgo.

"And thus, God wot, Mercur'z is decesolate In Places, where Venus is exalted."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 1575.

In chemistry, the refining or subliming of bodies, or of their qualities, virtues, or strength.

Exaltation of the Cross. A feast held in the Roman Catholic Church, on September 14th, to commemorate the restoration of the cross to Calvary in 628. It had been carried away by Khusroes the Persian.

Examination. Examen is Latin for the needle indicator of a balance. To examine is to watch the indicator, so as to adjust the balance.

Examiners (Public). The examiners at the universities, and at the examinations for the military, naval, and civil services, etc.

Excal'ibus (Ex cal [re] liger [aua]). Liberated from the stone. The sword which Arthur drew out of the stone, whereby he proved himself to be the king. (Sir Sword.)

"No sword on earth, were it the Excalibur of King Arthur, can cut that which opposes no steady resistance to the blow."—Sir Walter Scott.

Ex'cel'locy'ny (His). A title given to colonial and provincial governors, ambassadors, and the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. (Compare Luke i. 3.)

Excl'am'or. Aim at higher things still. It is the motto of the United States, and has been made popular by Longfellow's poem so named. Used also as the synonym of super-excellent.
Exception. To take exception. To feel offended; to find fault with.

"Her manner was so . . . respectful, that I would not take exception to this reply."—Farjeon.

Exceptions prove the Rule. They prove there is a rule, or there could be no exceptions; the very fact of exceptions proves there must be a rule.

"Exceptum prolat regulam."—Columella.

Exchequer. Court of Exchequer. In the subdivision of the court in the reign of Edward I., the Exchequer acquired a separate and independent position. Its special duty was to order the revenues of the Crown and recover the king's debts. It was denominated Secoacervium, from secacum (a chess-board), and was so called because a chequered cloth was laid on the table of the court. (Madox: History of the Exchequer.)

G Fos, in his Lives of the Judges, gives a slightly different explanation. He says; "All round the table was a standing ledge four fingers broad, covered with a cloth bought in the Easter Term, and this cloth was 'black rowed with strokes about a span, like a chess-board. On the spaces of this cloth counters were arranged, marked for checking computations."

Excise (2 syl.) means literally, a coupon, or piece cut off (Latin, excvdo). It is a toll or duty levied on articles of home consumption—a slice cut off from these things for the national purse.

Taxes on commodities are either on production within the country, or on importation into it, or on conveyance or sale within it; and are classed respectively as excise, customs, or tolls."—Mill: Political Economy, book v, chap. iii, p. 56.

Exclusion. Bill of Exclusion. A bill to exclude the Duke of York from the throne, on account of his being a Papist. Passed by the Commons, but rejected by the Lords, in 1679; revived in 1681.

Excommunication. (1) The greater is exclusion of an individual from the seven sacraments, from every legitimate act, and from all intercourse with the faithful. (2) The lesser excommunication is sequestration from the services of the Church only. The first Napoleon was excommunicated by Pope Pius VII.; and the kings of Italy were placed under an anathema by Pius IX. for adding the Papal dominions to the United Kingdom of Italy.

"The person excommunicated: Os, orare, vale, communistio, munus, pagana. (The person excommunicated is to be boycotted by the faithful in os (conversation), orare (prayer), communistio (commerce), munus (gift), pagana (idols).)"—Popenoe. P. Gury: Romish Moral Theology (3rd ed., 1862).

Excommunication by Bell, Book, and Candle. (See CURSING, etc.) Excommunication by the ancient Jews. This was of three sorts—(1) Niduni (separation), called in the New Testament "casting out of the synagogue" (John ix. 22); (2) Chrem, called by St. Paul "delivering over to Satan" (1 Cor. v. 5); (3) AnaSThema Maranaatha (1 Cor. xvi. 22), delivered over to the Lord, who is at hand, to take vengeance. The Baduuces had an interdict called Tetragrammaton, which was cursing the offender by Jehovah, by the Decalogue, by the inferior courts, and with all the curses of the superior courts.

Excruiate (4 syl.). To give one as much pain as crucifying him would do. (Latin, ex crur, where ex is intransitive.)

Excuse. "Qui s'excuse, s'accuse," or "Tet s'excuse qui s'accuse."

Exeat (Latin, he may go out). Permission granted by a bishop to a priest to leave his diocese. In the universities, it is permission to a student to leave college before end of term. Sometimes permission is granted to leave college after the gates are closed.

Exe crate (3 syl.). To many Roman laws this tag was appended, "If any one breaks this law, sacer esto," i.e. let his body, his family, and his goods be consecrated to the gods. When a man was declared sacer, anyone might kill him with impunity. Anyone who hurt a tribune was held a sacer to the goddess Cerés. Ex in this word is intensive.

"If anyone hurt a tribune in word or deed, he was held accused (sacer), and his goods were confiscated."—Livy, i. 55; see also Dionysius, v. 39, and viii. 17.

Exequatur. An official recognition of a person in the character of consul or commercial agent, authorising him to exercise his power. The word is Latin, and means, "he may exercise" [the function to which he has been appointed].

"The Northern Patriotic League (Oporto) has decided to petition the Government to withdraw the Exequatur from the British Consul here."—Reuter's Telegram, Tuesday, Feb. 11th, 1890.

Exercises. Week-day sermons were so called by the Puritans. Hence the title of Morning Exercises, week-day sermons preached in the morning.

Exeter. The Duke of Exeter's daughter was a sort of rack invented by the Exeter Controversy 484 Expose

Duke of Exeter during the reign of Henry VI. (Blackstone.)

"I was the lad that would not confess one word
... though they threatened to make me hug the Duke of Exeter’s daughter."—Scott: Fortunes of Nigel, xxxv.

Exeter Controversy. A controversy raised upon a tract entitled Plain Truth, by the Rev. John Agate, of Exeter, an Episcopalian; replied to by several dissenting ministers, as Withers, Trosse, Pierce, etc. (1707-1715.)

Exeter Domesday. A record containing a description of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall; published by Sir Henry Ellis (1816) as a Supplement to the Great Domesday-Book (q.c.). Called "Exon," either because it was at one time kept among the muniments of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, or because the Bishop of Exeter was commissioned to make the survey.

Exhibition. My son has got an exhibition at Oxford. An allowance of meat and drink; a benefit for maintenance. (Latin, exhibition, an allowance of food and other necessaries, "alimenta exhibere aliqua.")

"They have founded six exhibitions of £15 each per annum, to continue for two years and a half."—Taylor: History of the University of Dublin, chap. v. p. 186.

"I crave it disposition for my wife.
Due reference of place, and exhibition."
Shakespeare: Othello, 3, 3.

Exhibition (The Great) was held in Hyde Park, London, and lasted from May 1 to October 15, 1851.

Exies or Aes. 'Hysterics; ague fits; any paroxysm.

"Jenny Rutherford has taken the exies, and done nothing but laugh and weep ... for two days successively."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap.
xxxv.

Exile. The Neapolitan Exile. Baron Poggiro. One of the kings of Naples promised the people a constitution, but broke his word; whereupon a revolution broke out, and the baron, with many others, was imprisoned for many years in a dreadful dungeon near Naples. He was at length liberated and exiled to America, but compelled the captain to steer for Ireland, and landed at Cork, where he was well received.

Exit (Latin, he goes out). A theatrical term placed at the point when an actor is to leave the stage. We also say of an actor, Exit So-and-so—that is, So-and-so leaves the stage at this point of the drama.

He made his exit. He left, or died:
as, "He made his exit of this life in peace with all the world." Except in the drama, we say, "made or makes his exit." (See above.)

"All the world’s a stage,
And all the men and women merely players;
They have their exits and their entrances."
Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Exodus. The Exodus of Israel. The departure of the Israelites from Egypt under the guidance of Moses. We now speak of the Exodus of Ireland—i.e. the departure of the Irish in large numbers for America; the Exodus of the Aesdians—i.e. the expulsion of these colonists from Nova Scotia in the reign of George II.; etc. (Greek, ex odos, a journey out.)

Ex'on, Exon of the Guards. Any one of the three certain officers of the day in command of the yeomen of the royal ward; the acting officer who resides at the court; an exempt. Capitaines exempts de garde du corps. (French, ex-son, ex soin, exempt from duty or care.)

Exor'bitant means literally out of the rut (Latin, ex orbite, out of the wheel-rut); out of the track; extravagant (extra-vagant).

Exoter'ic. (See ESOTERIC.)

Expectation Week. Between the Ascension and Whit Sunday, when the apostles continued praying "in earnest expectation of the Comforter."

Experimental Philosophy. Science founded on experiments or data, in contradistinction to moral and matheatical sciences. Experimental philosophy is also called natural philosophy, and by the French physique.

Experimentum Cruc'os (Latin). A decisive experiment. (See CRUCIAL.)

Exporto Crede. Believe one who has had experience in the matter.

Explosion means literally, driven out by clapping the hands (Latin, ex-pludo—i.e. ex-pludo); hence the noise made by clapping the hands, a report made by ignited gunpowder, etc.

Exponent. One who explains or sets forth the views of another. Thus, a clergyman should be the exponent of the Bible and Thirty-nine Articles.
(Latin, ex pono, to expose or set forth.)

Exposé (French). An exposing of something which should have been kept out of sight. Thus we say a man made Express Train. A fast train between two large towns, with few or no stoppages at intermediate stations.

Expressed Oils are those which are obtained by pressure. Unlike animal and essential oils, they are pressed out of the bodies which contain them.

Expression. A geographical expression. A term applied to a tract of country with no recognised nationality.

"This territory is to a very great extent occupied by one race ... and yet to the present day Germany is little more than a geographical expression."—Daily Telegraph (before 1873).

Exquisite (3 syl.) One sought out; a coxcomb, a dandy, one who thinks himself superlatively well dressed, and of most unexceptionable deportment.

"Exquisites are out of place in the pulpit; they should be set up in a tailor's window."—Spurgeon: Lectures to My Students. (Lecture viii.)

Extensive (3 syl.) Rather extensive, that. Rather fast. A slang synonym for a swell.

Exter. That's Exter, as the old woman said when she saw Kerton. This is a Devonshire saying, meaning, I thought my work was done, but I find much still remains before it is completed. "Exter" is the popular pronunciation of Exeter, and "Kerton" is Crediton. The tradition is that the woman in question was going for the first time to Exeter, and seeing the grand old church of Kerton (Crediton), supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. "That's Exter," she said, "and my journey is over!" but alas! she had still eight miles to walk before she reached her destination.

Extinct Species [since the time of man]. The dodo, great auk, quagga, sea-cow, and white rhinoceros.

Getting very rare: the bison, the Carolina parakeet, the giraffe, and the passenger pigeon once common enough.

Extravagantés Constituo'tiónés, or Extrav'agants. The papal constitutions of John XXII., and some few of his successors, supplemental to the "Corpus Juris Canonici." So called because they were not ranged in order with the other papal constitutions, but were left "out-wanderers" from the general code.

Extreme Unction. One of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church, founded on St. James v. 14, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the Church: and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

Extremes Meet. In French: "Les extrémes se touchent."

Extricate. Latin, ex, out of, and tric, fetters. "Trice" are the hairs, etc., tied round the feet of birds to prevent their wandering. To extricate is to "get out of these trice or meshes."

Exult (Latin). To leap out. Thus we say, "I am ready to leap out of my skin;" to jump for joy.

Eye. Latin, oculus; Italian, oculo; Spanish, ojo; Russian, oko; Dutch, oog; Saxon, ēg (where g is pronounced like y); French, œil.

In my mind's eye. In my perceptive thought. The eye sees in two ways: (1) from without; and (2) from within. When we look at anything without, the object is reflected on the retina as on a mirror; but in deep contemplation the inward thought "informs the eye." It was thus Macbeth saw the dagger; and Hamlet tells Horatio that he saw his deceased father "in his mind's eye."

In the wind's eye. Directly opposed to the wind.

In the twinkling of an eye. Immediately, very soon. "Au moind're clin d'œil." Similar phrases are: "In a brace of shakes," "In the twinkling of a bed-post."

My eye! or Ok, my eye! an exclamation of astonishment. (See All My Eye.) One might see that with half an eye.

Easily; at a glance. The king's eyes. His chief officers. An Eastern expression.

"One of the seven Who in God's presence, nearest to the throne Stand ready at command, and see his eyes That run thro' all the heavens, or down to earth Bear his swift errands."

Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 652.

To have an eye on. To keep strict watch on the person or thing referred to.

To have an eye to the main chance. To keep constantly in view the profit to arise; to act from motives of policy. (See Main Chance.)

To see eye to eye. To be of precisely the same opinion; to think both alike.

"Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters, etc.; but with eye-service, as men pleases; but as the servants of Christ."—Bph. vii. 5, 6.

Eye-sore. Something that is offensive to the sight. Sore is the Anglo-Saxon Eye-tooth. The canine teeth are so called because their fangs extend upwards nearly to the orbits of the eyes.

To draw one's eye-teeth. To take the conceit out of a person; to fleece one without mercy; to make one suffer loss without seeing the manoeuvre by which it was effected.

"I guess these Yanks will get their eye-teeth drawn if they don't look sharp."—W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, vol. I.

Eye of a Needle. Lady Duff Gordon, writing from Cairo, says: "Yesterday I saw a camel go through the eye of a needle—i.e., a low arched door of an enclosure. He must kneel and bow his head to go through, and thus the rich man must humble himself" (Wood: Bible Animals, p. 243). Lord Nugent, in his Travels, informs us that when at Hebron the Needle's Eye, or small gate of the city.

Eye of Greece (The). Athens.

Eye of the Storm. An opening between the storm clouds. (See Bull's Eye.)

Eyes.

The Almond Eyes. The Chinese.

"He will not receive a very warm welcome from the Almond EYES."—F. Millar: On the Central Nations' Host (1841).

Eyes to the blind. A staff. So called in allusion to the staff given to Tiresias by Athm, to serve him for the eyes of which she had deprived him. (See Tiresias.)

To cast sheep's eyes at one. To look askant with shyness or diffidence.

To make eyes at one. To look wantonly at a person; to look lovingly at another.

To rent the eyes with paint (Jer. iv. 30). The ladies of the East tinge the edge of their eyelids with the powder of leadore. They dip into the powder a small wooden bodkin, which they draw "through the eyelids over the ball of the eye." Jezebel is said "to have adjusted her eyes with kohl" (a powder of leadore), 2 Kings ix. 30. N.B.—The word "face" in our translation should in both these cases be rendered "eyes." (Shaw: Travels.)

Your eyes are bigger than your stomach. You fancied you could eat more, but found your appetite satisfied with less than you expected. "Oculi plus devorabant quam capit venter."

Eyed.

One-eyed people. (See Artimaspians, Cyclops.)

Eyre. Justices in Eyre. A corruption of "Justices in itinerare." At first they made the circuit of the kingdom every seven years, but Magna Carta provided that it should be done annually.

Eyre (Jane). The heroine of Charlotte Brontë's novel so called. Jane Eyre is a governess, who stoutly copes with adverse circumstances, and ultimately wins the love of a man of fortune. ("Eyre" pronounced air.)

Ezour Veda or Yajur Veda. The second of the sacred books of the Hindus. The four are:—

1. The Rig Veda (prayers and hymns in verse);
2. The Ezour Veda (prayers in prose);
3. The Sama (prayers to be chanted):
4. The Atharvan Veda (formulas of consecration, imprecation, expiation, etc.).

Ezzelin (3 syl.). Sir Ezzelin recognised count Lara at the table of Lord Otho, and charged him with being Conrad the corsair. A duel was arranged, and Ezzelin was never heard of more. A serf used to tell how one evening he saw a horseman cast a dead body into the river which divided the lands of Otho and Lara, and that there was a star of knighthood on the breast of the dead body. (Byron: Lara.) (See Conrad.)

F

F. F is written on his face. "Rogue" is written on his face. The letter F used to be branded near the nose, on the left cheek of felons, on their being admitted to "benefit of clergy." The same was used for brawling in church. The custom was not abolished by law till 1822.

F Sharp. A flea. The pun is F, the initial letter, and sharp because the bite is acute. (See B Flats.)

f. A corrupt way of making a capital F in Old English, and used as low down.
as 1750; as France for France, Harrington for Farrington, etc.

F. E. R. T. The letters of the Sardinian motto.

Either Fortitudo Ejus Rhodam Teruit, in allusion to the succour rendered to Rhodes by the house of Savoy, 1310;
Or, Fide et Religione Tenetem, on the gold doubloon of Victor Amadeus I.;
Or, Fortitudo Ejus Rerumpublican Temet.

F. O. B. Free on board; meaning that the shipper, from the time of shipment, is free from all risk.

F.s. The three f's. Fixed tenure, Fair rent, Free sale. The platform of the Irish League in 1880.

F's. (Scotch). To get; to get a share of; to lay a claim to.

"Where is the lord or belted knight That best deserves to f's that?"
Barrows: "Whom Will Ye Hold, stanza i."

Fablian Society. An association of socialists.

"The Fablian Society aims at the reorganization of society by the emancipation of land and industrial capital from individual and class ownership, and the vesting of them in the community for the general benefit."—H. G. Wells: Fabian Essays on Socialism, June, 1891, p. 91.

? The name of the society is derived from Quintus Fabius, the Roman general, who won his way against Hannibal by wariness, not by violence, by caution, not by defiance.

Fabian Soldiers. A complimentary phrase for Roman soldiers, the bravest of the brave.

"Quam [sound of trained soldiers] pudent ac omni disciplina militari [disciplined] erat
Quam expatium hunc quidem Fabian militis Romani insigni sunt, nec 'disciplinatissimae' nondum Gracca in summâ haud fuit"—Nepos: Iphicrates, it.

Fabian Tactics or Policy—i.e., delay. "Win like Fabius, thy delay." The Roman general Fabius wore out Hannibal by marches, counter-marches, ambushes, and skirmishes, without ever coming to an open engagement. Fabius died B.C. 203.

"Not by the Fabian tactics, which proved fatal to its predecessor."—The Times.

Fabianism. The system called Collectivism. (See Collectivists.)

"It must be evident that the Fabian Society has a really gigantic task before it. The difficulties of which will not be lightened when the working classes come to understand that small ownership . . . . and small savings . . . . are justly severely condemned by Collectivists as being wasteful and criminal. Fortunes.—Twentieth Century (November, 1892, p. 626).

Fabula's sad Fate. The king Don Fabila was a man of very obstinate purpose and fond of the chase. One day he encountered a boar, and commanded those who rode with him to remain quiet and not interfere; but the boar overthrew him and killed him. (Chronica Aquitana de España, p. 121.)

Fabius. The American Fabius. Washington (1732-1799), whose military policy was similar to that of Fabius. He wearied out the English troops by harassing them, without coming to a pitched battle. Duguesclin pursued the same policy in France, by the advice of Charles V., whereby all the conquests of Edward and the Black Prince were retrieved.

Fabius of the French. Anne, Due de Montmorency, grand constable of France; so called from his success in almost annihilating the imperial army which had invaded Provence, by laying the country waste and prolonging the campaign. (1493-1567.)

Fables. The most famous writers of fables are—Pilpay, among the Hindus,
Lockman, among the Arabs,
Aesop and Babrius, among the Greeks,
Phaedrus and Aria'ius, among the Romans.

Faucius, Abstemius, and Casti, among the Italians. The last wrote The Talking Animals.

La Fontaine and Florian, among the French.

John Gay and Edward Moore, among our own countrymen. The former is sometimes called "The English Aesop." Lessing and Hoffmann, among the Germans.

Krilof, among the Russians.

(See Aesop.)

Fabulous. The metrical fables of the Trouvères, or early poets north of the Loire, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The word fable, in this case, is used very widely, for it includes not only such tales as Reynard the Fox, but all sorts of familiar incidents of knavery and intrigue, all sorts of legends and family traditions. The fabliau of An casterin and Nicolete is full of interesting incidents, and contains much true pathos and beautiful poetry.

Fabricius. A Roman hero, representative of inflexible purity and honesty. The ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which he lived on his hereditary farm; how he refused the rich presents offered him by the Samnite ambassadors; and how at death he left no portion for his daughters, whom the senate provided for.

"Fabulous, scion of all-conquering gold."

Thomson: Seasons (Winter).

Fabulus. The god who taught Roman children to utter their first word. It was the god Vagitan-us (q.v.) who taught them to utter their first cry. From serif, to speak (Varro).

Fabulous Isles. (See under ISLANDS.)

Face. (Latin, facies.)

A brazen face. A bold, defiant look. A brazen-faced person means one with an impudent, audacious look, especially in a bad cause. Brass metaphorically is generally used in a bad or depreciatory sense, as "You have plenty of brass" [impudence], "I admire your brass."

A rebeck face (French, visage de rebeck). An ugly, grotesque face, like that which used to be cut on the upper part of a rebeck or three-stringed fiddle.

"Dead is the noble Baubec,
Who had a face like a rebeck."—Bobain: Funtigruel, book i. 4.

Badebec was the mother of Gargantuas, and died in childbirth.

A very face. The features drawn awry, expressive of distaste.

To draw a long face. To look dissatisfied or sorrowful, in which case the mouth is drawn down at the corners, the eyes are dejected, and the face elongated.

"Of course, it is all right; if you had not drawn such a long face I should never have doubted."—Dr. Cipiana.

To fly in the face of . . . To oppose violently and unreasonably: to set at defiance rashly.

To put a good face on the matter. To make the best of a bad matter: to bear up under something disagreeable: "nulla mala dissimulare"; "in adversis vultum sequenda fortune gerere."

To set one's face against [something]. To oppose it; to resist its being done. The expression of the face shows the state of the inclination of a person's mind.

Face to Face. In the immediate presence of each other; two or more persons facing each other. To accuse another "face to face" means not "behind his back" or in his absence, but while present.

Faces.

To keep two faces under one hood. To be double-faced: to pretend to be very religious, and yet live an evil life.

"We never troubled the Church . . . We knew we were doing what we ought not to do, and scorned to look plaus, and keep two faces under one hood."—Boldwood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. ii.

To make faces. To make grimaces with the face.

Face. To face it out. To persist in an assertion which is not true. To maintain without changing colour or hanging down the head.

To face down. To withstand with boldness and effrontery.

Faced. With a facing, lining of the cuffs, etc.: also the preterite of the verb "to face."

Faced-faced. Impudence uncontrolled. A "bare-faced lie" is a lie told shamelessly and without prevarication.

Shame-faced. Having shame expressed in the face.

Faced with [silk, etc.]. An inferior article bearing the surface of a superior one, as when cotton-velvet has a silk surface; the "facings" (as the lining of coat-cuffs, etc.) made of silk, etc.

Face-card or Faced-card. A court card, a card with a face on it.

Facile Principe. By far the best; admittedly first.

"But the facile princeps of all oratorists is Professor Pott, of Halle."—Chambers's Cyclopaedia.

Facings. To put one through his facings. To examine; to ascertain if what appears on the surface is superficial only.

"The Greek books were again had out, and Grecian . . . was put through her facings."—A Trollop.

Façon de Parler. Idiomatic or usual form of speech, not meant to be offensive. I once told a waiter in Norway that the meat he brought me for breakfast was not sufficiently cooked, and he bluntly told me it was not true (det er ikke sann), but he did not intend to be rude. It was the Norwegian "façon de parler."

Faction. The Romans divided the combatants in the circus into classes, called factions, each class being distinguished by its special colour, like the crews of a boat-race. The four original factions were the leak-green (prusia), the sea-blue (veneta), the white (alba), and the rose-red (rosco). Two other factions were added by Domitian, the colours being golden-yellow (aurata) and purple. As these combatants strove against each other, and entertained a strong esprit de corps, the word was easily applied to political partisans.

In the faction riots of Constantinople, A.D. 532, above 30,000 persons were killed. (Latin, factio.)

Fac'tor. An agent; a substitute in mercantile affairs; a commission merchant. (Latin, facio, to do, whence the French facteur, one who does something for an employer.)

"Asleep and naked as an Indian boy,
An honest factor stole a gem away."

Thomas Pitt, ancestor of the Earl of Chatham, was appointed by Queen Anne Governor of Fort St. George, in the East Indies, and in 1702 purchased there, for £20,400, a diamond weighing 127 carats, which he sold to the King of France. This gem is still called the Pitt diamond. Pope insinuates that Pitt stole the diamond. This is not exactly true. He obtained it for a price much below its value, and threatened the thief with exposure if he made a fuss about the matter.

Factotum. One who does for his employer all sorts of services. Sometimes called a Johan'nes Factotum. Our "Jack-of-all-trades" does not mean a factotum, but one who does odd jobs for anyone who will pay him. (Latin, facere totum, to do everything required.)

Fad (A). A hobby, a temporary fancy, a whim. A contraction of faddle in "fiddle-faddle."

"Among the facts that Charles had taken up for a time was that of collecting old gems."

Fada. A fée or kobold of the south of France, sometimes called "Hada." These house-spirits, of which, strictly speaking, there are but three, bring good luck in their right hand and ill luck in their left.

Fadda. Mahomet's white mule.

Fadge (1 syl.). To suit or fit together, as, It won't fudge; we cannot judge together, he does not fudge with me. (Anglo-Saxon, feage, to fit together; Welsh, fay, what tends to unite.)

"How will this fadge?"
—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, u. 2.

Fadge. A farthing. A corrupt contraction of farthingale, i.e. farthingale.

(See CH'YR.)

Fädha (A). Mahomet's silver cuirass, confiscated from the Jews on their expulsion from Med'in.

Fä'daleen. The great Nazir', or chamberlain of Aurungzebe's harem, in 'La ila Rookh. The criticism of this self-conceited courtier upon the several tales which make up the romance are very racy and full of humour; and his crest-fallen conceit when he finds out that the poet was the Prince in disguise is well conceived.

"He was a judge of everything—from the pen-culling of a Cecilian's cycle to the deepest questions of science and literature; from the mixture of a conserve of rose-leaves to the composition of an epic poem. All the courts and parts of Delhi stood in awe of him."—T. Moore.

Faerie or Fsrie. The land of the fays or faeries. The chief fae realms are Avalon, an island somewhere in the ocean; Oberon's dominions, situated "in wilderness among the holts hairy;" and a realm somewhere in the middle of the earth, where was Fari Banou's palace.

"For learn'd John [Spenser] lay a his pipe to gaze,
And in to Faerie gone a pilgrimage."
—Dryden: Religio Laici, iii.

Faere Queene. A metrical romance in six books, by Edmund Spenser (incomplete). It details the adventures of various knights, who impersonate different virtues, and belong to the court of Gloria'na, Queen of faerie land.

The first book contains the legend of the Red Cross Knight (the spirit of Christianity), and is by far the best. The chief subject is the victory of Holiness over Error. It contains twelve cantos.

The second book is the legend of Sir Guyon (the golden mean), in twelve cantos.

The third book is the legend of Britomartis (love without lust), in twelve cantos. Britomartis is Diana, or Queen Elizabeth the Britoness.

The fourth book is the legend of Cambel and Triamond (fidelity), in twelve cantos.

The fifth book is the legend of Arte-gal (justice), in twelve cantos.

The sixth book is the legend of Sir Calidore (courtesy), in twelve cantos.

There are parts of a seventh book—viz. cantos 1 and 7, and two stanzas of canto three. The subject is Inutility.

The plan of the Faerie Queen is borrowed from the Orlando Furioso, but the creative power of Spenser is more original, and his imagery more striking, than Ariosto's. Thomson says of him—

"[He] like a copious river, poured his song Over all the names of enchanting ground."
—The Naturns (Summer), 1744-5.

Fag. One who does, and perseveres in doing. In public schools, it means a little boy who waits upon a bigger one. Probably a contracted form of factor, factotum; Latin, fac-tus, to do.

Fag. Servant of Captain Absolute, who serves his master in all things. (Sheridan: The Rivals.)

"Even the mendacious Mr. Fag assures us, though he never scruples to tell a lie at his master's command, yet it hurts his conscience to be found out."—Sir Walter Scott.

Fag-end (A.). The selvedge or coarse end of a piece of cloth. This also is from facio, factum, meaning the part added after the piece is finished. The fag-end of a session means the last few days before dissolution.

Fagged Out. Wearied with hard work. Fatigued contracted into fa'g'ed.

Fagin. An infamous Jew, who teaches boys and girls to rob with dexterity. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Fagot. A bundle worn in mediæval times by those who had recanted their "heretical" opinions. It was designed to show what they merited, but had narrowly escaped. (See Fagots.)

Il y a fagots et fagots. There are divers sorts of fagots; every alike is not the same. The expression is in Molière's Le Médecin malgré lui, where Sganarelle wants to show that his fagots are better than those of other persons; "Ay, but those fagots are not so good as my fagots." (Welsh, flag, that which unites; Anglo-Saxon, fegn, to unite.)

Sentive les fagots. To be heretical; to smack of the fagots. In allusion to the custom of burning heretics by surrounding them with blazing fagots.

Fagot Votes. Votes obtained by the nominal transfer of property to a person whose income was not otherwise sufficient to qualify him for being a voter. The "fagot" was a bundle of property divided into small lots for the purpose stated above. Abolished.

"The object was to prevent the creation of fagot votes."—The Times.

Fagots. Cakes made of the "insides" of pigs, with thyme, scraps of pork, sage, onions, and other herbs, fried together in grease, and eaten with potatoes. (Greek, phygo, to eat.)

NIX (female, NIXIS), a water-spirit. The nix has green hair, and wears a green hat: the nixie, very beautiful.

ODURE, king of the fairies.
Fairy of nursery mythology is the personification of Providence. The good ones are called fairies, elves, elf-kins, and fays; the evil ones are urchins, ouphes, all-maids, and evil-women.

"Fairies, black, grey, green, and white. You mondains' revellers, and shades of night, You ouphen-hears of fixed destiny; Attend your office."

Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, v. 5.

The dress of the fairies. They wear a red conical cap; a mantle of green cloth, inlaid with wild flowers; green pantaloons, buttoned with bobs of silk; and silver shoon. They carry quivers of adder-slug, and bows made of the ribs of a man buried where "three larders' lands meet;" their arrows are made of bog-reed, tipped with white flints, and dipped in the dew of hemlock; they ride on steeds whose hoofs would not "dash the dew from the cup of a harrel." (Cromek.)

"Fairies small, two foot tall, With caps red on their heads" Dodgey's Old Plays: Faustine Troit, i. 5.

Fairy Darts. Flint arrow-heads, supposed at one time to have been thrown by fairies in their pranks.

Fairy Ladies or Mugs, such as Urgunda, the guardian of Amadi'gi; the fair Oria'na; Silvia'na, the guardian of Alidoro; Luci'na, the protectress of Alid'yo and his lady-love, the maidew-warrior, Mirinda; Eufros'na, the sister of Luci'na; Argea, the protectress of Floridaute; and Filde'a, sister of Arden, all in Tussos' Amadiy'i.
simply an agaric or fungus below the surface, which has seeded in a circular range, as many plants do. Where the ring is brown and almost bare, the "spawn" is of a greyish-white colour. The grass dies because the spawn envelops the roots so as to prevent their absorbing moisture; but where the grass is rank the "spawn" is dead, and serves as manure to the young grass.

"You demi-puppets, that
By moonshine do the green-sour murther make,
Whereof the ewe not licks."—Shakespeare:

Fairy Sparks. The phosphoric light from decaying wood, fish, and other substances. Thought at one time to be lights prepared for the fairies at their revels.

Fairy of the Mine. A malevolent being supposed to live in mines, busying itself with cutting ore, turning the windlass, etc., and yet effecting nothing. (See Gnome.)

"No goblin, or sprite, nor fairy of the mine, Forth hurrying power over true virginity."—Millan: Comus, 413.

Fait Accompli (French). A scheme which has already carried out with success.

"The subjection of the South is as much a fait accompli as the declaration of independence itself."—The Times.

Faith. Defender of the Faith. (See Defender.)

In good faith, "Bond fai;" "de bonne foi;" with no ulterior motive.

Faithful, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, is seized at Vanity Fair, burnt to death, and taken to heaven in a chariot of fire. A Puritan used to be called Faithful Faitful. The abiding disciples of that cult are called the Faithful.

Jahah Faithful. The hero of Captain Murrat's novel so called.

Father of the Faithful. Abraham (Rom. iv.; Gal. iii. 6-9).

Fakir (Ibn'd). The seimitar of Mahomet, which fell to his share when the spoil was divided after the battle of Bekr. This term means "The Trenchant."

Fake (I syl.). Fake away. Cut away, make off (Latin, far, do, make). It also means to do—i.e. to cheat or swindle.

Fake. A single fold of a coiled cable.

Fakenham Ghost. A ballad by Robert Bloomfield, author of The Farmer's Boy. The ghost was a donkey.
Fall Away (To). To lose flesh; to degenerate; to quit a party, as “his adherents fell away gradually [one by one], or rapidly.”

Fall Flat (To). To lie prostrate or procumbent; to fail to interest, as “the last act fell flat.”

Fall Foul. To fall foul of one is to make an assault on someone. A sea term. A rope is said to be foul when it is entangled; and one ship falls foul of another when it runs against her and prevents her free progress. Hence to run up against, to assault.

Fall From (To). To violate, as “to fall from his word”; to tumble or slip off, as “to fall from a horse”; to abandon or go away from, as “to fall from grace.”

Fall In (To). To take one’s place with others; to concur with, as “he fell in with my views”—that is, his views or ideas fell into the lot of my views or ideas. (See FALL OUT.)

Fall Off (To). To detach themselves; to be thrown off [a horse]; to leave. The Latin decidó.

Fall Out (To). To quarrel; to happen. (Latin, accidó.) (See FALL IN.)

“Three children sliding on the ice
    Upon a summer’s day;
    As it fell out they all fell in,
    The rest they ran away.”

Porson: Mother Goose.

“See ye fall not out by the way.”—Genesis xi. 24.

Fall Sick (To). To be unwell. A Latin phrase, “In morbus incidère.”

Fall Through (To). To tumble through [an insecure place]; to fail of being carried out or accomplished.

Fall to (To). To begin [eating, fighting, etc.].

“They sat down ... and without waiting ... fell to like commoners after grace.”—Kane: Arctic Explorations, vol. i. chap. xxi. p. 410.

Fall Under (To). To incur, as, “to be under the reproach of carelessness:” to be submitted to, as, “to fall under consideration,” a Latinism, “In deliberationem cadère.”

Fall Upon (To). To attack, as “to fall upon the rear,” a Latin phrase, “uti viso incidère,” to throw oneself on, as, “he fell on his sword,” “manu sua cadère;” “to happen on, as, “On what day will the games fall?”

Fall in With (To). To meet accidentally; to come across. This is a Latin phrase, in aliquam casu incidère.”

Fall into a Snare (To), or “To fall into an ambush.” To stumble accidentally into a snare. This is a Latin phrase, “insidias incidère.” Similarly, to fall into disgrace is the Latin “in offensionem cadère.”

Fall of Man (The). The degeneracy of the human race in consequence of the “fall” [or disobedience] of Adam, man’s federal head. Adam fell, or ceased to stand his ground, under temptation.

Fall of the Drop (The), in theatrical parlance, means the fall of the drop-curtain at the end of the act or play.

Fall Out of (To). To tumble or slip from, as, “The weapons fell out of my hands.” This is a Latin phrase, “De manibus meis arma ceciderunt.”

Fall Short of (To). To be deficient of a supply. This is the Latin errère, to fail. To fall short of the mark is a figure taken from archery, quoits, etc., where the missile falls to the ground before reaching the mark.

Fall Together by the Ears (To). To fight and scratch each other; to contend in strife. “To fall together by the ears” is “inter se cerère;” but “to set together by the ears” is “discordium concutere.”

Fall Upon One’s Feet (To). To escape a threatened injury; to light upon one’s feet.

Falling Bands. Neck-bands which fall on the chest, common in the seventeenth century.

Falling Sickness. Epilepsy, in which the patient falls suddenly to the ground.

“Brutus.—Ill. [i.e. Caesar] hath the falling-sickness.
Carthage.—No, Caesar hath it not; but you, and I, and honest Caesar, we have the falling-sickness.”

Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, i. 2.

Falling Stars are said by Mahometans to be firebrands flung by good angels against evil spirits when they approach too near the gates of heaven.

Fallow Land. Land ploughed, but not sown: so called from its brown or tawny colour. (German, fahl, tawny; Anglo-Saxon, fahlo or fealo, pale-red; hence, fallow dier, red deer.)

“Break up the fallow land.”—Jer. iv. 3.

False (The Rule of). A method of solving certain mathematical questions generally done by equations. Suppose the question is this: “What number is that whose half exceeds its third by 12?”
Assume any number you like as the supposed answer—say 96. Then, by the question, 96 + 2 = 96 + 3 + 12, or 48 = 32 + 12, i.e. 54, but 48 does not equal 54, the latter is 16 too much.

Well, now state by rule of proportion thus, 15:12::96 to the answer, which is 72, the number required.

False Ceiling. The space between the garret-ceiling and the roof.

False staff. A fat, sensual, boastful, and mendacious knight; full of wit and humour; he was the boon companion of Henry, Prince of Wales. (1 and 2 Henry IV. and 1 Wives of Windsor.)

Falutin (High). Oratorical bombast; affected pomposity; "Erotes voix." (See HIFALUTEN.)

None of your high falutin airs with me. None of your swell ways with me. (Dutch, verlooten.)

Famil'iar. A cat, dog, raven, or other dumb creature, petted by a "witch," and supposed to be her demon in disguise. (See below.)

Famil'iar Spirita. Spirit slaves. From the Latin, fan' uitus (an attendant).

"Away with him! he has a familiar under his tongue."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., vi. 7.

Famil'iarity. Too much familiarity breeds contempt.

Latin: Ninia familiaritas contemptum parit.

French: La familieré engendre le mépris.

Italian: La famigliarità dà disprezzamento.

Familists. Members of the "Family of Love," a fanatical sect founded by David George, of Delft, in 1536. They maintained that all men are of one family, and should love each other as brothers and sisters. Their system is called Familism.

"Family will take a person anywhere."—Warner: Little Journey in the World, chap. iv.

Fan. I could brain him with his lady's fan (1 Henry IV., ii. 3)—i.e. knock his brains out with a fan handle. The ancient fans had long handles, so that ladies used their fans for walking-sticks, and it was by no means unusual for very testy dames to chastise unruly children by beating them with their fan-sticks.

"Wert not better
Your head were broken with the handle of a fan?"

Rashomon and Fletcher: Wit at Current Weapons, v.

Fan-light (4), placed over a door, is a semicircular window with radiating bars, like the ribs of an open fan.

Fanatic. Those transported with religious or temple madness. Among the Romans there were certain persons who attended the temples and fell into strange fits, in which they pretended to see spectres, and uttered what were termed predictions. (Latin, fani'mus, a temple.)

"That wild energy which leads
The enthusiasm to fanatic deeds."—Romans: Tale of the Secret Tribunal.

Fancy. Love—i.e. the passion of the fantasy or imagination. A fancyman is a man (not your husband) whom you fancy or select for chaperon.

"Tell me where is fancy bred,
Or in the heart or in the head,"—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.

The fancy, Pugilists. So called because boxing is the chief of sports, and fancy means sports, pets, or fancies. Hence "dog-fanciers," "pigeon-fanciers," etc.

Fancy-free. Not in love.

"In madness meditation fancy-free."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

Fancy Man (A). A cavalier servant or esquire; one selected by a married lady to escort her to theatres, etc., to ride about with her, and to amuse her. The man she "fancies" or likes.

Fancy-sick. Love-sick.

"All fancy-sick she is, and pale of cheer."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

Fan' e'l. A Scandinavian tribe far north, whose ears were so long that they would cover their whole body. (Dinj.)

Fanfar' on. A wagging or swaggering bully; a cowardly boaster who blows his own trumpet. Sir Walter Scott uses the word for finery, especially for the gold chains worn by military men, common in Spain amongst the conquerors of the New World. (Spanish, fanfar' on, a bully; French, fanfare, a flourish of trumpets, or short piece of military music performed by brass instruments and kettledrums.)

"Murky hung there, with thy fanfaron about thy neck!"—Shakespeare: The Albat, exxvi.

Fanfar'onade (4 syl.). Swaggering; vain boasting; ostentatious display. (See above.)

"The bishop copied this proceeding from the fanfaronade of M. Boufflers."—Swift.
Fang. A sheriff's officer in Shakespeare's 2 Henry IV.

Fangs. I fell into his fangs. Into his power, his clutches. (Anglo-Saxon, fang, a grasp.)

Traitors, that vice-like Fang the hawk to kick." - Bailey: Fausis (A Village Fausis), sec. 0.

Fangled. A new-fangled notion is one just started or entertained. (Saxon, fengan, to begin.)

Fanny Fern. A nom de plum of Mrs. Sarah Payson Parton, sister of Mr. N. P. Willis, the American poet. (Born 1811, died 1872.)

Fanti'gune (2 syl.). A function; a fussy anxiety; that restless, nervous commotion which persons have who are phantom-struck.

Fantocci'nì [fantoc-che'ny]. A dramatic performance by puppets. (Italian, fantoccio, a puppet.)

Fantom-corn. The mere ghost of corn, having been bewitched. (French, fantôme, a ghost.)

Fantom-fellow. A person who is light-headed, and under the ban of some hobgoblin. (See above.)

Fantom-flesh. Flesh that hangs loose and flabby—supposed to be under the evil influence of spectre. (See above.)

Far and Away. "Nullus proximus aut secundus;" as, "far and away the best;" some person or thing beyond all comparison or rivalry.

Far Cry from. It is a far cry from ... to ...; as, it is a far cry from Moses to Moses Montefiore, and from David to Dieriali, but they all were Jews; and had certain features in common. Sir Walter Scott several times uses the phrase "It's a far cry to Lochow [Lochaw)." It is a far cry from O'Connell to Kossuth.

Far fetched. Not closely connected; a remote conceit; as, "a far-fetched simile," a "far-fetched allusion." Also, obtained from a foreign or distant country, "a quaint varnum est, varnum est."

Far Gone. Deeply affected; as, "far gone in love."

Far Niente (3 syl.). Italan phrase. The Latin otium. *Thee far niente is the sweet enjoyment of having nothing to do, i.e. of a holiday. (See DOLE.)

Farce (1 syl.). Stuffing. Dramatic pieces of no solid worth, but stuffed full of ludicrous incidents and expressions. They bear the same analogy to the regular drama as force-meat does to a solid joint. (French, farce; Latin, farcio, to stuff.)

Farceur (The). One who writes or acts farces.

Farcé or Farcin (Latin, farcimen, a sausage, any stuffed meat). A disease in horses, which consists of a swelling of the ganglions and lymphatic vessels. It shows itself in little knots; glanders.

Fare, meaning the expense of a journey or passage across water, is the Anglo-Saxon far or fier, a journey; verb, favan, to travel. (Archaic, feriaga, the fare for crossing a ferry.)

Farce Well (To). You cannot fare well but you must cry out roast meat. Don't blazon your good fortune on the house-top. "Soresz suo perit iudicium." Terence has the same idea: "Ejusdem neo indication. quasi sorcer, hodie perii." (Ennuchus, v. 7, 23.)

Farina, Ejusdem farina. Other rubbish of the same sort. Literally, "Other leaves of the same batch." Our more usual expressions are, "Others of the same feather," "others tarred with the same brush."

Farinata or Farinata Degli Uberti. A nobleman of Florence, chief of the Ghibelline faction, placed by Dante, in his Inferno, in a red-hot coffin, the lid of which is suspended over him till the day of judgment. He is represented as faithless and an epicure. (Thirteenth century.)

Farley or Farley. A duty of 6d. paid to the lord of the manor of West Slatop, in Devonshire. (Bailey.) Money given by a tenant instead of his best beast (heriot).

Farm means food; so called because anciently the tenant was required to provide the landlord with food by way of rent. (Anglo-Saxon, ferme, food.)

To farm taxes is the French affermier (to let or lease), from fermer, a letting for the supply of food.

Farmer George. George III.; so called from his farmer-like manners, taste, dress, and amusements. (1738, 1760-1820.)

"A better farmer ne'er brushed dew from lawn." - Byron: Vision of Judgment.
Farmers. A farmer ought to make four rents in order to live: one for rent, one for labour, one for stock, and one for himself.

Farrene Bull [Far-nes-se]. A name given to a colossal group attributed to Apollo and Taurus of Trier, in Asia Minor. They belonged to the Rhodian school, and lived about B.C. 300. The group represents Dirce bound to the horns of a bull by Zethus and Amphion, for ill-using their mother. It was restored by Bianchi in 1546, and placed in the Farrense palace, in Italy.

Farrene Hercules [Far-na-se Hercul-es]. A name given to Glykon's copy of the famous statue of Lysippus, the Greek sculptor in the time of Alexander the Great. It represents the hero leaning on his club, with one hand on his back, as if he had just got possession of the apple of the Hesperides. Farrense is the name of a celebrated family in Italy, which became extinct in 1731.

“...it struck me that an ironclad is to a wooden vessel what the Farrene Hercules is to the Apollo Belvedere. The Hercules is not without a beauty of its own.”—The Times (Paris correspondent).

Farra. (3 syl.) Belonging to the Faro Islands; a native of the islands.

Farra-go. A farago of nonsense. A confused heap of nonsense. Farago is properly a mixture of far (meal) with other ingredients for the use of cattle.

“Anquetil was directed...for having suffered a farago of nonsense to be palmed off upon him by his Parol teachers as the works of the sage illuminated.”—Whitney: Oriental Studies (Notes), chap. vi, p. 184.

Farrington Ward (London). The aldermanry, etc., granted by John le Fevre to William Farndon, citizen and goldsmith of London, in consideration of twenty marks given beforehand as a gersum to the said John le Fevre. (1279.)

Farthing. A fourth part. Pouny pieces used to be divided into four parts, thus, ¼. One of these quarters was a far-thing or farthing, and two a halfpenny. (Anglo-Saxon, feor-thing.)

“I don’t care for it a brass farthing. James II. debased all the coinage, and issued, amongst other worthless coins, brass pence, halfpence, and farthings.

The farthing was the fourth part of other coins. Thus, we read in the Grayfriars’s Chronicle.

“This were the kyng made a newe quyne, as the nothlye, halte-mon lie, and færc ryng-mon lie.”

Farthingale (3 syl.) A sort of crinoline petticoat. The word means a “guard for modesty.” (French, vertin-garde, corrupted into verdinage, and then into farthingale.)

Faryndon Inn. Serjeants’ Inn, Chancery Lane, used to be so called.

Fascination means “slain or overcome by the eyes.” The allusion is to the ancient notion of bewitching by the power of the eye. (Greek, baskeino, i.e. phatis kaino, to kill with the eyes. See Valpy: Etymology of Greek Words, p. 23, col. 1; Latin, fascino.) (See Evil Eye.)

“None of the affection have been noted to fascinate and bewitch, but love and envy.”—Dece.

Fashion [fash-ion]. In a fashion or after a fashion. “In a sort of a way;” as, “he spoke French in a fashion” (i.e. very badly). (“French of Stratford at Bow.”)

Fashion of Speech (A). “Fon de parler” (q.v.); “Ratio lignendi!”

Fast Girl or Young Lady (A) is one who talks slang, assumes the airs of a knowing one, and has no respect for female delicacy and retirement. She is the ant of the fast young man.

Fast Man (A) is one who lives a continual round of “pleasure” so fast that he wears himself out.

Fast and Loose (To play). To run with the hare and hold with the hounds; to blow both hot and cold; to say one thing and do another. The allusion is to a cheating game practised at fairs. A belt is folded, and the player is asked to prick it with a skewer, so as to pin it fast to the table; having so done, the adversary takes the two ends, and loosen it or draws it away, showing that it has not been pierced at all.

“...He forced his neck into a noise.
To show his play at fast and loose;
And when he chance drive yeare out, mistook
For art and mischief, his luck.”
Butler: Hudibras, ill. z

Fasti. Working days; when, in Rome, the law-courts were open. Holy days (dies non), when the law-courts were not open, were, by the Romans, called ne-fasti.

Fasting. The most ingenious method of fasting I know of is that recorded in the Mappemonde Papiquet, p. 82. A Venetian saint had certain boxes made like mass-books, and these book-boxes were filled, some with Malmsay wine, and some with the fleshiest parts of capons and partridges. These were supposed to be books of devotion, and the saint lived long and grew fat on them.
Fastrade (2 syl.). Daughter of the Saxon count Rodolph and Luitgarde the German. One of the nine wives of Charlemagne.

Father:—

Alfonso II. of Portugal, (1212-1223.)
Charles II. of France, le Gros. (832, 881-888.)
Louis VI. of France, le Gros. (1078, 1108-1137.)

Fat Men. Edward Bright, of Essex, weighed 44 stone, or 616 pounds, at death. He was 5 feet 9 inches high, 5 feet round the chest, and 6 feet 11 inches round the paunch. He died 1750, aged thirty.

Daniel Lambert, born at St. Margeret's Leicester, weighed 739 pounds. He was 3 yards 4 inches round the waist, 1 yard 1 inch round the leg. (1770-1809.)

Fat as a Porpoise. The skin of the porpoise is nearly an inch thick, and under it is a layer of fat somewhat thicker, and yielding oil of the finest quality.

Fat. Women introduced in mediæval romance not unlike witches, and under the sway of Demogorgon. In Orlando Innamorato we meet with the "Fata Morgana;" in Bayardo, with the "Fata Silvanelia." The Fates Nera and Bianca, the protectresses of Guidone and Aquilante; the "Fata della Fonti," from whom Mauricardo obtains the arms of Hector; and "Alcina," sister of Morgana, who carries off Astifo. In Tasso we have the three daughters of Morgana, whose names are Morganetta, Nivetta, and Carvilda; we have also Dragou'tina, Montaina, Argea (called the queen of the Fates), protectress of Floridante, Filidea (sister of Argea), and several others. In the Adone of Maria'ni we have the Fata named "Faisirna."

Fata Morgana. A sort of mirage occasionally seen in the Straits of Messina. Fata is Italian for a "fairy," and the fairy Morgana was the sister of Arthur and pupil of Merlin. She lived at the bottom of a lake, and dispensed her treasures to whom she liked. She is first introduced in the Orlando Innamorato as "Lady Fortune," but subsequently assumes her witch-like attributes. In Tasso her three daughters are introduced.

Fatals Gifts. Collar of Arsinoe, collar and veil of Eriphyle, gold of the Nibelungen, gold of Toloasa, necklace of Cadmos, Harmonia's necklace and robe, opal of Alphonso XII., the Trojan horse, the shirt of Nessus, etc. (See these subjects.)

Fato = something destined or suitable, is not the Latin fatum, but the French fait = share, one's own, that which suits one; as "voila mon fait," that is the man for me.

"Pour moi, ma sœur, a dit la cadette, j'aime le solide, je veux un homme riche, et le gros don Bianca sera mon fait."—Le Sage: Dubois Boileau.

Fates (1 syl.). The cruel fates. The Greeks and Romans supposed there were three Fates or Fates, who arbitrarily controlled the birth, events, and death of every man. They are called cruel because they pay no regard to the wishes and requirements of anyone.

"The three Fates were Clopa (who held the distaff), Lachesis (who spun the thread of life), and Atropos (who cut it off when life was ended).

Father. A friar in holy orders. (See Brother.)

A father suckled by his daughter. Euphrosina, the Grecian daughter, so preserved the life of Euvarder, her aged father.

Xantippe so preserved the life of her father Cimonos in prison. The guard, marvelling the old man held out so long, set a watch and discovered the fact.

Byron alludes to these stories in his Childe Harold.

"There is a dungeon, in whose dim, drear light
What do I gaze on?...
An old man, and a female young and fair,

Fresh as a nursing mother, in whose veins
The blood is nectar...

Here, with offers to old age the food,
The milk of his own gift,—it is her fire
To whom she renders back the debt of blood....

Drink, drink and live, old man! here on's realm holds up such tides."

Byron: Childe Harold, iv. st. 149, 150.

Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life—i.e. Melchisedec (Heb. vii. 3). He was not the son of a priest, either on his father's or mother's side; his pedigree could not be traced in the priestly line, like that of the ordinary high priests, which can be traced to Aaron; nor did he serve in courses like the Levites, who begin and end their official duties at stated times.

"Jesus was a "priest after the order of Melchisedec." Neither his reputed father, Joseph, nor his mother, Mary, was of the priestly line. As priest, therefore, he was "without father, without mother," without genealogy. And, like Melchisedec, he is a "priest for ever."

His father it is me. He impuets it to me; he says it is my bantling.

Father Mathew. (See Mathew.)

Father Neptune. The ocean.

Father Norbert. Pierre Parisot, the French missionary (1007-1769).

Father Paul. Pietro Sarpi, father of the order of Servites in Venice, who changed his Christian name when he assumed the religious habit. (1552-1623.)

Father Pratt. Francis Mahoney, a humorous writer in Fraser's Magazine and the Globe newspaper. (1805-1868.)

Father Thames, or Old Father Thames. The Thames, so far as it belongs to London.

"Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
And many a sportive race,
Departing on the margent green,
The paths of pleasure rare;"

Grey, Distant Prospect of the City of

The epithet is not uncommonly applied to other great rivers, especially those on which cities are built. The river is the father of the city, or the reason why the site was selected by the first settlers there.

"A father, Father Thames,
To whom the Romans pray,
Macaulay, Law of Hanunia"

Father Thoughtful. Nicholas Catrainat, a marshal of France; so called by his soldiers for his cautious and thoughtful policy. (1637-1712.)

Father of Waters. The Irrawaddy, in Burma, and the Mississippi, in North America. The Nile is so called by Dr. Johnson in his Rasselas. (See Father Thomas.)

Father of the Country.

Cicero was so entitled by the Roman senate. They offered the same title to Merrius, but he refused to accept it.

Several of the Caesars were so called—Julius, after quelling the insurrection of Spain; Augustus, etc. Cosmo de' Medici (1389-1611). G. Washington, the defender and paternal counsellor of the American States. (1732-1799.)

Andrea D'orea (1488-1660). Inscribed on the base of his statue by his countrymen of Genoa.

Andronieus Palaeologus II. assumed the title (1260-1332).

(See also 1 Chron. iv. 14.)

Father of the People.

Louis XII. of France (1462, 1498-1515). Henri IV. was also termed "the father and friend of the people." (1553, 1589-1610.)

Fathers of the Church. The early advocates of Christianity, who may be thus classified:

(1) Five apostolic fathers, who were contemporaries with the apostles—viz. Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

(2) The primitive fathers. Those advocates of Christianity who lived in the first three centuries. They consisted of the five apostolic fathers (q.v.), together with the nine following—Justin, Theophilus of Antioch, Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Cyprian of Carthage, Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Dionysius of Alexandria, and Tertullian.

(3) The fathers, or those of the fourth and fifth centuries, who were of two groups, those of the Greek and those of the Latin Church. (See below.)

Fathers of the Greek Church.

Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzenus, Gregory of Nysa, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ephraim, deacon of Edessa.

Fathers of the Latin Church.

The last of the fathers. St. Bernard (1091-1153). The schoolmen who followed treated their subjects systematically.

Founder of the fathers of Christian doctrine. Cesar de Bus (1541-1607).

Fathom (Count). A villain in Smollet's novel so called. After robbing his benefactors, and fleecing all who trusted him, he is at last forgiven.

Fatima. The last of Bluebeard's wives, who was saved from death by the timely arrival of her brother with a party of friends. Mahomet's favourite daughter was called Fatima.
Fatted Calf. To kill the fatted calf. To welcome with the best of everything. The phrase is taken from the parable in the third gospel of the prodigal son. (Luke xv. 30.)

Fatale Mulier. A law term for a courtesan. Fatales with jurisconsults means one not in a right mind, incorrigibly foolish.

Fault. At fault. Not on the right track; doubtful whether right or wrong. Hounds are at fault when the scent is broken because the fox has jumped upon a wall, crossed a river, cut through a flock of sheep, or doubled like a hare.

In Geology, the break or dislocation of a stratum of rock is called a fault.

Fault. (French, faute, Latin, fallare, to fail.)

For fault of a better (Shakespeare: Merry Wives, i. 4). Having no better.

"I am the youngest of that name, for fault of a worse."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 4.

In fault. To blame.

"Is Antony or we in fault for this?"—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 17.

To a fault. In excess; as, kind to a fault. Excess of every good is more or less evil.

To find fault. To blame; to express disapprobation.

Faults.

No one is without its faults, i.e. is faultless. "Vitius nemo sine nascitur."

Fauna (2 syl.). The animals of a country at any given geological period; so called from the mythological fauns, who were the patrons of wild animals.

"Nor less the place of curious plant he knows—He hath his Flora and his Fauna shown."—Crabb: Borough.

Faust (1 syl.). The grandest of all Goethe's dramas. Faust makes a compact with Mephistopheles, who on one occasion provides him with a cloak, by means of which he is wafted through the air whithersoever he chooses. "All that is weird, mysterious, and magical groups round this story." An English dramatic version has been made by Bayle Bernard.

Dr. Faustus, a tragedy by Marlow: Faust and Marguerite, by Bouicault; Faust et Margherito, an opera by Gounod, etc.

Faux-jour (French). A false or contrary light; meaning that a picture is hung so that the light falls on it in the opposite direction to what it ought. The artist has made his light fall in one direction, but it is so hung that the light falls the other way.

Faux Pas. A "false step"; a breach of manners or moral conduct. (French.)

Fave'rous. The zephyr or west wind. It means the wind favourable to vegetation.

Favour. Ribbons made into a bow; so called from being the favour bestowed by ladies on the successful champions of tournaments. (See True Love Knot; Curzy Favour.)

"Here, Phoebe; wear thou this favour for me, and stick it in thy cap."—Shakespeare: Henry V, iv. 7.

Favourite. One to whom a lady gives a "favour" or token. The horse which betting men suppose is most likely to come off the winner of a particular race.

Favourites. False curls on the temples; a curl of hair on the temples plastered with some cosmetic; whiskers made to meet the mouth.

"Yet tell me, sire, don't you as nice appear With your false curls as, hard dash, and faun'ties there?"—Milo Centauro.

Fay. (See FAIRY.)

Faye (1 syl.). The way to Faye (French, "Faut la viness") A winding or zigzag manner, like "Crooked Lane at Eastcheap." A person who tries to do something indirectly goes by the pathway to Faye. Faye is a little village in France, built on an eminence so steep that there is no getting to it except by a very zigzag path.

"They go in to Paradise ... as the way is to Faye."—Babelon: Gargantua and Pantagruel, book 1, 27.

Fazio. A native of Florence, who first tried to make his fortune by alchemy; but being present when Bartoldo, an old miser, died, he buried the body secretly, and stole his money—bags. Being now rich, he became acquainted with the Marchioness Aldabella, with whom he passed his time in licentious pleasure. His wife Bianca, out of jealousy, accused him to the duke of being privy to the death of Bartoldo; and Fazio was condemned to death for murder. Bianca now tried to undo the mischief she had done, but it was too late; she went mad with grief, and died of a broken heart. (Dean Milman: Fazio.)

Fear Fortress. An hypothetical castle in a forest near Saragossa. It represents that terrible obstacle which fear conjures up, but which vanishes into thin air as it is approached by a Fearless

Feather

stout heart and clear conscience. The allegory forms the third part of the legend of Crocmuitaine.

"If a child disappeared, or any cattle were carried off, the trembling peasants said, 'The lord of Fear-fortress has taken them.' If a fire broke out anywhere, it was the lord of Fear-fortress who must have lit it. The origin of all accidents, mishaps, and disasters was traced to the mysterious owner of this invisible castle."—Cromwell, l. iii., 40.

"It sunk before my earnest face, It vanished quite away, And left no shadow on the place, Between me and the day. Such castles rise to strike us dumb; But, weak in every part, They melt before the strong man's eyes And fly the true of heart."—C. Mackay: The Giant (slightly altered).

Feast [Sans peur]. Jean, Duke of Burgundy (1371-1419). (See BAYARD.)

Feast of Reason.

"There St. John (sin-ja) mingles with the friendly bowl. The feast of reason and the flow of soul."—Pope: Imitations of Horace, i. 1.

Feasts. Anniversary days of joy. They are either immovable or movable. The chief immovable feasts are the four rent-days—viz., the Annunciation or Lady-Day (March 25th), the Nativity of John the Baptist (June 24th), Michaelmas Day (September 29th), and Christmas Day (December 25th). The Circumcision (New Year's Day, January 1st), Epiphany (January 6th), All Saints' (November 1st), All Souls' (November 2nd), and the several Apostles' days.

Feather. Meaning species or kind. From the proverb, "Birds of a feather."—i.e. of the same plumage, and therefore of the same sort.

"I am not of that feather to shake off My friend, when he must need me."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, 1. 1.

Feather. A light, volatile person.

"A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod; An honest man's the noblest work of God."—Pope: Essay on Man, 28-30.

A broken feather. (See BROKEN . . .)

An oiled feather. Kindness of manner and speech. An oiled feather will do more to ease a stubbornlock than great force. (See Power's Tract called The Oiled Feather.)

Birds of a feather flock together.

Latin: Similes similibus gaudent. Pares cum paribus facile congregantur.

Cicero says, "Deos novimus uestrum et vestitum"—French: Qui se ressemble, s'assemble.

In full feather. Flush of money. In allusion to birds not on the moult.

In grand feather. Dressed to the nines.

In high feather. In exuberant spirits, joyous. When birds are moulting they mope about, but as soon as they regain their feathers their spirits revive.

Tickled with a feather. Easily moved to laughter. "Pleased with a feather, tickled with a straw," is more usual; livre de la moindre bagatelle.

Also annoyed by trifles, worried by little annoyances.

"From day to day some silly things Upset you altogether; There's nothing so soon conversion brings As tickling with a feather. 'Gainst minor evils let him pray Who have none's favour certain; For one that big misfortunes stay, Ten die of little worries."—Some: Ballads of Babylon (Little Worries).

Cut a feather. A ship going fast is said to cut a feather, in allusion to the ripple which she throws off from her bows. Metaphorically, "to cut a dash."

"Jack could never cut a feather."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, 1819.

To show a white feather. (See WHITE . . .)

Feather in Your Cap. That's a feather in your cap. An honour to you. The allusion is to the very general custom in Asia and among the American Indians of adding a new feather to their head-gear for every enemy slain. The Cauts of Cabul stick a feather in their turban for every Mussulman slain by them. The Incas and (Jacques, the Munitarris and Mandans (of America), the Abyssinians and Turcomans, etc., etc., follow the same custom. So did the ancient Lycians, and many others. In Scotland and Wales it is still customary for the sportsman who kills the first woodcock to pluck out a feather and stick it in his cap. In fact, the custom, in one form or another, seems to be almost universal.

* When "Chinese" Gordon quelled the Taiping rebellion he was honoured by the Chinese Government with the "yellow jacket and peacock's feather."

In Hungary, at one time, none might wear a feather but he who had slain a Turk. (Lansdowne MS. 775, folio 149.)

Feather One's Nest.
He has feathered his nest well. He has made lots of money; has married a rich woman. The allusion is to birds, which line their nests with feathers to make them soft and warm.

Feather One's Oar (To).
To feather an oar is to turn the blade parallel with the surface of the water as the hands are moved forward for a fresh stroke. (The Greek pteron means both "an oar" and "a feather," and the verb ptereo, to "furnish with oars" or "with feathers.") The oar throws off the water in a feathery spray.

"He feathered his oars with such skill and dexterity that July Jones Waterman.

Feather Stone. A federal stone or stone table at which the ancient courts baron were held in the open air, and at which covenants were made. (Latin, fexdus, a treaty.)

Feathers (The). A public-house sign in compliment to Henry VI., whose cognizance it was.

Fine feathers make fine birds. (Latin, "Vestis virum fact;" dress makes the man). The French proverb is "La belle plume fait le bel oiseau.

The Prince of Wales' feathers. The tradition is, that the Black Prince, having slain John of Luxemburg, King of Bohemia, in the Battle of Cressy, assumed his crest and motto. The crest consisted of twelve ostrich feathers, and the motto was "Ich dien" (I serve). John of Arden discovered a contemporary MS., in which it is expressly said that this was the case; but much controversy has arisen on the question. Dr. Bell affirms that the crest is a rebus of Queen Philippa's hereditary title—viz. Countess of Ostre-vant (ostrich-feather). Randall Holmes claims an old British origin; and the Rev. H. Longueville asserts that the arms of Roderick Mawe, prior to the division of Wales into principalities, was thus blazoned:—"Argent, three lions passant regardant, with their tails passing between their legs and curving over their backs in a feathery form."

Feature means the "make." Spenser speaks of God's "secret understanding of our feature"—i.e. make or structure. It now means that part which is most conspicuous or important. Thus we speak of the chief feature of a painting, a garden, a book, etc., etc. (Norman, feature; Latin, factura.)

February. The month of purification amongst the ancient Romans (Latin, februs, to purify by sacrifice.)
The 2nd of February (Candlemas Day). It is said, if the weather is fine and frosty at the close of January and beginning of February, we may look for more winter to come than we have seen up to that time.

"Si sol splendet, Certa purificant, Major erit glacies post festum quam fuit ante." (Sir P. Broome; Vulgar Errors.

"If Candlemas Day be dry and fair,
The half o' winter's gone and o'air.
If Candlemas Day he be and foul,
The half o' winter was gane at Yole."

Scotch Proverb.

"The badger peeks out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and, if he finds snow, walks abroad; but if he sees the sun shining he draws back into his hole."—German Proverb.

Fe'olt (Latin, he did it). A word inscribed after the name of an artist, sculptor, etc., as David freit, Goujon freit; i.e. David painted it, Goujon sculptured it, etc.

Fee'ula means sediment. Starch is a fee'ula, being the sediment of flour steeped in water. (Latin, faces, dregs.)

Federal States. In the late American war the Unionists were so called—i.e. those northern states which combined to resist the eleven southern or Confederate states (q.v.).

Fee. Anglo-Saxon feeoh, cattle, goods, money. So in Latin, pecunia, from pecus, cattle. Capital is capta, heads of cattle, and chattels is a mere variant.

Fee-farm-rent is where an estate is granted, subject to a rent in fee of at least one-fourth its value. It is rent paid on lands let to farm, and not let in recompense of service at a greatly reduced value.

Fee-penny. A fine for money overdue. Sir Thomas Gresham often wrote for money "in order to save the fee-penny."

Fee Simple. An estate free from condition or limitation. If restricted by conditions, the inheritance is called a 'Conditional Fee.'

Fee-tail (f.) An estate limited to a person and his lawful heirs.

Feeble. Most forcible Feeble. A writer whose language is very "loud," but whose ideas are very jejune. Feeble is a "woman's tailor," brought to Sir John Falstaff as a recruit. He tells Sir John "he will do his good will," and the Fenella

Felo de Se. The act of a suicide when he commits self-murder. Murder is felony, and a man who murders himself commits this felony—felo de se.

"A felo-de-se, therefore, is he that deliberately puts an end to his own existence."—Blackstone: Commentaries, book iv. chap. xiv. p. 188.

Feme-covert. A married woman. This does not mean a woman covert by her husband, but a woman whose head is covered, not usual with maidsens or unmarried women. In Rome unmarried women wore on their heads only a corolla (i.e. a wreath of flowers). In Greece they wore an anâdæma, or fillet. The Hungarian spinster is called hujadon (bare-headed). Married women, as a general rule, have always covered their head with a cap, turban, or something of the same sort, the head being covered as a badge of subjection. Hence Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 65), being told that the man she saw was her espoused husband, took a veil and covered her head. Servants wear caps, and private soldiers in the presence of their officers cover their heads for the same reason. (See Eph. v. 22, 23.)

Women do not, like men, uncover their heads even in saluting, but bend their knee, in token of subjection. (See SALUTATIONS.)

Feme-sole. A single woman. Feme-sole merchant. A woman who carries on a trade on her own account.

Femme de Chambre. (French.) A chambermaid.

Femm'ynye (3 syl.). A medieval name for the kingdom of the Am'zons. Gower terms Penthes'iea's "queen of Femm'ye." "He [Thewes] conquered at the reign of Femm'ye."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 296.

Fen Nightingale. A frog, which sings at night in the fens, as nightingales sing in the groves. (See ARCADIAN NIGHTINGALE.)

Fence Month. The close time of deer, from fifteen days before Midsummer to fifteen days after it. This being a fawning time, deer-hunting is forbidden.

Fenchurch Street (London). The church in the fens or marshy ground by the "Langbourne" side.

Fenible Regiments. A kind of militia raised in 1759, again in 1778-9, and again in 1794, when a force of 15,000 was raised. The force was disbanded in 1802.

Fen'illa. A pretended deaf and dumb sylph-like attendant on the Countess of Derby, in Scott's Peveril of the Peak.
Fenians. An anti-British association of disaffected Irishmen, called the Fenian Brotherhood, after the ancient Fenians of Ireland; formed in New York, in 1857, to overthrow the domination of England in Ireland, and make Ireland a republic. The word means a hunter—Gaelic, fionn, from fheidhe (pronounced fee-agh), a hunt. Before the Germanic invasion, a Celtic race so called occupied not only parts of Ireland and Scotland, but also the north of Germany and the Scandinavian shores. Oisin (Ossian) refers to them, and one passage is thus rendered in The Antiquary: "Do you compare your psalms to the tales of the bare-armed Fenians?" Oisin was the grandson of Fionn, the "fair-haired chief" of the Fenians, and all the high officers of this volunteer association were men of rank. It appears that the Fenians of Ireland (Eirinn), Scotland (Alba), England (Socraing), and Scandinavia, had a great civil battle at Gabhra, in Ireland, and extirpated each other. Oisin alone escaped, and he had slain "twice fifty men with his own hand.

In the great Fenian outbreak of Ireland in 1865, etc., the leaders were termed "head centres," and their subordinates "centres." (See Clan-na-Gael.)

Fennel. Said to restore lost vision and to give courage.

"Above the lowly plants it towers,
The fennel with its yellow flowers,
And in an earlier age than ours,
Washed with the wondrous powers
Lost vision to restore;
It gave new strength and fearless mood,
And gladiators fierce and rueful
Mingled it in their daily food;
And he who battled and subdued
The breath of fennel wore

Fennir or Fenris. The wolf of sin [i.e. of Loki], meaning the gouging of a guilty conscience. The "wolf" was the brother of Hel (g.r.). When he gapes, one jaw touches earth and the other heaven. In the Ragnarok he swallows the sun and conquers Odin; but being conquered by Vidar, he was cast into Nifheim, where Loki was confined.

Fenton. One who seeks to mend his fortune by marriage. He is the suitor of Anne Page. Her father objects to him, he says, because "I am too great of birth;

And that, my state being gait'd with my expense,
I seek to lead it only by his wealth."

(Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 4.

Ferae Nature. Applied in law to animals living in a wild state, as distinguished from animals which are domesticated.

For'amore. The young Cashmerian poet, who relates poetical tales to Lalla Rookh, in her journey from Delhi to Lesser Buchair'a. Lalla Rookh is going to be married to the young sultan, but falls in love with the poet. On the wedding morn she is led to her future husband, and finds that the poet is the sultan himself, who had gallantly taken this course to win the heart of his bride and beguile her journey. (T. Moore.)

Ferdinand. Son of the King of Naples, and suitor of Miranda, daughter of Prospero, the banished Duke of Milan. (Shakespeare: Tempest.)

In Love's Labour's Lost, the same name is given to the King of Navarre.

Ferdinando. A brave soldier who obtained a complete victory over the King of Morocco and Gren'da, near Tarrifa, in 1340. Being in love with Leonora de Guzman, Alfonso XI., whose life he had saved in the battle, created him Count of Zama'ra, and Marquis of Montreal, and gave him the hand of Leonora in marriage. No sooner was this done, than Ferdinando discovered that Leonora was the King's mistress; so he restored his ranks and honours to the king, repudiated his bride, and retired to the monastery of St. James of Compostella. Leonora entered the same monastery as a novice, obtained the forgiveness of Ferdinando, and died. (Donizetti's opera of La Favorita.)

Ferdowsi. A Persian poet, famous for the copious flow of his dictation. He wrote in verse the Shah-Nammeh, or history of the Persian kings, which took thirty years, and contains 120,000 verses.

Ferguson. It's all very fine, Ferguson; but you don't lodge here. Capt. Ferguson was the companion of the Marquis of Waterford, when that young nobleman made himself notorious for his practical jokes in the middle of the nineteenth century. In one of their sprees the two companions got separated, and the marquis found his way home to the house of his uncle, the Archbishop of Armagh, Charles Street, St. James's Square. The marquis had gone to bed, when a thundering knock came at the door. The marquis, suspecting who it was that knocked, threw up the window and said, "It is all very fine, Ferguson, but you don't lodge here;" and for many years the saying was popular. (See Notes and Queries, Jan. 16, 1886, p. 46.)

Fern. (See Fan'y Fern.)
Fern Seed. We have the receipt of fern seed, we walk invisible (1 Henry IV., act iv. 4). The seed of certain species of fern is so small as to be invisible to the naked eye, and hence the plant was believed to confer invisibility on those who carried it about their person. It was at one time believed that plants have the power of imprinting their own specialty to their wearer. Thus, the herb-dragon was said to cure the poison of serpents; the yellow celandine the jamdice; wood-sorrel, which has a heart-shaped leaf, to cheer the heart; liverwort to be good for the liver, and so on.

"Why did you think that you had gold's ring, Or the herb that gives invisibility?"
Beaumont and Fletcher; Fair Maid of the Inn, i. 1.

"The seeds of fern, which, by prolific heat, Cleared and unfolded, form a plant so great, Are less a thousand times than what the eye Can assimilate of the tale dev'ry."
Blackmore: Creighton.

Fernando Florestan. A state prisoner of Seville, married to Leonora, who, in man's disguise, and under the name of Fidelio, became the servant of Rocco, the jailor. Pizarro, governor of the prison, conceived a hatred to Fernando, and resolved to murder him. Rocco and Leonora were sent to dig his grave, and when Pizarro entered the dungeon, Leonora intercepted his purpose. At this juncture the minister of State arrived, and ordered the prisoner's release. (Beethoven: Fidelio.)

Ferney. The patriarch of Ferney. Voltaire; so called because he retired to Ferney, a small sequestered village near Geneva, from which obscure retreat he poured forth his invectives against the French Government, the Church nobles, and all kinds of men and indeed all classes.

"There are in Paris five or six statues of the patriarch of Ferney."—The Times.

Fero'hera. The guardian angels of Persian mythology. They are countless in number, and their chief task is for the well-being of man.

Ferr'a'ute [sharp iron]. A giant in Turpin's Chronicle of Charlemagne. He had the strength of forty men, and was thirty-six feet high. Though no lance could pierce his hide, Orlando slew him by Divine interposition. (See Ferrau.)

Ferr'a'us. The giant of Portugal, who took Bellisant under his care after she had been divorced by Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. (Valentine and Orson.)

The great "Bronze Head," that told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, was kept in the castle of this giant. (Valentine and Orson.) (See Ferrau.)

Ferr'ra'u. An Andrew Ferrara. A broadsword or claymore of the best quality, bearing the name of Andrea Ferrara, one of the Italian family whose swords were famous in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Genuine "Andrea Ferraras" have a crown marked on the blade.

* My father had an Andrea Ferrara, which had been in the family about a century. It had a basket-hilt, and the name was distinctly stamped on the blade.

"We'll put in hall, boy; old Andrew Ferrara shall lodge his security."—Scott: Waverley, chap. 1.

Ferrau (in Orlando Furioso). Ferrau, Ferracuto, or Ferragus, a Saracen, son of Lanfranc. He dropped his helmet in the river, and vowed he would never wear another till he had won that worn by Orlando. Orlando slew him with a wound in the navel, his only vulnerable part.

Ferrax and Porrex. Two sons of Orchoduc, a mythical British king. Porrex drove his brother from Britain, and when Ferrex returned with an army he was slain, but Porrex was shortly after put to death by his mother. One of the first, if not the very first, historical play in the English language was Ferrex and Porrex, by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville.

Ferrumbras. (See Ferrabrus.)

Fesce'ninna Verses. Lampoons; so called from Fescennia in Tuscany, where performers at merry-makings used to extemporise scurrilous jests of a personal nature to amuse the audience.

Fess (Latin, fascia, a band or covering for the thighs). In heraldry, the fess is a band drawn horizontally across the shield, of which it occupies one-third. It represents the band which was worn by knights low down across the hips.

Fest. A pledge. Festing-man, a surety to another. Festing-penny, a penny given in earnest to secure a bargain. (Anglo-Saxon, festing, an act of confidence, an entrusting.)

Fetch. A wraith—the disembodied ghost of a living person. (See Ferche.)

"Fetches . . . most commonly appear to distant friends and relations, at the very instant preceding the death of those they represent."—Brand: Popular Antiquities (Death Omens).
Fetches. Exuses, tricks, artifices.
(Saxon.)

"Deny to speak with me? They are sick? they are weary.
They have travelled all the night? Mere fetches."
Shakespeare: King Lear, ii. 4.

Fetiché or Fetish. The African idol, the same as the American Mani'tou. The worship of this idol is called Fet'ichism or Fet'ishism. (Portuguese, fetișma, magician, fairy, oracle.)

"Almost anything will serve for a fetiche: a fly, a bird, a frog, a fish, a serpent, a stone, a tree struck by lightning, a bit of metal, a shell; but the most potent of all fetiches is the rock Tahra.

The fetiche or fetish of the bottle. The imp drunkenness, or drunkenness itself.

Fetter Lane is probably fetterer-lane. A fetterer is a keeper of dogs, and the lane has always been famous for dog-fanciers. Howel, with less probability, says it is Fec'tor Lane, i.e. the lane of fe'tors or worthless fellows who were for ever loitering about the lane on their way to the gardens. Faitour is an archaic word for a worthless fellow, a lazy vagabond, from the Norman-French.

Fettle, as a verb, means to repair; to smooth; as an adjective, it means well-knit, all right and tight. It is connected with our word fact, the French faire, the Latin facere.

Fet'led ale, in Lancashire, means ale warmed and spiced.

Feu de Joie (French). A running fire of guns on an occasion of rejoicing.

Feud, meaning "hated," is the Saxon feóht (hated); but feud, a "fist," is the Teutonic ferr-odh (trust-land). (See below.)

Fenadal or Fratal (2 syl.). In Gothic odh means "property," hence odh-all (entire property); Flemish, oudal. By transposition we get all-odh, whence our allodium (absolute property claimed by the holders of fiefs); and by combining the words fees and odh, we get fer-odh, feth, or feud (property given by way of fee for services conferred). (Pon'toppidan.)

Fenal System (The). A system founded on the tenure of feuds or fiefs, given in compensation for military service to the lord of the tenants.

Feuillante. A reformed Cistercian order instituted by Jean de la Barrière in 1586. So called from the convent of Feuillants, in Languedoc, where they were established in 1577.

The club of the Feuillants, in the French Revolution, composed of moderate Jacobins. So called because the convent of the Feuillants, near the Tuileries, was their original club-room (1791-2).

Feuillaton [fə-ju-lə-ton]. A fly-sheet. Applied to the bottom part of French newspapers, generally devoted to a tale or some other light literature.

"The daily [French] newspapers all had feuilltons with continued stories in them."—Hale: Ten-times One, chap. viii. p. 125.

Fever-lur'dan or Fever-lur'gan. A fit of idleness. Lurden means a block-head. (French, lourd, heavy, dull, thick-headed; lourdant, a blockhead.)

"Fever-lurk,
Neither play nor work."

Fey. Predestined to early death. When a person suddenly changes his wonted manner of life, as when a miser becomes liberal, or a churl good-humoured, he is said in Scotch to be fey, and near the point of death.

"She must be fey (said Tripl melan), and in that case has not long to live."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. i.

Fe'zon. Daughter of Savary, Duke of Aquitaine, demanded in marriage by a pagan, called the Green Knight; but Orson, having overthrown the pagan, was accepted by the lady instead. (Valentine and Orson.)

Fl or Fle! An exclamation indicating that what is reproved is dirty or indecent. The dung of many animals, as the boar, wolf, fox, marten, and badger, is called fants, and the "olficialis ana'le" is called a f, a word still used in Lincolnshire. (Anglo-Norman, flay, to clean out; Saxon, nafyan, to foul: our despise or file, to make foul; filth, etc.)

The old words, fic-corn (dross corn), fis-lands (unenclosed lands), fis-mashings (the dung of any wild beast), etc., are compounds of the same word.

"I had another process against the dung-farmer, Master Flk."—Robelain: Pantagruel, book ii. 11.

Fl. Fa. A contracution of the two Latin words, fie-ric facias (cause it to be done). A judicial writ for one who has recovered damages in the Queen's courts, being a command to the sheriff to see the judgment of the court duly carried out.

Fiacre. A French cab or hackney coach. So called from the Hotel de St. Fiacre, Paris, where the first station of these coaches was established by M. Sauvage, about 1650.

A According to Alibai Butler, Fiacre was the son of an Irish king, born in 000, to whose tomb pilgrimages were made in the month of August. His day is August 30th. (Lives of the Saints, vol. ii. p. 378.)

Fian (John), a schoolmaster at Salt- pans, near Edinburgh, tortured to death and then burnt at the stake on the Castle Hill of Edinburgh, Saturday, January, 1591, because he refused to acknowledge that he had raised a storm at sea, to wreck James I. on his voyage to Denmark to visit his future queen. First, his head was crushed in upon his brain by means of a rope twisted tight and tighter; then his two legs were jammed to a jelly in the wooden boots; then his nails were pulled out and pins inserted in the raw finger tips; as he still remained silent, he was strangled, and his dead body burnt to ashes.

Flas. Striking the flats. Taking the average price of corn. Flars is a Gothic word, still current in Ireland. (Scotch law.)

Fiasco. A failure, a mull. In Italy they cry Old, old, fiasco ! to an unpopular singer. This word, common in France and Germany, is employed as the opposite of furore.

The history of the word is as follows:—In making Venetian glass, if the slightest flaw is detected, the glassblower turns the article into a fiasco—that is, a common flask.

A gentleman from North America (G. Fox, "The Gentleman Farmer"") furnishes me with the following anecdote: "There was once a clever harlequin of Florence named Dominico Biancali, noted for his comic parodies. He was wont to improvise upon whatever article he held in his hand. One night he appeared holding a flask (fiasco); but failing to extract any humour whatsoever from his subject, he said, "It is thy fault, fiasco," and dashed the flask on the ground. After that a failure was commonly called in Florence a fiasco." To me it appears incredible that a clever improvisator could draw no matter from an empty bottle, apparently a subject ripe with matter.

Flat. I give my flat to that proposal. I consent to it. A flat in law is an order of the court directing that something be done. (Latin, fiat, let it be done.)

Fib. An attendant on Queen Mab in Drayton's Nymphidia. Fib, meaning a falsehood, is the Latin fabula, a fable.

F'co. (See Fig.)

Fido. "Fido for the phrase." Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 2. "I see contempt marching forth, giving me the fieu with his thumb in his mouth." — Wt's Miseries (1668).

Fiddler's Fare or Fiddler's Pay. Meat, drink, and money.

Fiddler's Green. The land of the leal or "Dixie Land" of sailors: where there is perpetual mirth, a fiddle that never ceases to untiring dancers, plenty of grog, and unlimited tobacco.

Fiddler's Money. A silver penny. The fee given to a fiddler at a wake by each dancer.
Fiddler's News. Stale news carried about by wandering fiddlers.

Fiddiestech. In the Great German epic called The Nibelungen-Lied, this word is used six or eight times for a broadsword.

"His fiddiestech he grasped, 'twas massy, broad, and long,
As sharp as any razor."

Stanza 1,411.

"My fiddiestech's no feather; on whom I let it fall,
If he has friends that love him, 'twill set them weeping all."

Stanza 1,860.

"His fiddiestech, sharp-cutting, can hardest steel divide.
And at a stroke can shiver the morrow's beauty pride."

Stanza 2,079.

Fiddiestickies! An exclamation signifying what you say is not worth attention. To fiddle about is to waste time, fiddling. A fiddiestick is the instrument used in fiddling, hence the fiddiestick is even less than the fiddle.

Fidele (3 syl.). The name assumed by Imogen in Shakespeare's Cymbeline. Collins has a beautiful elegy on Fidele.

Fideillo. Beethoven's only opera. (See Leonora.)

Fides. The goddess of Faith, etc.

Fides (2 syl.). Mother of John of Leyden. Not knowing that her son was the "prophet" and ruler of Westphalia, but thinking that the prophet had caused his death, she went to Munster to curse the new-crowned monarch. The moment she saw him she recognised him, but the "prophet-king," surrounded by his courtiers, pretended not to know her. Fides, to save her son annoyance, declared she had made a mistake, and was confined in the dungeon of the palace at Munster, where John visited her and was forgiven. When her son set fire to his palace, Fides rushed into the flames and perished with him. (Meyerbeer's opera of Le Prophète.)

Fides Carbonari. Blind faith, faith of a child. A carbonaro being asked what he believed, replied, "What the Church believes;" and, being asked again what the Church believes, made answer, "What I believe." (See Carbonari.) (Roux: Dictionnaire Comique.)

Field. (Anglo-Saxon, feld.)

In agricultural parlance, a field is a portion of land belonging to a farm.

In Huntsman's language, it means all the riders.

In heraldry, it means the entire surface of the shield.

In military language, it means a battle; the place where a battle is fought, or is about to be fought; a campaign.

In sportmen's language it means all the horses of any one race. Against the field. In horse-racing, to bet against the field means to back a particular horse against all the rest entered for the race.

In the field. A competitor for a prize. A term in horse-races, as, so-and-so was in the field. Also in war, as, the French were in the field already.

Master of the field. In military parlance, means the conqueror in a battle.

To keep back the field, is to keep back the riders.

To take the field. To move the army preparatory to battle.

To win the field. To win the battle.

Field-day. Day of business. Thus, a clergyman jokingly calls "kept festival" his field-day. A military term, meaning a day when a regiment is taken to the fields for practice.

Field Marshal. A general officer of the highest rank, who commands an army, or, at any rate, more than one corps.

Field Officer. Any officer between captain and a general officer. A major or a lieutenant-colonel may be a field officer, being qualified to command whole battalions, or a "field."

Field Pieces. Small cannon carried into the field with an army.

Field Works. Works thrown up by an army in besieging or defending a fortress, or in strengthening its position.

"Earth-works, and especially field works, will hereafter play an important part in wars."—W. T. Sherman: Memoirs, 11, ch. 24, p. 396.

Field of Blood. Aclandama the piece of land bought by the chief priests with the money which Judas threw down in the temple; so called because it was bought with blood-money. (Matt. xxvii. 5: Acts i. 19.)

* The battle-field of Cannas (a.c. 216) is so called because it was especially sanguinary.

Field of Ice. A large body of floating ice.

Field of Vision or Field of View. The space in a telescope, microscope, stereoscope, etc., within which the object is visible. If the object is not distinctly visible, it must be brought into the field by adjustment.

Field of the Cloth of Gold. The plain, near Guines, where Henry VIII.
Field

had his interview with François I. in 1520; so called from the splendour and magnificence displayed there on the occasion.

Field of the Forty Footsteps. At the back of the British Museum, once called Southampton Fields. The tradition is that two brothers, in the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, took different sides and engaged each other in fight. Both were killed, and forty impressions of their feet remained on the field for many years, where no grass would grow. The encounter took place at the extreme north-east of Upper Montague Street. The Misses Porter wrote a novel on the subject, and the Messers. Mayhew a melodrama.

Fielding. The Fielding of the drama. George Furquhar, author of the Jesus' Strategem, etc. (1678-1707.)

Pierabras (Sir), of Alexandria, son of Balan, King of Spain. The greatest giant that ever walked the earth. For height of stature, breadth of shoulder, and hardness of muscle he never had an equal. He possessed all Babylon, even to the Red Sea; was seigneur of Russia, Lord of Cologne, master of Jerusalem, and even of the Holy Sepulchre. He carried away the crown of thorns, and the balsam which embalmed the body of Our Lord, one drop of which would cure any sickness, or heal any wound in a moment. One of his chief exploits was to slay the "fearful huge giant that guarded the bridge Manibille," famous for its thirty arches of black marble. His pride was laid low by Olivier, one of Charlemagne's paladins. The giant then became a child of God, and ended his days in the odour of sanctity, "meek as a lamb and humble as a chidden slave." Sir Pierabras, or Ferunbras, figures in several medieval romances, and is an allegory of Sin overcome by the Cross. (See Balan.)

Fifteen decisive Battles (The), according to Sir E. S. Creasy, were: 1. The battle of Marathon (Sept., 490 B.C.), when Miltiades, with 10,000 Greeks, defeated 100,000 Persians under Datis and Artaphernes. 2. The naval battle at Salamis (Sept., 480 B.C.), when the Athenians under Nicias and Demosthenes were defeated with a loss of 40,000 killed and wounded, and their entire fleet. 3. The battle of Arbela (Oct., 331 B.C.), when Alexander the Great overthrew Darius Codomannus for the third time. 4. The battle of Metaurus (207 B.C.), when the consuls Livius and Nero cut to pieces Hadaubal's army, sent to reinforce Hannibal. 5. In A.D. 9 Arminius and the Gauls utterly overthrew the Romans under Varus, and thus established the independence of Gaul. 6. The battle of Chalons (A.D. 451), when Aetius and Theodoric utterly defeated Attila, and saved Europe from devastation. 7. The battle of Tours (Oct., 732 A.D.), when Charles Martel overthrew the Saracens under Abderrahman, and thus broke the Moslem yoke from Europe. 8. The battle of Hastings (Oct., 1066), when William of Normandy slew Harold II., and obtained the crown of England. 9. The battle of Orleans in 1429, when Joan of Arc secured the independence of France. 10. The defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588, which destroyed the hopes of the Pope respecting England. 11. The battle of Blenheim (13 Aug., 1704), when Marlborough and Prince Eugene defeated Tallard, and thus prevented Louis XIV. from carrying out his schemes. 12. The battle of Pultowa (July, 1709), when Czar Peter utterly defeated Charles XII. of Sweden, and thus established the Muscovite power. 13. The battle of Saratoga (Oct., 1777), when General Gates defeated the British under General Burgoyne, and thus secured for the United States the alliance of France. 14. The battle of Valmy (Sep., 1792), when the French Marshal Kellerman defeated the Duke of Brunswick, and thus established for a time the French republic. 15. The battle of Waterloo (18 June, 1815), when Napoleon the Great was defeated by the Duke of Wellington, and Europe was restored to its normal condition.

The battle of Gettysburg, in Pennsylvania (3 July, 1863), when the Confederate, under the command of General Lee, were defeated by the Northern army, was certainly one of the most important, if not the most important, of the American Civil War. The battle of Sadowa (June, 1870), when Napoleon gave up his sword to William, King of Prussia, which put an end to the empire of France.

Fifth-Monarchy Men. A sect of English fanatics in the days of the Puritans, who maintained that Jesus Christ was about to come a second time to the earth, and establish the fifth universal monarchy. The four preceding monarchies were the Assyrian, the Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman. In politics, the Fifth-Monarchy Men were arrant Radicals and levellers.

Fig. Full fig. Full dress. A corruption of the Italian in foc'chi (in gala costume). It was derived from the tassels with which horses were ornamented in state processions. Thus we read in Miss Knight's Autobiography, "The Pope's throne was set out for mass, and the whole building was in perfect focchì" (in full fig). Another etymology has been suggested by a correspondent in Notes and Queries, that it is taken from the word full fig. (figure) in fashion books.

"The Speaker sits at one end and in full fig, with a clerk at the table below."—Frolicke: West Indies, chap. ix. p. 101.

Fig or Figo. I don't care a fig for you; not worth a fig. Anything at all. Here fig is foco—a fillip or snap of the fingers. Thus we say, "I don't care that for you," snapping the fingers at the same time. (Italian, far le fiche, to snap the fingers; French, faire la figue; German, diefigen weisen; Dutch, de vijghe setzen, etc.) (See FICO.)

"A fig for Peter."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., ii. 9.

"The figs for thy friendship."—Shakespeare: Henry V., iii. 5.

Fig Sunday. Palm Sunday is so called from the custom of cutting figs on that day. The practice arose from the Bible story of Zaccheus, who climbed up into a fig-tree to see Jesus.

Many other festivals have their special foods; as, Michaelmas goose. Christmas, plum-pudding. Shrove Tuesday, pancake day; Ash Wednesday, salt cod; Good Friday, hot cross-buns; pasch-eggs, roast-chestnuts, etc., have their special days.

Fig-tree. It is said that Judas hanged himself on a fig-tree. (See ELDER-TREE.)

"Quare aliquis quis aequor Judas se suspendit? Arbor fusa fruste diriment."—Barredia.

Figs. I shan't buy my Attic figs in future, but grow them. Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. It was Xerxes who boasted that he did not intend any longer to buy his figs, because he meant to conquer Attica and add it to his own empire; but Xerxes met a signal defeat at Salamis, and "never loosed his sandal till he reached Abyd'ra."

"In the name of the Prophet, Figs!" A burlesque of the solemn language employed in eastern countries in the common business of life. The line occurs in the imitation of Dr. Johnson's pompous style, in Rejected Addresses, by James and Horace Smith.

Figged out. (See Fra, Full Fig.)

Fig'aro. A type of cunning dexterity, and intrigue. The character is in the Barbier de Séville and Mariage de Figaro, by Beaumarchais. In the former he is a barber, and in the latter a valet; but in both he outwits every one. There are several operas founded on these dramas, as Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, Paisiello's Il Barbiero di Siviglia, and Rossini's Il Barbier di Siviglia.

Fight. (See Hudiabre, Pt. iii. c. 3.)

"Do the figs that runs away may live to fight another day; But that is to run with plain Can never rise to fight again."

Sir John Mennes: Miserum Delectus. (1566.)

Demosthenes, being reproached for running away from Philip of Macedon, at Cheronæa, replied, "A man that runs away may fight again ('Αρης ὁ θεσμός καὶ τάλιν παχύφαστος)." (See Aulius Cel-lius, xvii. 21.)

Fight Shy (7b). To avoid. A shy person is unwilling to come forward, and to fight is to resist, to struggle in a contest. To "fight shy," therefore, is to resist being brought into contest or conflict.

Fighting-cocks. To live like fighting-cocks. To have a profusion of the best food. Fighting-cocks used to be high fed in order to aggravate their pugnacity and increase their powers of endurance.

Fighting Fifth (7c). The 5th Foot. This sobriquet was given to the regiment during the Peninsular War. The "Old and Bold Fifth," the Duke of Wellington's Body-guard, is now called the "Northumberland Fusiliers." What a terrible vexation must the abolition of the time-honoured names of our old regiments have been to our army!

Fighting Kings [Chen-kwo]. Certain feudatories of China incessantly contending for mastery over each other. (B.C. 770-320.)

Fighting Prelate. Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, who greatly distinguished himself in the rebellion of Wat Tyler. He met the rebels in the field, with the temporal sword, then absolved them, and sent them to the gibbet.

"The Bishop of Norwich, the famous 'fighting prelate,' had led an army into Flandres."—Lord Campbell.
Fighting the Tiger. Gaming is so called in the United States of America. "After seeing 'flying the tiger,' as gaming is styled in the United States, I have arrived at the conclusion that gambling is more fairly carried on in the Monte Carlo casino than in any American gaming-house." — The Nineteenth Century, Feb., 1887, p. 249.

Fighting with Gloves on. Sparring without showing animosity; fighting with weapons or words with coloured friendliness. Fighting, like boxers, with boxing gloves. Tories and Whigs in the two Houses of Parliament fight with gloves on, so long as they preserve all the outward amenities of debate, and conceal their hostility to each other by seeming friendliness.

Figure. To cut a figure. This phrase seems applicable more especially to dress and outward bearing. To make a figure is rather to make a name or reputation, but the distinction is not sharply observed.

To make a figure. To be a notability. Faire quelque figure dans le monde. "He makes no figure at court;" Il ne fait aucune figure à la cour.

Figure of Fun (A). A droll appearance, whether from untidiness, quaintness, or other peculiarity. A precious figure of fun, is a rather stronger expression. These are chiefly applied to young children.

Figures. A corruption of fingers, that is, "digits" (Latin, digiti, fingers). So called from the primitive method of marking the monadles by the fingers. Thus the first four were simply i, ii, iii, iv; five was the outline of the hand simplified into a v; the next four figures were the two combined, thus, vi, vii, viii, viii; and ten was a double v, thus, x. At a later period iii and viii were expressed by one less than five (i-v) and one less than ten (i-x). Nineteen was ten-plus-nine (x + ix), etc.—a most clumsy and unphilosophical device.

Filch. To steal or purloin. A filch is a staff with a hook at the end, for plucking clothes from hedges and abstracting articles from shop windows. Probably it is a corruption of pilfer. (Welsh, ysepil and ysepilwir; Spanish, pelizar; French, pilier and pilier. Filch and pilfer are variants of the same word.

Fitch. With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart.

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. ii.

File. To cheat. The allusion is to filing money for the sake of the dust which can be used or sold. A file is a cheat. Hence "a jolly file," etc. "Sortful bemoan that false file." Curator Mundi MS.

In single file. Single row; one behind another. (French, file, a row.)
Rank and file. Common soldiers. Thus we say, "Ten officers and three hundred rank and file fell in the action." Rank refers to men standing abreast, file to men standing behind each other.

"It was only on the back of some grand expedition that the epidemic rank and file of the fraternity subscribed their dollars." — The Times.

Filis Dolorosa. The Duchesse d'Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI., also called the modern Antigone. (1778-1831.)

Filibuster. A piratical adventurer. The most notorious was William Walker, who was shot in 1855. (French, filibuster, a corruption of our "freebooter;" German, freibüter; Spanish, filibuster; Dutch, vrijbuiter.) (See Buccanneer.)

Filioque Controversy (The) long disturbed the Eastern and Western Churches. The point was this: Did the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father and the Son (Filio-quae), or from the Father only? The Western Church maintained the former, and the Eastern Church the latter dogma. The filio-que was added in the Council of Toledo 589. Amongst others, Pope Leo III. was averse to the change. (Nicene Creed.)

The gist of the argument is this: If the Son is one with the Father, whatever proceeds from the Father must proceed from the Son also. This is technically called "The Proceeding of the Holy Ghost."

Fill-dyke. The month of February, when the rain and melted snow fills the ditches to overflowing.

Fillet. A narrow band round the head for binding hair, or simply for ornament. Aurelius was the first Roman emperor that wore a royal fillet or diadem in public. In the time of Constantine the fillet was adorned with precious stones.

Filomena. Longfellow calls Florence Nightingale St. Filomena, not only because Filomena resembles the Latin word for a nightingale, but also because this Finger

saue, in Sabatelli's picture, is represented as lingering over a group of sick and maimed, healed by her intercession. (See THAUMATURGUS.)

Filter. To run through felt, as jelly is strained through flannel. The Romans strained the juice of their grapes through felt into the wine-vat, after which it was put into the casks. (Latin, filtrum, felt, filtrum, a strainer.)

Fin. The hand. A contraction of finger. Thus we say, "Give us your fin"—i.e. shake hands. The derivation from a fish's fin is good only for a joke.

Finality John. Earl Russell, who maintained that the Reform Bill of 1832 was a finality, yet in 1854, 1860, and 1866 brought forth other Reform Bills.

Finance (French). Revenue derived from fines or subsidies. In feudal times finance was money paid to a lord for a privilege. In the plural we use the word to signify available money resources. Thus we say, "My finances are exhausted," meaning I have no more funds or available money.

Finch Lane (London). So called from a family of consideration by the name of Finch or Finke. There was once a church in the lane called St. Benet Finke. There is an Irish saint named Finc, in Latin Finouceus, whose day is October 13th.

Find. You know what you leave behind, but not what you will find. And this it is that "makes us rather bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of."

Findon Haddocks. Haddocks smoked with green wood. (See Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, xxvi.) Findon or Finnon is a village some six miles south of Aberdeen, where haddocks are cured.

Findy. Plump, full. (Saxon, findig.)

"A cold May and a windy
Make rins fat and findy."

Old Proverb.

Fine Arts. Those arts which chiefly depend on a delicate or fine imagination, as music, painting, poetry, and sculpture.

Fine as Fivepence. The ancient Saxon shilling was a coin worth 5d. "To dress fine as fivepence" is to dress very smartly. The Saxon shilling was a far better coin than those made of tin, lead, and other inferior metals.

Fine-car. One of Fortunio's servants, who could hear the grass grow and the mole work underground. (Grimm's Goblin: Fortunio.)

Fingal—i.e. Fin-mac-Coul. (See Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxii.)

Fingal's Cave. The basaltic cavern of Staffa. So called from Fion na Gael (Fingal), the great Gaelic hero, whose achievements have been made familiar by the Fingal of Macpherson.

Finger. (Anglo-Saxon, finger.)

The ear finger, digitus auricularis—i.e. the little finger. The four fingers are the index finger, the middle finger, the ring finger, and the ear finger. In French, le doigt auriculaire. The little finger is so called because it can, from its diminutive size, be most easily introduced into the conduit of the ear.

"Le doigt auriculaire est le petit doigt, nul homme parv a la cause de sa petiteur, il peut facilement se introduit dans le conduit auditif externe." Dict. des Sciences, etc.

The index finger. The first finger; so called because it is used as a pointer.

The medical finger. The ring finger (q.v.).

"As last he put on her medical finger a pretty, handsome gold ring, wherein was engraved a precious traduction of Beauce."—Labesius: Panisymn, iii. 17.

The ring finger. The finger between the long and little finger was used by the Romans as a ring-finger, from the belief that a nerve run through it to the heart. Hence the Greeks and Romans used to call it the medical finger, and used it for stirring mixtures, under the notion that nothing noxious could touch it without its giving instant warning to the heart. It is still a very general notion in England that it is bad to rub on saliva or scratch the skin with any but the ring finger. The fact that there was no such intimacy between the finger and the heart was not discovered till after the notion was deeply rooted. Pliny calls this digitus annularis.

With a wet finger. Easily. (See Wet Finger.)

My little finger told me that. The same as "A little bird told me that," meaning, I know it, though you did not expect it. The former expression is from Molière's Malade Imaginaire. (See Bird.)

"By the pricking of my thumbs, Something wicked this way comes."—Shakespeare: Macbeth, iv. 1.

Try, baby, try; put your finger in your eye, etc. This nursery rhyme seems to Finger and Glove be referred to by Shakespeare in his Comedy of Errors, ii. 2:—

"No longer will I be fooled,
To put the finger in the eye and weep."

To hold up a finger (in an auction room) by way of a bid, was a Roman custom, "digitum tollere" (Cicero: In Verrem, Acto i. 54). Horace confirms this.

To turn up the little finger. (See Turn.)

Finger and Glove. To be finger and glove with another means to be most intimate.

Finger in the Pie. To have a finger in the pie. To assist or mix oneself officiously in any matter. Esse vei particeps. In French, Mettre la main à la pâte.

Finger Benediction. In the Greek and Roman Church the thumb and first two fingers represent the Trinity. The thumb, being strong, represents the Father; the long or second finger, Jesus Christ; and the first finger, the Holy Ghost, which proceedeth from the Father and the Son. (See Blessing.)

Some bishops of the Anglican Church use this gesture while pronouncing the benediction.

Finger-stall. A hutkin, a cover for a sore finger. The Germans call a thimble a finger-hut, where hut is evidently the word hut or huth (a tending, keeping, or guarding), from the verb huten (to keep watch over). Our hutkin is simply a little cap for guarding a sore finger. Stall is the Saxon stiel (a place), whence our stall, a place for horses.

Fingers. The old names for the fingers are:—

- Thumb (Anglo-Saxon thun).
- Towch (the finger that touches, foremost, or pointer. This was called by the Anglo-Saxons the sede-finger, i.e. the shooting finger.
- Long-man or long finger.
- Lech-man or ring-finger. The former means "medical finger," and the latter is a Roman expression, "*digtus anula-ris, * Called by the Anglo-Saxons the gold-finger.
- Little-man or little finger. Called by the Anglo-Saxons the cair-finger,

Fingers. Ben Jonson says—

"The thumb, in chirurgery, we give to Venus; The fore-finger to Jove, the index to Saturn; The ring to Sol; the least to Mercury." Alchemy, i. 2.

His fingers are all thumbs. Said of a person awkward in the use of his hands.

Ce sont les deux doigts de la main.

---

Fingers before Forks. "This Vulcan was a smith, they tell us; That first invented trongs and bellows; For breath and fingers did their work. (We'd fingers long before we'd forks.)" King: Art of Love.

Fingers' Ends. I have it at my fingers' ends. I am quite familiar with it and can do it readily. It is a Latin proverb (Sceur tanguam un'gues dig'tong), where the allusion is to the statuary, who knows every item of his subject by the touch. (See Unguem.)

"Content: Go to; thou hast it ad dumphill, at the fingers' ends, as they say.

Fingered. The light-fingered gentry, Friggers, qui un gues hamanos et uno habent.

Finglo-fangle (A). A ricochet word meaning a fanciful triflc. A "new fangle" is a novel contrivance. "New fangled," etc.

Finished to the Finger-nail, or "at ungwen," in allusion to statuaries running their finger-tips over a statue to detect if any roughness or imperfection of surface remains.

Finny Tribe. Fish; so called because they are furnished with fins.

Flensburg (London). A corruption of Fens-bury, the town in the fens.

Flon, son of Connal, an enormous giant, who could place his feet on two mountains, and then stoop and drink from a stream in the valley between. (Gaelic legend.)

Fish-cone on the Thysus. The juice of the fir-tree (turpentine) used to be mixed by the Greeks with new wine to make it keep; hence it was adopted as one of the symbols of Bacchus.

Fir-tree (The). Atys was metamorphosed into a fir-tree by Cybele, as he was about to lay violent hands on himself. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, x. fable 2.)

Fire. (Anglo-Saxon, fyr; Greek, phus.) St. Anthony's fire. Erysipelas. "Le ftn St. Antoine." (See Anthony.)

St. Helen's fire. Ignis sancte Helene. "Pen St. Heine." (See Castor and Pollux; and Elmo.)

Hermes' fire. Same as St. Helen's fire (q.v.).

I have myself passed through the fire. I have smelt the smell of fire. I have had experience in trouble. The allusion is to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who were cast into the fiery furnace by Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iii.).
If you will enjoy the fire you must put up with the smoke. (Latin, "Commodeitas quavis sua fort incommoda secum.") Every convenience has its inconvenience.

More fire in the bed-straw. More mischief brewing. Alluding to the times when straw was used for carpets and beds.

No fire without smoke. (French, "Nul feu sans fumée.") No good without its mixture of evil.

No smoke without fire. To every scandal there is some foundation.

Where there is smoke there is fire. Every effect is the result of some cause.

Fire. The Great Fire of London (1660) broke out at Master Farrar's, the king's baker, in Pudding Lane, and after three nights and three days was arrested at Pie Corner, St. Paul's Cathedral, eighty-nine other churches, and 13,200 houses were burnt down.

Fire Away! Say on; say what you have to say. The allusion to firing a gun; as, You are primed up to the muzzle with something you want to say; fire away and discharge your thoughts.

"Foster, I have something I want you and Miss Caryll to understand." "Fire away!" exclaimed Foster."—Watson: The Web of a Spider, chapt. 21.

Fire away, Flanagan. A taunt to a boaster. A man threatening you, says he will do this, that, and the other: you reply; "Fire away, Flanagan." Cromwell marched against a castle defended by Flanagan, who threatened to open his cannon on the Parliamentarians unless they withdrew. Cromwell wrote on the corner of the missive sent to him, "Fire away, Flanagan," and the doughty champion took to his heels immediately.

Fire First. Non, Monsieur, nous ne tivrons jamais les premiers. According to tradition, this was said by the Count D'Auteches to Lord Charles Huy at the battle of Fontenoy, 30th April, 1745 (old style).

"On c'était de tradition dans l'arme: on lançait toujours par courtoisie, l'avantage du premier feu à l'ennemi." (See Notes and Queries, 20th October, 1832, p. 545.)

Fire-balloon. A balloon whose ascensional power is derived from hot air rising from a fire beneath its open mouth. Montgolfier used such a balloon.

Fire-brand. An incendiary: one who incites to rebellion; like a blazing brand which sets on fire all it touches.

"Our fire-brand brother, Paris, burns us all."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 2.

Fire-drake or Fire-dragon. A fiery serpent, an ignis-fatuus of large proportions, superstitiously believed to be a flying dragon keeping guard over hid treasures.

"There is a fellow somewhat near the door, he should be a braggart by his face, for, o' my conscience, twenty of the door-day's new reign in a minute. . . . That fire-drake did I hit these three times on the head."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 2.

Fire-eaters. Persons ready to quarrel for anything. The allusion is to the jugglers who "eat" flaming tow, pour melted lead down their throats, and hold red-hot metal between their teeth. Richardson, in the seventeenth century—Signor Josephine Girardelli (the original Salamander), in the early part of the nineteenth century—and Chauter, a Frenchman, of the present century, were the most noted of these exhibitors.

"The great fire-eater lay unconscious upon the floor of the house."—Nashville Banner.

Fire-new. Spick and span new (q.v.).

"You should have accosted her; and with some excellent jests fire-new from the mint."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

Fire-ship. A ship filled with combustibles to be sent against adverse vessels in order to set them on fire.

Fire Up (To). To become indignant or angry.

Fire and Sword. Letters of fire and sword. If a criminal resisted the law and refused to answer his citation, it was accounted treason in the Scottish courts; and "letters of fire and sword" were sent to the sheriff, authorising him to use either or both these instruments to apprehend the contumacious party.

Fire and Water. I will go through fire and water to save you. The reference is the ordeals of fire and water which might be transferred to substitutes. Paul seems to refer to substituteional death in Rom. v. 7: "Sparely for a righteous man will one die; yet for a good man some would even dare to die."

Fire as a Rock. (See Similes.)

First-class Hard Labour. Under this sentence, the prisoner sleeps on a plank bed without a mattress, and spends six or eight hours a day turning a hard crank, or treading a wheel. (See SECOND-CLASS HARD LABOUR.)

First-fruits. The first profitable results of labour. In husbandry, the first corn that is cut at harvest. We also use the word in an evil sense; as, the first-fruits of sin, the first-fruits of repentance.

First Water. A diamond of the first water. (See DIAMOND.)

First Gentleman of Europe. A nickname given to George IV., who certainly was first in rank, but it would be sad indeed to think he was ever the most gentlemanly man in feeling, manners, and deportment. Louis d'Artois was so called also.

First Grenadier of France. A title given by Napoleon to Latour d'Arbergue (1745-1800).

First Stroke is Half the Battle. "Well begun is half done." "A good laisher is half the slave."

Latin: "In vico; dimulum facti est commune."

French: "Berce bien noir cuence est morte faite. Heureux commencement est la moitie de l'oeuvr."

C'est que le premier pas qui compte.

Fish. The French have a remarkable location respecting fish as a food:

"Après poisson, faut est poisson; après poisson, le vin est bon; après poisson, maix est contre-poison."

Fish. The reason why fish are employed as card-counters is from a mis-apprehension of the French word fiche (a five-sou piece). The two points allowed for the "rub" are called in French la fiche de consolation. The Spanish word pez has also a double meaning—a "winning," or a "fish;" pez is the Welsh ysgy, Latin piscis, English fish.

A loose fish. One of loose or dissolute habits. Fish implying a human being is derogatory, but bird is a loving term, as my "bonny bird," etc. Beast is most reproachful, as, "You are a beast."

A pretty kettle of fish. (See KETTLE.)

A queer fish. An eccentric person. (See above, LOOSY FISHER.)

All is fish that comes to my net. "Auri bonus est odor ex te qualitatem," I am willing to deal in anything out of which I can make a profit. I turn everything to some use.

"All fish that cometh to the net."—G. Gascoigne: The Steele Glass (died 1577).

Fish. He eats no fish; he is not a papist: he is an honest man, and one to be trusted. In the reign of Elizabeth papists were opposed to the Government, and Protestants, to show their loyalty, refused to eat fish on Fridays to show they were not papists.

"I do profess... to serve him truly... and to eat no fish."—Shakespeare: King Lear, i. 4. I have other fish to fry; "J'ai bien d'autres affaires en tête," "Ayant mihi est agendum;" I am busy and cannot attend to [that] now; I have other matters to attend to.

Mute as a fish. Fish have no language like birds, beasts, and insects. Their utmost power of sound is a feeble cry of pain, the result of intestinal respiration. The French also say "mute comme un poisson."

The best fish swarm when they are three days old; "L'hôte et le poisson sont passés trois jours." "Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour's house, lest he get weary of thee, and so hate thee." (Prov. xxv. 17). "Don't outstay your welcome."

The best fish swim near the bottom, "Le meilleur poisson nage près du fond." What is most commercially valuable is not to be found on the surface of the earth, nor is anything else really valuable to be obtained without trouble. "Il faut cesser le moyen pour en avoir l'amaudn," for "Nul n'ont magnus vita labore dedit mortificant."
scramble for personal advantage in the tumult of rebellion, revolution, or national calamity.

Fish it Out (The). This is the Latin expriemt.

Fish out of Water. Out of place; without one's usual occupation; restless from lack of employment.

Fisher of Souls (The great). The devil.

"I trust, young man, that neither idleness nor licentious pleasure . . . the chief baits with which the great Fisher of souls conceals his hooks, are the causes of your deserting the career to which I would invite you."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xi.

Fisherman. The fisherman who was father of three kings. Abu Shujah al Bouyah was a Persian fisherman in the province of Dehli, whose three sons, Imad, Ruken, and Moez, all rose to sovereign power.

Fishing. Fishing for compliments. Laying a bait for praise.

Fisk (in Huddeese) was Nicholas. Fisk, a physician and astrologer, who used to say that a physician never deprived his bread til he had no teeth to eat it. In his old age he was almost a beggar.

Fitz (Norman). Son of: as Fitz-Herbert, Fitz-William, Fitz-Peter, etc. It is sometimes applied to illegitimate children, as Fitz-Clarence, Fitz-roy, etc.

Fitz-Fulke (Heb). "A gracious, graceful, graceless grace;" "fat, fair, and forty." (Byron: Don Juan, canto xvi.)

Fitzwilliam Museum (Cambridge University). So called from Earl Fitzwilliam, who left £100,000, with books, paintings, etc., to form the nucleus of a museum for the benefit of the university.

Five. or the pentad, the great mystic number, being the sum of 2 + 3, the first even and first odd compound. Unity is God alone, i.e. without creation. Two is diversity, and three (being 1 + 2) is the compound of unity and diversity, or the two principles in operation since creation, and representing all the powers of nature.

Five-minute Clause. A provision sometimes inserted in deeds of separation, whereby it is stipulated that the deed is null and void if the husband and wife remain together five minutes after the separation is enjoined.

Five Nations (The). The five confederated Indian tribes, viz. the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas. Known as the Iroquois Confederacy.

Five Points (The). (See Calvinism.)

Five Wits. (1) Common sense, (2) imagination, (3) fantasy, (4) estimation, and (5) memory. Common sense is the outcome of the five senses; imagination is the "wit" of the mind; fantasy is imagination united with judgment; estimation estimates the absolute, such as time, space, locality, and so on; and memory is the "wit" of recalling past events. (See Seven Wits.)

"Four of his five wits went halting off." Shakespeare: Much Ado, etc., i. 1.

"These are the five wits remaining inwardly: First, 'Common Witte,' and then 'Imagination,' "Fantasy,' and 'Estimation' truly, and 'Memory.'"—Steph. Hawes: The Famous Tyrant Plutarch (1521).

"Notwithstanding this quotation, probably the Five Wits mean the wits of the five senses.

Fiver (4). A five-pound note. A "tenner" is a ten-pound note.

Fives. A game similar to court-tennis; the hand, however, is used instead of a racket. Said to be so called because the game is three fives (15).

"He forgot that cricket and fives are capital training for tennis."—F. Hughes: Tom Brown at Oxford, chap. ii.

A bunch of fives. The fist, in which the five fingers are bound in a bunch.

Fix. I'm in a fix. A predicament. The allusion is to machinery which will not move. The Northumber-land was in a terrible fix at the launch, when it refused to leave the dock. (1866.)

Fixed Air. Carbonic dioxide gas. Dr. Black gave it this name, because carbonate of magnesia evolved by heat carbonic acid, that is, MgO, CO₂ evolved CO₂, thereby proving that CO₂ (carbonic acid) is a "fixed air."

Fixed Oils. Oils obtained by simple pressure. These oils do not readily dry or volatilise, but remain fixed in their oily character.

Fixed Stars. Stars whose relative position to other stars is fixed or always the same. Planets are always shifting their relative positions.

First (The). That is, the Firmament. According to the Ptolemaic System, the earth is surrounded by nine spheres. These spheres are surrounded by the Primum Mobile (or First Moved); and the Flag and Flaccus

Flag. (Danish, flag) A black flag is the emblem of piracy or of no quarter. (See Black Flags) To unfurl the black flag To declare war. The curtain which used to hang before the door of Ayeshah, Mahomet's favourite wife, was taken for a national flag, and is regarded by Musulmans as the most precious of relics. It is black, and is never unfolded except as a declaration of war.

A red flag. To display a red flag is to defy or dare to battle. Red is the emblem of blood. The Roman signal for battle.

Flag signals (5). To display these flag signals contagious disease on board ship. To set one's flag To become an admiral. Formerly the captain of a flag ship was called a "flag-officer".

I do not believe that the latitude is lost that is to deprive of life. In 1812, when the British flag was hoisted, I stood in the ship "American" and revolved the union downwards.

To hang the flag half mast high is in token of mourning or distress.

To hang out the white flag. To sue for quarter, to give in.

To raise one's flag To eat humble pie to eat the leek, to confess oneself in the wrong, to eat one's own words.

The Expression: The anniversary of the Union Act or the anniversary of the Union Flag. The Union Jack is raised at high tide. (7th July.) To strike the flag. To lower it or pull it down upon the cap of respect or submission. In naval warfare it means to surrender.

Flag, Flags. Banners of State. Flags smaller than standards and not at the extremity. Royal Banners contain the Red Cross, surrounded by large and smaller plant ensigns, and at the extremity. A standard has no armorial bearings.

Barge. A small flag with the hose and chief like a < Pennant. A small triangular flag. Pennons much smaller than standards, are hoisted at the extremity and charged with arms.

Banerole. A panel of great width with representing arms and devices.

Peacock small flags shaped like the vane on windmills.

Flag Lieutenant (A). An admiral's aide-de-camp.

Flag-officer. Either an admiral, vice-admiral, rear-admiral, or commodore. These officers alone are privileged to carry a flag denoting rank. Admirals carry their flag at the main, vice-admirals at the fore, and rear-admirals at the mizen. (See Admiral.)

Flag-ship. A ship carrying a flag officer. (See Admiral.)

Flag Signals (on railroads) White in all right; Red is all wrong. Give it a go cautiously bowing along.

Flag's Down (The). Indicative of distress. When the face is pale the "flag is down." Alluding to the ancient custom of taking down the flag of theatres during Lent, when the theatres were closed.

Flagellants. A sect of enthusiasts in the middle of the thirteenth century, who went in procession about the streets menacing on themselves dailyflagellations, in order to merit thereby the favour of God. They were put down soon after their appearance, but revived in the fourteenth century. Also called "Brothers of the Cross."
ardebat Algerin;" and Horace (Epoch xiii, 9), "Arbit Anacreon Bathyillo."

Flaming. Superb, captivating, attractive. The French flambant. This word was originally applied to those persons who dressed themselves in rich dresses "flaming" with gold and silver thread. We now speak of a "flaming advertisement," etc.

"Le velour, trop commun en France,
Sous toto rprend son oicial honneur,
Tellement que la remunance
Nous a fait voir la difference
Du velat et de son Seigneur,
Et du muguet chargé du sceau,
Qui à ses princes s'escalait,
Et riche en draps de soye, allait
Paisant charmer toute la voie.

Canon : Au Roy Henri III. (1548.)"

Flaming Swords. Swords with a wary or flasuboyant edge, generally used for state purposes. The Dukes of Burgundy carried swords of this sort, and they were worn in our country till the accession of William III.

Flamin'ian Way. The great northern road of ancient Italy, constructed by C. Flaminius, and beginning at the Flaminian gate of Rome, and leading to Ariminum (Rimini).

Flanders (Moll). The chief character of De Foe's novel of the same name. She runs through the whole career of female profligacy, then turns religious.

Flanders' Babies. The wooden jointed dolls common in the early part of the nineteenth century, and now almost entirely superseded by "wax dolls."

Flanders' Mare (The). So Henry VIII. called Anne of Cleves. She died at Chelsea in 1537.

Flaneur (French). A loungier, gosiper. From flanier, to saunter about.

Flap-dragons. Small combustible bodies blazing at one end and floating in a glass of liquor. The liquor was stirred about with a candle-end to promote combustion. A skilful toper would swallow them blazing, as we swallow the blazing raisins of snap-dragons.

"He drinks off candles' ends for flap-dragons."
—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV, II, 4.

Flare-up. A sudden outburst of anger; a gase-jet or other ignitable body flares up when lighted with a sudden blaze.

Flare-up (A). A rumpus or row. Also a banquet or jovial treat. The first meaning is simply the substantive of the verb. The second meaning refers to dazzle and "splendour" displayed.

Flash. A mere flash in the pan. All sound and fury, signifying nothing; like the attempt to discharge a gun that ends with a flash in the look-pan, the gun itself "hanging fire."

Flash Men and Flash Notes. Between Buxton, Leek, and Macclesfield is a wild country called the Flash, from a chapel of that name. Here used to live a set of pedlars, who hawked about buttons, ribbons, and other articles made at Leek, together with handkerchiefs and small wares from Manchester. They were known on the road as Flash-men, and frequented fairs and farmhouses. They paid, at first, ready-money; but when they had established a credit, paid in promissory notes, which were rarely honoured. They were ultimately put down by the magistracy.

Flat. One who is not sharp; a suite of rooms on one floor.

"Oh, Messner... what thin are you!"—The Times.

"He said he was going to have a flat to let on the top floor."—Howells: Hours of New Fortunes, vol. i. part i. p. 123.

Flat as a flounder. I knocked him down flat as a flounder. A flounder is one of the flat-fish.

Flat as a pancake. Quite flat. A pancake is a thin flat cake, fried in a pan.

Flat-fish. He is a regular flat-fish. A dull, stupid fellow, not up to anything. The play is upon flat (stupid), and such fish as plaice, dabs, and soles.

Flat Milk. Skimmed milk, that is, milk "fleatted" (Anglo-Saxon, flét, cream; Latin, flatus lactis.)

Flat Race (A). A race on the flat or level ground without obstacles.

Flat Simplicity. "The flat simplicity of that reply was admirable." (Colley Cibber: The Crooked Husband, i. 1.)

Flatterer. Vitellius, the Roman synonym of flatterer. (Tacitus, Ann. vi. 32.)

Flatterers. When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner. Flattery is so pernicious, so fills the heart with pride and conceit, so perverts the judgment and disturbs the balance of the mind, that Satan himself could do no greater mischief. He may go to dinner and leave the leaven of wickedness to operate its own mischief.

"Porteus, there is a proverb thou shouldst read; When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner."
—Peter Pendar: Nil Admirari.

Play a Fox (To). To vomit.

"At the time of the paroxysm he used to play a fox by way of antidote."—Bulfinch: Pandemonium.
Flea. When the Princess Badoura was placed on Prince Camaralzaman’s bed, in order to compare their claims to beauty, the fairy Maimouné changed herself into a flea, and bit the prince on the neck in order to awake him. Next, the genius Danhasch changed himself into a flea and bit the princess on the lip, that she might open her eyes and see the prince. (Arabian Nights; Cameraalzaman and Badoura.)

Flea as a parasite.

Buttes clearly proves that every creature lives in a state of war by nature,
No naturalists observe a flea
Has smaller fleas that on him prey
And these have smaller still to bite ’em,
And so proceed ad infinitum.

Swift: Poetry; A Rhapsody.

Sent off with a flea in his ear. Peremptorily. A dog which has a flea in the ear is very restless, and runs off in terror and distress. In French: Motte à quelqu’un puce à l‘oreille. Probably our change of word implies a pun.

Flea-bite. It is a mere flea-bite. A thing of no moment. Thus, a merchant who has suffered loss by speculation or failure might say that the loss is a mere flea-bite to him. A soldier might call a wound a mere flea-bite. A passing inconvenience which annoys but leaves no permanent injury. Mr. Damneli spoke of the national debt as a mere flea-bite.

Flea’s Jump. Aristophanès, in the Clouds, says that Socrates and Chærephon tried to measure how many times its own length a flea jumped. They took in wax the size of a flea’s foot; then, on the principle of ex prole Herculem, calculated the length of its body. Having found this, and measured the distance of the flea’s jump from the hand of Socrates to Chærephon, the knotty problem was resolved by simple multiplication.

Fleance (2 syl.). Son of Banquo. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

Fléche. Faire fléche de tout bœuf. To turn every event into a cause of censure. To make whatever wood falls in your path an arrow to discharge at your adversary.

Flecnoes (Richard). An Irish priest, who printed a host of poems, letters, and travels. As a poet, his name, like the names of Medius and Badius among the Romans, is proverbial for vileness. Dry.

Fledgeby (2 syl.). An over-reaching, cowardly sneak, who conceals his dirty bill-broking under the trade name of Puseby & Co. He is soundly thrashed by Alfred Lammle, and quietly pockets the affront. (Dickens: Mutual Friend.)

Flee the Falcon (7½). To let fly the small cannon.

"I’ll flee the falcon! (so the small cannon was called) I’ll flee the falcon... my centre, she’ll ruffle their feathers for them" [i.e. the insurgents]—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. 71.

Fleeced (1 syl.). Cheated of one’s money; shaved like a sheep.

Fleet Book Evidence. No evidence at all. The books of the Old Fleet prison are not admissible as evidence to prove a marriage. (Wharton: Law Dictionary.)

Fleet Marriages. Clandestine marriages, at one time performed without banns or licence by nosey chaplains, in Fleet Prison, London. As many as thirty marriages a day were sometimes celebrated in this disgraceful manner; and Malcolm tells us that 2,951 were registered in the four months ending with February 12th, 1705. Suppressed by the Marriage Act in 1751. (See Chaplain of the Fleet, by Besant and Rice.)

Fleet Street (London). For 200 years after the Conquest London was watered on the west by “the river of Wolls,” afterwards called “Fleet dyke, because (Stowe says) it runneth past the Fleece.” In the middle of the city and falling into the Thames was Wellbrookes; on the east side, Langbourne; and in the western suburbs, Oldbourne. Along the Fleece and Oldbourne “ships” used to ply with merchandise. These four, together with the Roding, the Lea, the Ravensbourne, and the Wandle, now serve as sewers to the great metropolis.

Fleet of the Desert. A caravan.

Flemish Account. A sum less than that expected. In Antwerp accounts were kept in bruws, sols, and penes; but the bruws or pound was only 12s. In Notes and Queries we have an example of a Flemish account, where £373 Flemish becomes £212 2s. 10d. English.

Flemish School. A school of painting established by the brothers Van Eyck, in the fifteenth century. The chief early masters were Memling, Weyden, Matsys, Mabus, and More. Of the second period, Rubens and Vandyck, Snyders, Jordaens, Gasper de Crayer, and the younger Teniers.
Flesh and Blood. Human nature; as "Flesh and blood cannot stand it."

Flesh-pots. Singing for the flesh-pots of Egypt. Hankering for good things no longer at your command. The children of Israel said they wished they had died "when they sat by the flesh-pots of Egypt" (Exodus xvi. 3)—i.e. when they sat watching the boilers which contained the meat they were to have for dinner. The expression also means abundance of appetising food.

Fleshed. He fleshed his sword. Used it for the first time. Men fleshed in cruelty—i.e. initiated or used to it. A sportsman's expression. When a sportsman wishes to encourage a young dog or hawk, he will allow it to have the first game it catches for its own eating. This "flesh" is the first it has tasted, and fleshing its tooth thus gives the creature a craving for similar food. Hence, also, to eat with avidity.

"The wild dog shall flesh his tooth on every innocent."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., i. 5.

Fleeshly School (The). A class of "realistic" British poets, such as Swinburne, Rossetti, Morris, etc. So called by Thomas Maitland [R. Buchanan] in the Contemporary Review.

Fleets. An excellent treatise on the common law of England, written in the fourteenth century by an unknown writer while a prisoner in the Fleet.

Fleurs-de-Lis. A corruption of Fleur-de-Liue. (See FLAG.) In Italian the white iris is called fiorililma. Made thus.

"They may give the dozen white lilies In their coat."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, i. 1.

Fleurs-de-Lys. In the reign of Louis VII. (1137-1180) the national standard was thickly charged with flowers. In 1365 the number was reduced by Charles VI. to three (the mystical church number). Guerchin, in his Display of Heraldry, 1611, says the device is "Three toads erect, saltant:"

in allusion to which Nostradamus, in the sixteenth century, calls Frenchmen crapauds (toads). Recently it has been thought that the device is really a "bee flying," because certain ornaments resembling bees were found in the tomb of Childeric, father of Clovis, when it was opened in 1653. These bees are now generally believed to be the neurons of horse-trappings, and quite independent of the emblem.

The fleur-de-lis or lily-flower was chosen by Flavio Gioja to mark the north point of the compass, out of compliment to the King of Naples, who was of French descent (1302).

Flibbertigibbet. One of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom." Shakespeare got it from Bishop Harsnet's account of the Spanish invasion, where we are told of forty fiends which the Jesuits cast out, and among the number was Flibbertigibbet. Shakespeare says he "is the fiend of mopping and mowing, who possesses chambermaids and waiting women" (King Lear, iv. 2). And, again, that he "begins at curfew and walks till the first cock," giving men pins and needles, squint eyes, haro-lips, and so on. (Shakespeare: Lear, iii. 4.)

Flic (French). A policeman or serjeant de ville. "Une allusion à l'épée des sergents de ville, ou plutôt aux flèches des archers primitifs" (Raille). Hence "flic-face," thumps and thwacks.

Flick. To strike with a quick jerk. To "flick a whip in one's face" is to strike the face with the lash and draw the whip suddenly back again. (Anglo-Saxon, flecesian; Scotch, flicker; Danish, flickeren, to twinkle, etc.)

Fli's. (See FLX.)

Fling.
I must have a fling at .... Throw a stone at something. To attack with words, especially sarcastically. To make a haphazard venture. Allusion is to hurling stones from slings.

To have his fling. To live on the loose for a time. To fling about his time and money like "ducks and drakes."

"If he is young, he desires to have .... his 'Fling' before he is compelled to settle down."—Nineteenth Century (February, 1887, p. 291.)

Fling Herself at my Head (To). To make desperate love to a man; to angle obviously to catch a certain individual for a husband.

"Come, child," said Lance; "why, twas last night the whole family saw her .... fling herself at my head."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, ch. vii.

Fli's (a stone). An idol of the ancient Vandals settled in Lusace. It was a huge stone, draped, wearing a lion's skin over its shoulders, and designed to represent death. Mr. Lower says that the town of Flint in North Wales is named in honour of this stone deity, and gives Alwin Flint in Suffolk as another example. (Pat. Brit.)

The Welsh call Flint Flint Yeg-tingi (Flin's beautiful band or girdle).
Flint. To skin a flint. To act meanly, and exact the uttermost farthing.

Flint Implements. Arrow-heads, axe-heads, lance-heads, and knives, made of granite, jade, serpentine, jasper, basalt, and other hard stones. The first were discovered on the banks of the Somme, near Amiens and Abbeville, but others have been discovered in Belgium, Germany, Italy, etc. They were the rude instruments of men before the use of metal was known.

Flint Jack. Edward Simpson, an occasional servant of Dr. Young, of Whitby. So called because he used to tramp the kingdom vending spurious fossils, flint arrow-heads, stone celts, and other imitation antiquities. Professor Tennant charged him with forging these wares, and in 1867 he was sent to prison for theft.

Flipper. Tip to your flipper. Give me your hand. A flipper is the paddle of a turtle.

Flirt. A coquette. The word is from the verb flirt, as, "to flirt a fan." The fan being used for coquetting, those who coquetted were called fan-flirts. Lady Frances Shirley, the favourite of Lord Chesterfield, introduced the word. Flirt is allied to flutter, fit, jerk, etc.

Fittermouse. A bat. South calls the bat a flinder-mouse. (German, flödermaus.)

Flo (Old French). A crowd. (Latin, fluctum.)

"Puis lui tranmav par bailz onverse Grand fio d'Anglejo de fer couverze." Guillaume Guinet, 1602.

Floated (Stock Exchange term). Brought out (said of a loan or company), as the Turkish '69 Loan was floated by the Cohens. The French 6 per cent. was floated by the Morgan.

Flooters (Stock Exchange term). Exchequer bills and other unfunded stock. (See STOCK EXCHANGE SLANG.)

Floating Academy. The hulks.

Flogging the Dead-Horse. Trying to revive an interest in a subject out of date. Bright said that Earl Russell's "Reform Bill" was a "dead horse," and every attempt to create any enthusiasm in its favour was like "flogging the dead horse."

Flagged by Deputy. When Henri IV. of France abjured Protestantism and was received into the Catholic Church, in 1598, two ambassadors were sent to Rome who knelt in the portico of St. Peter, and sang the Misere. At each verse a blow with a switch was given on their shoulders.

Flood. The almost universal tradition of the East respecting this catastrophe is that the waters were boiling hot. (See the Talmud, the Targums, the Koran, etc.)

Floor. I floored him. Knocked him down on the floor; hence, to overcome, beat or surpass. Thus, we say at the university, "I floored that paper, i.e., answered every question on it."

I floored that problem—did it perfectly, or made myself master of it.

Floorer. That was a floorer. That blow knocked the man down on the floor. In the university we say, "That paper or question was a floorer;" meaning it was too hard to be mastered. (See above.)

Flora. Flowers; all the vegetable productions of a country or of a geological period, as the flora of England, the flora of the coal period. Flora was the Roman goddess of flowers.

"Another Flora there, of hollower hue,
And richer sweets beyond our garden's pride." Thomson: Summer.

The animals of a period or country are called the Fauna; hence, the phrase the Flora and the Fauna of... signifies all its vegetable and animal productions.

Metropolis of Flora. Aranjuez, in Spain, is so called, from its many beautiful gardens.

Flora's Dial. A dial formed by flowers which open or close at stated hours.

I. Dial of flowers which open—

(a) The first twelve hours.

A. N. O.

1. (Scandinavian: Southwistle closes.)
2. Yellow (sea's head.
8. Scarlet Pimpernel; Mouse-ear Hawkweed: and Pheasant's Pint.
11. Star of Bethlehem.
12. Snow-ice Plant.
Day, and on account of the richness and quantity of flowers, called the new possession "Florida."

Florimel [honey-flower]. A damsel of great beauty, but so timid that she feared the "smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor," and was abused by everyone. Her form was simulated by a witch out of wax, but the wax image melted, leaving nothing behind except the girdle that was round the waist. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii. 4, 8; iv. 11, 12.)

"Florimel loved Marinel, but Proteus cast her into a dunceum, from which, being released by the order of Neptune, she married the man of her choice."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iv.

"St. Amand had long since in bitterness repented of a transient infatuation, had long since distinguished the true Florimel from the false."—Sir E. B. Lytton: Pilgrimage of the Rhine, iii.

Florimel's Girdle gave to those who could wear it "the virtue of chaste love and wifehood true;" but if any woman not chaste and faithful put it on, it "loosed or tore asunder." It was once the cestus of Venus, made by her husband Vulcan; but when she wanted with Mars it fell off, and was left on the "Acids'ian mount." (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iv. 11, 12.)

Florin. An English coin representing 2s., or the tenth of a sovereign, issued in 1849. Camden informs us that Edward III. issued gold florins worth 6s., in 1337. The word is generally supposed to be derived from Florence; but as it had a lily on one side, probably it is connected with the Latin flos, a flower. (See Graceless Florin.)

Florisan'do. One of the knights in the Spanish version of Am'adis of Gaul, whose exploits and adventures are recounted in the 6th and following books. This part of the romance was added by Paez de Ribe'ra.

Flor'isel of Nice'a. A knight whose exploits and adventures form a supplemental part of the Spanish version of Am'adis of Gaul. This part was added by Felic'a-no de Silva.

Flor'is'mart. One of Charlie'magne's paladins, and the bosom friend of Roland.

Flor'is'el. Prince of Bohemia, in love with Per'dita. (Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.)

Florizel. George the Fourth, when prince, corresponded under this name with Mrs. Robinson, actress and poet, generally known as Per'dita, that being the character in which she first attracted the prince's attention.
Flotsam and Jetson

Prince Florizel, in Lord Beaconsfield's novel of Endymion (1880), is meant for Napoleon III.

Flotsam and Jetson. Waifs found in the sea or on the shore. "Flotsam," goods found floating on the sea after a wreck. "Jetson," or Jetsam, things thrown out of a ship to lighten it. (Anglo-Saxon, Jetson, to float; French, jeter, to throw out.) (See LiGAN.)

Flower Games. Fêtes held at Toulouse, Barcelonà, Treviso, and other places, where the prizes given consisted of flowers.

Flower Sermon. A sermon preached on Whit Monday in St. Catherine Cree, when all the congregation wear flowers. Flower sermons are now (1894) preached very generally once a year, especially in country churches. Every person is supposed to bring a bunch of flowers to the altar, and the flowers next day are sent to some hospital.

Flower of Chivalry. A name given to several characters: e.g., William Douglas, Lord of Liddesdale, in the fourteenth century.

Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586). Chevalier de Bayard (le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche) (1470-1524).

Flower of Kings. Arthur is so called by John of Exeter. (Sixth century.)

Flower of Paradise. The Ipoméa or Camalita, called by Sir W. Jones "Love's creeper." It symbolises that mythological plant which fulfils all desire.

Flower of the Levant. Zante, noted for its beauty and fertility. "Zan-tè! Zante, flos di Levanti."

Flowers and Trees.

N.B.—The laurel, oak, myrtle, rosemary, myrtles, and amaranth are all funeral plants.

Flowers and Trees with Christian Traditions.

The Aspen leaf is said to tremble because the cross was made of Aspenwood.

Ah! tremble, tremble, Aspen-tree,
We need not ask thee why thou shakest,
For, as holy legend saith,
On thee the Saviour bled to death,
No wonder, Aspen, that thou quakest;
And till in judgment all assemble,
The leaves accursed shall wail and tremble.

The dwarf elder is called in Wales "the plant of the Blood of Man."

The wallflower is known in Palestine as the "Blood-drops of Christ."

The following are also said to owe their stained blossoms to the blood which trickled from the cross:—

The red anemone; the arum; the purple orchis; the crimson-spotted leaves of the roodsker (a French tradition); the spotted persicaria, snake-weed. (See Christian Traditions.)

Flowers at Funerals. The Greeks crowned the dead body with flowers, and placed flowers on the tomb also. The Romans decked the funeral couch with leaves and flowers, and spread flowers, wreaths, and fillets on the tomb of friends. When Sulla was buried as many as 2,000 wreaths were sent in his honour. Most of our funeral customs are derived from the Romans; as dressing in black, walking in procession, carrying insignia on the bier, raising a mound over the grave, called tumulus, whence our tomb.

Flowered Robes. In ancient Greece a woman wore flowered robes. was to imply that she was a fille publique. Solon made it a law that virtuous women should appear in simple and modest apparel, but that harlots should always dress in flashy or flowered robes.

"As fugitive slaves are known by their manners, so flowered garments indicate one of the demi-monde [letracée]."—Clemens of Alexandria.

Flowing Philosophers. The followers of Heraclitus, referred to by Plato as ὀδοὺς πέφρωνς (Theaetetus, 181 A). Heraclitus denied the permanency of everything in nature except change. Tennyson has a poem entitled "On πέφρωνς.

Fluellen. A Welsh captain and great pedant, who, amongst other learned quiddities, attempted to draw a parallel between Henry V. and Alexander the Great; but when he had said that one was born at Monmouth and the other at Macedon, both beginning with the same letter, and that there was a river in both cities, he had exhausted his best parallelisms. (Henry V., iv. 7.)

"His parallel is, in all essential circumstances, as incorrect as that which Fluellen drew between Macedon and Monmouth."—Lord Macaulay.

Fluke. Hap-hazard. In billiards it means playing for one thing and getting another. Hence an advantage gained by luck more than by skill or judgment. (German, glück, chance, our luck.)

"We seem to have discovered, as it were by a fluke, a most excellent rule for all future cabinet arrangements."—The Times.

Flummery. Flattering nonsense, palaver. In Wales it is a food made of oatmeal steeped in water and kept till it has become sour. In Cheshire and Lancashire it is the prepared skin of oatmeal mixed with honey, ale, or milk; pap; blanc-mange. (Welsh, liwny, wash-brew, from liwn, sour or sharp.)

"You came... with your red coats and flashing buttons... and her head got turned with your flummery."—Shawe: The Posthouse, chap. xix.

Flummux (7b). To bamboozle; to deceive; to be in a quandary. "I am regularly flummuxed."—i.e. perplexed. The first syllable is probably a variant of flaw, humbug, deception, and the word seems to be compounded on the model of the word "perplex.

"For the privates, the sergeants, and spectors, she flummuxed them all to a comic."

Sinc: Dupont Bullard (Mall Jaws).

Flummuxed. The mark set on a street, gatepost, house, etc., as a warning to fellow-vagabonds not to go near, for fear of being given in charge.

Flunkey. A livery servant. (Old French, flanquier, a henchman.)

Flur. The bride of Cas'avelan, "for whose love the Roman Cesar first invaded Britain." (Tennyson: Enid.)

Flush (4), in cards, means a whole hand of one suit, as a "flush of clubs," a "flush of hearts," etc. (See below.)

Flush of Money. Full of money. Similarly A flush of water means a sudden and full flow of water. (Latin, flus-us.)

"Start was not very flush in [the] ready."—Dr. Arbuthnot.

Flute. The Magic Flute, an opera by Mozart (Die Zauberflöte). The "flute" was bestowed by the powers of darkness, and had the power of inspiring love. Unless purified the love was only lust, but, being purified by the Powers of Light, it subserved the holiest purposes. Tamino and Pamina are guided by it through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of Divine Truth.

Flutter. A very weak specimen of a top, in the Belle's Stratagem, by Mrs. Cowley.

Flutter the Dovecoots (7b). To disturb the equanimity of a society. The phrase occurs in Coriolanus.

"The important movement in favour of a general school of law fluttered the dovecoets of the Inner Court."—Nineteenth Century (Nov., 1879, p. 477).

Fly (plural flies). A hackney coach, a cab. A contraction of Fly-by-night, as sedan chairs on wheels used to be called in the regency. These "Fly-by-nights," patronised greatly by George, Prince of Wales, and his boon companions, during their wild night pranks at Brighton, were invented 1809 by John Butter, a carpenter of Jew Street.

"In the morning we took, a fly, an English term for an exceedingly shabby vehicle, and drove it to the Minister's."—Hutchinson: Old House (Pilgrimage to Old House, p. 171).

Fly (plural flies). An insect. All flies shall perish except one, and that is the bee-fly. (Koran.) A Fly has three eyes and two compound eyes, each of which has 4,000 facets.

The god of flies. In the temple of Actium the Greeks used to sacrifice annually an ox to the god of flies. Pliny tells us that at Rome sacrifice was offered to flies in the temple of Hercules Victor. The Syrians undoubtedly offered sacrifice to the same tiny tormentors. It is said that no fly was ever seen in Solomon's temple.

Acras, god of the Cyrenians, to whom, according to Pliny, they offered sacrifice.
Fly-boy

APOMYSIS, a surname given by the Cypriots to Zeus, for delivering Heracles (Hercules) from flies during Marathon. Sacrifices were yearly offered to Zeus Apomysis. (Greek, apo-mysia, from flies.)

BELEREU, or BELEREN (Prince of Piles), was one of the principal Syrian gods, to whom sacrifice was offered in all occasions.

BUODORUS, in Roman mythology, (Abud li u. 3.) MYALOR (the fly-chaser), one of the deities of the Arcadians and Eleusins. (Paus. x. 26.) (Greek, mya, a fly, apa, taken in hunting or chasing.)

Flies in amber. (See under Amber.)

To crush a fly on a wheel. Making a mountain of a mole-hill. Taking a wheel used for torturing criminals and heretics for killing a fly, which one might destroy with a flapper.

Fly on the coach-wheel (A). One who fancies himself of mighty importance, but who is in reality of none at all. The allusion is to the fable of a fly sitting on a chariot-wheel and saying, "See what a dust we make!"

Not a fly with him. Domitian, the Roman emperor, was fond of catching flies, and one of his slaves, being asked if the emperor was alone, wittily replied, "Not a fly with him."

To rise to the fly. To be taken in by a hoax, as a fish rises to a false fly and is caught.

"He [the professor] rose to the fly with a charming simplicity." Grant Allen: "He Mytcham Occurrence in Piccadilly," p. 11.

Fly-boy. The boy in a printing-office who lifts the printed sheets off the press.

He is called the fly-boy because he catches the sheets as they fly from the tympan (q.v.) immediately the frisket (q.v.) is opened. This is now generally performed by the pressmen.

Fly a Kite (7b). To send a begging letter to persons of a charitable reputation, or in easy circumstances, to solicit pecuniary aid, urging poverty, losses, or sickness as an excuse. (See Kite-flying.)

Fly-by-night (A). One who defrauds his creditors by decamping at night-time. (See Fly.)

Fly in One's Face (7b). To get into a passion with a person; to insult; as a hawk, when irritated, flies in the face of its master.

Fly in the Face of Danger (7b). To run in a foolhardy manner into danger, as a hen flies in the face of a dog or cat.

Fly in the Face of Providence (7b). To act rashly, and throw away good opportunities; to court danger.

Fly Open (7b). To open suddenly, as "the doors flew open," "les portes s'ouvrirent," as they do sometimes by the force of the wind.

Fly Out at (7b). To burst or break into a passion. The Latin, irruere in . . . "Poor cholera! Sir Ruan would it: cut at his coachman, his butler, or his gamekeeper, and use language . . . which . . . from any other wretch, would have brought about a prompt resignation,"—Good Words, 1897.

Flying Colours (To come off with). In triumph; with the flags unfurled and flying.

Flying Dutchman. A spectral ship, seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and considered ominous of ill-luck. Sir Walter Scott says she was originally a vessel laden with precious metal, but a horrible murder having been committed on board, the plague broke out among the crew, and no port would allow the vessel to enter. The ill-fated ship still wanders about like a ghost, doomed to be sea-tossed, but never more to enjoy rest. Captain Marryat has a novel called The Phantom Ship.

Flying without Wings (No). Nothing can be done without the proper means.

"Saxa pennae volatula factae est."—Plautus.

Flyman's Plot (The). In theatrical language, means a list of all the articles required by the flyman in the play produced. The flyman is the scene-shifter, or the "man in the flies."

Fog-ator. A white bow in the clouds during foggy weather is so called. Such a bow was seen in England during January, 1888. A week preceding, the weather had been clear, sunny, and genial, then followed several days of thick fog, during which the white bow appeared. The bow was followed by several days of brilliant mild weather.

Fogey or Fogey. An old fogey. Properly an old military pensioner. This term is derived from the old pensioners of Edinburgh Castle, whose chief occupation was to fire the guns, or assist in quelling street riots. (Allied to fogat, phogat, yogat, foged, fogey, etc.)

"What has the world come to [said Thackeray] . . . when two token-nosed old foges like you and me sit talking about love to each other?"—Trollope: W. M. Thackeray, chap. i. p. 61.

Fo-hi or FO-I. One of the chief deities of the Chinese. His mother, Moci, was walking one day along a river bank, when she became suddenly encircled by a rainbow, and at the end of twelve years was the mother of a son. During gestation she dreamed that she was pregnant with a white elephant, and hence the honours paid to this beast. (Asiatic Researches.)

Foil. That which sets off something to advantage. The allusion is to the metallic leaf used by jewellers to set off precious stones. (French, feuille; Latin, folium; Greek, phyllon, a leaf.)

"Hector, as a foil to set him off." Brome.

"My skill shall, like a star, the darkest night, Stick foily off indeed." Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 2.

He foiled me. He outwitted me.

"If I be foiled, there is but one ashamed who never was practised."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, i. 2.

To run a foil. To puzzle; to lead astray. The track of game is called its foil; and an animal hunted will sometimes run back over the same foil in order to mislead its pursuers.

Folio. A book of the largest size, formed by folding the paper only once, so that each sheet makes two leaves. It is from the Italian, un libro in folglio, through the French, in-folio. Fol. is the contraction for folio.

Folio (so-and-so), in mercantile books, means page so-and-so, and sometimes the two pages which lie exposed at the same time, one containing the credit and the other the debit of one and the same account. So called because ledgers, etc., are made in folio. The paging is called the foil also. Printers call a page of MS, or printed matter a foil regardless of size.

Folio. In conveyances seventy-two words, and in Parliamentary proceedings ninety words, make a folio.

Folk. Latin, vulg (the common people); German, volk; Dutch, volck; Saxon, folc; Danish, folk. Folk and vulgar are variants of the same word.

Folk. Fairies, also called "people," "neighbours," "wights." The Germans have their kleine volk (little folk), the Swiss their hill people and earth people.

"The little folk,
So happy and so gay,
Amuse themselves
Sometimes with singing
Sometimes with dancing,
When they jump and spring,
Like the young skipping kids in the Alp-grass." Wynn: Idyll of Gertrude and Roes.

"In the hinder end of harvest, at All-hallow even,
When our good neighbours ride, if I read right,
Some buckled on bannock, and some on a beem." Montgomery: Flying against Fowarts.

"I cruches thee from the elves, and from wights." Chaucer: The Miller's Tale.

Folk-lore. Whatever pertains to a knowledge of the antiquities, superstitions, mythology, legends, customs, traditions, and proverbs of a people. A "folklorist" is one who is more or less acquainted with these matters.

Folk-meeting. A word used in England before the Conquest for what we now call a county or even a parish meeting.

Folks. Goblins of the north of France, who live in the houses of simple rustics, and can be expelled neither by water nor exorcism. They can be heard but are never seen. In the singular number, "esprit follet."

Follow. Follow your nose, go straight on. He followed his nose—he went on and on without any discretion or thought of consequences.

"He who follows truth too closely will have dirt kicked in his face. Be not too strict to pry into abuse, for "odium veritas parvius," "Summum jus suprema injuria."

Followed. A male sweetheart who follows the object of his affections. A word very common among servants. Mistresses say to female servants, "I allow no followers"—i.e. I do not allow men to come into my house to see you. Also a disciple, a partisan.

"The pretty best seruant-maids had their choice of desirable followers."—E. G. Minkel: Crawford, chap. iii. p. 53.

Folly. Father of Folly (Abu Jahl), an aged chief, who led a hundred horse and seven hundred camels against Mahomet and fell at the battle of Bedr. His own people called him Father of Wisdom (Abu Lhorm).

Folly. A fantastic or foolishly extravagant country seat, built for amusement or vainglory. (French, folie.)

"We have in this country a word (namely Folly) which has a technical appropriation to the case of fantastic buildings."—H. Quaincy: Essays on the Poets (Kens., p. 90).

Fisher's Folly. A large and beautiful house in Bishopsgate, with pleasure-gardens, bowling-green, and hot-houses, built by Jasper Fisher, one of the six clerks of Chancery and a Justice of the Peace. Queen Elizabeth lodged there.

"Kirby's castle, and Fisher's folly, Fond. A foolish, fond parent. Here fond does not mean affectionate, but silly. Chaucer uses the word bonne for a simpleton, and the Scotch feu is to play the fool. Shakespeare has "fond desire," "fond love," "fond shekels gold," "fond wretch," "fond madwoman," etc. "Fondling" means an idiot, or one fond.

"See how simple and how fond I am."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 2.
"Fonder than ignorance."
Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 1.

Fons et Origo (Latin). The primary cause. Fox et focus, the instigator, as Juno was the fæx et focus of the Trojan war.

Font, in printing, sometimes called Fonte, a complete set of type of any one size, with all the usual points and accents; a font consists of about 100,000 characters. The word is French, fonte, from fonder (to melt or cast). When a letter of a different type to the rest gets into a page it is called a "wrong font," and is signified in the margin by the two letters uf. (See Type.)

Tucked to the font. Baptised. The font is a vessel employed for baptism.

Fontanaria. Now called Fuenterabia (in Latin, Fons rapidentes), near the Gulf of Gascony. Here, according to Maria'nna and other Spanish historians, Charlemagne and all his chivalry fell by the sword of the Spanish Saracens. Mezeray and the French writers say that, the rear of the king's army being cut to pieces, Charlemagne returned and revenged their death by a complete victory.

"When Charlemagne with all his pageage fell..."
By Fontanaria'

Food. Sir Walter Scott remarks that live cattle go by Saxon names, and slain meat by Norman-French, a standing evidence that the Normans were the lords who ate the meat, and the Saxons the serfs who tended the cattle. Examples:

Sheep Ox Calf Hog Pig (Saxon) Mutton Beef Veal Bacon Pork (Norman-French).

Food of the gods. (See Ambrosia, Nectar.)

Food for Powder. Raw recruits levied in times of war.

Foods and Wines. Gastronomic curiosities.

- Foods.
  - Sterlets from the Volga.
  - Belis from the Tiber.
  - Grenou from Scotland.
  - Bustards from Sweden.
  - Bears' feet from the Black Forest.
  - Bison horns from America.
  - Pilet of beef à la Chateaubriand.
  - Oeufs à la Lascaris.

- Wines.
  - Old Madeira with the soup.
  - Châtelain Filosies with the small dishes.
  - Johannisberger and Picton-Longueville with the roasts.
  - Châtelain-Laflite à la French.
  - Sparkling Moselle with the roast.

Fools. In chess, the French call the "bishop" fou, and used to represent the piece in a fool's dress; hence, Regnier says, "Les fous sont aux échecs les plus proches des Rois" (14 Sat.). Fou is a corruption of the Eastern word Fol (an elephant), as Thomas Hyde remarks in his Latin Orientalibus (i. 4), and on old boards the places occupied by our "bishops" were occupied by elephants. A Tom Fool. A person who makes himself ridiculous. (See Tom.)

"The ancient and noble family of Tom Fool."
- Quarterly Review.

Fool [a food], as gooseberry fool, raspberry fool, means gooseberries or raspberries pressed. (French, fouler; to press.)

Fool Thinks. As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks (Latin, "quod valeat 'evi-dunus facile credimus'"). A foolish person believes what he desires.

Fool in his Sleeve. Every man hath a fool in his sleeve. No one is always wise. The allusion is to the tricks of jugglers.

The winiest fool in Christendom, James I. was so called by Henri IV., but he learnt the phrase of Sully.

Fool or Physician at Forty. Plutarch tells us that Tiberius said "Every man is a fool or his own physician at forty." (Treatise on the Preservation of Health.)

Fools. (French, fol, Latin, follis.)

(1) The most celebrated court fools:

- (a) Dug'ont, jester of King Arthur; Rayère, of Henry I.; Scogan, of Edward IV.; Thomas Killigrew, called "King Charles's jester" (1611-1682); Archie Armstrong, jester in the court of James I. (died 1792).
- (b) Thomas Derrie, jester in the court of James I.
- (c) James Goddes, jester to Mary Queen of Scots. His predecessor was Jenny Colquhoun.
- (d) Patch, the court fool of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII.
- (e) Will Somers, Henry VIII.'s jester. He died 1560.
- (f) W. F. Wallet, jester in the court of Queen Elizabeth.
- (g) Triboulet, jester of Louis XII. and François I. (1487-1563); Brisset, of whom Brantôme says "he never had his equal in repartee" (1512-1563); Chicot, jester of Henri III. and IV. (1553-1591); Longely, of Louis XIII.; and Angeli, of Louis XIV., last of the titled fools of France.
(h) Klaus Narr, jester of Frederick the Wise, elector of Prussia.
(i) Yorick, in the Court of Denmark, referred to by Shakespeare in Hamlet, v. 1.

(2) Not attached to the court:
(a) Patrick Bonny, jester of the regent Morton; John Heywood, in the reign of Henry VII., dramatist, died 1505; Dickie Pearce, fool of the Earl of Suffolk, whose epitaph Swift wrote.
(b) Kunz von der Rosen, private jester to the Emperor Maximilian I.
(c) Gonnella the Italian (g.v.).
(d) Le Glorieux, the jester of Charles le Hardi, of Burgundy.
(e) Patche, Cardinal Wolsey's jester, whom he transferred to Henry VIII. as a most acceptable gift.
(f) Patison, licensed jester to Sir Thomas More. Introduced by Hans Holbein in his picture of the chancellor.

(3) Men worthy of the motley:
(a) Andrew Borde, physician to Henry VIII., usually called Merry Andrew (1500-1549).
(b) Gen. Kyaw, a Saxon officer, famous for his blunt jests.
(c) Jacob Paul, Baron Gundling, who was laden with titles in ridicule by Frederick William I. of Prussia.
(d) Seigni Jean (Old John), so called to distinguish him from Johan "fol de Madame," of whom Marot speaks in his epitaph. Seigni Jean lived about a century before Caillette.
(e) Richard Tarlton, a famous clown in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. He died 1588.
(f) Caillette "flourished" about 1494. In the frontispiece of the "Ship of Fools," printed 1497, there is a picture both of Seigni Jean and also of Caillette.

Feast of Fools. A kind of Saturnalia, popular in the Middle Ages. Its chief object was to honour the ass on which our Lord made His triumphant entry into Jerusalem. This ridiculous mum-mery was held on the day of circumcision (January 1). The office of the day was first chanted in travesty; then, a procession being formed, all sorts of absurdities, both of dress, manner, and instrumentation, were indulged in. An ass formed an essential feature, and from time to time the whole procession imitated the braying of this animal, especially in the place of "Amen."

Fool's Bolt. A fool's bolt is soon shot (Henry V., iii. 7). Simpletons cannot wait for the fit and proper time, but waste their resources in random endeavours; a fool and his money are soon parted. The allusion is to the British bowmen in battle: the good soldier shot with a purpose, but the foolish soldier at random. (See Prov. xix. 11.)

Fool's Paradise. Unlawful pleasure, illicit love, vain hopes. Thus, in Romeo and Juliet, the Nurse says to Romeo, "If you should lead her [Juliet] into a fool's paradise, it were a gross . . . . behaviour." The old schoolmen said there were three places where persons not good enough for paradise were admitted: (1) The limbus patrum, for those good men who had died before the death of the Redeemer; (2) The limbus infantium or paradise of unbaptised infants; and (3) The limbus fatiœ rum or paradise of idiots and others who were non compos mentis. (See Limbo.)

Foolscap. A corruption of the Italian foglio-capo (folio-sized sheet). The error must have been very ancient, as the water-mark of this sort of paper from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century was a fool's head, with cap and bells.

Foot. (Greek, pod ; Latin, ped ; French, pied ; Dutch, voet ; Saxon, fot. Foot and pedal are variants of the same word.)

Best foot foremost. Use all possible dispatch. To "set on foot" is to set agoing. If you have various powers of motion, set your best foremost.

"Nay, but make haste ; the better foot before." Shakespeare : King John, iv. 2.

I have not yet got my foot in. I am not yet familiar and easy with the work. The allusion is to the preliminary exercises in the great Roman foot-race. While the signal was waited for, the candidates made essays of jumping, running, and posturing, to excite a suitable warmth and make their limbs supple. This was "getting their foot in" for the race. (See HANDLE.)

I have the measure or length of his foot. I know the exact calibre of his mind. The allusion is to the Pythagorean admeasurement of Hercules by the length of his foot. (See Ex PED.)

To light on one's feet. To escape a threatened danger. It is said that cats thrown from a height always light on their feet.

To put down your foot on [a matter]. Peremptorily to forbid it.

To show the clown foot. To betray an evil intention. The devil is represented with a clown foot.
Foot-breath. Turn away thy foot from the Sabbath (Isa. lviii. 13). Abstain from working and doing your own pleasure on that day. The allusion is to the law which prohibited a Jew from walking on a Sabbath more than a mile. He was to turn away his foot from the road and street.

Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour’s house, lest he get weary of thee, and so hate thee. Never outstay your welcome.

With one foot in the grave. In a dying state.

You have put your foot in it nicely. You have got yourself into a pretty mess. (In French, vous avez mis le pied astane.) When porridge is burnt or meat over-roasted, we say, “The bishop hath put his foot in.” (See Bishop.)

A foot. On the way, in progress. (See Game’s Afoot, Matter Afoot.)

“Mischief, thou art afoot, Take thou what course thou wilt.”

Foot-breath or Quern-biter. The sword of Thoralf Skollinson the Strong, a companion of Hak0 I. of Norway. (See Swines.)

Foot-lights. To appear before the foot-lights. On the stage, where a row of lights is placed in front along the floor to lighten it up.

Foot Monsters. In the Italian romance of Guerino Mecchi’no Indians are spoken of with feet so large that they carry them over their heads like umbrellas.

Foot-notes. Notes placed at the bottom of a page.

“A trifling sum of misery
Now added to the foot of thy account.”

Dryden

Foot-pound. The unit of result in estimating work done by machinery. Thus, if we take 1 lb, as the unit of weight and 1 foot as the unit of distance, a foot-pound would be 1 lb. weight raised 1 foot.

Foot of a Page. The bottom of it, meaning the notes at the bottom of a page.

Footing. He is on good footing with the world. He stands well with the world. This is a French phrase, Etre en un grand pied dans le monde. “Grand pied” means “large foot,” and the allusion is to the time of Henry VIII., when the rank of a man was designated by the size of his shoe—the higher the rank the larger the shoe. The proverb would be more correctly rendered, “He has a large foot in society.”

To pay your footing. To give money for drink when you first enter on a trade. Entry money for being allowed to put your foot in the premises occupied by fellow-craftsmen. This word is called foot-ale by ancient writers. (See Garnish.)

Footman’s Wand (A). (See Running Footmen.)

Footmen. (See Running Footmen.)

Fop’s Alley. The passage between the tiers of benches, right and left, in the Opera-house, frequented by maskers and other exquisites.

Foppington (Lord). An empty coax comb in Vanbrugh’s Relapse, of which Sheridan’s Trip to Scarborough is a modified version.

“The shoemaker in the Relapse tells Lord Foppington that his lordship is mistaken in supposing that his shoe pinches.” — Lord Macaulay.

Forbear. Ancestors, predecessors—i.e. those born before the present generation. (Anglo-Saxon, for-hun.)

“My name is Gromit, so please you.—Roland Grune, whose forefathers were designierte of Nestheerre, in the Delaistowle Land.”—Sir W. Scott: The abbot, chap. xviii.

Forbes, referred to by Thomson in his Seasons, was Duncan Forbes, of Cullo’den, lord president of the Court of Session. For many years he ruled the destinies and greatly contributed to the prosperity of Scotland. He was on friendly terms with Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, etc. The word is now generally pronounced as a monosyllable.

“Thou, Forbes, too, whom every word attends... Thy country trusts’st her winning arts Planned by thy wisdom, by thy soul informed.”

Thomson: Autumn.

Forbidden Fruit (The), Mahometan doctors aver, was the banana or Indian fig, because fig-leaves were employed to cover the disobedient pair when they felt shame as the result of sin. Called “Paradisica.” Metaphorically, unlawful = forbidden indulgence.

Forcible Feeble School. (See Feeble.)

Ford. Mr. and Mrs. Ford are characters in The Merry Wives of Windsor. Mrs. Ford pretends to accept Sir John Falstaff’s protestations of love, in order to punish him by her devices.

Ferdelis (in Orlando Furioso). Wife of Bran’dimart, Orlando’s intimate friend. When Bran’dimart was slain, Fore. To the fore. In the front rank; eminent.

"To come to the fore. To stand out prominently; to distinguish oneself; to stand forth.

Fore-and-Aft. Lengthwise, in opposition to "athwart-ships" (or across the line of the keel). (Dana : Seaman's Manual, p. 96.)

Forecastle. Ancient ships had a castle, as may be seen in the tapestry of the House of Lords, representing the Spanish Armada. The term forecastle means before the castle. The Romans called the castled ships navés turris.

"That part of the upper deck forward of the forecastle deck in merchant ships, the forward part of the vessel, under the deck, where the sailors live."—Dana : Seaman's Manual, p. 96.

Foreclose. To put an end to. A legal term, meaning to close before the time specified; e.g. suppose I held the mortgage of a man called A, and A fails to fulfill his part of the agreement, I can insist upon the mortgage being cancelled, foreclosing thus our agreement.

"The embargo with which foreclosed this trade."—Dinwiddie.

Foreshortened. Not viewed laterally, but more or less obliquely. Thus, a man's leg lying on the ground, with the sole of the foot nearer the artist than the rest of the body, would be perspective shortening.

"He forebids the fore-shortenings, because they make the parts appear little."—Dinwiddie.

Forfar. Do as the cow o' Forfar did, tak' a stannin' drink. A cow, in passing a door in Forfar, where a tub of ale had been placed to cool, drank the whole of it. The owner of the ale prosecuted the owner of the cow, but a learned baillie, in giving his decision, said, "As the ale was drunk by the cow while standing at the door, it must be considered deox an doruis (stirrup-cup), to make a charge for which would be to outrage Scotch hospitality." (Sir W. Scott : Waverley.)

Forget-me-nots of the Angels. The stars are so called by Longfellow. The similitude between a little light-blue flower and the yellow stars is very remote. Stars are more like buttercups than forget-me-nots.

"Silently, one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven. Bloom up the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels."—Evanj.ire.

Forgive, blest Shade. This very celebrated epitaph is in Braden churchyard, Isle of Wight, and is attributed to Mrs. Anne Steele (Thedoesa), daughter of a Baptist minister of Bristol, but was touched up by the Rev. John Gill, curate of Newchurch. Set to music in three parts by J. W. Calcott (1795).

Forgiveness. (Ang.-Sax., forgifnes.)

"Forgiveness to the injured doth belong. But they never pardon who have done the wrong."

Dryden : Conquest of Granada, part ii. act i. 2.

"Proprieum humani generis, odium quom habeas."—Tertullian.

Fork Out. Hand over; pay down; stand treat. Fingers are called forks, and this may suffice to explain the phrase; if not, we have the Anglo-Saxon verb fescon (to draw out, to take), and "fork out" would be "fescon out."

Forked Cap. (A). A bishop's mitre is, so called by John Skelton. It is cleft or forked.

Forlorn Hope. Cromwell says, "Our forlorn of horse marched within a mile of the enemy," i.e. our horse picket sent forward to reconnoitre approached within a mile of the enemy's camp. (German, verloren.)

Fork or Firlot. The fourth part of a boll. From fonevar (four), hit or (part).

Forma Pan'peris (Latin, Under plea of poverty). To sue in forma panperis. When a person has just cause of a suit, but is so poor that he cannot raise 2$, the judge will assign him lawyers and counsel without the usual fees.

Fortiter in Re (Latin). Firmness in doing what is to be done; an unflinching resolution to persevere to the Fortunato Islands. Now called the Càna-ries.

Fortunatus. You have found Fortunato’s purse. Are you luck’s way. The nursery tale of Fortunatus records that he had an inexhaustible purse. It is from the Italian fairy tales of Straparola, called Nights. Translated into French in 1585. (See Wishing Cup.)

Fortune. Fortune favours the brave. (Fortes fortuna adiuvat.) (Terence: Phormio, i. 4.)

Fortunio. The assumed name of a damsel, youngest of three sisters, who dressed herself as a cavalier to save her aged father, who was summoned to the army. Fortunio on the way engaged seven servants: Strong-back, who could carry on his back enough liquor to fill a river; Lightfoot, who could traverse any distance in no time; Marksman, who could hit an object at any distance; Fine-car, who could hear anything, no matter where uttered; Boisterer, who could do any amount of cudgelling; Gourmand, who could eat any amount of food; and Tippler, who could drink a river dry and thirst again. Fortunio, having rendered invaluable services to King Alfonrite, by the aid of her seven servants, at last married him. (Grimm’s Goblins: Fortune. Countess D’Artheny: Fairy Tales.)

Forty. A superstitious number, arising from the Scripture use. Thus Moses was forty days in the mount; Elijah was forty days fed by ravens; the rain of the flood fell forty days, and another forty days expired before Noah opened the window of the ark; forty days was the period of embalming; Nineveh had forty days to repent; our Lord fasted forty days; He was seen forty days after His resurrection; etc.

St. Swithin betokens forty days’ rain or dry weather; a quarantine extends to forty days; forty days, in the Old English law, was the limit for the payment of the fine for manslaughter; the privilege of sanctuary was for forty days; the widow was allowed to remain in her husband’s house for forty days after his decease; a knight enjoined forty days’ service of his tenant; a stranger, at the expiration of forty days was compelled to be enrolled in some tithing; members of Parliament were protected from arrest forty days after the prorogation of the House, and forty days before the House was convened; a new-made burgess had to forfeit forty pence unless he built a house within forty days; etc., etc.

The ancient physicians ascribe many strange changes to the period of forty; the alchemists looked on forty days as the charmed period when the philosopher’s stone and elixir of life were to appear.

Fool or physician at forty. (See under Fool.)

Forty Stripes save One. The Jews were forbidden by the Mosaic law to inflict more than forty stripes on an offender, and for fear of breaking the law they stopped short of the number. If the scourge contained three lashes, thirteen strokes would equal “forty save one.”

Forty Stripes save one. The thirty-nine articles of the Anglican Church.

Forty Thieves. In the tale of Ali Baba. (Arabian Nights’ Entertainments.)

Forty Winks. A short nap. Forty is an indefinite number, meaning a few. Thus, we say, “A, B, C, and forty more.” Coriolanus says, “I could beat forty of them” (iii. 1). (See Forty.)

“Th’slave had forty thousand lives.”

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii. 1.

“1 loved Ophelia; forty thousand brothers Could not, with all their quantity of love, Make up my sum.”

Forty-five. No. 45. The celebrated number of Wilkes’s North Britain, in which the Cabinet Ministers are accused of putting a lie into the king’s mouth.

Forwards (Marshall). G. L. von Blucher was called Marschall Vorwarts, from his constant exhortation to his hussars in the campaigns preceding the great battle of Waterloo. Vorwärts! always Vorwärts! (1742-1819.)

Foscarì (Francesco). Doge of Venice. He occupied the office for thirty-five years, added Brescia, Bergamo, Crema, and Rassonna to the Republic, greatly improved the city, and raised Venice to the pinnacle of its glory. Of his four sons only one, named Jacopo, survived; he was thrice tortured. Before his final banishment, the old doge, then eighty-four years of age, hobbled on crutches to the gaol where his son was confined, but would not mitigate the sentence of “The Ten.” His son, being banished to Candia, died, and Francis was deposed. As he descended the Giant Staircase he heard the bell toll for the election of his successor, and dropped down dead. (Byron: The Two Foscari.)
Jacofo Foscarin. Denounced by the Council of Ten for taking bribes of foreign powers. He was tried before his own father, confessed his guilt, and was banished. During his banishment a Venetian senator was murdered, and Jacofo, being suspected of complicity in the crime, was again tortured and banished. He returned to Venice, was once more brought before the council, subjected to torture, and banished to Candia, where in a few days he died.

"Nothing can sympathise with Foscarin—Not even a Foscarin."

Byron: The Two Foscari.

Foss (Corpsman). An attendant on Lieutenant Worthington. A similar character to Trim in Sterne's Tristram Shandy. (G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

Foss-way. One of the four principal highways made by the Romans in England, leading from Cornwall to Lincoln. It had a foss or ditch on each side of it. (See ERMIN STREET.)

Fossa et Furca [pit and galloway]. An ancient privilege granted by the Crown to its vassals, to cast female felons into a ditch, and hang male ones on a gallow.

According to Wharton (Law Dictionary), this foss is not the Latin word, but the Hebrew farkah, to divide. Hence also the servile tenure called Furcam et Flagellum.

Fossae. Things dug up, animal and vegetable remains dug out of the earth. (Latin, fodio, to dig up.)

"Many other bodies, which, because we discover them by digging into the bowels of the earth, are called by one common name—fossae, under which are comprehended metals and minerals." [Not now.—Lords.]

Foster Brother or Sister. One brought up by the same nurse.

A foster-child is one brought up by those who are not its real parents. (Saxon, fossrian, Danish foster, to nurse.)

Foul Drunk. "Wilbrahim has fun-drunk"—i.e. is desperately drunk, dead drunk. French, fou, "mad," as fou-enrage; or simply fit, i.e. "full," "intensive," as in full-of, "full-well ye reject the commandment of God" (Mark vii. 9).

Foul Proof. A proof is a rough impression of a manuscript set up in type, or of a drawing engraved, for the author's correction. The proof with many faults is a foul proof, but the "pull," after the errors are corrected, is termed a clean proof. These impressions are called proofs because they must be approved of by author and reader before they are finally printed.

Foul-weather Jack. Commodore Byron, said to be as notorious for foul weather as Queen Victoria is for fine. (1723-1786.)

Admiral Sir John Norris, who died 1746.

Fountain of Death. In Jerusalem Delivered, the hermit tells Charles and Ulboid of a fountain, the sight of which excites thirst, but those who taste its water die with laughter.

Pomponius Meleagus speaks of a fountain in the Fortunate Islands, "Qui potest aut riso solvere in mortem." Petrarck alludes to the same.

These fountains symbolize the pleasures of sin.

Fountain of Youth. A fountain supposed to possess the power of restoring youth. It was thought to be in one of the Bahama Islands.

Four Kings. The History of the Four Kings (Livre des Quatre Rois). A pack of cards. In a French pack the four kings are Charlemagne, David, Alexander, and Caesar, representatives of the Franco-German, Jewish or Christian, Macedonian, and Roman monarchies.

Four Letters, containing the name of God, and called by Rabbins "tetragrammaton." Thus, in Hebrew, JHVH (JeHoVaH); in Greek, Θεός; in Latin, Deus; in French, Dieu; in Assyrian, Adat; Dutch, Godt; German, Gott; Danish, Godt; Swedish, Gud; Persia, Soru; Arabic, Alla; Cabalistic, Agla; Egyptian, Θεός; Sanskrit, Deva; Spanish, Dios; Italian, Dio; Scandinavian, Odin, etc.

This probably is a mere coincidence, but it is worthy of note.

Four Masters. Michael and Cucoirighe o'Clerighe, Maurice and Fearsefa Coury, authors of the Annals of Dougal.

Fourierism. A communist system, so called from Charles Fourier, of Besançon. According to Fourier, all the world was to be caustioned into groups, called phalansteries, consisting each of 400 families or 1,800 individuals, who were to live in a common edifice, furnished with workshops, studios, and all sources of amusement. The several groups were at the same time to be associated together under a unitary government, like the Cantons of Switzerland or the States of America. Only one language was to be admitted; all the gains of each phalanstery were to belong to the common purse; and though talent and industry were to be rewarded, no one was to be suffered to remain ingent, or without the enjoyment of certain luxuries and, public amusement (1772-1837).

Fourierists. French communists, so-called from Charles Fourier. (See above.)

Fourteen, in its connection with Henri IV. and Louis XIV. The following are curious and strange coincidences:

Henri IV. 14 letters in the name Henri-de-Bourbon. He was the 14th king of France and Navarre on the extinction of the family of Navarre. He was born Dec. 4, 1553, and lived 14 years, and died on May 14, 1610; and lived 14 times 14 years, and 14 times 14 days.
14 May, 1552, was born Marguerite de Valois, his first wife.
14 May, 1560, the Parisians rose in revolt against him, because he was a heretic.
14 March, 1590, he won the great battle of Jery. 14 May, 1588, was organised a grand ecclesiastical and military demonstration against him, which drove him from the faubourgs of Paris. 14 Nov., 1596, the Sixteen took an oath to die rather than submit to a "heretic" king. It was Gregory XIV. who issued a Bull excluding Henri from the throne. 14 Nov., 1644, the Paris parliament registered the royal Bull. 14 Dec., 1610, the Duke of Savoy was reconciled to Henri IV.
14 Sept., 1608, was baptised the dauphin, afterwards Louis XIII., son of Henri IV.
14 May, 1610, Henry was assassinated by Ravaillec. For the dates see Histoire de France, by Bordeaux and Chirton (1820).

Louis XIV.
14th of the name. He mounted the throne 1661, born Dec. 4, 1661, and was on 1663, the sum of which figures equals 14. He died 1715, the sum of which figures also equals 14. He reigned 77 years, the sum of which figures equals 14. He was born 1638, died 1715, which added together equals 3353, the sum of which figures comes to 14. Such a strange combination is probably without parallel.

Fourteen Hundred (A Stock Exchange warning). It is to give notice that a stranger has entered 'Change. The term was in use in Defoe's time.

Fourth Estate of the Realm (The). The daily press. The most powerful of all. Burke, referring to the Reporters' Gallery, said, "Yonder sits the Fourth Estate, more important than them all."

Fourth of July (The). The great national holiday of the United States of America. The Declaration of Independence was July 4, 1776.

Fowler (Henry the Fowler). Heinrich I., King of Germany, was so called, because when the deputies announced to him his election to the throne, they found him fowling with a hawk on his fist (876, 919-936).

"This tradition is not mentioned by any historian before the eleventh century; but since that period numerous writers have repeated the story. He was called in Latin, Henricus Aecupa.

Fox (The old). Marshal Soulé was so nicknamed, from his strategic talents and fertility of resources. (1769-1831.) (See REYNARD.)

Fox. Antipathy to foxes. Speaking of natural antipathies, Shakespeare makes Shylock say:

"Some men there he love not a gaping pig,
Some that are mad if they behold a cat."

Tycho Brahé would faint at sight of a fox, Marshal d’Albret at sight of a pig, Henri III. at sight of a cat. (See ANTIPATHY.)

A wise fox will never rob his neighbour’s hen-roost, because it would soon be found out. He goes farther from home where he is not known.

Every fox must pay his skin to the furrier. The crafty shall be taken in their own williness.

"Tutte le volpi si trovano in pellicciera."—Italian Proverb.

To set a fox to keep the goose. (Latin, "Ovem ino committere.") He entrusted his money to sharpers.

Fox (That). So our Lord called Herod Antipas, whose crafty policy was thus pointed at, “Go ye, and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils” (St. Luke xiii. 32). (B.C. 4—A.D. 39.)

Herod Agrippa I. (A.D. 41-44.) Herod Agrippa II. (A.D. 52-100.)

Fox. An Old English broadsword. —A correspondent of Notes and Queries (May 2nd, 1891, p. 356) says: “The swords were manufactured by Julian del Rei of Toledo, whose trade-mark was a little dog, mistaken for a fox.” The usual derivation is the Latin fulx, French fauchon, our falchion.

"O signeur Dew, thou dost not point of fox, Except, O signeur, thou dost give to me Envious reason."—Shakespeare: Henry V. iv. 4.

"I had a sword, ay, the flower of Smithfield for a sword, a right fox! faith."—Two Angry Women of Abington (1650).

Fox (To). To steal or cheat; to fub; also "to shadow" a suspect; to watch without seeming so to do. A dog, a fox, and a weasel sleep, as they say, "with one eye open."
Fox-tail. I gave him a flap with a fox-tail. I cajoled him; made a fool of him. The fox-tail was one of the badges of the motley, and to flap with a fox-tail is to treat one like a fool.

Fox's Sleep (4). A sleep with one eye on the jus vice. Assumed indifference to what is going on. (See above.)

Foxed. A book stained with reddish-brown marks is said to be foxed. Of course, the stain is so called because it is of the colour of a fox.

Foxglove, called by the Welsh Fairy's glove and by the Irish Fairy-bells, is either a corruption of Folk's glove—i.e. the glove of the good folks or fairies, or else of the Saxon fox [glofa], red or fox-coloured glove. (French, gants de Notre Dame.)

Foxite (2 syll.). The Quakers. So called from George Fox, who organised the sect (1624-1690).

"His muse, framed of opposition stuff. Firm as a Foxite, would not lose its stuff."—Dr. Warton [Peter Pindar]: The Razor Seller.

Foxy. Strong-smelling, or red-haired; like a fox.

Fra Diavolo (Michele Pozza). A celebrated brigand and renegade monk, who evaded pursuit for many years amidst the mountains of Calabria. (1760-1806.) Auber has made him the subject of an opera.

Francanus. Father of Ferragus, the giant, and son of Morgante.

"Prima erat quidam Francanus profectum, cuius sapris esset Morgane venus nullius. Quo seceperunt, canem fecit ferus solitum. Cumque milia hominum caepit Francanus in monte."—Merlin Convivale e Thespide Feluncio, Historie Monumegue (1866).

Fraud'thio [Brother Doubt], says Sir John Spenser, wooed and won Duessa (False- faith); but one day, while she was bathing, discovered her to be a "filthy old hag," and resolved to leave her. False-faith instantly metamorphosed him into a tree, and he will never be relieved till "he can be bathed from the well of living water." (Faerie Queen, book i. 2.)

Frame of Mind. Disposition. A property's frame is a stand on which the type is disposed; a founder's frame is a mould into which molten metal is disposed or poured; a wrayer's frame is a loom where the silk or thread is disposed or stretched for quilting, etc.: a picture frame is an ornamental edging within which the picture is disposed; a mental frame, therefore, is the boundary within which the feelings of the mind are disposed. (Anglo-Saxon, fremm-æn.)

France. The heraldic device of the city of Paris is a ship. As Sauval says, "L'ile de la cité est faite comme un grand navire enfoncé dans la vase, et échoué au fil de l'eau vers le milieu de la Seine." This form of a ship struck the heraldic scribes, who in the latter part of the Middle Ages emblazoned a ship on the shield of Paris.

Francosca. A Venetian maiden, daughter of Minotti, governor of Corinth. She loved Alp, and tried to restore him to his country and faith; but, as he refused to recant, gave him up, and died broken-hearted. (Byron: Siege of Corinth.)

Francesca da Rimini. Daughter of Guido da Polenta, Lord of Ravenna. Her story is told in Dante's Inferno (canto v.). She was married to Lanciott Malatesta, Lord of Rimini, but committed adultery with Paolo, her husband's brother. Both were put to death by him in 1389. Leigh Hunt has a poem, and Silvio Pellico a tragedy, on the subject.

Francis's Distemper (St.). Impenitence; being moneyless. Those of the Order of St. Francis were not allowed to carry any money about them.

"I saw another case of gentlemen of St. Francis's disorder."—Bérenger: Pantagruel, v. 21.

Franciscans, or Minorites (3 syll.). Founded in 1208 by St. Francis of Assisi, who called poverty "his bride." Poverty was the ruling-principle of the order. Duns Scotus, Roger Bacon, Cardinal Ximenes, Ganganelli, etc., were of this order.

Called Franciscans, from the name of their founder.

"Minorites, from their profound humility. Grey Franks, from the colour of their coat at.

"Mendicants, because they were one of the Begging or mendicant order.

"The Franciscan Sisters were known as Clares, or Poor Clares, Minories, Mendicants, and Urbanites.

Frangipani. A powerful Roman family. So called from their benevolent distribution of bread during a famine.

Frangipani. A delicious perfume, made of spices, orris-root, and musk, in imitation of real Frangipani. Mutio Frangipani, the famous Italian botanist, visited the West Indies in 1493. The sailors perceived a delicious fragrance as they neared Antigua, and Mutio told them it proceeded from the Pho-me'sis Alba. The plant was re-named Frangipani, and the distilled essence received the same name.

Frangipani Pudding is pudding made of broken bread. (Frangere, to break; panis, bread.)

Frank, A name given by the Turks, Greeks, and Arabs to any of the inhabitants of the western parts of Europe, as the English, Italians, Germans, Spaniards, French, etc.

Frank Pledge. Neighbours bound for each other's good conduct. Hallam says every ten men in a village were answerable for each other, and if one of them committed an offence the other nine were bound to make reparation.
The word means the security given by Franklin or free-men.

Frankeleyens Tale, in Chaucer, resembles one in Boccaccio (Decameron, Day x. No. 5), and one in the fifth book of his Philoephe. (See Doriyen.)

Frank enumerated. 3 syl. A young student, who made a soulless monster out of fragments of men picked up from churchyards and dissecting-rooms, and ended it with life by galvanism. The tale, written by Mrs. Shelley, shows how the creature longed for sympathy, but was shunned by everyone. It was only animal life, a parody on the creature man, powerful for evil, and the instrument of dreadful retribution on the student, who usurped the prerogative of the Creator.

"The Southern Confederacy will be the soulless monster of Frankensteins."—Charles Sumner.

Mrs. Shelley, unfortunately, has given no name to her monster, and therefore he is not unfrequently called "Frankenstein" when alluded to. This, of course, is an error, but Frankensteins monster is a clumsy substitute.

"I believe it would be impossible to control the Frankenstein who should have creatures created."—
Sir John Lubbock (a speech, 1886).

Frankforters. People of Frankfort.

Franklin, The Polish Franklin,
Thaddaeus Czacki (1765-1813).

Frankum's Night. A night in June destructive to apple- and pear-trees.
The tale is that one Frankum offered sacrifices in his orchard for an extra fine crop, but a blight ensued, and his trees were unproductive.

Frantic. Brain-struck (Greek, phren, the heart as the seat of reason), madness being a disorder of the understanding.
"Cebot's frantic rites have made them mad."— Spencer.

Fraserian. One of the eighty-one celebrated literary characters of the 19th century published in Fraser's Magazine
(1830-1838). Amongst them are Harrison
Ainsworth, the countess of Blessington,
Brewster, Brougham, Bulwer, Campbell,
Carlyle, Cobbett, Coleridge, Cruikshank, Allan Cunningham, D'Israeli (both Isaac and Benjamin), Faraday, Gleig, Mrs.
S. C. Hall, Hobhouse, Hogg (the Ettrick shepherd), Theodore Hook, Leigh Hunt,
Washington Irving, Knowles, Charles
Lamb, Miss Landon, Dr. Lardner,
Lockhart, Harriet Martineau, Dr.
Moir, Molesworth, Robert Montgomery,
Thomas Moore, Jane Porter, Sir Walter
Scott, Sydney Smith, Talfourd, Talley-rand, Alaric Watts, Wordsworth, and others to the number of eighty-one.

Fraserian Group (The) consists of twenty-seven persons: Maginn, On his right hand, Washington Irving, Mahony, Gleig, Sir E. Blydges, Carlyle, and Count d'Orsay. On his left hand, Barry
Cornwall. Southey, Perceval Banks,
Thackeray, Churchill, Serjeant Murphy,
Mackintosh, and Harrison Ainsworth.
Opposite are Coleridge, Hogg, Galt, Dunlap, Jordan, Fraser, Croker, Lockhart, Theodore Hook, Brewster, and Moir.

Frater. An Almam-man (q.v.).
(Latin, frater, a brother, one of the same community or society.)

Frater'scot'to. A fiend mentioned by Edgar in the tragedy of King Lear.
"Frater'scot'to calls me, and tells me Nemo is an anvil in the lake of darkness. Pray, lanceon, and beware of the foul fiend."—Act iii. 6

Fraternity. The refectory of a monastery, or chief room of a frater-house.
A Frater is a member of a fraternity or society of monks. (Latin, frater, a brother.)

Fratiocelliants [Little Brethren]. A sect of the Middle Ages, who claimed to be the only true Church, and threw off all subjection to the Pope, whom they denounced as an apostate. They wholly disappeared in the fifteenth century.

Fre'a. The Anglo-Saxon form of Frigga, wife of Odin. Our Friday is Fre'a's daey.

Free. A free and easy. A social gathering where persons meet together without formality to chat and smoke.

Free Bench (francus bancus). The widow's right to a copyhold. It is not a dower or gift, but a free right independent of the will of the husband. Called bench because, upon acceding to the estate, she becomes a tenant of the manor, and one of the benchers, i.e., persons who sit on the bench occupied by the partes curiae.

Free Coup (in Scotland) means a piece of waste land where rubbish may be deposited free of charge.

Free Lances. Roving companies of knights, etc., who wandered from place to place, after the Crusades, selling their services to anyone who would pay for them. In Italy they were termed Condottierì.

Free Lances of Life (The). The Aspasia of fashion. The fair frail demi-monde.

Free Spirit. Brethren of the Free Spirit. A fanatical sect, between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries, diffused through Italy, France, and Germany. They claimed “freedom of spirit,” and based their claims on Romans viii. 2-14, “The law of the Spirit hath made me free from the law of sin and death.”

Free Trade. The Apostle of Free Trade. Richard Cobden (1804-63).

Freebooter means a free rover, (Dutch, buiter, to rove, whence vrijbuiten; German, freiheit, etc.)

“His forces consisted mostly of base people and freecutters.”—Bacon.

Freeholds. Estates which owe no duty or service to any lord but the sovereign. (See Copyhold.)

Freeman (Mrs.). A name assumed by the Duchess of Marlborough in her correspondence with Queen Anne. The queen called herself Mrs. Morley.

Freeman of Bucks. A cuckold. The allusion is to the buck’s horn. (See Horns.)

Freeman’s Quay. Drinking at Freeman’s Quay. (See Drinking.)

Freemasons. In the Middle Ages a guild of masons specially employed in building churches. Called “free” because exempted by several papal bulls from the laws which bore upon common craftsmen, and exempt from the burdens thrown on the working classes.

St. Paul’s, London, in 604, and St. Peter’s, Westminster, in 605, were built by Freemasons. Gundulph (bishop of Rochester), who built the White Tower, was a “Grand Master;” so was Peter of Colechurch, architect of Old London Bridge. Henry VII’s chapel, Westminster, was the work of a Master Mason; so were Sir Thomas Gresham (who planned the Royal Exchange), Inigo Jones, and Sir Christopher Wren. Covent Garden theatre was founded in 1608 by the Prince of Wales in his capacity of “Grand Master.”

“Before the beginning of the 13th century the corporation of Freemasons was not sufficiently organized to have had much influence on art.”—J. Ferguson: Historic Archeology, vol. i. part ii. chap. viii. p. 327.

The lady Freemason was the Hon. Miss Elizabeth St. Leger, daughter of Lord Doueraile, who (says the tale) hid herself in an empty clock-case when the lodge was held in her father’s house, and witnessed the proceedings. She was discovered, and compelled to submit to initiation as a member of the craft.

Freepost (Sir Andrew). A London merchant, industrious, generous, and of great good sense. He was one of the members of the hypothetical club under whose auspices the Spectator was published.

Freestone is Portland stone, which cuts freely in any direction.

Freethinker. One who thinks unbiassed by revelation or ecclesiastical canons, as deists and atheists.

“Atheist is an old-fashioned word. I am a freethinker.”—Addison.

Freezing-point. We generally mean by this expression that degree of Fahrenheit’s thermometer which indicates the temperature of frozen water—viz. 32° above zero. If we mean any other liquid we add the name, as the freezing-point of milk, sulphuric ether, quicksilver, and so on. In Centigrade and Röntgen’s instruments zero marks the freezing-point.

Freischütz (pronounce fry-shootz), the free-shooter, a legendary German archer in league with the Devil, who gave him seven balls, six of which were to hit infallibly whatever the marksman aimed at, and the seventh was to be directed according to the will of his co-partner. F. Kind made the libretto, and Weber set to music, the opera based on the legend, called Der Freischütz.

Freki and Geri. The two wolves of Odin.

French Cream. Brandy. In France it is extremely general to drink after dinner a cup of coffee with a glass of brandy in it instead of cream. This “patent digester” is called Gloria.
French Leave. To take French leave. To take without asking leave or giving any equivalent. The allusion is to the French soldiers, who in their invasions take what they require, and never wait to ask permission of the owners or pay any price for what they take.

The French retort this courtesy by calling a creditor an Englishman un Anglois, a term in vogue in the sixteenth century, and used by Clement Marot. Even to the present hour, when a man excuses himself from entering a café or theatre, because he is in debt, he says: "Non, non! je suis Anglò" ("I am cleared out "."

"Et aujourd'hui je faietz solliciter

Tous mes anglais.

Guillaume Crotet (1520).

French leave. Leaving a party, house, or neighbourhood without bidding good-by to anyone; to slip away unnoticed.

"And French, she (the nun) spak ful, fastro and fetcly.

After the scote of Stratford atte Bowe,

For French, Pury was to hire unknowne."

Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (The Prologue).

Frenchman. Done like a Frenchman, turn and turn again (1 Henry VI., iii. 4). The French are usually satirised by medieval English authors as a fickle, wandering nation. Dr. Johnson says he once read a treatise the object of which was to show that a weathercock is a satire on the word Gallus (a Gaul or cock).

Frenchman. The nickname of a Frenchman is "Crupaud" (q.v.), "Johnny" or "Jean", "Mossoe", "Robert Macauro" (q.v.); but of a Parisian "Grenouille" (Frog). (See Brissotina.)

They stand erect, they dance wherever they walk.

Monkeys in action, parroquets in talk."

Tales.

French Canadian, "Jean Baptiste."

French Peasantry, "Jacques Bonhomme.

French Reformers, "Brissotins" (q.v.).

Fres co-painting means fresh-painting, or rather paint applied to walls while the plaster is fresh and damp. Only so much plaster must be spread as the artist can finish painting before he retires for the day. There are three chambers in the Pope's palace at Rome done in fresco by Raphael Urbino and Julio Roma'no; at Fontainebleau there is a famous one, containing the travels of Ulysses in sixty pieces, the work of several artists, as Bollames'o, Martin House, and others.

"A fading fresco here demands a sigh."

Pope.

Frenchman, at college, is a man not salted. It was anciently a custom in the different colleges to play practical jokes on the new-comers. One of the most common was to assemble them in a room and make them deliver a speech. Those who acquitted themselves well had a cup of caudle; those who passed muster had a caudle with salt water; the rest had the salt water only. Without scanning so deeply, "french-man" may simply mean a fresh or new student. (See BEJAN.)

Freston. An enchantor introduced into the romance of Don Barti'nis of Greece.

"Truly I can't tell whether it was Freston or Frestuan; but I am sure that his name ended in ton."—Don Quixote.

Frey. Son of Niurd, the Van. He was the Scandinavian god of fertility and peace, and the dispenser of rain. Frey was the patron god of Sweden and Iceland, he rode on the boar Gullinbursti, and his sword was self-acting. (See GERDA.)

Niurd was not of the Eor. He, with his son and daughter, presided over the sea, the clouds, the air, and water generally. They belonged to the Vanir.

Freyja. Daughter of Niurd, goddess of love. She was the wife of Odin, who deserted her because she loved funny better than she loved her husband. Her chariot was drawn by two cats, and not by doves like the car of Venus. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Friar. A curtal Friar. (See CURNAL.)

Friar, in printing. A part of the sheet which has failed to receive the ink, and is therefore left blank. As Caxton set up his printing-press in Westminster Abbey, it is but natural to suppose that monks and friars should give foundation to some of the printers' slang. (See Monk.)

Friar Bungay is an historical character overlaid with legends. It is said that he "raised mists and vapours which befriended Edward IV. at the battle of Barnet."

"[Friar Bungay in] the personification of the charlatan of science in the 15th century."—Lord Lytton [Bulwer Lytton]: The Last of the Barons.

Friar Dom'ino, in Dryden's Spanish Friar, designed to ridicule the vices of the priesthood.
Friar Gerund. Designed to ridicule the pulpit oratory of Spain in the eighteenth century; full of quips and cranks, tricks and startling monstrosities. (Joseph Isla: Life of Friar Gerund, 1714-1788.)

Friar John. A tall, lean, wide-mouthed, long-nosed friar of Seville, who dispatched his matins with wonderful celerity, and ran through his vigils quicker than any of his fraternity. He swore lustily, and was a Trojan to fight. When the army from Lerne pillaged the convent vineyard, Friar John seized the staff of a cross and pummelled the rogues most lustily. He beat out the brains of some, crushed the arms of others, battered their legs, crucked their ribs, gashed their faces, broke their thighs, tore their jaws, dashed in their teeth, dislocated their joints, that never corn was so mauled by the thresher's flail as were these pillagers by the "baton of the cross." (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, book i. 27.)

"If a joke more than usually profane is to be uttered, Friar John is the spokesman... A mass of jocundities, dauntless, profanity, and valour."—Foreign Quarterly Review.

Friar Laurence, in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

Friar Rush. A house-spirit, sent from the infernal regions in the seventeenth century to keep the monks and friars in the same state of wickedness they were then in. The legends of this roysterer are of German origin. (Bruder Rausch, brother Tipple.)

Friar Tuck. Chaplain and steward of Robin Hood. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Ivanhoe. He is a pudgy, paunchy, humorous, self-indulgent, and combative clerical Falstaff. His costume consisted of a russet habit of the Franciscan order, a red corded girdle with gold tassel, red stockings, and a wallet. A friar was nicknamed tuck, because his dress was tucked by a girdle at the waist. Thus Chaucer says, "Tucked he was, as is a friar about."

"In this our spacious isle I think there is not one But he hath heard some talk of Hood and Little John; Of Tuck, the merry friar, which many a sermon made In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaw, and their trade."—Drayton: Polyhymnia, p. 25.

Friar's Hoe. The outstanding upright stone at Stonehenge is so called. Geoffrey of Monmouth says the devil bought the stones of an old woman in Ireland, wrapped them up in a wyth, and brought them to Salisbury plain. Just before he got to Mount Ambre the wyth broke, and one of the stones fell into the Avon, the rest were carried to the plain. After the fiend had fixed them in the ground, he cried out, "No man will ever find out how these stones came here." A friar replied, "That's more than thee canst tell," whenupon the foul fiend threw one of the stones at him and struck him on the heel. The stone stuck in the ground, and remains so to the present hour.

Friar's Lantern. Sir W. Scott calls Jack o'Lantern Friar Rush. This is an error, as Rush was a domestic spirit, and not a field spirit. He got admittance into monasteries, and played the monks sad pranks, but is never called "Jack." Sir Walter Scott seems to have considered Friar Rush the same as "Friar with the Rush (light)," and, therefore, Friar with the Lantern or Will o' the Wisp.

"Better we had through mire and rush been banished, led by Friar Rush."—Sir Walter Scott: Marmion.

Sir Milton also (in his L'AlLEGRO) calls Will o' the Wisp a friar, probably meaning Friar Rush:

"She was pinched, and pulled she said;
And he by Friar's lantern led."

but "Rush" in this name has nothing to do with the verb rush [about] or rush [light]. It is the German Bruder Rausch, called by the Scandinavians Broder Raus. (Scandinavian runes, intoxication, in German rausch), which shows us at once that Friar Rush was the spirit of inebriety. (See Robin Goodfellow.)

Friars (brothers). Applied to the four great religious orders — Dominicans, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Carmelites. Later, a fifth order was added—that of the Trinitarians. The first two were called Black and Grey friars, the Carmelites were called White friars, and the Trinitarians Crchted friars (q.v.).

Friars. (See Black.)

Friars Major (Fratres majoris). The Dominicans.

Friars Minor (Fratres minoris). The Franciscans.

Friar's Tale. A certain archdeacon had a sumpnoir, who acted as his secret spy, to bring before him all offenders. One day as he was riding forth on his business he met the devil disguised as a yeoman, swore eternal friendship, and promised to "go snacks" with him. They first met a carter whose cart stuck in the road, and he cried in his anger, "The devil take it, both horse and cart and hay!" Soon the horse drew it out of the slough, and the man cried, "God bless you, my brave boy!" "There," said the devil, "is my own true brother, the churl spake one thing but he thought another." They next came to an old screw, and the sumpoun declared he would squeeze twelve pence out of her for sin, "though of her he knew no wrong;" so he knocked at her door and summoned her "for cursing" to the archdeacon's court, but said he would overlook the matter for twelve pence, but she pleaded poverty and implored mercy. "The foul fiend fetch me if I excuse thee," said the sumpoun, whereat the devil replied that he would fetch him that very night, and seizing him round the body, made off with him. (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales.)

Fribble. An effeminate coxcomb of weak nerves, in Garrick's farce of Miss in Her Teens.

Friday is the Mahometan Sabbath. It was the day on which Adam was created and our Lord was crucified. The Sab'ans consecrate it to Venus or Astartë. (See Frea.)

* Friday is Fri-dag or Frédag, called in French Vendredi, which means the same thing. It was regarded by the Scandinavians as the luckiest day of the week. (See below, Friday, Unlucky.)

Friday. Fairies and all the tribes of elves of every description, according to medieval romance, are converted into hideous animals on Friday, and remain so till Monday. (See the romance of Guérouléd Moths'no, and others.)

Blak Monday. (See Black.)

Long Friday. Good Friday, long being a synonym of great. Thus Mrs. Quickly says, "Tis a long loan for a poor lone woman to bear" (2 Henry IV. ii. 1), and the Scotch proverb, "Between you and the long day"—i.e. the great or judgment day. Good Friday in Danish is Langfredag, and in Swedish Längfredag.

Friday. A man Friday. A faithful and submissive attendant, ready to turn his hand to anything.
My man Friday. The young savage found by Robinson Crusoe on a Friday, and kept as his servant and companion on the desert island.

Friday Street (London). The street of fishmongers who served Friday markets. (Stow.)

Friday and Columbus.
Friday, August 3rd, 1492, Columbus started on his voyage of discovery. Friday, October 12th, 1606, he first sighted land. Friday, January 4th, 1603, he started on his return journey. Friday, March 13th, 1609, he safely arrived at Palos. Friday, November 22nd, 1610, he reached Hispaniola in his second expedition.

Friday, June 13th, 1894, he discovered the continent of America.

Friday and the United States.
Friday, June 17th, 1775, was fought the battle of Bunker's Hill.
Friday, July 11th, 1776, the motion was made by John Adams that the United States are and ought to be independent.
Friday, October 17th, 1777, Saratoga surrendered.
Friday, September 22nd, 1780, the treason of Arnold was exposed.

- To these Fridays should be added:
Friday, July 13th, 1600, the Great Eastern sailed from Valencia, and on Friday, July 27th, 1600, landed safely with the cable at Heart's Ease, Newfoundland.

Friday a Lucky Day. Sir William Churchill says, "Friday is my lucky day. I was born, christened, married, and knighted on that day; and all my best accidents have befallen me on a Friday."

- In Scotland Friday is a choice day for weddings. Not so in England.

He who laughs on Friday will weep on Sunday. Sorrow follows in the wake of joy. The line is taken from Racine's comedy of Les Plaidereurs.

Friday, an Unlucky Day. Because it was the day of our Lord's crucifixion; it is accordingly a fast-day in the Roman Catholic Church. Soames says, "Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit on a Friday, and died on a Friday." (Augla-son Church, p. 255.)

"But once on a Friday last (as they say),
A day of no misfortune is apt to fail,
Verse: Good Day of Brexit, stanza 3.

- In Spain, Friday is held to be an unlucky day. So is it esteemed by Buddhists and Brahmins. The Old Romans called it nefas, from the utter overthrow of their army at Gallia Narbonensis. And in England the proverb is that a Friday moon brings foul weather.

Friend (A). The second in a duel, as "Name your friend," "Captain B. acted as his friend."

"Mr. Balfour was to have acted as Disraeli's friend, if there had been a duel between that statesman and Daniel O'Connell."—Newspaper paragraphs (December, 1882).

Better kinder friend than friend kinde (motto of the Waterton family) means "better kind friend (i.e. neighbour) than a kinsman who dwells in foreign parts."
Probably it is Prov. xxvii. 10, "Better is a neighbour that is near, than a Friend at Court

brother far off," in which case friend would be = stranger. Better a kind friend than a kinsman who is a stranger.

Friend at Court properly means a friend in a court of law who watches the trial, and tells the judge if he can note out an error; but the term is more generally applied to a friend in the royal court, who will whisper a good word for you to the sovereign at the proper place and season. (See Amicus Curiae.)

Friend in Need (A) A friend in need is a friend indeed, "Amicus certus in re incerta servitor."

Friend of Man. Marquis de Mirabeau. So called from one of his works, L’Ami des Hommes (5 vols.). This was the father of the great Mirabeau, called by Barbaire "the Shakespeare of eloquence." (1715-1789.)

Friends ... Enemies. Our friends the enemy. When, on April 1, 1814, the allied armies entered Paris, Sir George Jackson tells us he heard a viva pass along the streets, and the shout "vos amis, vos ennemis."

Friendly Suit (A). A suit brought by a creditor against an executor, to compel the creditors to accept an equal distribution of the assets.

Friendship (Examples of):

Archilles and Patroclus, Greeks
Anna and Amynion (q.v.), Etruscan History
Baron (Fra Bartholdew) and Matthias, artists
Bird and Gratia
Burke and Dr Johnson.
Christ and the "Beloved disciple," New Testament
Danton and Pythias, Struggle
David and Jonathan, Old Testament
Dionysus and Cybele, Greeks
Eumonomus and Polyphnesia, Greeks
Goethe and Schiller. (See Carlyle: Schiller, 1840.)
Hudson and Antipous,
Harmodius and Aracagni, Greeks
Hercules (Herakles) and Iphicles, Greeks
Homeric (q.v.) and Iliad Greeks
Maurice (F. D.) and C. Kingsley
Montaigne and Brene de la Boëtie, French
Neuus and Herculis, Trojans
Pythias and Orestes, Greeks
Socrates and Anaxarchus, Greeks
Sehrius and Alexander, Greeks
Thebes (q.v.) and Patroclus, Greeks
William of Orange and Bentinck (See Macaulay: History, 1, 411.)

Friendships Broken (Eng. Hist.)

Elizabeth and the Earl of Essex,
Henry II. and Thomas Becket,
Henry VII, and Cardinal Wolsey,
Newman (J. H.) and Whitley,
Wesley and Whitefield.

Other examples in other histories might be added; as

Brutus and Cassar,
Launcelot III. and Otho IV. (See Milman: Latin Christianity, vol. V. p. 254.)

Frigga, in the genealogy of Æsir, is the supreme goddess, wife of Odin, and daughter of the giant Ængwyn. She presides over marriages, and may be called the Juno of Asgard. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Frilingi. The second rank of people among the ancient Saxons. (See Ethnology.)

Fringo. The Jews wore fringes to their garments. These fringes on the garments of the priests were accounted sacred, and were touched by the common people as a charm. Hence the desire of the woman who had the issue of blood to touch the fringe of our Lord’s garment. (Matt. ix. 20-22.)

Frippery. Rubbish of a tawdry character; worthless finery; foolish levity. A friperer or frapperer is one who deals in frippery, either to sell or clean old clothes. (French, friperic, old clothes and cast-off furniture.)

"We know what befoeces to a fripperer," Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, 1.

"Old clothes, cast dresses, tattered rags, whose works are men the frappers of all," Ben Jonson.

Frippery properly means rags and all sorts of odds and ends. French, fr超出 (a rag), fr corresponds (old clothes and furniture), friper (a broker of old clothes, etc.). Applied to pretty. Eugène Grandet says, "En Angle la ‘frippe’ exprime l’accompagnement du pauvre, depuis le beurre plus distingué des frappes."

Friskot. The light frame of the printing-press, which folds down upon the tympan (q.v.) over the sheet of paper to be printed. It is printed in two-fold to hold the sheet in its place and to keep the margins clean. It is called frisket because it frisks or skips up and down very rapidly, i.e., the pressman opens it and shuts it over with great alacrity, the movement being called "flying the frisket."

Frith. By frith and fell. By holt and wild, wood and common. Frith is the Welsh frith or fiath, and means a "woody place." Fell is the German fels (rock), and means barren or stony places, a common.

Frithiof (pron. Frith-yoff) means "peace-maker." In the Icelandic myths he married Ingerborg (In-ger-boy’-co), the daughter of a petty king of Norway, and widow of Hring, to whose dominions he succeeded. His adventures are recorded in the Saga which bears his name, and which was written at the close of the thirteenth century.

Frithiof's Sword. Angvra'adel (stream of anguish). (See Sword.)

Fritz. (Old Fritz). Frederick II. the Great, King of Prussia (1712, 1740-1786).

Frog. A frog and mouse agreed to settle by single combat their claims to a marsh; but, while they fought, a kite carried them both off. (ESOP: Fables, clxviii.)

"Old Esop's fable, where he said what fate uto the mouse and frog befell..."

Frogs. (The Dutchman not Frenchman) in Arbuthnot's History of John Bull. Frogs are called "Dutch nightingales."

Frog's March. Carrying an obstreperous prisoner, face downwards, by his four limbs.

Frogs. Frenchmen, properly Parisians. So called from their ancient heraldic device, which was three frogs or three toads. "Qu'en disent les grenouilles!"—What will the frogs (people of Paris) say?—was in 1791 a common court phrase at Versailles. There was a point in the pleasantness when Paris was a quaisnère, called Latétrie (mud-land) because, like frogs or toads, they lived in mud, but now it is quite an anomaly. (See CRAPAUD.)

Frogs. The Lycian shepherds were changed into frogs for mocking Latoina. (Oral: Metamorphoses, vi. 1.)

"As when those Titans that were transformed to Frogs..."

Frogs. It may be all fun to you, but it is death to the frogs. The allusion is to the fate of a boy stoning frogs for his amusement.

Frollo. (Archdeacon Claude). A priest who has a great reputation for sanctity, but falls in love with a gipsy girl, and pursues her with relentless persecution because she will not yield to him. (Victor Hugo: Notre Dame de Paris.)

Fronde. (1 syl.). A political squabble during the ministry of Cardinal Mazzarini, in the minority of Louis XIV. (1648-1659). The malcontents were called Frondeurs, from a witty illustration of a councillor, who said that they were "like schoolboys who sling stones about the streets. When no eye is upon them they are bold as bullies; but the moment a 'policeman' approaches, away they scamper to the ditches for concealment." (Montglat). The French for a sling is fronde, and for slingers, fondeurs.

"It was already true that the French government was a despotism, and as speculators and hypocrites were launched by persons who tried to hide after they had had their due, some one compared them to children with a fronde (fronde), who let fly a stone and run away."—C. M. Yorke: History of France, chap. viii. p. 130.

Frondeur. A backbiting, one who throws stones at another.

Frost. (See Horse.)

Frost. Jack Frost. The personification of frost.

"Jack Frost looked forth one still, clear night, and he said, 'Now I shall be out of sight; so over the valley and over the height in silence I'll take my way.'"—Miss Gould

Frost Saints. (See Ice Saints.)

Froth. (Master). "A foolish gentleman" in Measure for Measure.

Froth. (Lord Froth). A pompous coxcomb in The Double Dealer, by Congreve.

Fronde's Cat. This cat wanted to know what was good for life, and everyone gave her queer answers. The owl said, "Meditate, O cat!" and so she tried to meditate which could have come first, the fowl or the egg. (Short Studies on Great Subjects.)

"If I were wise like Fronde's cat, What is my duty? you would answer, I suppose, like the sanguine annual in the parable, 'Get your own dunce.' That is my duty, I suppose."—Eden Law, Donor, chap iv.

Frozen. Architecture. So called by F. Schlegel.

Frozen Words. appears to have been a household joke with the ancient Greeks, for Antiphon applies it to the discourses of Plato: "As the cold of certain cities is so intense that it freezes the very words we utter, which remain concealed till the heat of summer thawed them, so the mind of youth is so thoughtless that the wisdom of Plato lies frozen, as it were, till it is thawed by the ripened judgment of mature age." (Plutarch's Morals.)

"The moment their backs were turned, little Jacob thawed, and renewed his striving from the point where Quivy and frozen him.—Dickens, Old Curiosity Shop.

"Truth in person both appear Like words engrossed in northern air..."

(Latté: Thibauts, vi. 1, lines 145-8)

Everyone knows the incident of the "frozen horn" related by Mnemuchen.

"Pantagruel and his companions, on the confines of the Frozen Sea, heard the uproar of a battle, which had been frozen the preceding winter, released by a thaw. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, book iv. chap 56.)"
Frumentius (St.). Apostle of Ethiopia and the Abyssinians in the fourth century.

Fry. Children (a word of contempt). Get away, you young fry. It means properly a crowd of young fishes, and its application to children should be limited to those that obstruct your path, crowd about you, or stand in your way. (French, frit, spawn.)

Nothing to fry with (French). Nothing to eat: nothing to live on. (See Wide-noshtis.)

Frying-pan. Out of the frying-pan into the fire. In trying to extricate yourself from one evil, you fall into a greater. The Greeks used to say, "Out of the smoke into the flame;" and the French say, "Tomber de la poêle dans la bruine."

Fub. To steal, to preg. (French, fourbu, "a few who conceal a trap;" fourber, "to cheat;" four, "a false pocket for concealing stolen goods.")

Fuchs [a far]. A freshman of the first year in the German University. In the second year he is called a Bursch.

Fudge. Not true, stuff, make-up. (Gaelic, fig, deception; Welsh, flug, pretence; whence figuer, a pretender or deceiver.) A word of contempt bestowed on one who says what is absurd or untrue. A favourite expression of Mr. Burchell in the View of Wakefield.

Fudge Family. A series of metric al epistles by Thomas Moore, purporting to be written by a family on a visit to Paris. Sequel, The Fudge Family in England.

Fuel. Adding fuel to fire. Saving or doing something to increase the anger of a person already angry. The French say, "pouring oil on fire."

Fuga ad Saloons. (A). An affectation or pretence of denial; as, when Caesar thrice refused the crown in the Lurpercal. A "nolo epseepari." The allusion is to—

"Ved me dudat et peti, lastica puella, Et fugit ad salices et se exspectat ante videm;"
Virgil: Aeni, iv, 274, 276.

"Cramner was not prepared for so great and sudden an elevation. Under pretence that the king's affairs still required his presence absent, he lamented six months longer, in the hope that Henry might consult the council to some other hand. There was no affectation in this—no fuga ad salines. Ambition is made of sterner stuff than the spirit of Cramner."—Blunt: Reformations in England, 126.
